E14286

THE LIFE

œ

MARIE DE MEDICIS,

QUBEN OF FRANCE.

VOL. I.

Land Quen of Money 4th of Strange

THE LIFE

QP.

MARIE DE MEDICIS,

QUEEN OF FRANCE,

CONSORT OF HENRY IV., AND REGENT OF THE KINGDOM UNDER LOUIS XIII.

BY MISS PARDOE,

AUSSION OF

"160H 127. AND THE COURT OF THE SULEN," Se.
"THE COST OF THE SULEN," Se.

IN THREE VOLUMES: VOL. L

LONDON: COLBURN AND CO., PUBLISHERS, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

1862.

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES BECKET,

(OF REVER COURT, KENT,)

THESE VOLUMES

ARE VERY APPROTIONATELY INSCRIBED,

BT

THE AUTHOR.

PREFACE.

ALL the existing records of European royalty do not, probably, comprise the annals of a life of greater vicissitude than that which has been chosen as the subject of the present work. We find numerous examples in History of queens who have suffered exile, imprisonment, and death; but we believe that the unfortunate Marie de _____ is the only authenticated instance of a total abandonment on the part alike of her family and friends, which terminated almost in starvation. Certain it is that after having occupied the throne of France, presided over its councils, and given birth to of a long line of princes, was ultimately the sympathy and attachment of a foreign artist, of whom she had once been the zealous patron, for a roof under which to terminate her miserable existence The whole life of this ill-fated Queen is, indeed, full of startling contrasts from which the mind shrinks back appalled; and her entire career is so freighted with alternate grandeur and privation that it is difficult to reconcile the possibility of their having fallen to the share of the same individual; and this too in an age when France, above all other nations, boasted of its chivalry, and when some of the greatest names that have ever figured in its annals gave grace and glory to its history.

The times were, moreover, as remarkable as the men by whom they were illustrated; for despite the civil and foreign wars by which they were so unhappily distinguished, the arts flourished, and the spread of political liberty became apparent; although it is equally certain that they were we the same time fatal slike to the aristocracy and to the magistrature; and that they rapidly paved the way to the absolutism of Louis XIV., to the shameless saturnalia of the Regency, and to the dishonouring and degrading excesses of Louis XV., who may justly be said to have prepared by his licentiousness the scaffold of his successor.

During several centuries the French monarchs had indulged in a blind egotiam, which rendered them unable to appreciate the effects of their own errors upon their subjects. L'ETAT C'EST MOI had unfortunately been practically their ruling principle long ere Louis XIV. ventured to put it into words. To them the court was universe, the aristocracy the nation, and the church the corner-stone of the proud alter upon which they had enthroned themselves, and beyond which they cared not either to look or listen. It fatal mistake fatally expiated! Yet, we we already remarked. system, dangerous and hollow as it was, endured for centuries endured until crime was heaped on crime, and the fearful holocaust towered towards Heaven as if to appeal for vengeance. And that vengeance came! It had been long delayed; so long indeed that when the brilliant courtiers of Versailles were told of disaffection among the masses, and warned to conciliate ere was too late the good-will of their inferiors, they listened with contemptuous miles to the tardy caution, and scorned place themselves in competition with those untitled classes whom they had long ceased to regard as their fellow-men. But the voice of the people is like the stroke of the hammer upon the anvil; it not only makes itself heard, but, however great may be the original resistance, finishes by fashioning the metal upon which it falls, after its own will.

During the reign of Louis XIII. this great and fatal truth had not yet been impressed upon the French nation, for the popular voice was stifled beneath the of despotism; and even the tiers-état—important as the loyalty of that portion of a kingdom must ever be to rulers—were treated with disdain and contumely; but throughout all workings his government, or rather the government of his minister, for the son of Marie Medicis was monarch only in name, may be undercurrent popular indignation discontent, gradually swelling heaving into power during the two succeeding reigns, finally overthrew with its giant waves the last frail barrier which still up-reared itself before a time-honoured throne; and built upon the ruins of an ancient monarchy the tinsel temple and the false shrine, whose idel was been in grouns, and baptized in blood.

The incapacity of the King, the vensity of the princes, arrogance of the hierarchy, are insubordination of the nobles, the licentiousness of the court, the despotism of the government; all the errors and all the vices of their rulers, were jealously noted and bitterly registered by an oppressed and indignant people; but a required time to shake off a yoke which had been so long borne that it had eaten into the flesh; nor, moreover, were the minds of the masses in that age sufficiently awakened to a sense of their own collective power to enable them, as they did in the following century, to measure their strength with those upon whom they had been so long accustomed to look with fear and awe.

There cannot, moreover, exist the slightest doubt that the wantonness with which Richelieu, in furtherance of his own private interests, poured so freely on the scaffold some of the proudest blood of France, did much towards destroying that prestige which had environed the high nobility. When Biron perished upon the block, although his death was decreed by the sovereign, and that sovereign, moreover, was their own idolized Henry IV., the people marvelled and even murmured; but in after-years, they learned through the teaching of the Cardinal that nobles were merely men; the exile of the persecuted II—de Medicia, and the privations to which she was exposed through his agency, taught them that even royalty itself was not invulnerable to the malice or vengeance of its opponents; and unhappily in those by whom its succeeded in power, its brought its fruits in due manner.

Thus much premised, I mill confine myself a brief explanation of the manner in which I have endeavoured to perform my self-imposed task. For wilful, but I trust excusable, inaccuracy, I throw myself on the indulgence of my critics. Finding my already overladen with names, they consequently induce considerable strain upon the memory of such individuals - might chance be intimately acquainted with domestic history of period under consideration, I have, from ecommencement of the work, designated the Duke de Sully by the title which is ultimately attained, and by which is universally known, than confuse the mind of my reader by allusions to M. de Béthune, M. Rosny, and finally M. Sully, each and all merely signified the mindividual; I persuaded this arrangement generally regarded a judicious one, inasmuch as it tends to lessen a difficulty already sufficiently great; a fact which will be a once apparent on reference to the biographical table at the head of each volume.

On the other hand I have, contrary to my previous system, but in justice to myself, carefully, and even perhaps somewhat elaborately, multiplied the footnotes, in order to give with precision the several whence I deduced my facts; and I must be excused should this caution appear uselessly tedious pedantic to the general reader, as I am anxious on this occasion to escape the accusation which was once brought against me when it was equally undeserved, of having "quoted is second-hand," and even my materials from "historical romances of the time." It is, of course, easy to make assertions of this nature at random; but when a writer feels that he make has conscientiously performed a duty voluntarily undertaken, it is painful to be misjudged; especially when, as in the present instance, nearly three years have been devoted to the work.

For the fac-simile letters by which my volumes are enriched, I am indebted to the kindness of M. de la Plane, member of the Institut Royal de France, of whose extensive and valuable cabinet of ancient records they now form a part; and by whom their publication was obligingly authorised. The authenticity of these letters admits of no doubt, as it is known that they originally formed a portion of the rich collection of autographs in the possession of the Marshal de Bassompierre, to whom they were severally addressed; and the library of the Fathers of the Oratory at St. Magloire in Paris; whence (it is believed) the Revolution) they fell into the hands of a member of that and society, Le Père de Mevolhon, formerly Canon and Vicar-General of the diocese of St. Omer, by whom they were presented to M. de la Plane.

The fac-simile page of Memoirs will require a more detailed explanation. At the time when he so kindly intrusted to me the letters above-named, the same obliging friend also confided to my care, with full permission to make whatever use of I I should see fit, an unpublished MS. consisting of nearly twelve thousand closely written, and divided into twentyfour volumes and quarto, all undeniably work of one hand. This elaborate MS, was entitled " Memoirs of M. le Commandeur 🖿 Rambure, Captain 🖃 🔤 regiment of French Guards, Gentleman of the Bedchamber under the Kings Henry IV., Louis XIII., and Louis XIV. surnamed In Great, with in the memorable which took place during reigns of the three Majesties, from the year 1594 of 1660."

The author of this voluminous MS., who, at the age of eighty-one, inscribes work to his uncle, Monseigneur de Rambure, Bishop of Vannes, and who professes to have ventured thus tardily upon his Herculean undertaking the request, and for the instruction, of nephew is Marquis de Rambure, lays strict injunctions upon his successors to keep the record of his life to themselves; alleging as his reason a dread of injuring by revelations interests of the young courtier, who had succeeded to his own post of Gentleman of the Bedchamber; "In that," as he proceeds to say; "to the greatest King in the world, by whom In has the honour to be loved and esteemed; therefore I pray you that this writing may never be printed, in order not to make him enemies, who are too ready to come without being sought by our imprudence; and because I have only composed these Memoirs for myself and my kindred."

This curious work is at present the property of Count d'Inguimbert of Avignon; who, having lost his father an early age, is not aware of the precise manner in which it fell into the possession of his family. Thus much, however, is certain, that it has for a considerable length of time been religiously preserved by his ancestors; and that the Countees his mother (sister of the last Count de Bruges, aide-de-camp to Charles K.), who died a few years ago at an advanced age, had never ventured, in obedience the injunction above-mentioned, intrust it to any one.

The author states that the work is not in his own autograph, but in that of his accretary, to whom he dictated during eleven years four hours each day, two in the morning, and two in the afternoon—and he commenced formidable in in wear 1664, when he was living in retirement in his Commanderic of St. Eugène in Limousin and, despite his advanced age, "in possession of all his faculties as perfectly as when he had only remoked his twenty-fifth year."

is but very recently that the present proprietor of the Memoirs, rightly judging that long elapsed in which the disclosures of the chronicler in question could conduce to the injury of any one connected with him (should such individuals indeed now exist), has consented to permit of their permal; and that only by a limited number of literary friends, all of whom have been astonished by their extraordinary variety of information, marvellous detail, and intimate acquaintance, not only with the principal events of the seventeenth century (the writer having lived to the patriarchal age of ninety-six years), but also with the leading in and all of them. As a literary curiosity I have thought a fac-simile of one of the pages of this elaborate chronicle a desirable addition to my own volumes; which are, moreover, through the kindness d'Inquimbert and Plane, enriched by numerous curious extracts from these unpublished Memoirs, no part of which has previously appeared in print.

MAY,

CONTENTS

01

THE FIRST VOLUME.

Marie L

MARIE HE MEDICIS AS QUEEN.

CHAPTER I.

[1572—98.]

Marriages of Henry IV.-Marguerite de Valois-Har character -Her marriage with the King of Navarre-Massacre of Saint Bartholomew-Henry, Duke d'Anjou, elected sovereign of Poland-Death of Charles IX.-Accession of Henry III,-Conspiracy of the Will d'Alencon-Revealed by Marguerite-Henry of Navarre escapes from the French court-Henry of Protests against enforced cath-Marguerite imprisoned by her brother-The Duke d'Alencon returns to allegiance - Marguerite joins | at Boarn -Domestic discord-Marriage-portion of Marguerits-Court of Navarre-Dupin insults the Queen of Navarre-Catherine Medicis induces Marguerite to return to France-The Duke d'Alencon amin revolts-Marguerite arrests a royal courier-She is banished with ignominy from the French court—She is deprived of her attendants-Henry of Navarre refuses to receive her in the palace-Margueritz retires to Agen-Her licentiousness-Agen is stormed and taken by the Marshal de Matignon-Marguerite escapes to the fortress of Carlet-The inhabituats of the town resolve to deliver her up to the French king-She is made prisoner by the Marquis de Canillac, and conveyed Useon—She fortress Death of Duke d'Alençon-Poverty Marguerite-Accession of Henry IV.-He embraces the Catholic faith-His dissipated habits-The Duke de Bouillon the Hugnenot party-Henry IV. proceeds Brittany, de Bouillon-Festivities at Reppes -Henry IV. melancholy — He divorce Marguerite, a wife-European princesses-Henry marry Le Belle Gabrielle—Sully expostulates -Sully divorce to Marguerite-The Beaufort intrigues to prevent the marriage of the King with Medicis - She bribes Sillery - Diplomacy of Sillery -Gabrielle aspires to the throne of France - Her death -Marguerita to divorce—The Pope declares nullity of her marriage-Grief of the King at the death of Gabrielle-Royal pleasures-A intrigue-Mademoiselle d'Entragues-Her tact-Her character-A love-messenger-Value ■ royal favourite—Costly indulgences—A practical rebuke-Diplomacy of Paringues-The written promise-Mademoiselle d'Entragues II Marquise III Verneull

MONTHO II.

[1599—1601.]

Sully resolves to hasten the King's marriage—Ambassadors are sent to Florence to demand the hand of Marie de Medicis—
The marriage articles are signed—Indignation of Madame de Verneuil—Revenge of her brother, the Count d'Auvergne—The Duke of Savoy visits Paris—His reception—His profusion—His mission fails—Court poets—Marie de Medicis is married to the Prench king by procaration at Florence—Hostile demonstrations of the Duke of Savoy—Infatuation of the King for the favourite—Her pretensions—A well-timed tempest—Diplomacy of Madame de Verneuil—Her reception at Lyons—War in Savoy—Marie de Medicis lands at Marseills—e Madame de Verneuil returns to Paris—The Duke de Bellegarde is proxy for the King at Florence—He escorts the Queen to France-Portrait of Marie de Medicis-Her state-galley --- Her voyage--- Her reception -- Henry Lyons-The royal interview-Public rejoicings-The royal marriage—Henry Paris—The icalousy awakened - Profigate of the King - Marie's Italian her against husband-Marie reaches Paris-She holds a court-Presentation of Madame de Verneuil to the Queen-Indignation of Marie-Disgrace of the Remours-Self-possession of Madame de Verneuil-Marie takes possession of the Louvre-She adopts the French costume-Splendour of the court-Festival given by Sully - A practical joke - Court festivities gambling - Royal play debts - The Queen's favourite - A petticoat intrigue - Leonora Galigai appointed mistress robes-Reconciliation between the Queen de Verneuil-The King gives the marquise ■ suite of spartments in the Louvre-Her rivalry of the Queen-Indignation of Marie-Domestic dissensions-The Queen and the favourite are again at war-Madame de Verneuil effects the marriage of Concini and Leonora-Gratitude I the Queen-Birth of the Dauphin-Joy of the King-Public rejoicings-Birth of Anne Austria - Superstitions of the period - Belief in astrology -A royal anecdote-Horoscope of the Dauphin-The sovereign and the surgeon-Birth of Guston Heavy, son of Madame de Verneuil-Public entry of the Douphin into Paris-Exultation of Marie de Medicis .

III.

[1602.]

Court festivities—The Queen's ballet—A gallant prelate—A poetical almoner—Insolesce — royal favourite—Unhappiness — Villars—The King quarrols — the favourite—They are reconciled—Madame de Villars is exiled, and the Prince de Joinville sent to join the army in Hungary—VOL. I.

the Queen-Her in judgment-New Dissension in the royal menage—Sully endeavours to restore peace-Mademoinelle de Sourdis-The court removes to Blois -Royal rupture-A her foster-sister-Conspiracy of the Dukes de Rouillon and de Biron - The Count d'Auvergne - Ingratitude Biron-He betrayed-His arrogance—He is summoned to the capital to justify himself— He refuses to obey the royal summons -- Henry sends a messenger to command his presence a court-Precautionary measures of Sully-The President Jeannin prevails over the obstinacy of Biron-Double treachery of La Fin-The King endeavours to induce Biron to confess his crime-Arrest of the Duke de Biron and the Count d'Auvergne-The royal spire-A timely caution-Biron is made prisoner by Vitry, the Count d'Auvergne by Presin-They conveyed separately to Bestille -- Exultation of the citizens --Firmness of the King-Violence of Biron-Tardy repentance -Trial of Biron-A scene in the Bastille-Condemnation of the duke-He is beheaded-The subordinate conspirators are pardoned-The Duke de Bouillon retires to Turenne-Refuses to annear at court -- Execution of the Baron de salutary lesson—The Count d'Auvergne is restored to liberty-Revolt of the Prince de Joinville-He is treated with contempt by the King-He is imprisoned by the Duke de Guise-Removal of the court to Fontaineblesu-Legitimation of the son of Madame de Verneuil-Unhappiness of the Queen-She is consoled by Sully-Birth of the Princess France—Disappoinment of Queen—Scarr Ance

IV.

[1603-4.]

 thither, and rebellion-Discontent the Duke d'Epernon-The Duchess arrive in France-Illness of Queen Riimbeth of England-Her death-Indisposition of the limit king-Sully I Fontainebleau-Confidence of Henry IV. in his wife-His recovery-Renewed passion of Henry for Mudame de Verneuil-Anger of the Queen-Quarrel of the Count de Soissons and the Duke Sully-The Edict-Treachery of Warmenil-Insolence of the Count de Soissons-A royal rebuke-Alarm of Madame de Verneuil-Hopes of the Queen-Jealousy of the marquise-The dinner at Rossy-The King pacifics the province of Lower Normandy-The Count de Soissons prepares kingdom — Is by King—Official apology of Sully-Reception of Alexandre-Monsieur Order of the Knights of Malta-Death of the Duchess de Bar -Grief of the King-The Papal Nuncio-Treachery near the throne - A revelation-The Duke Willeroy - A stormy audience - Escape of L'Hôte - His purenit - His death-Ignominious of his body - Madame Verneuil asserts her claim to the hand of the King - The Count d'Auvergne from the court — Madame de Verneuil requests permission . quit France - Reply . King-Indignation of Marie-The King resolves to obtain the written promise marriage-insolence of the favourite-Weakness of Henry-He asks advice of Sully-Parallel a wife and a mistress -A lame apology - The two Henrys-Reconciliation between the King and the favourite-Remonstrances of Sully-A dilemma-Ratravagance of the Queen-The pot de vis-The royal letter-Kvil influences-Heary endeavours to effect a reconciliation with the Queen-Difficult diplomacy—A temporary calm—Renewed differences -- A minister ■ fault -- Mademoiselle de la Bourdaisière-Mademoiselle Benil-Jealousy Vernenil-Compiracy Count d'Auvergne -- Intemperance E Queen - Timely interference - Confidence by Sully—A dangerous suggestion—Sully the royal couple -- Madame de Verneuil is exiled from the court.—She joins the consoirney of her brother.—The forged

Count d'Entragues — Promises — Philip of Spain to the conspirators—Duplicity of the Count d'Auvergne — He — pardoned by — King — His treachery suspected by M. — Louenie — D'Auvergne — — government—Is made prisoner, and conveyed to the Bastille—His self-confidence—A devoted wife—The requirements of a prisoner—Hidden documents—The treaty with Spain—The Counters d'Entragues—Haughty demeanour — Verneuil — The hause — Haughty demeanour — of Sully—Marriage of Hause — Beuil — Henry — the city of Paris, and undertakes other great national works

ERRETER V.

[1605.]

Trial of the conspirators—Pusillanimity of the Count d'Auvergne -Arrogant attitude by Verneuil-She refuses to offer any defence-Defence of the Count d'Entragues -The nobles are condemned to death - Madame Verneuil is sentenced to imprisonment for life in a convent-A mother's intercession-The King commutes the sentence of death passed on the two nobles to exile from the court and imprisonment for life—Expostulations of privy council— Madame de Verneuil is permitted to retire to her estate-Disappointment of the Queen - Marriage of the Duke de Rohan-Singular ceremony-A tilt - Louvre-Bassompierre is dangerously wounded-His convalescence-Death Clement VIII. - Election of Leo XI. - His deathof Paul V.—The Count d'Entregues is authorised to return to Marconage-Madame de Verneuil is pardoned and recalled-Marriage Prince de Conti-Mademoiselle Guise -- Marriage W Prince of Orange -- The ex-Queen Marguerite-She arrives in Paris-Gratitude of the King-Her reception-Murder at the Hôtel de Sens-Execution of the criminal-Marguerite removes to the Faubourg St. Germain-The King condoles with her on the so of her favourite-Her

CHAPTER VI.

[1606.]

New Year's Day ≡ court — The royal tokens — A singular audience-A proposition-Birth of I Princess Christinefestivities -A man we horseback-The King resolves to humble the Duke de Bouillon-Arguments III Queen-Policy of Henry—The proceeds to Torcy—Surrender of Bouillon-The sovereigns enter Sedan-Rejoicings of the citizens-State entry into Paris-The High Court of Justice assigns to the ex-Queen Marguerite the county of Auvergne-To Doum-Marguerite makes a donation of her recovered Dauphin - Inconsistencies of Marguerite -Jealousy of Queen of Man Moret - Increasing coldness of the King towards that lady-The frail rivals-Princely beacons-Indignation of the Queen-Narrow of the King and Queen - Gratitude of the Queen to her preserver-Insolent pleasantry of the Marquise de Verneuil-A disappointment compensated—Marriage of Duke de Bar -The King invites the Duchess of Mantua to become sponsor to the Dauphin, and the Duke de Lorraine to the younger Princess-" The Mantoun suite"-Preparations at Notre-Dame -The plague in Paris-The court removes to -The royal christenings - Increase of the plague - Royal disappointments-The Duchess de Nevers-Discourtesy of King-Dignity of the duchem . . .

VII.

[1607.]

Profuse expanditure of the French nobles...Prevalence of duelling under Henry IV.—Meeting of the Prince de Condé and the

Duke de Nevers-They are arrested by the King's guard-Reconciliation of the two nobles-The Duke de Sonbise is wounded in a duci-Profigacy of Mademe de Moret-The King insists upon her marriage with the Prince de Joinville-Indignation of the Duchese de Guise-A dialogue with Majesty -The Prince de Joinville is exiled-Madame de Moret intrigues with the Count de Sommerive-He promises her marriage-He attempts to assessinate M. de Balagny-He is exiled to Lorraine - Mademoiselle des Essarts - Birth of the Duke d'Orleans-Peace between the Pope and the Venetians-The Queen and her confidents-Death of the Chancellor of France -Death of the Cardinal de Lorraine-Royal rejoicings-The last ballet of a dying Prince - Betrothal of Incomment de Montpensier to the infant Duke d'Orieuns - Sully as a theatrical manager-The court gamester-Death of the Duke de Montpensier-The ex-Queen Marguerite founds a monastery -Influence of Concini and Leonora over the Queen -Arroganos of Concini-Indignation of the King-A royal rupture-The King leaves Paris for Chantilly-Sully and the Queen-The letter - Anger of the King - Sully reconciles the King and Queen-Madame de Verneuil and the Duke de Guise-Court gambling-Birth of the Duke d'Anjou-Betrothal of the Duke de Vendôme and Mademoiselle de Mercour-Reluctance of the lady's family-Celebration of the marriage-Munificence of Henry-Arrival of Don Pedro de Toledo-Hia arrogunco-Admirable rejoinder of the King-Object of the embassy-Passion of Henry for hunting-Embellishment of Paris-Eduardo Fernandes-The King's debts of honour-Despuir of Madame de Verneuil-Defective policy-A bold stroke for a coronet—The falles favourits. . ,

DESCRIPTION OF THE PERSON OF T

THE FIRST VOLUME.

Duke de Guise (Henri de Lor-		Duke de Lude	58
reine, Le Belstré)	6	M. de Thermes	5 6
Duchess de Guise . Prince de Condé (Henri I. de	8	Marquis de Castensu Marquis de Montglut M. de Frontenso de Rassompierre	5 (
Prince de Conde (Henri L. de		margus de Montgut	Ī
Bourbon) Ambroise Paré	16	M. de Prontenac	5 8
Ambroise Paré	17	de Bassompterre	5
Mue de Tongo	81	MATCHINO GO Y OFFICEULL	BC
Duchess de Her		Queen Louise	84
Duke de Joyense	29	Count d'Auvergne	6
Le Père Ange	29	M. de Villeroy	7(
Maréchal de Matignon	85	Duke of Suroy	71
Marquis de Canillac	35	Count d'Auvergne M. de Villeroy Duke of Savoy Duke de Biron	7
Countese de Guiche	37	M. de Zernet	61
Gabrielle d'Estrées (Duchesse		M. do Terredi	81
de Beaufort)	87	Maronis de Créony	81
Dake de Bouillon		Marquis de Créquy Duke de Montmorensy (Henri
Count d'Aubigny		1)	00
Isabella, Infants of Spain	48	Dake de Nessoura	01
Princess Arabella Street	43	Duke de Verstadour	01
Princess Arabella Steart Isabeau de Bavière	46	M. du Vair	01
Prince Maurice of Orange	44	M. Bearfa	Di
Marie de Medicis	44	M. Albert de Bellièrre	Ш
Mile. de Guise		M. de Roquelaure 10 Gardinal de Joyeuse 11	Dŧ
Mile. de Mayenne	45	Gordinal da Jovense 11	ij
Mile d'Annels	45	Cuedinal de Gundy	ij
Mile. d'Aumale Mile. de Longueville	46	Cardinal de Gundy 11 Cardinal de Bourdis 11	11
Mile de Rohan	46	Marrois de Gondy 11	16
Mile de Luxembourg	46	Marquis de Gondy 11 Dachesse de Némours 11	iè
Mile. de Guiménée	46	Leonora Galisai (Mazonise	-
Cardinal de Marquement	50	Leonora Galigai (Marquise d'Anore) 19 Madame de Rinholiou 15	21
Cardinal d'Ossat	50	Madema de Binhelian	Ž,
Condinal Department	51	Charles (Marsonal d'Arren) 19	įĭ
Cardinal Duperron	53	Concini (Maréchal d'Ancre) . 18 Charles I. Cardinal de Bourbon 18	17
Duke de Piney-Laxanbourg .	53	Charles II. Cardinal de Bour-	"
M. de Sillery	93	The state of the s	10
Duke de Bellegarde	58	bon	.0

M. de la Rivière 14 Duke de Dako de M. de Berthault	40 Countens d'Entragues 80
Duke de	30
Duko de	M. de la Varenne
M. de Berthault 19	49 M. dn Plessis-Mornsy 31
Prince de Joinville	58 M. Achille de Harley 32
Mademoiselle de Sourdin 10	49 M. dn Pleasis-Morney
Selvaggio . 10 Duke de la Trémonille . 12 Duke d'Epernon . 12 Count de Fuentes . 13 Baron de Laz	65 Mademoiselle d'Entragues $8
Duke de la Trémonille 1	71 Duke de Rohan 83
Duke d'Epernon	78 Count de Laval
Count de Fuentes 1	78 Beron de Thermes 83
Baron de Las	81 M. de Saint-Luc
M. de la Fin	81 Count de Sault
M. Descures 18	88 Clement VIII 88
M. Jeannin	83 Paul V
Count de Scissons (Charles de	Count de Clary
Bourbon Conti) 10	87 Princess of Orange 84
Marquia de Vitry	90 M. de Merargues
Marquis de Vitry	90 Madame de Drou	38
Maréchal de Montigay 19 M. de Montbarot	95 Mademoiselle de Piolant 86
M. de Montbaret	01 Christine de France . 80
Baron de Fontenelles	US Count de Sommeriya	0
Duke de Mayenne	06 Duke de Nevers	/1
Duke de Guise (Charles de Lor-	Paro de Montpensier 88	38
raine)	Baron de la Châtaignerale . 88
Madame Elisabeth de France . 31	18 Duchess of Mantua 88
Mademoiselle de Bourbon 31	17 Leo XI
M. de Sobole	90 Baron de la Châtre 89
M. d'Arquien	22 Count de Liancourt 89	16
Duke de Deux-Ponts	28 Marquis de Fervaques	_
Count de Beaumont	Marquis de Bois-Dauphin
M. de Bellefonda	43 Marquis de Lavardin 89
Duke de Montbeson	18 Duchess d'Angoulême 39	17
Count de St. Pol	AS Prince de Vandemont
Rishop of Nevers	48 Marquis de Rosny 39 52 Duchess de Montpensier
M. de Barrault 25 Count de Bochepot 25 M. d'Argouges 27 M. de Maisse 29 M. de Gèvres 29 Midemoisele de Beuil 29 Mide Henrese 2	52 Duchess de Montpensier 40	N.
Count de Rochepot	54 Duches de Nevers 56 Duke de
Count de Brienne	DO DERO SE COMPANION	Ŋ
M. CArgonges	75 Count de 41	8
M. de Maisse	9U m. de Belagny	.3
M. de Gèvres	W Mademonalle des Kasarts 41	. 5
Mademoiselle de Beuil 39	VI Count de Harley . 41	٠ō
M. de la Houssaye	91 Count de La Harlay 41 94 Cardinal de Guise . 41 99 Cardinal de Lorraine . 41	Ş
M. de la Housesye	99 Cardinal de Lorraine 41	g
M. de Nérestan	99 Mademoiselle de Montpensier . 49	13
Countess d'Auvergne 30	03 Gaston Jean Baptiste de France 43	iØ
M. Delmotas	3 Madamoiselle de Merceseur . 43	7
Marquis Spinola 30	06 Don Pedro de Toledo 43	8

the state of the state of

ILLUSTRATIONS.

VOL L

PORTRAFF IN MARIE DE MEDICIS	Frontisp To face gage	iece.
VOL. IL	Prontin	ni sas
PORTRACE OF MILE	Esched	исте,
TIL 1107
BEGERALES.	Pronting	picor.
LETTER OF MARIE DE MEDICES ON HER ESCAPE
PROM	To face page	125
LINTER OF BEGINNING	99
XIII., COUMBERGEED III
LOWENTE	-	31.5
LETTER OF MARIE OF PERSONS, WITH COMMISSION	la .	100

MATERIAL ...

B00K I.

MARIE DE MEDICIS AS QUEEN.

CHAPTER L

[1572.]

THE RESERVE OF THE TY MARGUETTS IN THE STREET STREET
RALL CO LINE OF LINE RARTEGLOMEW — REXEY, DUKE D'AKJOU, MINISTER SOVEREIGN OF POLAND DEATH IX ACCESSION III
COMMENSATION OF THE SHARE B'ALENCON-REVEALED BY MARRIED MANAY OF RESIDENCE AND ADDRESS OF THE PROPERTY OF QATH-MARSVERITE
BY MAN PARK D'ALENÇON MANAGEM OF MAN AND DESCRIPTION OF THE PERSON OF MARQUESTTS—COURT IN ALLEGE
DESCRIPTION OF THE PARTY OF THE PROPERTY OF TH
D'ALENÇON
AGAIN REVOLTS MARQUERITE ARRESTS A ROYAL COURSER-HEE IS BANISHED WITE 10X0MINT FROM THE STREET - STREET TO SEATURE REPEARS TO RECEIVE IN THE STATE STA LICENTIOUSNESS-AGEN IS STORMED AND TAKEN BY THE MATIGNON—MARGUERITE ESCAPES TO THE CARLAT—THE INEASHTANTS IN THE TOWN RESOLVE TO DELIVER HER UP TO MADE TENO-THE 15 MADE CANILLAC, AND TO USEON—NEE THE THE
THE DEATH OF THE B'ALEXCON - POTERTY IN CATROLIO
PATTE-HIS COMMERCE DESCRIPTION DURY IN THE PARTY COM
EVOUENCE CHEST HEREN IV. COMMENC OF BRITTANY, AND ENTRANSME
$\mathbf{x}_{i}$ or definition in Fermi states of experts in the experts of the same $\mathbf{x}_{i}$ . Because MINISTER OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY AND TAKE A SECOND DESIRES MARRY to SECLE Committee to the committee of the committee of DIVORCE TO COMPANY OF STREET PREVENT THE CONTRACT OF THE WITH BUILD OF SILLERY - OASLELLE
70 - 07
TO SEE MALL OF SEE MALL OF SEE
CATELY IN THE KING IN THE BEATR IN COLUMN THE COLUMN TH
-A B'ESTRAGUES-HER
PAVOURITE-CORTLY PRACTICAL
D'ENTEAQUES THE WEITTEN PRONIES MARRIOISELLE
D'ENTRACORS 15 MARQUINE VERNEUIL

THE LIFE

MARIE DE MEDICIS.

CHAPTER L

[1572.]

HOWEVER' celebrated he was destined to become sovereign, Henri IV. of France was nevertheless fated be singularly unfortunate as a husband. Immediately after the death of his mother, the high-hearted Jeanne d'Albret, whom he succeeded on the throne of Navarre, political considerations induced him to give his hand Marguerite, the daughter of Henry II. and Catherine Medicis, a princess whose surpassing beauty and rare accomplishments were the theme and marvel of all the European courts, and whose alliance was an object of ambition to many of the sovereign princes of Christendom.

Marguerite Valois was born 14th May, 1552, and became the wife of Henry of Navarre the 18th of August, 1572, when she in it full bloom of youth and loveliness; there be any doubt that she one of the most extraordinary women of her time; for while her grace and wit dazzled the less observant by their brilliancy, the depth of her crudition, her love of literature and the arts, and the solidity of her judgment, less astonished those who capable of appreciating the valuable gifts which had been lavished upon her by nature. A dark shadow rested, however, upon the surface of this glorious picture. Marguerite possessed no moral self-government; her passions at once the bane and the reproach of her existence; and while yet mere girl her levity had already afforded ample subject for the comments of the courtiers.

Fortunately, in the rapid sketch which we compelled to give of her career, it is unnecessary that we should do more than glance at the licentiousness of her private conduct; our business is simply to trace such an outline of her varying fortunes as may suffice to render intelligible the position of Henry IV. In the period of his second marriage.

After the death of Francis II., when internal commotion which taken place between Charles IX. and Henry de Lorraine, Duke de Guise,* Marguerite

Heary de Lorraine, Duke de Guise, was the brother of Charles, Mayenne, and of Louis, Cardinal de Guise. He was the chief of the League, and excited a popular revolt on the

and her younger brother, the Duke d'Alençon, www removed to the castle of Amboise for greater security; and she remained in palace-fortress from her tenth year until 1564, when she returned to court, and thenceforward became one of the brightest ornaments of the royal circle. Henry de Guise un not long ere he declared himself her ardent admirer, and the manner in which the Princess received and encouraged his attentions left and doubt that the affection was reciprocal; convinced, indeed, those about her person of the fact, that M. du Gast, the favourite of the King her brother, cornestly entreated his Majesty no longer to confide to the Princess, as he had hitherto done, all the secrets of the state, as they could not, he averred fail, under existing circumstances, to be communicated to M. de Guise; and Charles IX. so fully appreciated the value of this advice, that he hastened to urge the man caution upon the Queen-mother. This sudden distrust and coldness on the part of her royal relatives was peculiarly irritating to Marguerite; was her mortification lessened by the fact that the Duke de Guise, first alarmed, and ultimately disgusted, by her unblushing irregularities, withdrew his pretensions to her hand; and, sacrificing his ambition to a day of the Barricades, in the hope of possessing himself of the Henry III. caused him to be assussinated Blois, in the year He was distinguished as le Balafré by the people, in consequence of the deep scar of wound across the face by which he was disfigured.

sense of self-respect, selected as wife, common de Clèves. Princess de Portien.*

At this period Marguerite de Valois began to divide her existence between the most exaggerated devotional observances and the most sensual and degrading pleasures. Humbly kneeling before the altar, would everal during the day; but twilight she cast off every restraint; and careless of what due, alike to her sex and wher rank, she plunged into grossest dissipation; and after having played guest is riotous banquet, she might be seem sharing in the disgraceful orgies of a masquerade.† A short time after the marriage of the Duke de Guise, the hand of the Princess demanded by Don Sebastian, King of Portugal; but the Queen-mother, who witnessed with alarm the increasing power of the Protestant party, and the utter impossibility of inspiring confidence in their leaders may by mean bold and subtle stroke of policy, resolved to profit by the presence of the Huguenot King

Catherine was the second daughter of François Cièves, Duke de Nevers, and of Marguerite de Bourbon-Vendôme, the sunt of Henry IV. Her dower consisted of the county of Eu, in Normandy. She was twice married; first to Antoine de Croi, Prince de Portien, by whom she had no issue; and, secondly, to Henry de Lorraine, Duke de Guise. She died in 1633, at the of eighty-five years.

† She heard three masses every day, one high and two low ones, and took the holy communion each week on the Thursdays, Pridays, and Sundays.—Letter of Etienne Pasquier, Book XXII, letter v, col. (1981) of the folio edition.

of Navarre, in order to overcome the distrust which not edict of 1570 had sufficed to remove; and to renew the project which been already mooted during the lifetime of Jeanne d'Albret, of giving Marguerite in marriage to the young Prince, her son.

The consciousness are she sacrificing her daughter by thus bestowing her hand upon the sovereign of a petty kingdom might perhaps have deterred Catherine, and she not already decided upon the means by which the bonds of so unequal an alliance might be rent asunder; and it is even possible that the hatred which she bore to the reformed faith would in itself have sufficed to render such an union impossible, had the crafty and compunctionless spirit by which she was animated inspired her with method which would more than expiste the temporary sin. It is all events certain, that having summoned Henry of Navarre to her presence, she unhesitatingly, and with many professions of regard for himself, informed him of the overtures of the Portuguese monarch, assuring him the same time, that although the King of Spain was opposed to the alliance from motives of personal interest, it which would prove highly gratifying to Gregory XIII.; but adding that both Charles IX. and herself were so anxious to perform the promise which they had made to his mother, and me prove their good faith to his own person, that they were willing to refuse the crown of Portugal, and to accept that of Navarre for the Princess.

Henry of Bearn hesitated. He was aware the of the Protestant party, especially the Admiral de Coligny whom he regarded as a father, and desirous should become the husband of Elizabeth of England. Past experience had rendered them suspicious of French, while an alliance with the English promised them strong and abiding protection. Nor Henry himself disposed to espouse Marguerite de Valois, - her early reputation for gallantry offended of self-respect, while a strong attachment elsewhere rendered him insensible to her personal attractions. As matter of ambition, the alliance was beyond his hopes, and brought him step to that throne which, by some extraordinary prescience, both he and his friends anticipated that he me destined one day to ascend; but he could not forget that there dark suspicions attached to the strange and sudden death of a mother to whom he had been devoted; and he felt doubly repugnant receive a wife from the very hands which secretly accused of having abridged his passage to the sovereignty of Navarre. Like Marguerite herself, moreover, he was not heart-whole; and thus in chang to the freedom of an unmarried life, and would fain have declined the honour which was pressed upon him; but the wily Catherine, who instantly perceived his embarrassment, bade him carefully consider the position in which he stood, and the responsibility which attached to decision. Charles IX., in bestowing upon him the hand of his sister, gave to the Protestants the most decided and unequivocal proof of his sincerity. It was evident, she said, that despite the edict which assured protection to the Huguenot party. they misdoubted the good-faith of the monarch; but when he had also overlooked, a rather disregarded, the difference of faith mu thoroughly to give a Princess of France in marriage to one of their Princes, they would no longer have a pretext for discontent, and the immediate pacification of the kingdom must be the necessary consequence of such a concession. The ultimate issue of unequal a conflict, could not, ashe asserted, be for one moment doubtful; but the struggle might be bloody one, and he would do well to remember that the blood thus spilt would be upon his head.

....

Henry then sought, his mother had previously done, treate a difficulty by alleging that the difference of between himself and the Princess must tend to validity of their marriage; but the wily Italian this objection by reminding him that Charles IX. had publicly declared that "rather than that alliance should not take place, he would permit sister to dispense with all the rites and ceremonies of religions."

It is well known that the motive of the French king in thus urging, or rather insisting upon, a marriage greatly the pretensions of the Princess, simply to attract to court all the Huguenot leaders, who, placing little faith in the conciliatory edict, had resolutely from appearing in the capital; but Catherine alluded a slightly this fact that I awoke misgivings in the mind of the young monarch.

abjured, Henry of Navarre yielded; nor the Princess on her part offer any violent opposition to the marriage She objected, it is true, her religious scruples, and her attachment to her own creed; but her arguments were soon overruled, the hand of the King of Portugal was courteously declined, Philip of Spain was assured that his representations had decided French court, and immediate preparations were made for the unhappy union, whose date was to be written in blood. The double ceremony, exacted by the difference of faith in the contracting parties, was performed, as have said, on 18th of August, 1572, the public betrothal having taken place on the preceding day at the Louvre; and it was accompanied by all splendour of which it was susceptible. The marriageservice was performed by the Cardinal - Bourbon, on a platform erected in the front of the metropolitan church of Notre-Dame; whence, its conclusion, bridal train descended by a temporary gallery to the interior of the cathedral, and proceeded to the altar, Henry, relinquishing of land of land wife, and at a customary and meanwhile paced to and fro along the cloisters in conversation with the venerable Gaspard de Coligny and his confidential friends, whole of whom were sanguine in their anticipations of a bright and happy future.

At the conclusion of the mass the King of Navarre rejoined his bride, and taking her hand, conducted her to the episcopal palace, where, according to an ancient custom, the marriage-banquet awaited them.* The square of the Parvis Notre-Dame was crowded with eager spectators, and the heart of the Queen-mother beat high with exultation as she glanced at the retinue of the bridegroom, and recognised in his suite all the Huguenot leaders who had hitherto refused to pass the gates of the capital.

Marguerite; and many were the devout Catholics who murmured beneath their breath at the policy which had determined the monarch to bestow a princess of such beauty and genius upon a heretic. In truth, nothing could be more regal or more dasting than the appearance of the youthful bride, who wore, as Queen of Navarre, a richly-jewelled crown, which her long and haxuriant dark hair fell in waving masses over an ermine cape (or conet) clasped from the throat to the waist with large diamonds; while her voluminous train of violet-coloured velvet, three ells in length, was borne by four princesses.* And thus, in royal state she moved along, surrounded and followed by all in nobility and chivalry of France, amid the acclamations of an admiring and excited people, having just pledged herself one whose feelings in little interested in the compact in her

Dreux du Radier, vol. v. p. 182.

The term festivities that throughout three entire days; and never had such an amount of luxury magnificence been displayed at the French court. Towards the Protestants, the bearing both of Charles IX. and his mother so courteous, frank, and conciliating, that the most distrustful gradually threw off their misgivings, and vied with the Catholic nobles both in gallantry and splendour; and meanwhile Catherine, the King, the Duke d'Anjou, and the Guises were busied in organising the frightful tragedy of St. Bartholomew!

The young Queen of Navarre had scrupulously been in ignorance of a plot which involved the life of her bridegroom as well as those of his co-religionists; nor was she aware of the catastrophe which had been organised until Paris was already vast shambles. Startled from her sleep at the dead of night, and hurriedly informed of the nature of frightful cries that had broken her rest, she once sprang from bed, and throwing on a mantle, forced her way the closet of her royal brother; where, sinking her knees, she earnestly implored lives of Henry's Protestant attendants; for a time Charles obdurate; nor it until he had reluctantly yielded to her prayers that she recognised, with an involuntary cry of joy, in figure of husband, who stood in the deep bay of window with his cousin, MI de Condé.*

* Prus. Hist. des Reines et Régentes de France, vol. ii, p. 4.

By one of those caprices to which he was subject, the King and refused to sacrifice either of these princes and he had accordingly summoned them to his presence, where he had offered them the alternative of an instant abjuration of their heresy.

Shrieks and grouns already resounded on all sides; the grouns of strong men, struck down unarmed and defenceless, and the shrieks of struggling with their murderers; while through all, and above all, boomed out the deep-toned bells of the metropolitan churches—one long burial-peal; and amid this ghastly diapason it was the pleasure of the tiger-hearted Charles to accept the reluctant and informal recantation of his two horror-stricken victims; after which he compelled

" Henry de Bourbon, Prince de Condé, first prince of the blood, and Grand Master of France, was born in 1552, and succeeded his father, the Count Louis, who was killed ■ the battle of Jarnac, on the 13th of May, 1569, in the command of the Property, conjointly with ■ King of Navarra (Henry IV.) we made a levy of fureign troops, in 1575, distinguished himself at Courtas, in 1587, and died by poison the following year, at St. Jean d'Angely.

ш

them without remorse to the agony of seeing their friends and followers butchered before their eyes.

Enraged by what they denounced as the weak and impolitic clemency of the King, in having thus shielded two of the most powerful leaders of the adverse faction, Catherine Medicis and the Guises, having wreaked their vengeance upon the corpse of the brave and veteran de Coligny they induced the King to dishonour himself by subjecting . ignominious treatment, next endeavoured to slienate Marguerite from her husband, and to induce her to solicit It had formed no part of the Queenmother's intention that the Princess should remain fettered by the bonds which she had herself wreathed about her; nor could she brook that after having accomplished coup-de-main which had excited the indignation of half Europe, Henry of Navarre should be indebted for an impunity which counteracted all her views, to the alliance which he had formed with her own family. Marguerite, however, resolutely to lend herself to this new treachery, declaring that as her husband had abjured his heresy, she had no plea to advance in justification of so flagrant an act of perfidy; nor could the expostulations of her mother produce any change in her resolve.

It probable perfect freedom of action, for which she was indebted to the indifference of her young bridegroom, had great influence in prompting this reply; and that the crown which had so recently been placed upon her brow the the fightful carnage of which she had just been witness, might well to shrink from probable repetition of so hideous a catastrophe. Be her motives what they might, however, neither threats nor entreaties could shake the resolution of the Princess; and she supported in her opposition by her favourite brother, the Duke d'Alençon, who had secretly attached himself the cause of the Protestant princes.

This another of uneasiness to the Queenmother, who apprehended, from the pertinacity with which Marguerite clung to her husband, that she would exert all her influence to effect understanding bethe two brothers-in-law which could not prove fatal to the interests of the Duke d'Anjou, who, in the event of the decease of Charles IX., was the rightful heir to the throne. Nor that decease a mere of idle speculation, for the health of King, always feeble and uncertain, had failed more than ever since the night of the 24th of August; and he had even confessed to Ambroise Paré,*

*Ambroise *** was born ** Laval (Mayeane), in *** commenced his public career as surgeon of the infantrygeneral Réné de Montejean; and on his return to France, having taken his degrees at the College of St. Edme, he was elected provost of the Corporation of Surgeons. In 1552, Henry II. gave him the appointment of body-surgeon to the King, a post which he continued to fill under Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III.
Charles IX., whose life he saved, when he had nearly fallen a victim to *** want of skill of his physician Portail, who, in body-surgeon, that his dreams were limited by the spectres if his victims, and that he consequently shrank from the aleep which was messential to his existence. The Duke d'Anjou meanwhile was absent in the siege in Rochelle, brother, d'Alençon, shout person of wind dying monarch, and had made himself eminently popular among the citizens of Paris. The crisis was an alarming one; but it was still appear perilous, for, to the consternation of Catherine, intelligence at period reached we court, that Polish nation had elected the Duke d'Anjou w their King, and that their ambassadors about visit France in order to tender him the crown. In vain did she represent - Charles the impolicy of suffering warlike prince Henry d'Anjou to abandon country for a foreign throne; and urge him to replace the elder by the younger brother, alleging that so long the Polish people could me prince of the blood-royal of France at the head of their nation, they would care little whether he were called Henry Francis; the King refused to countenance such a substitution. In had long been jealous of the military renown of the Duke d'Anjou; while he was also perfectly aware in the anxiety with which both the Queen-mother opening a vein, had inflicted a deep and dangerous wound in his arm, repaid the benefit by concealing him in his own chamber during the manacre of St. Batholomew. Paré was a He died in I. His published works consist of one folio volume, divided into twenty-eight books.

and the Prince himself looked forward to his own death, in order Henry might succeed him; he quently a command that sovereign-elect should immediately repair to Paris, to receive the hands of the foreign delegates the crown which they were about to him.

The ambassadors, who duly arrived, were magnificently received; Henry d'Anjou was declared King of Poland; and, finally, he found himself compelled to depart for his own kingdom. Unfortunately for Marguerite, she had not sufficient self-control to conceal the joy with which she the immediate succession to the French throne thus transferred to her favourite brother; and her evident delight exasperated the Queen-mother, that she communicated to Charles the suspicions which she tained of the treachery of the Princess; but the King, treated her warnings with indifference, and was consequently compelled to await with patience pro-

The death of the French monarch, which shortly afterwards took place, and the accession of Henry d'Anjou, whom a timely warning had enabled abandon the crown of Poland for that of France, for a time diverted the of Catherine from the suspected machinations of her daughter; when, as if to convince her the injustice, the suddenly received intelligence from the young Queen of Navarre, the the d'Alençon the

ш

entered into a new league with a Bourbon princes. It is difficult account for the motive which led Marguerite to make a revelation, when her extraordinary affection for her brother, and the anxiety which she had universally the safety of her husband, a remembered; thus much, however, a certain, that and did betray the conspiracy (which had been revealed a her by Lutheran gentleman whom she had saved during a pledge that the lives of all who were involved in it should be spared. In her anxiety to secure the secret, the Queen-mother, on her side, gave a solemn promise that effect, and she redeemed her word; while from the immediate precautions which she caused to be taken the plot are necessarily annihilated.

The Princess had, however, by the knowledge which she thus displayed of the movements of the Huguenot party, only increased the suspicions both of the Queenmother and her son; and the court of France became ere long a distasteful to Henry of Navarre, from the constant affronts which he subjected, and the undisguised surveillance which fettered all his ments, are resolved to effect his escape from Paris; an example in which he was imitated by the Duke d'Alençon and the Prince de Condé, the former of whom retired Champagne, the cone of estates; and with both whom I shortly wards into formidable league.

Henry III., exasperated by departure of three princes, many determination to revenge the affront upon Marguerite, who lime been enabled in the pany her husband; but the representations of the Queen-mother induced him to forego this ungenerous project, and driven to satiate thirst for geance upon her favourite attendant, Mademoiselle 🌆 Torigni,* of whose services he had already deprived her, on the pretext that wyoung a Princess should we be permitted to retain about her person such persons wire likely to exert an undue influence wire her mind, and to possess themselves of her secrets. In the first paroxysm of his rage, he even sentenced this lady to be drowned; is is iniquitous and unfounded sentence would have been really carried into effect, had not the unfortunate succeeded in making her escape through the agency of two individuals who about to rejoin the Duke d'Alençon, and who conducted her safely to Champagne.+

One of the first acts of Henry of Navarre on reaching his own dominions had been to protest against the enforced abjuration to which he compelled on the fatal night of St. Bartholomew, and to evince his aincerity by resuming the practices of the reformed faith

* Gillone Goyon, dite de Matignon, demoiselle de Tozigni, was the daughter of Jacques de Matignon. Marshal of France, and of Françoise de Deillon, who was subsequently married to Pierre de Harcourt, Seigneur de Betwron.

† Lévi Alvarès, Hist. Clas. des Reines et Régentes de France, p. 185.

recantation which so exasperated in French king that he made Marguerite a close prisoner in her own apartments, under the pretext that she was leagued with enemies of the state against the church and throne of her ancestors. Nor would be listen to her entreaties ahe might be permitted to follow in husband, declaring met "she should not live with a heretic;" her days passed on in a gloomy and monotony, ill-suited to her excitable temperament and splendid Meanwhile, the Duke d'Alençon, weary of his voluntary exile, and hopeless of any successful result to the disaffection in which he had long indulged, became anxious to effect a reconciliation with the King; and for this purpose he addressed himself to Marguerite, to whom he explained the conditions upon which he was willing to return in his allegiance, giving her full power to treat in his name. Henry III., who, on his side, was no less desirous to detach his brother from the Protestant cause, acceded to all his demands, among which was the immediate liberation of the Princess; and thus she a length found herself enabled to quit her regal prison, and to rejoin her royal husband Bearn.

During the space of five years the ill-assorted couple maintained least a semblance of harmony, for each apparently regarded very philosophically those delicate questions which occasionally conduce considerable discord in married life. The personal habits of Henry, combined with his sense of gratitude to his wife for her refusal to abandon him to the virulence of her mother's hatred, induced him to close his eyes to her moral delinquencies; while Marguezite, in her turn, with equal complacency, affected a like ignorance as regarded the pursuits of her husband; and thus the little court of Pau, where they had established their residence, rendered attractive by the frank urbanity of the sovereign, and grace and intellect of the young Queen, became as and dissipated the daughter of Catherine de Medicis herself could desire. Poets her praise, under the name of Urania; flatterers sought her smiles by likening her to the Goddesses of Love and Beauty, and she lived in a perpetual atmosphere of pleasure and adulation.

The marriage-portion of Marguerite had consisted of the two provinces of the Agénois and the Quercy, which had been ceded to her with all their royal prerogatives; but even after this accession of revenue, the resources of Henry of Navarre did not exceed those of a private gentleman, amounting, in fact, only to a hundred and forty thousand livres, or about six thousand pounds yearly. The ancient kingdom of Navarre, which had once extended from the frontier of France to banks of the Ebro, and of which Pampeluna had been capital, shorn of its dimensions by Ferdinand the Catholic Spanish monarchy, now consisted only of portion of Lower Navarre, and the principality of Beam, thus leaving to Henry little of sovereignty the title. The duchy of Albret in Gascony, which he inherited from his great-grandfather, and that of Vendôme, his appanage prince of the blood-royal of France, consequently formed no inconsiderable portion of his territory: while the title of Governor of Guienne, which he still retained, merely nominal dignity whence he derived neither income nor influence; and unpopular he in the province that the citizens of Bordeaux refused to admit him within their gates.

* Dopleix, Hist, WILL, p. WI

Nevertheless, the young monarch who held his court alternately — Pau and at Nerac, the capital of the duchy of Albret, expended annually upon his household and establishment nearly twelve thousand pounds, and — period when, according to the evidence of Sully, "the whole court could not have furnished forty thousand livres;" yet — inadequately — those about him remunerated, that Sully himself, in his joint capacity of councillor of — and chamberlain, received only two thousand annual livres, — ninety pounds sterling. This royal penary did not, however, depress — spirits of — frank and free-hearted King, who eagerly entered into every species of gaiety and amusement. Jousts, masques, and ballets, succeeded each other — a rapidity which left no time for anxiety or ensus;

Sully, Mémoires, vol. i, p. 45.

Marguerite has bequeathed to in her Memoirs graphic a picture of the royal circle in 1579-80, that cannot its transcription. "We passed greater portion of our time at Nerac;" she says, "where the court was so brilliant that we had no reason to envy france. The sole subject of regret principal number of the nobles and gentlemen thuguernots; but the subject of religion mentioned; the King my husband, accompanied by a sister," attending their own devotions, while I and my heard mass in a chapel in the park. When the several services were concluded, we again assembled in a garden ornamented with avenues of laurels and cypresses, upon the bank of river; and in the afternoon and evening performed."

It is much to be regretted in the royal biographer follows up this pleasing picture by avowals of her own profligacy, and complacent comments in indulgence and generosity with which she lent herself to the vices of her husband.

The temporary calm was not, however, fated to endure. Marguerite, while she indulged in unblushing licentiousness, was, as we have already stated, devoted to the observances of her religion; and on her first arrival ... Pau she had requested that chapel might be provided, in which the services of her church could be performed. This was a concession Henry of Navarre was neither willing, and indeed able, to make; the inhabitants of the city being all rigid reformers, who and not yet forgiven the young monarch either his enforced remunciation of their faith, or his Catholic marriage; and accordingly the Queen had been compelled to avail herself of a small oratory in the castle which would not contain more than aix as eight persons while anxious was the King not to exasperate the good citizens, that no individual was permitted to accompany her to the chapel ____ the immediate members of her household, and the drawbridge was always raised until she had returned to her own apartments.

* Catherine de Bourbon, Princess of Navarre, and sister of Henry IV., was born at Paris, in 1558. After his accession to the throne of France, Henry gave her in marriage to Henry of Lorraine, Duke de Bar. She refused to change her religion, even when her brother had done so, and died without issue, in 1604, at Nancy.

† Mémoires de Marguerite, pp. 176, 177.

Thus, arrival of Marguerite in the country, which had raised the hopes of the Catholic portion of the population, by no means tended to improve their position; and for a time her co-religionists, disheartened by an signal a disappointment, made no effort to resist the orders of King; but on the day of Pentecost, 1579, a few sealous devotees, who had by some means introduced themselves secretly into the castle, followed the Queen to her oratory, where they were arrested by Dupin the royal secretary, very roughly treated in presence of Marguerite herself, and only released on the payment of a heavy fine.

Indignant at the disrespect which had been shown to her, the Princess at once proceeded to the spartment of her husband, where she complained with emphatic bitterness of the insolence of his favourite; and had scarcely began to acquaint him with the details of the affair when Dupin entered unannounced, and in the intemperate commented her breach of good-faith, in having wilfully the forbearance of the sovereign and his Protestant subjects.

It was not without some difficulty that Henry ceeded in arresting this indecent flow of words; when, rebuking Dupin for an of discretion and selfcontrol, he commanded him immediately to with the pardon of the Queen for ill-advised interference, and the want of deference of which he had been guilty towards her royal person; but Marguerite refused to listen any apology, last haughtily and resolutely demanded the instant dismissal of the delinquent. In vain did Henry expostulate, declaring that he could not dispense with services of so old and devoted a vant: the Princess was inexorable, and the over-zealous secretary received orders to leave the court. Marguerite, however, purchased this triumph dearly, as King resented with a bitterness unusual to him the exhibition of authority in which she had indulged; when subsequently urged him to punish those who had acted under the orders of the exiled secretary, he boldly and positively refused to give her any further satisfaction, alleging that her want of consideration towards himself left him = equal liberty to disregard her own wishes.

Angry and irritated, Marguerite lost no time in acquainting her family with the affront which had experienced; and Catherine de Medicis, who believed had found a pretext sufficiently plausible to separate the young Queen from her husband, skilfully envenomed already rankling wound, not only by awakening religious scruples of her daughter, but also by reminding her that she had been subjected to insult from a petty follower of a petty court; and, finally, she urged her to mean her dignity by mimmediate return to France.

Marguerite, whom the King had not made a single effort to conciliate, obeyed without reluctance; and, in the year 1582, she left Navarre, and the her arrival in took possession of her old apartments in the Louvre. She the received with great cordiality by Henry III., who trusted that her residence in France might induce her husband ere long to follow her; but he soon discovered that not even the warmth of his welcome could cause her to forget the past; and that, under his own royal roof, she was secretly intriguing with the Duke d'Alençon, who the more in open revolt against him.

For a time, although thoroughly informed auch was the fact, his emissaries were unable to produce any tangible proof of the validity of their accusations; but length, rendered bold by impunity, Marguerite was so imprudent as to cause the arrest of a royal courier, charged with an autograph letter of two entire sheets who we then a mission Rome, for the purpose of forwarding his desputches the rebel Duke; when the unfortunate messenger, who found himself suddenly with the bound himself suddenly with the packet with which he had been intrusted, who had anticipated an easy triumph, became much exasperated, that they stabbed him the spot.

Henry III., than he sent III desire the presence of his sister; when, utterly regardless of the fact that they were not alone, he so far forgot his own dignity as to overwhelm her with the coarsest and most cutting reproaches; and not with expatiating upon the treachery of which she had been guilty towards himself, he passed in review the whole of her ill-spent life; accusing her, among other enormities, of the birth of an illegitimate son,† and terminated his invectives by

* Anne, Duke de Joyense, Admiral and Peer of France, first gentleman of the bed-chamber, and Governor of Normandy, was born in 1561. He was one of the mignous of Henry III., who, in 1582, gave him in marriage Marguerite de Lorraine, the sister of the Queen Louise de Vandemont. The commanded the troops in Guienne against the Huguenots, where he exercised the greatest cruelties; and having been defeated at the battle of Coutras, in 1587, he was put to death by the conquerors.

† This child, called by Bassompierre & Père Archange, and by Dupleix is Père Ange, was the son of Jacques de Harlay de Chanvallon, known at court as "the handsome Chanvallon;" and

commanding her instantly "to quit Paris, and rid the

On Marguerite accordingly in the capital with ____ state than ___ had entered it, for had neither suite equipage, panied only by Madame de Duras ...... Mademoiselle de Béthune, her two favourite attendants. She mu not, however, to depart thus without impediment, she had only travelled a few leagues when, between Saint-Cler and Palaiseau, her litter saint-cler and Palaiseau, her litter by a captain of the royal guard, at the head of a troop of harquebusiers: she was compelled to remove her mask; and her companions, after having been subjected to great discourtesy, were finally conveyed - prisoners to Montargis, where they underwent examination, at which the King himself presided, and wherein facts were elicited that mee fatal to the character of their mistress. Their replies were then reduced writing; and Marguerite, who had been detained for this express purpose, was compelled by her inexorable brother to affix her signature to the disgraceful document; when, after she had been subjected this new indignity, the daughter of Catherine was the individual who, as the confessor of the Marquise de Verneuil, became one of the most active agents in the conspiracy which was formed against Henry IV. and the French princes.

Dreux du Radier, vol. v, p. 176.

† Mezeray, vol iii, p. Varillas, Marillas, IIII., Book v.i.

Medicis was at length permitted to pursue her journey |
but she compelled to do so alone, her forbidden bear her company.

dispatched one of the valets of his wardrobe to St. Foix, where the King of Navarre was for the sojourning, with an autograph letter, in which he informed him that he had considered it expedient dismiss from the service of his royal sister both Madame de Duras and Mademoiselle de Béthune, having discovered that they leading the most dissolute and scandalous lives, and were "pernicious vermin" who could not be permitted remain about the person of a princess of her rank.

Thus ignominiously driven from the court of France, Marguerite, who had resource in the indulgence of her husband, travelled with the greatest speed. Nerse where he was then residing, in the hope might be enabled by her representations to induce him to expouse her mans against her brother; but although, in order to preserve appearances, Henry received her courteously, and man listened with exemplary patience, her impassioned relation of the indignities to which she had been subjected, the coldness of his deportment, and the stern tone in which he informed her would give the necessary orders for a separate be prepared her accommodation, he could never again receive her under his own roof, or accord to her the boneau and consideration due to a wife, convinced her that she had nothing more to hope from inforbestance...

Even while thus resented wown wrongs, however, Henry of Navarre no comprehended Marguerite had been personally exposed to insults which had affected his honour as her consort, than he dispatched messenger to the French King Lyons, "to entreat him to explain the cause of these affronts, and to advise him, magood master, how he had better act." somewhat service proceeding produced no adequate result, as his envoy received only biguous answers; and all he could accomplish to extort promise from Henry III. that on his return to he would discuss the affair with the Queen-mother and the III d'Alencon.

Unaware of the negociation which thus opened, Marguerite had, as have said, lost all confidence in her own influence over her husband; and accordingly, without giving any intimation of her design, she like Nerso, and retired to Agen, of her dower-cities, where the same of the same of her dower-cities, where the same of her dower-cities, where the same of the same

In vain did she declare that the bull of excommuni-

D'Aubigny, wol. ii, wi, ch. 1 (1583). Sezcy, Confession, ch. vii, p. 447. Duplessis-Morray.

cation which Sixtus V. In recently fulminated against the King of Navarre had been the cause of her retiring from In court, her conscience not permitting her share the roof of a prince under the ban of the church.* The Agenese, although Catholics and leagued against her husband, evinced towards in disaffection so threatening in her position was rapidly becoming untenable, when the city was stormed and taken by Internable, when the city was stormed and taken by Internable.

Convinced that the capture of her own person was motive of this unprovoked assault, the fugitive Queen had once more recourse to flight; and her eagerness to escape the power of the French king was so great as she left the city seated on a pillion behind gentleman of her suite named Lignerac, while Madame de Duras followed in like manner; and thus travelled four-and-twenty leagues in the short space of days, attended by such of the members of her little household as were enabled to keep pace with her.

Duplessis-Mornay, Mém., p. 205.

† Jacques Govon de Matignon, Prince de Mortagne, man the representative of a family of Brittany which truced its descent from the thirteenth century, and had been established in Normandý towards the middle of the fifteenth. Born at Loursy, in 1526, m was appointed Lieutemant-General of Normandy in 1559, where he made himself compicuous by his persecution of the Huguenots. Henry III. recompensed his services, in 1579, by the bâtos of a maréchal, and the collar of his Order. He subsequently became commander-in-chief of the army in Picardy, then lieutemant-general of Guicane, and, finally, Governor of that province. He died in 1597.

<sup>1</sup> Lévi Alvarès, p. 187.

The fortress of Carlat in the mountains of Auvergne offered the her, as she believed, a saylum; but although the governor, who was the brother of M. In Lignerac, received her with respect, and promised her protection, the enmity of Henry III. pursued her even to this obscure place of exile.

At this period even the high spirit of Marguerite de Valois mearly subdued, for she no longer knew in what direction to turn for safety. She had become contemptible in the eyes of her husband, she was deserted by her mother, was by her brother, despised by her co-religionists from the licentiousness of her life, and detested by the Protestants . the cause, however innocently, of the fatal _____ of their friends and leaders. The memory of the martyred Coligny was accompanied by a curse on Marguerite; and thus she was an outcast from all creeds and all parties. Still, however, confident in the good-faith of Governor of Carlat, she assumed . semblance of tranquillity, and trusted that she should enabled remain for a time unmolested; but it was long ere ascertained that the inhabitants of town, like those of Agen, were hostile to interests. and that they had even resolved to deliver her to the French king.

Under circumstances, she is alternative save to become once more a fugitive; and having, with considerable difficulty, succeeded in making her escape beyond the walls, she began to include a hope that she should yet buffle the devices of her enemy; she was soon, however, fated to be undeceived, for she had travelled only a few leagues when she was overtaken and captured by the Marquis de Canillac,* who conveyed her to the fortress of Usson. As she passed the drawbridge, Marguerite recognised at a glance that there was no hope of evasion from this new and impregnable prison, save through the agency of her gacler; and she accordingly lost no time in exerting all her blandishments to captivate his reason. Although she had now attained her thirty-fifth year, neither time, anxiety, hardship, nor even the baneful indulgence of her misguided passions, had yet robbed her of her extraordinary beauty; and it is consequently scarcely surprising that ere long the gallant soldier to whose custody she was confided, surrendered sidiscretion, and laid in her feet, not only his heart, but also the keys of her prisonhouse.

"Poor man!" enthusiastically exclaims Brantôme, her friend and correspondent; "what did he expect to do? Did he think to retain as a prisoner her who, by her eyes and her lovely countenance, could hold in her

Governor of Auvergne,

† The fortress of Usson, which had been a state prison under Louis XI., was demoliahed by Louis XIII., in 1684.

chains and bonds all the rest of the world galley-

Certain I is, that if the brave but susceptible marquis contemplated such a result, he was destined prove the fallacy of I hopes; for totally he subjugated by the fascinations of the captive Queen, I have abandoned her I command of the fortress, which thenceforward acknowledged au authority was her own.

Marguerite and scarcely resided a year Usson when the death of the Duke d'Alençon deprived her of the friend whom she possessed on earth; and not were the security that she derived from the impregnability of the fortress in which she had found asylum, could preserve her from great and severe suffering. The castle, with its triple ramparts, its wide most, and its iron portcullis, might indeed defy all human enemies, but could not exclude famine; and during her sojourn within its walls, which extended over a period of twoand-twenty years, she ma compelled to pawn her jewels, and to melt down her plate, in order to provide food for the famishing garrison; while, an utterly did she ultimately become, and she found herself driven to appeal to the generosity of Elizabeth of Austria, widow of brother, Charles IX., who thenceforward supplied her necessities.

In year 1589, Henry of Navarre the

* Brantême, Dames Illustres, Marguerite de France, Reine de Navarre, Dis. v, p. 275.

throne of France, having previously, we second time, embraced the Catholic faith; but for a while the liaisons which he found it is facile to form at the court, and his continued affection for the Countess de Guiche, together with the internal disturbances and foreign which had convulsed the early years of his reign, so thoroughly engrossed his attention, that he had made no attempt to separate himself from his erring and exiled wife; nor was it until 1598, when the Edict of Nantes had ensured a lasting and certain peace the Huguenots: and that la belle Gabrielle! had

"There are three things," Henry IV. was wont to say, "that the world will not believe, and yet they are certainly true: the Queen of England (Elizabeth) died a maid; that the Archduke (Albert, Cardinal and Archduke of Austria) is a great captain; and King of France a very good "Lande."—L'Etoile, Journ. de Henry IV., vol. i, p. 233.

d'Andonins, Vicomtesse Louvigui, l'Escun, only daughter Paul, Viscount Louvigui, Seigneur de l'Escun, and of Marguerite de Cauna. While yet a mere girl, she became the wife of Philibert de Grammont, Count de Guiche, Governor of Bayonne, and Seneschal of Bearn. The passion of Henry IV. for this lady was so great, that he declared his intention of obtaining a divorce from Marguerite de Valois, for the purpose of making ber his wife; a project from which he was dismuded by d'Aubigny, who represented that the contempt which could not fail to be felt by the French for a monarch who had degraded himself by an alliance with his mistress, would inevitably deprive him of the throne in the event of the death of Henry III. and the man d'Alengon.

Gabrielle d'Estrées was the daughter of Antoine d'Estrées, fourth of the name, Governor, Senesshal, and first Baron of Bouplaced de Guiche, and by making him of sons, had him contemplate (as he had done in a previous case with her predecessor) elevation to the throne, that he became really anxious liberate himself from trammels of his ill-omened marriage.

Having ascertained that the Duke . Bouillon, notlunnois, Viscount of Soissons and Berry, Marquis of Cornyres, knight of the Orders of the King, Governor of La Fère, Paris, and the Isle of France; and of Françoise Babou, second daughter Jean, Seigneur de la Bourdaisière, and of Françoise Robertet. She married m an early age, by the desire of her father, who was anxious to protect her from the assiduities of the King, Nicolas d'Armeval, Seigneur de Liancourt, who was alike in birth, in person, and in fortune, unworthy of her hand. This ill-assorted union produced the very result which it was intended to avert, for Henry found means to separate the young couple immediately after their marriage, and to attach Gabrielle to the court, where she soon became the declared favourite. On the birth of her first child (Casar, Duke de Vendôme), Manual de Liancourt abandoned the name of her husband from whom she obtained a divorce, and assumed that of Marquise de Monceaux, which she derived from an estate presented to her on that occasion by the King; and on the legitimation of her son in January, 1595, all already aspired to the throne, and formed a party, headed by M de Sillery, by whom her pretensions were encouraged. She was subsequently created Duchesse de Beaufort, and became the mother of Catherine-Henriette, married to the Duke d'Elbouf, and of Alexandre de Vendôme, Grand Prior of France, who were likewise legitimated. She died in child-birth, but not without suspicion of poison, on withstanding concessions which he had Protestant party, had been recently engaged, in conjunction with d'Aubigny other zealous reformers, in endeavouring to create renewed disaffection among Huguenots, Henry resolved to visit Brittany, personally to express to the Duke his indignation and displeasure.

* Henri de la Tour, Vicomte de Turenne, Duke de Bouillon, Peer and Marshal of France.

Easter Eve, in the year 1599.

On his arrival at Rennes, where M. de Bouillon was confined to his bed by a violent attack of gout, King accordingly proceeded to his residence; where, after having expressed his regret at the state of suffering in which he found him, he ordered all the attendants to withdraw, and seating himself the pillow of the invalid, desired him to listen without remark or interruption to all that he about to say. In then reproached him in the most indignant terms with his continual and active efforts to disturb the peace of the * Théodore Agrippa d'Aubigny was the son of and d'Aubigny, Seigneur de Brie, in Xaintonge, and of Catherine ... Leatang; and was born on the 8th of February, 1550. At the age of six years he read with equal facility the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew landaries and eighteen months afterwards translated the "Crito" of Plato. The persecutions of the Huguenots, which he witnessed in his early youth, and the solemn injunctions of his father to revenge their wrongs, rendered him one of the most zealous and uncompromising reformers under Henry IV. He died at Geneva, on the 29th of April, 1630, aged eighty years, and was buried in a cloisters of ... Pierre. D'Aubigny ... him him not only his own memoirs, which are admirably and truthfully written, but also the biting satire known as the "Aventures ... Baron de Fomeste," and the still more celebrated "Confession de Sancy."

kingdom, recapitulating every act, and almost every word, of his astonished — embarrassed listener, with — accuracy which — no opportunity for denial; and, finally, he advised him — be warned in time, and, if he valued his — safety, — adopt a perfectly opposite line of conduct; assuring him, in conclusion, — should he persist in — present contumacy, he — himself — his sovereign and his master, to render him incapable of working further mischief.

The bewildered Duke would have replied, but he was instantly silenced by an imperious gesture from the King; who, rising from seat, in the chamber in ailence.

The presence of Henry IV. in Brittany the signal for festivity and rejoicing, and all that and noble in the province was collected Rennes in honour of his arrival; but despite these demonstrations of affection and respect, his watchful and anxious minister, the Duke de Sully, remarked that he sionally gave way to is of absence, and even of melancholy, which was quite unusual to him, and which consequently excited the alarm of the zealous Duke. III had, moreover, several times desired M. - Sully's attendance in a manner which induced him to believe Was King had something of importance nicate, but interviews successively terminated without any such result; until, one occasion, days after his interview with the Duke Ma Bouillon. Henry beckoned him to his side, will turning into a large garden which was attached a large residence, he there wreathed in fingers in those of the minister, his habit, and drawing him into a retired walk, commenced the conversation by relating in detail all had passed between and the rebel. He then digressed to recent political measures, and expressed himself strongly upon an advantages which tranquility home, well so east, must insure the kingdom; after which, = if by process of mental retrogression, he became suddenly more gloomy in his discourse; and observed, as I despite himself, that although he would struggle even limited end of his existence to secure these national advantages, he nevertheless felt that as III Queen had given him no son, I his endeavours prove fruitless; since the contention which would necessarily arise between In de Condé and the other princes of the blood, when important subject of us succession gave a free and sufficient motive for their jealousy, could mit fail m renew this civil anarchy which he is been so anxious in terminate. He then, after a moment's silence, to im desire which had been formally expressed to him by the Parliament of Paris, that he should separate him-Marguerite de Valois, and unite himself with other princess who might give Dauphin to France, and thus transmit to a son of his own line the many which he

Sully, who was makes desirous than himself to ensure in prosperity of the nation in which in the sum of the nation is such as the sum of the nation is such as the sum of the nation is such as the na 100

all the energies of his powerful and active mind, did not have a suggest the expediency of his Majesty's immediate compliance with the prayer of his subjects; and entreat him in his turn to obtain a divorce, which by leaving him free, would enable him to make a happier choice; and he assured the anxious monarch that he had already taken steps to ascertain that he had already taken steps to ascertain that he had already taken steps to ascertain that he Archbishop d'Urbino, and the Pope himself (who was fully aware of the importance of maintaining the peace of Europe, which have necessarily be endangered by a renewal of the intestine troubles in France,) would both readily facilitate by every means in their power so politic and so desirable a measure.

Henry urged for a time his disinclination to contract a second marriage, alleging that his first had proved so unfortunate in every way, that he was reluctant to rivet anew the chain which had been so rudely riven asunder; but the unfinching minister did not fail to remind him that much as he owed to himself, he still owed even more to a people who had faith in his wisdom and generosity; and the frank-hearted King suffered himself, although with evident distaste, a ultimately convinced.

He then began to pass a review all the marriageable princesses who were eligible to share his throne, but to each in succession he are objection which tended to weaken her claim. After what he had already undergone, as he declared, there were few women, and still fewer women of royal blood, to whom he would willingly a second time confide his chance of happiness. "In order not to encounter once the disappointment and displeasure;" he disappointment and displeasure; he displeasure; "I must find in the next woman whom I may marry seven qualities with which I dispense. In handsome, prudent, gentle, intellectual, fruitful, wealthy, and of high extraction; and thus I do not know a single Princess in Europe calculated to satisfy my idea of feminine perfection."

.

Then, after a pause during which the minister remained silent, he added, with inconsistency: "I would readily put up with the Spanish Infanta," despite both her age and her ugliness, did response the Low Countries in her person; neither would I refuse the Princess Arabella of England,† if, all alleged, the of that country really belonged to her, even had she been declared heiress presumptive; but we cannot reasonably anticipate either contingency. I have heard also of several German princesses whose names I have forgotten, but I have no taste for the women of that country; which, if on record that a German queent nearly proved the ruin is the

* Isabella Clara Eugenia, Infanta of Spain, was the accord daughter of Philip II. She was the Governante of the Low Countries; and although no longer either young or handsome, she possessed as extraordinary influence over her royal father, who was tenderly attached to her.

† Arabella Stuart, daughter of Charles, Earl of Leunox, the grandson of Margaret of Scotland, sister to Henry VIII.

Isabean de Havière, Queen of Charles VI.

mation; and they inspire only disgust."

Still Sully listened without reply, the King having commenced his confidence by assuming a position which rendered argument

"They have talked to me likewise;" resumed Henry more hurriedly, and disconcerted annoyed by the expressive silence of his companion he began to walk more rapidly along the shaded path in which conference took place; "they have talked to me of is sisters of Prince Maurice; but not only are they Huguenots, a fact which could not III to give umbrage the court of Rome, but I have also heard reports that would render averse to their alliance. Then the Duke of Florence has a niece, who is stated to be tolerably handsome, but she comes of one of the pettiest principalities of Christendom; and not than sixty meighty years her ancestors mem merely the chief citizens of the town of which their successors are now the sovereigns; and, moreover, she is a daughter of the same race as Catherine de Medicis, who has been my own enemy and of France."

Once the King paused for breath, and glanced anxiously towards his minister, but Sully inex-

Maurice of Nassau, Prince of Orange, second son of William, and of Anne, the daughter of Maurice, Elector of Saxony.

† Marie de Medicis was the daughter of Francis, Grand Duke of Tuscany, and of Jane, Archduchem of Austria, and Queen of Hungary, daughter of the Emperor Ferdinand.

orable, and continued in the respectfully and intering syllable.

"So much for the foreign princesses;" continued Henry with irritation, when he that his listener had resolved not to assist him either by word gesture; "at least, I know of mothers. And now for there is my niece, Mademoiselle despite the naughty tales and told of her, for I place the naughty tales are told of her, for I place in them; but she is too much devoted the interests of her house, and I have reason to dread the restless ambition of her brothers."

The Princesses of Mayenne,† of Aumale,‡ and of Louise-Margnerite de Lorraine un the daughter Henri, Duke de Guise, surnamed le Belafré, and of Catherine of Clèves, subsequently Duchess de Nemoure. She was celebrated alike for extreme beauty, her brilliant wit, and her great intellect. When wrote admirably for that age, and man the author of the "Maria" des Amours du Grand Alcandre," and of some "Court Chronicles," which she published under the patronymic of Dupilaust. Mademoiselle de Guise married François, Prince de Conti, son of the celebrated Louis, Prince de Condé, who was killed at Jaruae.

† Catherine de Lorraine, daughter of Charles, Duke de Mayenne, and of Lorraine de Savoie-Villars, who became in Fabruary, 1599, the wife of Charles de Gonzagna, Duke de Nevers, and subsequently Duke Manton. She died on the 8th of Manton 1618, the age of thirty-three years; and was consequently, at period referred to in the text, only seventeen years old.

Anne, daughter and heiron of Charles, last Duke d'Aumale, by whom the duchy was transferred to the house of Savoy. Longueville, next the subject of royal comments; but they were all either too fair or too dark, too old too plain; nor Mesdemoiselles Rohan,† de Luxembourg,‡ de Guiménée; more fortunate; the first Calvinist, the second too young, and Long ere the King had arrived in point in his discourse, the keen-sighted minister in the limit determination to raise some obstacle in every instance; began to entertain a suspicion that this was not done without a powerful motive, which he immediately became anxious to comprehend. Thus, therefore, when Henry pressed him to declare in sentiments upon the subject, he answered cautiously: "I cannot, in truth, hazard an opinion, Sire; nor can I even understand the bent of your wishes. Thus much only do I

Mademoiselle de Longueville was the sister of Henry d'Orleans, first Duke de Longueville.

† Catherine de Roban, second daughter of Réné II., Vicomte de Roban, and of Catherine, the daughter and heireas of Jean de Parthenay, Seigneur Soubise. When she had subsequently become the wife of the Duke de Deux-Ponts, Henry IV. was so enamoured of her as to make dishonourable proposals, to which she replied by the memorable answer: "I am too poor, Sire, to be your wife, and too well born to become your prehend—that you to take another wife, but that you discover no princess throughout Europe with whom you are willing to share the throne of France. From the manner in which you spoke of the Infanta, it nevertheless appeared as though a rich heiress would not be unacceptable; but surely you expect that Heaven will resuscitate in your favour a Marguerite Flandres, a Marie de Bourgogne, or even permit former of England to grow young again."

Diane de Luxembourg, who in 1600-1 gave her hand to Louis de Ploësqueler, Comte de Kerman, in Provence.

§ Mademoiselle de Guiménée was the daughter of Louis de Rohan, Prince de Guiménée, first Dake de Montheson.

"I anticipate nothing of which is the sharp retort; "but how know I, even were I to marry one of the princesses I have enumerated, that I should be fortunate than I have hitherto been? If beauty and youth could have ensured to the blessing of a Dauphin, had I not every right to anticipate a different result in my union with Madame Marguerite? I could brook a second mortification of the like description, and therefore I am cautious. And now, as I have failed to satisfy myself upon this point, tell me, do you know of any one woman in whom are combined all the qualities which I have declared to be requisite in a Queen of France?"

"The question is one of too important a nature, Sire, to be answered upon the instant;" Sully; "and the rather that I have never hitherto turned my attention to the subject."

"And what would you say," asked Henry with illconcealed anxiety; "were I to tell you that such an one exists in my own kingdom?"

- "I will say, Sire, I'm you have greatly advantage was myself; and also that the lady to whom you alkade will necessarily be widow."
- "Just wyou please;" retorted the King; "but if you refuse to guess, I will name her."
- "Do so;" and Sully with increasing surprise; "for I washed that the riddle is beyond my reach."
- " I have say that you do not wish to solve it;" " qualities upon which I insist are to be found combined in the person of the Duchess de Beaufort."
  - "Your mistress, Sire!"
- "I do not affirm that I have any intention, in the of my release from my present marriage, of making the duchess my wife;" pursued Henry with embarrassment; "but I anxious to learn what you would say, if, unable to find another to my taste, I should one day see fit to do so."
- "Say, "echoed the minister, struggling conceal his consternation under magneted gaiety; "I should probably be of same opinion as the rest of your subjects."

The King had, however, made so violent an effort himself, in order to test the amount of forbearance which might anticipate in favourite counsellor, desirous to ascertain upon important subject, claimed impatiently: "I command you to speak freely
you have acquired the right to utter unpalatable truths; do not, therefore, fear that I shall take whenever our conversation is purely confidential, although I should assuredly resent such a liberty in public."

The reply of the upright minister, authorised, was worthy alike of the monarch who had made such an appeal, and of the man to whom it was addressed. He placed before the eyes of his royal master the opprobrium with which an alliance of the which he had hinted must inevitably cover his own name, and affront it would entail upon every reign in Europe. He reminded him also that the legitimation of the gran of Beaufort, and the extraordinary and strictly regal ceremonies which he recently permitted at the baptism of the younger of the two, (throughout the whole of which the infant had been recognised a prince of the blood-royal although the King had himself refused to allow the registry of the proceedings until they were revised, and the obnoxious passages rescinded), could not fail, should are ever become Queen of France, in the event of her having other children, to plunge the nation into those very struggles for succession, from which he had just declared his anxiety to preserve it,

"And strife, Sire;" he concluded fearleasly;
"would be formidable frightful to which you anxiously alluded; it you will well to remember that not only the arena in which must take place will be your own beloved kingdom of France, while the whole of civilised Europe stands looking on, but it will be a contest between the of M. de Liancourt and the King's mistress—of Madame de Monceaux, the divorced wife of obscure noble, and the declared favourite of the sovereign; and, finally, between these, the children of ahame, it the Dauphin of France, the son of Henry IV. Queen; I leave you, Sire, to reflect upon startling fact before I venture further."

"And you do well;" said the monarch, as turned away; "for truly you have said enough for once."*

It will be readily conceived that at the close of this conference M. de Sully considerably less anxious than before to effect the divorce of the infatuated sovereign; nor the sorry to remind Henry, when he next touched upon the subject, that they had both been premature in discussing the preliminaries of second marriage before they had succeeded in cancelling the first. It was true that Clement VIII., in his desire maintain the peace of Europe, had readily entered into arguments of MM. Marquemont,† Ossat,‡ and

* Sully, Mém., vol. iii, pp. 162-174.

† Denys de Marquemont, Archbishop of Lyons, and subsequently cardinal (1626). In not, however, long enjoy in dignity, to obtain which he had exerted all his energies, as in died at the close of the same year. He was a truckling politician, and an ambitious priest.

Arnaud d'Osent was born in 1536, at Cassagnaberre, a small village of Armagnac, near Auch. His parents lived in great

Duperron,* whom the had, by command of the monarch, entrusted with the difficult and dangerous mission, when they represented that the birth of a indigence during his infancy, and at nine years of the limit orphan, totally destitute. of a young gentleman of family, whose studies shared with such success that, from the fellow-student of his patron, ill secompanied employer to Paris, where by persevering industry he completed education, en enabled prive lessons philosophy rhetoric. He then proceeded to Bourges, where he studied legal jurisprudence under the famous Cujas. Paul de Foix, Archbishop of Toulouse, when about to proceed as ambassador to Rome, engaged him as his secretary; and while there, he embraced the profession, and rendered himself perfectly conversant the whole policy of the papal court. Henry III. bestowed upon him the abbey of Notre-Dame de Varennes, but, m ke claim contested, he immediately resigned it. Subsequently he raised to the bishopric of Rennes, was created a cardinal in 1598, sometime afterwards was appointed to the see of Bayeux. His untiring devotion to the interests of France was ultimately recognised by his elevation to the dignity of minister under Henry IV.

Jacques Davy Duperron was born — Berne, in 1556, and being learned in mathematics, Greek, Hebrew, and philosophy, he became a professor of those sciences in Paris, where he obtained the appointment of reader to Henry III. Having embraced the ecclesisatical profession, he received from Henry IV. (in 1591) the hishopric of Evreux, as a recompense — his devotion to the from the Pope the removal of the interdict fulminated against France. — ultimately — a cardinal, — Archbishop — Sens, — in 1606.

.

Dauphin must necessarily avert all risk of a civil war in France, together with the utter hopelessness of unless their royal master were released from his present engagements; and that the sovereign-pontiff had even expressed his willingness to second the wishes of French monarch; but the franch of Marguerite herself no less important; and with a view to obtain this, minister addressed to her a letter, in which he expressed ardent desire fifest reconciliation between herself and the King, in order that the prayers of the nation might be answered by the birth of a Dauphin; or, should she deem such an event impossible, to treat of her to pardon him if he ventured to take the liberty of imploring her Majesty to make a still greater sacrifice.

Sully had that it was unnecessary to explain himself more clearly, reconciliation between Henry IV. and his erring consort, had, from the profligate life which she was known to have led Usson, become utterly impossible; nor could she doubt for instant the nature of the sacrifice which was required at hands. It was not, therefore, without great anxiety he awaited her reply, which not reach him for the of five months; the expiration of which period he received a letter, wherein she averred her willingness to submit the pleasure of the King, whose she expressed herself grateful; offering at time her acknowledgments the limit himfor the interest which he towards her per-

aon. From period continued correspondence maintained between Queen and the minister; and she proved so little exacting in the conditions which she required as the price of her concession, the would have been concluded without difficulty, had not the favourite, who was privy negociation, calculating upon her influence over the mind of monarch, suddenly assumed an which arrested progress.

For a considerable time she had aspired to the throne; but a not until she learnt that the agents of the King in Rome were labouring to effect the dissolution of marriage with Marguerite de Valois; and that the Duke Luxembourg* was also about to visit the papal court in order to hasten the conclusion of the negociations, that she openly declared her views to Sillery,†

&quot; Henry de Luxembourg, Duke de Piney, was the distribution of the celebrated Count de Saint-Pol, and that branch of the family became extinct in his person. He died in 1981.

† Nicolas Bruiart, Seigneur de Sillery, was the elder son of Pierre Bruiart, president of the Court of Requests, at Paris. He obtained the office of court-councillor, in 1573, and subsequently that of master of the Court of Requests. Henry IV., after his accession to the throne of France, appointed him ambassador to Switzerland; and on his return from that country, made him sixth president, that dignity having become vacant by the death of Jean Le Mann. In 1888 he was one of the deputies by whom the peace of Vervins was concluded; and from thence he proceeded to Brussels with the Dake de Biron, to be present when the Archduke swore to the observance of the treaty. He next visited Italy whom she knew to be already well affected towards her; declaring that should he be instrumental in inducing the King to make her his wife, she would pledge herself to obtain the seals for him on his return from Rome, well the dignity of chancellor so soon with should be vacant.*

•

Sillery, whose ambition aroused, and not slow obey her wishes; and, finding the Pope unwilling to lend himself to the haste which required of him, only informed him privately that, in the event of a divorce, his royal master ready to espouse the Princesa Marie de Medicis his kinswoman (although this period Henry evinced no inclination towards such an alliance), but when he discovered that his remained unmoved by this prospect of family aggrandisement, he ventured so far as to hint, in conjunction with the Cardinal d'Ossat, that it was probable, should the pontiff continue to withhold his consent to the annullation of the King's present marriage, he would dispense with it altogether, and make the Duchess I Beaufort Queen of France: a threat which as alarmed the sovereign prelate that, immediately declaring im he placed the whole affair in the hands of God, he com-as ambassador extraordinary to the Pope, where he negociated the marriage of the King with Marie de Medicia. In 1604, Henry IV. created in his favour the office of keeper in the man of France; and finally, on the death of the Chancellor de Bellièves, he became his successor.

Sully, Mém., vol. iii, 190.

manded segeneral fast throughout Rome, himself up in his oratory, where he continued for a considerable time in fervent prayer. On his re-appearance he was calm, and simply remarked: "God provided for it."

A few days subsequently courier arrived with intelligence of the death of the duchess.

Meanwhile Gabrielle by her unbridled vanity had counteracted all the exertions of her partisans. Aware of her power over the King, and believing this divorce from Marguerite once obtained, she should find little difficulty in overcoming all other obstacles, she unguarded enough prematurely to the and pretensions of the regality to which she aspired, affecting airs of patronage towards the greatest of the court, and lavishing the most profuse promises upon the sycophants and flatterers by whom she was surrounded. The infatuation of the King, whose passion for his arrogant mistress appeared to increase with time, tended, as a natural consequence, as encourage these unseemly demonstrations; nor did the friends of exiled Queen fail to render her cognizant of every extravagance committed by the who aspired become her successor; upon which Marguerite, who, morally fallen as she was in her own person, had never forgotten she she daughter and consort of a King, suddenly withdrew her consent proposed divorce; declaring, in the delicate, that no woman of blighted character should ever, through her agency, usurp place.

&quot;Comme s'il revenn d'extase," Péréfixe, vol. ii, p.

The sudden and frightful death of the which shortly afterwards supervened, having, however, removed her only objection the proposed her marriage with the King was, I length, finally declared null and void, to the equal satisfaction of both parties. The event which Marguerite I dreaded, had become impossible; and she once forwarded a personal requisition to Rome, in which she declared that "it was in opposition to her own free will that her royal brother King Charles IX. I the Queen-mother had effected an alliance to which she had consented only with her lips, but not with her heart; and that the King her husband and herself being related in the third degree, she besought his Holiness to declare the nullity of said marriage."

On the receipt of this application, the pontiff—having previously ascertained that the demand of Henry himself was based on precisely the same arguments, and still entertaining the hope held out to him by Sillery that the King would, when liberated from his present wife, espouse one of his unit relatives—immediately appointed committee, composed — Cardinal de Joyeuse, the

* In April, IIII

† Française, 1783, in folio, vol. v, p.

Archbishop of Arles,* and Bishop Modena, his nephew, instructing them, should they find all circumstances they were represented, declare forthwith the dissolution of marriage.†

Meanwhile King, whose burst of grief the loss of duchess had been violent duches in his carriage on receiving the intelligence, and afterwards shut himself up in the palace of during several days, refusing to see the princes of the blood and the great nobles who bastened to offer their condolences, and retaining about his person only half a dozen courtiers to whom he personally attached; had recovered from the shock sufficiently to resume in usual habits of dissipation and amusement. In the extremity of his sorrow he had commanded general court mourning, and himself - the example by assuming a black dress for the first week; but as his regret became moderated, he exchanged his sables for a suit of violet, in which costume he received a deputation from the Parliament of Paris which was sent to condols with him upon bereavement had had undergone! while the intelligence which im of the presumed treachery of the Duke Biron, by compelling his removal to Blois, where he could more readily investigate affair, completed a cure already more than accomplished. There sensual

† Mezeray, vol. 📖 p. 123.

<sup>1</sup> Maintenon, Mém., Amsterdam, 1756, vol. ii, p. 115.

- Roger de St. Larry, Duke de Bellegarde, was the favourite autocessive sovereigns. Henry III. appointed autocessive sovereigns. Henry IV. made him a knight of his Orders, in 1595; and, ultimately, Louis XIII. continued to him an equal of favour. The preservation of Quillebosnf, and defended with great gallantry during the space of weeks, with only forty-five and ten nobles, against the army of the Duke de Mayenne, acquired for him a renown which he never afterwards forfeited.
- ‡ Jean de St. Larry de Thermes, brother of the Duke d'Aiguillon.
- § Jacques, Marquis de Castelnau, subsequently serviced of France, who, in 1658, commanded the left wing of the army at the battle of the Dunes, and died the same year, at the early age of thirty-eight.
- | François de Paule de Clermont, Marquis de Montglat, | de d'hôtel | King.
- ¶ M. de Frontenne was one of the officers of Henry IV., who, before his accession to the throne of France (in 1576), had a quarrel with II. de Rosny, during which he told him that if he were to pull his nose, he could only draw at milk; a taunt to him better I nobler feelings. Ambitious, wealthy, witty, and obsequious, they I all interested in flattering his vanity, gratifying I tastes, and pandering his passions; and it melancholy contemplate perfect self-gratulation with which of highest-born nobles of the time have in personal memoirs chronicled the unblushing subserviency with which they lent themselves I the encouragement of the and memoirs debesing qualities of their sovereign.

the future minister replied by an assurance that he felt strong enough to draw blood out of that of his adversary with his sword. The peculiarity of this quarrel existed in the fact that, although de Rosny was a Protestant, and Frontenec a Catholic, M. de Turenne nevertheless espoused the cause of the latter; upon which M. de Lavardin, a Catholic, declared himself ready to second the arms of the adverse party.

François, Beron de Bassompierre, was the son of Christophe de Bassompierre and Louise de Radeval, and was born on the 12th of April, 1579, at the château of Harouel, in Lorraine. He became at an early age intimate companion and favourite of Henry IV., by whom in was appointed colonel-general in Swiss troops. In the year 1603 he was made Marshal of France, and obtained great influence over both Marie de Madicia and her son, Louis XIII. Richelieu, who became jeakous of his favour, caused him to be imprisoned in the Bastille, in 1631, where he remained for twelve years. He was an able diplomatist, a distinguished general, and a polished, though dissolute, courtier. He acquitted himself with great distinction in several sieges; and at his death, which occurred in 1646, he bequeathed to posterity his personal mesocies, which are among the most carious in the rich collections possessed by his countrymen.

Even before his departure for Blois, and during the period of last temporary retirement from the court, which he had assumed in honour of his dead mistress, the more intimate of his associates could discover no means of consolation more effective than by inducing him to select another favourite.

"All the court," says a quaint old chronicler, himself member of the royal circle; "were aware that King had a heart which could not long preserve to liberty without attaching itself to some new object, knowledge which induced the flatterers to court who discovered his weakness for the other to leave nothing undone to urge him onward in this taste, and to make their fortunes by the defeat."

Unfortunately, the natural character of the King lent itself only too readily to their designs; and, as already stated, they had profited by the opportunity afforded them during the short retreat at Fontainebleau to the curiosity of Henry on the subject of a beauty. Whether table, play, lounging beneath shady to the conversation, and always with the most enthusiastic encomiums; nor was it long ere their pertinacity pro-

* Rambure, unpublished Mem., 1599, vol. i. 151, 111
† Land de Land d'Entragues, subsequently known as the Marquise de Verneuil, was the elder daughter of the celebrated Marie Touchet, who, after having been the mistress

duced the desired effect, and the monarch expressed his desire to see the paragon of whom they all professed enamoured. A hunting-party accordingly organised in the neighbourhood of the château of Malesherbes, where Marquis d'Entragues then residing with his family; and the fact no sooner became known to mother of the young beauty, whose greater than her morality, and who was aware of the efforts which had been made to induce Henry to replace the deceased duchess by a new favourite, than and dispatched a messenger to and of his Majesty himself under her roof after the fatigue of the chase. The invitation was accepted; and on his arrival Henriette presented to the King; who was immediately captivated by her wit, and that charm of youthfulness, which had for time ceased to enhance the loveliness of the man faultless Gabrielle. At this period, Mademoiselle d'Entragues III not quite attained her twentieth year, but she was already well versed in the art of fascination Advisedly overlooking monarch in the man she conversed with a perfect self-possession, which enabled her to display all the resources of a

DR DR

of Charles IX., became the wife of François de Balanc, Seigneur d'Entragues, Marcounis, and de Malesherbes, Governor Orleans, and was, in 1573, elected a knight of St. Michael, by Henry III. Henriette, as her name implies, was, together with her two sisters, the issue of this marriage; while her half brother the Count d'Auvergne, subsequently the Duke d'Angoulème, was the son of Marcount IX.

•

cultivated mind a lively temperament; while Henry was enchanted by a gaiety and absence of constraint which placed him the most familiar footing with young and brilliant hostess; and thus, instead of departing the morrow, been his original design, he remained during several days. Malesherbes, constantly attended by the marquise and her daughter, who were invited to share the royal table.

The Besufort had been dead only three weeks, and already the sensual monarch will elected her

Leas regularly handsome than Gabrielle d'Estrées, Mademoiselle d'Entragues was even attractive from graceful vivacity of her her brilliant sallies, and her aptitude in availing herself of the resources of extensive and desultory course of study. She remembered that, in all probability, death alone had prevented Gabrielle d'Estrées from ascending the French throne; and she was aware that, although less classically beautiful than the deceased duchess, she eminently her superior in youth and intellect, and, above all, in that sparkling conversational talent, which waluable amid the ensus of a court. Well versed in the nature of the monarch with whom she had to deal, Mademoid'Entragues accordingly gave to the animation and playfulness by which Henry easily enthralled; skilfully turning the sharp almost impercentible point of her satire against the younger and handsomer of his courtiers, and thus flattering his vanity and self-love. Still, the passion of the King made no progress save in his own breast. At times. Mademoiselle d'Entragues his professions is a pleasantry, and others to them as an affront to her honour; a one moment confessing that he alone could ever touch her heart, and bewailing that destiny should have placed him upon throne, and thus beyond the reach of her affection; and at another declaring herself ready to make any sacrifice rather than resign her claim upon his love, save only that by which she could be enabled to return it. This conduct served, as she intended it should do, merely to irritate the passion of the monarch; who, unconscious of the extent of her ambition, believed her to be simply anxious to secure herself against future disappointment and the anger of her family; and thus finding his entreaties was unavailing, he resolved memory another argument of which he had already frequently the efficacy, and on his return to Fontsinebleau he dispatched the Count Lude in imlady with what ____ in that age termed _ propositions."

Saint-Edme, Amours et Galanteries des Rois France. Brussels, vol. ii. 199, 200.

It is, from a circumstance, sufficiently clear
Henry himself was a feeling any inclination his throne with the daughter of Charles IX.'s mistress; I that, despite the infatuation under which haboured, he already estimated at its true price the value of I affection. Nevertheless, the wily beauty remained for some short time proof against the representations of the royal envoy; nor it until the equally wily courtier hinted Mademoiselle d'Entragues would do well to reflect she there was reason to believe that the King had, on a recent visit to the widowed Queen Louise. Chenonceaux, become

" Margoerite de Lorraine, the widow of Henry III., was the elder daughter of Nicolas de Lorraine, Duke de Mercour, Comte de Vaudemont, and of the Marquise d'Egment, his wife. Henry III, having seen her at Rheims, during his temporary residence in that city, became enamoured of her person, and their marriage took place on the 5th of February, 1575. François de Luxembourg, of the House of Brienne, had me time paid his addresses to Mademoiselle de Lorraine, with the hope and intention of making her his wife; a fact which the licentious and frivolous King no sooner ascertained, then he declared his inclination to effect an alliance between the disappointed suitor and his own mistrees, Mademoiselle de Chatesuneuf, for whom he was anxious to provide through this medium. In consequently proposed in arrangement to M. In Luxembourg on the day of his coronation, but received the cold and firm reply, that the Count felt himself bound to congratulate Mademoiselle da Lorraine on her good fortuna, by changing her lover she had also been enabled to limited her dignity; but that, as regarded himself, benefit whatever from becoming the husband of Mademoiselle Chateauneuf, he begged that his Majesty would excuse him from contracting such an alliance. The King, however, declared that he would admit of no refusal, and insisted upon his instant obedience; whereupon M. I Luxembourg demanded eight days to make the

1

enamoured of Mademoiselle Bourdaisière, one of her maids of honour,* that the startled beauty, who had deemed herself of her royal conquest, induced to affix a price to the concession which was upon to make; and that M. de Lude returned bearing her ultimatum to the King.†

This ultimatum amounted to me less than a hundred thousand crowns; and, setting aside the voluntary finally arranged that he should be allowed three days for that purpose, after which he was to hold himself prepared to obey the royal command. These three days sufficed to enable the intended victim to make escape, and he accordingly left the kingdom. against herself had so deeply irritated Queen Louise, that the death of her husband, she entreated Henry IV. to revenge injured dignity upon her former sultor, but monarch declined to aid in any further persecution of the unfortunate young noble. The married life of the Queen was a most unhappy one, and appeared to have entirely disgusted her with the world, as an becoming a widow, she passed two years of seclusion and mourning E Chenonceanz, whence she removed to the chatesu of Moulins, where she devoted herself to the most austere duties of religion. In her will, by which she bequeathed nearly the whole of her property to the church and to charitable purposes, she left a large sum for the crection of a Capuchin convent Bourges, where she desired that she might be ultimately interred; but by command of Henry IV., the convent was built in the Fauhouse St. Honoré, at Paris, and her body deposited in the chapel.

* Sully, Mém., vol. iii, p. .

† Saint-Edme, p. 200.

Equal, in the present day, to nearly five degradation of the lady—a degradation which would appear have been more sufficient to disgust any man of delicacy who sought to be loved for his own sake—it — demand which even startled the inconsiderate monarch himself, although he had not sufficient self-command it with the contempt that it was calculated to excite. Well had it been, alike for himself and for the nation generally, he suffered his better judgment this occasion dant; initial misdoubted, the well might, the sand protestations of interested person; particularly, when he could not fail to remember that he had been deceived by Gabrielle d'Estrées, whom he overwhelmed with riches and honours, and who voluntarily given herself to him when he woung and handsome; whereas he was some in the decline of life, and suing for the love of much his junior. Unfortunately, however, reason waged a unequal warfare with passion in the breast of the French sovereign; and voluntarily overlooking alike the enormity of the demand, and the circumstances under which it made, he at once dispatched an order to the finance-minister to supply the required sum. Sully had no alternative save obedience; he did even venture upon expostulation; but lim lim better. When admitted to the royal closet, he alluded in general the extreme difficulty which he anticipated in raising the required amount of four millions renewal of the Swiss alliance; all then, approceeded slowly and estentationally to count the hundred thousand crowns destined to satisfy the cupidity of Mademoiselle d'Entragues. He had been careful to the whole amount to be delivered in silver; and it was not, therefore, without an emotion which in failed to conceal that Henry was the manufacture piles of money which gradually was before him, and overspread the table.

Nevertheless, although he could not control exclamation of astonishment, he made no effort retrieve his error; but, after the departure of M. de Sully, placed the required amount in the hands of the Count de Lude, who hastened to transfer it to those of the frail beauty. It was not until after the receipt of this present, that the Marquis d'Entragues and his step-son* affected to suspect the design of the King, and upbraided M. de Lude with the part which he had acted, desiring him never again to enter a house which he sought only to dishonour; an accusation which, from the lips of the husband of Marie Touchet men mere epigram. He however followed up this demonstration, by removing his daughter from Malesherbes Marcouseis, although with what intention is diffidetermine, as the King at once proceeded thither, obtained an interview.

accustomed to indulge in a prodigality so reck-

* Charles de Valois, the son of Charles IX. and Marie Touchet, dame de Marie III was subsequently Duke d'Angoulème, and grand prior of France. He died in I less, Henry had flattered himself that the affair was concluded; but such by no the intention of the young lady and her family. Henriette, indeed, received her royal lover with the me exaggerated of affection and gratitude; but she theless persisted in declaring that she and closely watched as to mo longer mistress of her own actions. and so intimidated by the threats of her father, that she dared not act in opposition to his will. In vain did the King remonstrate, argue, and upbraid; the lady remained firm, affecting to bewail the state of coercion in which she was kept, and entreating Henry to exert his influence we overcome the repugnance of her family to their mutual happiness. To manger opposed her tears; to his resentment, her fascinations; and when at length she discovered that the royal patience rapidly failing, although her power his feelings remained unshaken, she ventured upon the last bold effort of her ambition, by protesting infatuated sovereign that her father had remained her entreaties; and that the only concession which she could induce him to make we which she courage to communicate his Majesty. As she had, of course, anticipated, Henry desired her to inform him of the nature of the fresh demand which was to be made upon his tenderness; when, with well-acted reluctance, Mademoiselle d'Entragues repeated a conversation that she is held with the marquis, is the close of which is had assured her that he would never to see her the mistress of the King until she to received written promise marriage under the royal hand, provided she became, within year, the mother of

.

"In vain, Sire;" she pursued hurriedly, as she perceived a cloud gather upon the brow of the monarch; "In vain did I seek to overcome the scruples of my parents, will represent to them the utter inutility of such m document; they declared that they sought only in prethe honour of their house. And you well know, Sire," she continued with an appealing smile, " that, I ventured to remind them, your word is of equal value with your signature, as no mere subject could dare to summon great King like yourself to perform any promise. You, who have fifty thousand men i your command to enforce your will! But all my reasoning vain. Upon this point they are firm. Thus then, since there is me other hope, and that they insist upon this empty form, why should you not indulge their whim, when it cannot involve the slightest consequence? you love as I do, rom you hesitate to comply with their desire? Name what conditions you please on your side, and I am ready to accept them-too happy to obey your slightest wish."

Suffice it that the modern IMIM triumphed, will the King was induced to promise the required document;* weakness rendered the less excusable,

Radier, vol, vi, 62, 62, 62 Seint-Edme, pp. 201, 202.

if indeed, as Sully broadly asserts: Heary not blind but that the clearly how this sought to deceive him. I say nothing of the reasons which also had to believe her be anything rather than vestal; nor of the state intrigues of which her father, her mother, her brother, and herself had been victed, and which had drawn down upon all the family an order to leave Paris, which I had quite recently signified there in the same of the Majesty."

As it is difficult to decide which of the the duke sought in Memoirs to praise the most unsparingly, the sovereign - himself, the epithet of "this weak Prince," which he applies Henry the present occasion, proves the full force of his annoyance. He, moreover, gives a very detailed account of an interview which took place between them upon the subject of the document in question; even declaring that he tore it up when his royal master placed it in his hands; and upon being asked by the King if he mad, had replied by saying: " Would to God that I man the only madman in France 1" As, however, I do not find the anecdote recorded elsewhere by any cotemporaneous authority, I will not delay the narrative by inserting it length; and the rather at although from Im influence subsequently exercised over the fortunes of Marie de Medicis by the frail favourite, I have already compelled we dwell long upon her history, it is which I naturally anxious abridge as much as possible; I shall therefore only add, the same biographer goes on that the contract which he had destroyed was rewritten by King himself, who within an hour afterwards was on horseback, to his way to Malesherbes, where he sojourned two days. It is, of course, impossible to decide whether Henry two ever seriously contemplated the fulfilment of so degrading an engagement; but it is certain, that only few months subsequently he presented to Madomoiselle d'Entragues the estate of Verneuil, and that thenceforward she assumed the title of marquise, coupled with the name of her new possession.

* Sully, Mém., vol. iii, pp. 111 314.

† Sully, Mém., vol. iii, p. 315.

* Mezerny, vol. z, p. 124.

CHAPTER IL

[1599.]

VILLY THE STATE OF
SENT - PLORENCE - DEMAND THE ASS MARIE DE
THE STONES - INDIGNATION OF MADAME DE TRIBUTAL D'AUVERGER-OF SAVOY PARIS - RIS PROPURION-HIS MISSION IN THE COMMISSION OF THE COMMISSION
TEN TEN TOTAL
THE PURE PURE WE SAVOY - INFATUATION OF THE RING FOR THE PAYOURITE - BEE PRETENSIONS - I WELL-TIMED AT LTONS-WAR IN LINE DE MEDICIS LANDS AT MADAME OF VERNEUR RETURNS TO THE PERSON DESCRIPTION OF THE PERSON DESCRIPTION DESCRIPTION OF THE PERSON DESCRIPTION OF THE
AT PLORENCE—HE HOUSEN
TO THE STATE OF SHIFT DE MEDICIS-REE STATE-GALLEY-HER RECEPTION—BENEY BELLEVILLE SOYAL
THE BOTAL STATE OF THE BOTAL
- Sayib — Are Cores, 7
PROPLICATE RABIOS IN THE EING-HARIN'S
AMERITEL MER MIND AGAINST HER RUSBAND — MILL REACHES PARIS — MEE MINES M COURT — PRESENTATION M MADAME VERNEUIL TO THE QUEEN-INDIGNATION OF MARIE-DISCRAGE OF THE DUCKESS IN THE PROPERTY OF THE PROPERTY.
THE PERSON OF THE STREET OF STREET OF STREET
A MARINE JOER - COURT MARINE LAND CAN MARINE
BOYAL MAIN DESTRUCTION OF THE QUEEN'S MAINTING PRINTING AT MAINTING
GALIGAT LIMITED OF THE ROSES ERCON-HADARE IN THE RESERVE THE TAXABLE THE TERMS KING THE BUILT OF LEADING THE BUILT OF ERE RIVALRY - IN-GARBIL THE ARE AVADORIZE THE TIME AND AND AND ADDRESS OF THE PARTY OF MUDAME DE ARBEGIF REARCES RUBBITOS CONCINI
OP THE DAVISHE-JOY
THE REPORTEDS—SINTE OF ARRE OF SUPERSTITIONS OF THE BOYAL
Of the SOARSTON III LEX
SURGEON-BIRTE OF CASTON MEMBY, COMMAND OF THE PROPERTY.
DITO PARIS—REGULATION OF MARIE MEDICIA.

CHAPTER IL

[1599.]

THE infatuation of the King for his property decided M. de Sully hasten by every in his power the marriage of the covereign with European princess worthy to share his throne; and he accordingly instructed the royal agents - Rome to demand forthwith the hand of Marie de little for the French monarch; while Henry, absorbed in his passion, permitted him to act as he saw fit, offering neither assistance nor impediment to a negociation on which his domestic happiness was in future to depend; nor man until the duke urged upon him the necessity of selecting such of his nobility as it was his pleasure to with the management of the affairs in conjunction ambaseador whom the Grand-Duke, uncle, was about to dispetch to Paris, that, by dint of importunity, was induced man M. Sully himself, Constable, the Chanceller, Constable of Villeroy,* whose son, M. d'Alincourt, M. previously been sent Rome to the acknowledgments of Henry to his Holiness for the dissolution of his marriage with Queen Marguerite, and to apprize him of which he desirous to contract with Marie de Maline This duty performed, M. d'Alineourt solicited the permission of the Pope to accompany Sillery to Florence w pay like respects to the Princess, and to negociate the alliance; and having obtained the required sanction, the two nobles set forth upon their embassy, quite that the preliminaries were already nearly concluded.+ So determined, indeed, had been the minister that no time should be afforded to the King to redeem the pledge which he had given to the favourite, that Joannini, the agent of the Grand Duke, had been many days in Paris before the articles arm drawn and signed on both sides, and Sully commissioned by wo other contracting parties to communicate the termination of their labours to his royal master. The account given by the minister of this interview is highly characteristic :

"He had not;" says the chronicler; "anticipated such expedition: and thus when I had answered his question of where I had come from, by 'We come, Sire, from marrying you'—the Prince remained for a quarter of an hour as though he had been stricken by thunder: then began pace the chamber with long strides, biting his nails, scratching his head, and absorbed by reflections which agitated him violently that he siderable time before he was able to speak to me. I entertained no doubt that my previous representations now producing their effect; and so it proved, for ultimately recovering himself like man who length taken taken the resolution: 'Well,' he, striking his hands together; 'well, then, so be it; there is no alternative, since for the good of my kingdom you say that I must marry.'"

* Indian de Neufville, Marquia d'Alincourt, Seigneur III Villeroy, secretary and minister of state, knight of the King's Orders, Governor of the city of Lyons, and of the provinces of Lyons, Fores, and Beaujolais.

† Mezeray, vol. x, pp. 124,

Such the ungracious acceptance of the haughty Florentine princess at the hands of her future bridegroom.

The indignation of Madame de Verneuil unbounded when she ascertained that she had for ever lost all hope of ascending the throne of France; but is nevertheless certain that she was enabled to dissimulate sufficiently render her society indispensable the King, and accept with a good grace the equivocal honours of her position. Her brother, the Count d'Auvergne, was, however, placable; he had always to believe in the validity of her claim upon the King; and naturally restless and dissatisfied character him, under the pretext of avenging her wands, into conspiracy which recently been formed against the the King, whom certain malcontents sought to deprive alike of his throne and of his liberty, and supersede in his sovereignty by of the princes of blood.* Among others, the Duke of Savoy,† who, during the troubles of 1588, had taken possession of marquisate of Saluzzo, which he refused restore, was not to implicated in this plot; and he was the strongly suspected as it had been ascertained he had constant communication with several individuals French court, and that the tampered with certain of the nobles; among others, with the Duke de Biron.† He had also succeeded in attaching to his

Sully, Mém., vol. iii, p. 317.

* Mezersy, vol. z, p. 125.

Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy, surnamed Great, was born in the chateau of Rivoles, on the 12th of January, 1562. greatly distinguished himself by his gallantry upon several occasions, but tarnished his reputation by an ambition which was unscrupulous. He was remarkable for his literary attainments, and his friendship for men of latters; and was generally esteemed one of the greatest generals of the age. He was also so thorough a diplomatist, that it was commonly remarked that I was more difficult to penetrate his designs than the fastnesses of his duchy. He died at Savilian, on the 26th of July, the Charles de Gontanit, Duke de Biron, Peer, Admiral, and Marshal of France, acquired great reputation shike for his valour and his services. He was honoured with the confidence of Henry, who created the barony of Biron into a dachy-peerage his benefit, and loaded him with proofs of his favour; Biron, however, repaid his severeign with the batest ingratitude, by entering into a transfy with the Duke of Savoy and the Spaniards, who were both inimical to France. Having refused to acknow-interests the Duchess de Besufort; and had, during her lifetime, proposed to the King to visit France in person in order to effect a compromise, which he anticipated that, under her auspices, he should be enabled clude with advantage to Henry Maccepted the proposition; and although after the death of duchess, M. de Savois endeavoured to rescind lution, in found himself compromised that in was compelled to carry out his original purpose; and accordingly, on the 1st of December, he left Chambery with a train of twelve hundred horse, accompanied by the greater part of his ministers, his nobles, and the most magnificent members of his court.* As the French king had issued orders that he should, in every city through which he passed, be received with regal honours, he did not reach Fontainebleau until the 14th of the same month, where he arrived just - his roval host me mounting his horse to me him. As approached Henry he bent his knee, but the King immediately raised and embraced him with great cordiality; and during the seven days which is spent Fontainebleau the court men one mann of splendour and dissipation. Balls, jousts, and hunting-parties succeeded ledge his fault, and thereby exhausted the furbearance of the King, he was put upon his trial, convicted of the crime of Res-majesté, and condemned to lose his head. The sentence was carried into execution in the court of the Bastille, on the 31st of July, 1602.

Guichenon, Histoire de Savoie.

each other without intermission, but the Duke soon perceived that the monarch no intention of taking the initiative on the errand which had brought him to France, caution from which he justly augured no favourable result his expedition; while on his the subject to by Sully any of the other ministers without giving the equivocal proofs of his determination to retain the marquisate.

subtle policy; his bearing towards the monarch was mean deferential and familiar; his liberality was unbounded; and his courtesy towards the great nobles, and the officials of the court untiring and dignified.

On the eighth day after the arrival of the Duke at Fontainebleau the court removed to Paris, where Henry had caused spartments to be prepared for his royal guest in the Louvre; but M. de Savoie, after offering his acknowledgments for the proffered hodour, preferred to up his abode in the house of his relative the Duke de Nemours, when the Augustine convent. The whole of the Christmas festival was spent in a succession of splendid as those with which he had been originally received; and in the lat of January, 1600, when it customary in France to exchange presents, the Duke repaid all this magnificence by a profusion almost unprecedented. To the King,

Daniel, Histoire de France, vol. vii, p. 386.

† L'Etoile, Journal de Henri IV., vol. ii, p. 481.

DR -

The King responded to the liberality of his guest by the gift of a diamond star, of which the centre brilliant covered a miniature of Madame de Verneuil, together other valuable jewels; but the profusion of the Duke was so great that his whole outlay upon this occasion was estimated at no less a sum than four hundred thousand crowns; and when I was I have that I have exhausted his resources, he still further astonished the French nobles by appearing at a ball which he gave to the court in a dress entirely covered with precious stones, and valued in a higher sum than the which is a expended.*

* L'Etoile, vol. ii, pp. 📉 📟

than by generosity — sufficiently apparent; — whatever effect I might have produced upon — minds of the courtiers, M. de Savoie was — made aware — had been utterly powerless over the resolution of the sovereign; for he — ventured — subject of his voyage, than Henry with his accustomed frankness — determination — enforce — right to the marquisate which — guest had usurped; an which determined the Duke to request that — commission might be appointed to examine their conflicting claims.

appointed on both sides, and the question rigidly discussed; propositions were mutually made and mutually declined; until finally the King, by the advice of his council, dispatched Sebastian Zamet† to the Duke

Mezeray, vol. z, p. 127.

† Sebastian Zamet was a wealthy contractor, of the origin, but who had caused himself to be naturalised in France, in 1581, together with his two brothers, Horace and John-Anthony Zamet. Although he ultimately became the father of an adjutant-general of the King's armies, and of a bishop, it was confidently asserted that during the preceding reign he had been a shoumaker. In that as a may, it is no less certain that he must have possessed considerable talent, as even during the lifetime of Henry III. he was already a rich contractor, and under Henry IV. he was esteemed the richest in the kingdom. On the occasion of the mar-of Savoy, with authority negociate a restitution an exchange; giving him the time three months in consult nobility, decide upon the one measure or the other.

skilfully did the envoy perform mission, he ultimately succeeded in inducing management and savoie propose management. King, as compensation for the contested marquisate, the cession of certain and management had no sooner named in a treaty which was signed by the two contracting parties; and this arrangement had no sooner been concluded than the court resumed for gaiety; nor was it until 7th of March that the Duke finally took leave of his royal entertainer, menced homeward journey.

Meanwhile the court poets had not been idle; while the Duke of Savoy in recognised the supremacy of the favourite by costly gifts, her favour had been riage of one of his daughters, the notary who was employed to draw up the marriage-contract, finding it difficult to define his real rank, inquired by what title he desired to be designated; upon which Zamet calmly replied: "You may describe mean in lord of seventees histories of theorem." His ready wit first procured favour of Henry IV., which he subsequently by a system in complainance of thoroughly into morality. In house was always open to the King, even for the most equivocal so great was the familiarity with which in was treated by the immeanth, that in constantly addressed him by a pet name, and held many of his orgies beneath his roof.

L'Etoile, vol. ii, pp. 492, 493.

.

courted by the most popular of those time-serving bards who were accustomed in their time subservient to their interests; nor is it the least remarkable feature of the age that the three most fashionable rhymesters in the circles of gallantry were all codesiastics; and that charms and virtues of Henriette d'Entragues celebrated by a cardinal, a bishop, and an abbé!*

palmy days were, however, a end, for hitherto had reigned undisputed and of the King's affections, and she was henceforward with the same of the s a divided sway. On the 5th of May, M. d'Alincourt arrived Fontainebleau from Florence, with the intelligence that, me the Mill of the preceding month, Ill contract of marriage between the French monarch and Princess Marie de Medicis had been signed at the Palazzo Pitti, in III presence of Carlo-Antonio Putéi, Archbishop of Pisa, and the Duke of Bracciano; and was the bride brought as her dowry six hundred thousand besides jewels and other seemed of value. Ill further stated that " "Te Deum" had been chanted, both in the Palazzo Pitti, and un the church of the Annunciation at Florence : Www which Princess Marie, declared Queen of France, had dined in public, seated under a dais above her uncle; and III the conclusion of the repast, the Duke III Bracciano had presented the water to wash lim hands, Marquis Sillery, L French Ambassador, napkin upon which wiped them. Having report, and despatches, M. d'Alincourt placed in the hands of the King a portrait of Marie richly set in brilliants, which had been intrusted to him for that purpose; and the lover of Madame de Verneuil found solemnly betrothed.*

* Dreux 🖿 Radier, vol. vi. p. 58, n. .

This fact, however, produced little visible effect upon court circle, and less upon King himself; and after having afforded a subject of conversation for m brief interval, it present to be entirely forgotten amid the more absorbing matters of interest by which I minds of the different individuals severally engrossed. From policy, betrothal mentioned by the courtiers in the presence of de Verneuil, a restraint which caused it to fall into partial oblivion; and the rather as the month of June had arrived without any demonstration on the part of the Duke of Savoy, who had availed himself of every possible pretext to evade the fulfilment of the treaty of Paris; and who had rendered it evident that force of arms alone could compel him to resign the usurped duchy. Even the monarch himself became at length convinced of impolicy of further delay, and resolved forthwith advance Lyons, whither Sully had already dispatched both troops artillery.†

L'Etoile, vol. ii, pp. 511, NIII.

† Sully had recently been appointed grand-master of artillary, had, however, during acjourn in France, made many partisans, who urged upon their sovereign the expediency of affording to the Duke opportunity of redeeming his pledge; and Henry, even against better histened the more complemently to counsels de Verneuil about become mother, and he ahrank from the idea of separation from her 📰 such a moment. Thus he delayed 🔚 journey until Sully, who not long in discovering cause of his inaction, renewed his expostulations with still greater emphasis, and finally induced him to make preparations for m immediate departure. As the hour arrived, however, he again wavered, until length he declared we determination to be accompanied by the marquise; but arrangement was, from her arrangement was, from her health, soon found to impossible; and after considerable difficulty he was persuaded to consent that she should await his return Monceaux, whither he himself conducted her, with renewed protestations in he loved her well enough to resign even then the alliance with Marie de Medicis, and to make her his wife.* This was precisely what the favourite still hoped accomplish. was aware of the extraordinary influence which had obtained over the mind of her royal lover, and she looked forward to the birth of aon, as a one thing necessary to her success. Accordingly, before she suffered the King to depart, she compelled him to promise he would be near her during her illness; and then she reluctantly saw him set forth to Moulins, where detained for fortnight; his council not being able to agree as to the expediency of campaign.

Saint-Rdme, vol. ii, p.

There we be little doubt that under other circum-Henry would have found to bring their decision; but as was was during their discussions to receive daily intelligence of the marquise, he submitted quietly to detention which wishes.

At length the period arrived in which Madame de Verneuil about to enforce her claim upon the tenderness of her royal lover, and already be spoke of returning for while Monceaux; when violent storm, and the falling of a thunder-bolt in the very chamber of the invalid, so affected her nervous system, that she lost the infant upon which she had based all her anticipations of greatness; and although the King hastened to condole with her upon her disappointment, and even remained in constant attendance upon her sick-bed until partially convalescent, the great link between them was necessarily broken: a fact of which she was no well aware, that her temper gave way beneath the trial, and she bitterly upbraided her royal lover for the treachery of which she declared him to have been guilty in permitting his ministers to effect his betrothal with Marie de Medicia, when she had herself, as she affirmed, sacrificed everything for his sake. In order to pacify her anger, the King loaded her with new gifts, and consoled her by new protestations; nor did his weakness end there, for so soon as her health sufficiently re-established, he sufficiently re-established, he defere addressed to him a most submissive letter, in which she assured him that her whole happiness depended upon his affection; and that as she had too late become aware that his high rank had placed an inseparable barrier between them, and that her own insignificance preduded the possibility of her ever becoming his wife, she at least implored of him to leave to her the happiness of still remaining his mistress; and to continue to feel for her the sum tenderness of which he had hitherto honoured her with many demonstrations.*

This was an appeal to which the enamoured monarch willingly responded; and the nature of her reception at Lyons tended still further to restore peace between them. What the Lyonnese had previously done in honour of Diana of Poitiers, when, as the accredited and official mistress of Henry III., she visited their city, they repeated in that of Madame Werneuil, whose entrance within their gates was rather that of a crowned queen than a fallen woman; and this triumph shortly afterwards augmented by her reception of the standards taken by the King Charbonnières, which he caused be conveyed her as a proof of his devotion; and which she, with pomp, transferred to the church of Just.

Dreux da Radier, vol. vi, pp. 74—76.

From Lyons Henry proceeded Grenoble, still accompanied by de Verneuil, the Duke of Savoy having length rather than submit the conditions which been proposed him, he would incur the hazard of war. In consequence of the decision, immediate were by the French generals to march upon Saluzzo; and Mandel de Biron, although already strongly suspected of disaffection to his sovereign, having the body of troops, possessed himself of the whole territory of Brescia. The town of Bourg was stormed by Du Terrail,* and taken, with the exception of the citadel; while M. de Créquyt entered Savoy, and made himself

† Charles de Créquy was the representative of one of the most ancient families in France, which traced its descent from Arnoul,

Louis de Comboursier, Seigneur de Terrail, commenced his military cureer as a cornet in the troop of the Dauphin. He was brave, we haughty and reckless, and was obliged to retire into Flanders, in consequence of having killed a man under the eyes of the King, and within the precincts of the Louvre. Making a pilgrimage to the abrine of Our Lady of Loretto, he profited by his return through Turin to pay his respects to the Duke of Savoy, to whom he offered his services, and assistance in his project of taking the city of Genoa by surprise. The plot, was, however, discovered by a valet, was apprised the authorities of the intended treachery; and Du Terrail, together with a companion whom he had associated in the enterprise, were imprisoned in the castle of Yverdum, and thence conveyed to Genoa, where they were both decapitated, in the year 1609.

atill held out.

THE RESERVE OF

300

Henry then resolved enter Savoy in person; and having once taken leave of the marquise who returned Lyons, he upon Chambery, which immediately capitulated; and thence he proceeded possess that of the citadels of Conflans and Charbonnières which had hitherto been deemed impregnable.

Savoie, who had confided in the strength of his fortresses of Montmelian and Bourg, and who introduced to affect the most perfect indifference.

called the Old, or the Bearded, who died in 897. The alder branch of the house became extinct in the person of Antoine de Crequy, cardinel Bishop of Amiens, born 1551, and who his death, which occurred in the year 1574, left all his personal wealth, together with the family possessions which he inherited from his brothers, to Antoine de Blanchefort, the son of his sister, Marie de Créquy, on condition that he should bear the name and arms of his mother. The son of Antoine was Charles de Créquy, de Blanchefort, and de Canaples, Prince de Poix, Governor of Dauphiny, peer and maréchal of France, who became Duke of Lesdiguières by his marriage with Madelaine de Bonne, daughter of the celebrated Connétable de Leadiguières, in 1611. His duel with Don Philippino, the besterd of Savoy, in which he killed his adversary, acquired for him a great celebrity; but he secured a more legitimate and desirable reputation by his gallantry in the taking of Fignerol and La Maurieans, in 1630. Three years subsequently he was sent as ambassador to Rome | in 1630 he conquered the Spenish forces on the Ticino : and in 1638 he was killed by a curnon-ball, at the siege of Brème. in Hanover.

approach of the French troops, became seriously alarmed, and made instant preparations to relieve the Marquis Brandis, the governor of the former fortress, which purpose he applied to Spain for assistance. This was, bowever, refused; and both places fell into the hands of the French monarch, who then successively took Chablais and Faussigny; after which he down before the fortress of St. Catherine, which is Savoyards had erected to see the Genevese.*

During the siege of Fort St. Catherine, intelligence reached the King of the arrival of the young Queen Marseilles; and meanwhile the gratification of the Pope an alliance of flattering to his pride, had been of essential benefit to the French interest, to he had, in sequence, made to demonstration in favour of the Duke of Savoy, although it was to entirely without anxiety that he had seen the army of Henry approach his own dominions; but, satisfied that at such a conjuncture the French monarch would attempt to aggressive measures against Italy, he had consented to remain passive.

Madame de Verneuil was no apprised of the landing of Marie Medicis than, after having vehemently reproached the King with Medicis than, after having vehemently reproached the King with Medicis than, after having vehemently reproached the King with Medicis than, after having vehemently reproached the King with Medicis than, after having vehemently reproached the Expostulations of Henry, even accompanied as they were, by the most profuse proofs of his consinued affection, induce her to rescind her determination. To every representation of the monarch she replied by reminding him that out of all the high nobles of his court, he had seen fit to select the Duke de Bellegarde as the bearer of his marriage-procuration to the Grand-Duke of Florence—thus indemnifying him to the utmost in his power for the mortification to which he had been subjected by the royal refusal me permit him to act personally as his proxy; while she assured him that she was blind to the fact that this selection was meant an additional affront to herself, in order to avenge the preposterous notion which his Majesty had adopted, that, after having previously paid his court to the Duchess of Beaufort during her period of power, the duke had since transferred his affections to herself.

Péréfixe, Histoire de Henri le Grand, vol. ii, pp. 329-383.

Under all circumstances, and accusation unfortunate ill-judged, and should in itself have sufficed to open the eyes of the monarch, who had, assuredly, had sufficient experience in female tactics to be quite aware that where a woman is compelled mentally to condemn herself, she is the most anxious to transfer her fault to others, and to blame where she is conscious of being open to censure. Madame de Verneuil had not, however, in this instance at all miscalculated the extent of her influence over the royal mind; as, instead of resenting an impertinence which was well fitted to arouse his indignation, Henry weakly concession laid the foundation of all his subsequent domestic discomfort.

.

Madame de Verneuil returned to Paris, surrounded by adulation and splendour, and the King was left is liberty to bestow some portion of his thoughts upon expected bride. It is probable, indeed, that the portrait of Marie presented to him by Sand-Duchess, had excited his curiosity, and flattered his self-love; for it me more sufficiently attractive command the of a monarch even less susceptible to female beauty than himself. Marie was still in the very bloom of life, having only just attained her twenty-fourth year; could the King have forgotten that when, some time previously, her portrait had been forwarded to the French court together with that of the Spanish Infanta, Gabrielle d'Estrées, then in the full splendour of her own excelling loveliness, had exclaimed as she examined them: "I should fear nothing from the Spaniard, but the Florentine is dangerous." From whatever impulse he might act, however, it is certain that after the departure of the favourite, Henry publicly expressed his perfect satisfaction with the marriage which he had been induced to contract,* and lost no time in issuing his commands for the reception of his expected bride.

The Duke de Bellegarde, Grand-Equerry of France, had reached Livourna on the 20th of September,

Saint-Edme, iii ñ, pp. 211, iiii

On the 4th of October, the Cardinal Aldobrandini. the nephew and legate of the Pope, who is already been preceded by the Duke of Mantus and the Venetian Ambassador, arrived in his turn at Florence, in order to perform the ceremony of the royal marriage. His Eminence was received at the gate of the city by the Grand-Duke in person, and made his entry on horseback under a canopy supported by eight young Florentine nobles, preceded by all the ecclesiastical and secular bodies: while immediately him followed sixteen prelates, and fifty gentlemen of the first families in the duchy bearing halberds. On reaching the church, prelate dismounted, and thence, after a brief prayer, he proceeded to the ducal palace. At the conclusion of the magnificent repast which awaited him, we legate, in the presence of his royal host, of the Dukes of Mantua and Bracciano, Princes Juan Antonio Medicis, and the Sieur de Bellegarde, announced to the young Queen entire satisfaction of the Sovereign Pontiff the union upon which he was about to pronounce blessing: to which assurance she replied with grace and dignity.

■ Montfancon, vel. v. p. 402.

On the morrow, a high mass was celebrated by the cardinal in the presence of the whole court; and during its solemnization he was seated under a canopy of cloth of gold in the right hand side of the altar, where chair had been prepared for him upon a platform raised three steps above the floor. He had no sooner taken his place, than the Duke de Bellegarde, approaching the Princess (who occupied a similar seat of honour, together with her uncle, with opposite side of the shrine), led her to the right hand of the legate; the Grand-Duke at the same time placing himself upon his left, and presenting to his Eminence the procuration by which he was authorised to espouse his niece in the name of the King. The document was then transferred in two of the attendant prelates, by whom it was read aloud; and, subsequently, the authority given by the Pope for the solemnization of the marriage was, in like manner, made public. The remainder of the nuptial service was then performed amid perpetual salvos of artillery. In the evening a splendid ball took place at the palace, followed by a banquet, at which the ____ Queen occupied the upper seat, having on her right the legate of his Holiness, the Duke of Mantua, and the GrandDuke her uncle; who, in homage to her superior rank, ceded to her the place of honour; and on her left, Duchesses of Mantua, Tuscany, and Bracciano; Duke de Landa acting as equerry, and Don Juan, the brother of Grand-Duke, cupbearer.

The four following days were passed in a succession of festivities; hunting-parties, jousts, tiltings at the ring, racing, and every other description of manly sport occupying and hours of daylight; and nights devoted and ballets, in which the Florentine nobility vied with their foreign visitors in every species of profusion and magnificence. Among other ments, a comedy in five acts was represented, on which the outlay a stated to have amounted to the of sixty thousand crowns.

At the close of the court festivals, the Cardinal Aldobrandini took his leave of the distinguished party, and proceeded to Chambery; but the Queen lingered her family until the 13th of the month, upon which day, accompanied by the Grand-Duchess her aunt, the Duchess of her aister, her brother Don Antonio, the Dan de Bracciano, and the French Ambassador, she set forth upon her journey to her new kingdom.*

being strictly beautiful, Marie de Medicis possessed a person once pleasing and dignified. All the pride of her Italian blood flushed from her large dark eye, while the consciousness of her exalted rank

L'Etoile, vol. ii, pp. 534—537.

however, in moments of irritation, degenerated into haughtiness. Her intellect was quick and cultivated, but she was deficient alike in depth of judgment and in strength of character. Amiable, who submissive in her intercourse with her favourites, and windictive and tyrannical towards those who fell under the ban of her displeasure: and with all the unscrupulous love of intrigue common to her race, she was nevertheless unguarded in her confidence, unstable in her purposes, and short-sighted in her policy. In temper, she was hot, impatient and iracible; in temperament, jealous and exacting; while her vanity and love of power, perpetually made her the tool of those who sought to profit by her defects.

It is probable that throughout the whole of Europe no princess could have been selected less constituted to make the happiness of a sovereign who, in Henry IV., had not scrupled to make to his minister in he dreaded domestic dissension far more than foreign warfare; but who at the man time of not hesitate, by his own irregularities, to arouse all the worst passions in the bosom of an outraged wife.

On the 17th of October the royal bride reached Livorna, where she made her entry in great pomp, and was received with the most enthusiastic acclamations; and on the following day she that in the galley of the Grand-Duke, one of the most magnificent which had ever floated upon the the waters of the Mediterranean. Seventy feet in length, it was impelled by fifty-four and was richly gilded from stem to stern; the borders of the poop being inlaid with profusion of lapis-lazuli, mother-of-pearl, ivory, and ebony. It was, moreover, ornamented by twenty large circles of iron interlaced, and studded with topaz, emeralds, pearls, and other precious stones; while splendour of the interior perfectly corresponded with framework. In the principal cabin, which was hung and carpeted with cloth of gold, a seat of state had been arranged for the Queen, opposite to which were suspended the shields of France and of the house of Medicis side by side; the fleurs-de-lys of the former being composed of large diamonds, and the device of the latter represented by five immense rubies and sapphire, with an pearl above, and a fine in the centre.* This fairy vessel - followed by five other galleys furnished by Pope, and six appertaining to Grand-Duke; and thus escorted Marie de Medicis reached Malta, where she was joined by another which awaited her off that island; but, despite all this magnificence, the voyage of the Queen was anything but propitious, for after arriving Esperies, where the authorities of Genoa proffered to her, with great respect, attendance of their own flotilla, she lim no Portofino, than was compelled to anchor for days from weather. Unaccustomed high-spirited young Queen resisted all the entreaties of those about her, who were anxious that she should land until the wind and moderated, simply remarking the King had given no directions to that effect; and retaining, amid all the dismay and discomfort by which surrounded, not only her self-command, but even her cheerfulness.

Pres., vol. ii, p. 🖼

Meanwhile, Henry had no sooner ascertained the approach of his royal bride, than he forthwith dispatched to welcome her, the Constable, the Chancellor, and the Dukes of Nemours, Ventadour, and Guise; princes were followed on the ensuing day by the Cardinals de Joyeuse, de Gondy, and de Sourdis; which intimated his pleasure to all the several princesses and great ladies of the court who were then sojourning at Grenoble in order to be near the royal army, they should immediately their respects to their new sovereign, and remain in * Malharbe, the favourite poet of Marie de Medicia, profited by the tediousness of her voyage to make # the subject of an allegory, in which he represents that Neptune

Dix jours ne pouvant se distraire
Au plaisir de la regarder,
Il a, par un effort contraire, Resayé de la rétarder."

A specimen of his godship's gallantry, with which the young sovereign would, in all probability, most willingly have dispensed.

† L'Etoile, vol. ii, p. 537.

attendance upon her person until her entry into Paris; a command which was a literally obeyed, and the days afterwards the city was utterly stripped of the aspect of gaiety splendour which are rendered time time epitome of a capital itself.

On the see, and two days subsequently she entered the port of Toulon, where she landed under a canopy of cloth of gold, with her fine hair flowing her shoulders. There she remained for two days, in order to from the effects of her voyage; after which she rembarked, and proceeded to Marseilles, where she arrived the evening of Friday, the 3rd of November. A gallery had been constructed from the port to the grand of the palace in which apartments had been prepared for her; and on stepping from her galley, she was welcomed by the Chancellor, who announced her the orders that he had received from the King relative to her reception, and presented her Majesty the Connétable-Duke Montmorency, the transfer of the palace in the Montmorency, the connétable-Duke Montmorency, the Montmorency, the connétable-Duke Montmorency, the connétable-Duke Montmorency, the connétable-Duke Montmorency, the connétable-Duke Montmorency, the connetable-Duke Montmorency the connetable connetab

* Valadier, 1600.

† M. Billery.

Henri I., de Montmorency, duke, peer, marshal, and Constable of France, Governor of Languedoc, &c., was the second son of the celebrated Anne de Montmorency. He rendered himself famous, during the life time of his father, under the name of the Seigneur de Damville, and made prisoner the Prince de Condé at the battle of Dreux, in 1562. Having anhaequently incurred the displeasure of Catherine de Medicis, he retired to the court of the Duke of Savoy, and because the leader of the malcontents in consuls and citizens then tendered to her upon knees the keys of the city in gold, linked together by chain of the same precious metal; after which ceremony, the young Queen was conducted to the palace under a rich canopy, preceded by the Constable, by a cardinals and prelates who had been sent to welcome her, and followed by the wife of the Chancellor, and the other great ladies of the court. So long a delay having occurred between her betrothal and her marriage, Princess had been enabled to render herself mistress of the language of her new country; and the satisfaction of the courtiers was consequently undisquised when she her acknowledgments for the courtesy of Languedoc during the reign of Henry III. Henry IV. restored him to all his honours, and made him Constable of France, and a knight of the Order of the Holy Ghoat, in 1593. He died at an advanced age, in the town of Agde, in 1614.

Dukes of Nemours* Ventadour.†

Charles Amédée de Savoie, Duke de Nemours, was the son of Jacques de Savoie and of Anne d'Est, whose first husband was the Duke de Guise. This lady made herself very conspicuous during the League. Charles Amédée married Elizabeth, the sister of César de Vendôme, Duke de Beamfart, and during the Fronse attached himself to the party of the princes; but having quarrelled with his brother-in-law, he was killed by kim in a duel, in the year 1652.

† Anne de Levis, Duke de Ventadour, was the representative of one of the most ancient and illustrious families of France, which derived its name from the estate of Levis, near Chevreuse, where his ancester, Guy de Levis, a famous general, founded in the year 1190 the abbey of La Roche.

reception in their own dialect; a gratification which was enhanced by the fact that Marie had made no effort to assimilate her costume to that of the French court, but appeared a robe of cloth of gold on a blue ground, in the Italian taste, and, with her fine fair hair simply braided and utterly destitute of powder;* a circumstance which all already sufficed awaken the jealousy of the French princesses.

On the following day, the Queen will a reception in great hall of the palace, and graciously listened, surrounded by her august relatives, the elequent celebrated harangue of M. du Vair,† the president of the Parliament of Provence; to which she had no sconer replied than the hastened to examine from the balcony sumptuous state carriage presented to her by the King; and then retired to her own apartments, attended by her personal suite. Of the royal vehicle in question Cayet gives a minute description, which transcribe as affording an accurate idea of the displayed in decoration of coaches: "It was," says; "covered with brown velvet and trimmed with ailver tinsel on coutside; and within it was lined with carnation-coloured velvet, embroidered with gold silver. The curtains of carnation damask, it was drawn by four grey borses." These royal conveyances were, however, far less convenient than showy, being cumbrous and ungraceful in form, rudely suspended upon leathern straps, and devoid of windows, the configuration of glass becoming known until the succeeding reign.

* Valadier, year 1600.

† Guillaume du Vair, ultimately Bishop of Lizieux, and Keeper of the Seals, was the son of Jean du Vair, chevalier and attorney-general of Catherine — Medicis and Henri de France, Duke d'Anjou. He was born at Paris, on the 8th of March, 1556, and was successively counsellor of parliament, master of requests, first president of the Parliament of Provence, and finally (in 1616), keeper — He subsequently — eee of Lizieux, in He was a man of consummate talent; and his works, which were published in folio in Paris, in 1641, are still highly — U. du Vair died at Tonnoins, in Agénois, in 1621, at the age of sixty-six years.

____

On the morrow during her toilette the Queen received the principal ladies of the city, who had the honour of accompanying her to the temporary chapel which adjoined the principal saloon, where a high was performed with all I magnificent accessories of which it susceptible; the numerous prelates and high dignitaries of the church then assembled at Marseilles assisting its celebration. The subsequent days spent in courtly festivities | survey of the noble city, where the ponderous and gilded coach of the royal bride was followed by the wondering acclamations of and delighted populace, probably dazzled and delighted than herself; for Marie de Medicia, young and ambitious, man not but be forcibly struck by of her present splendour with L comparative obscurity of the court to which she had been previously * Chronologie Septemaire, p. 184.

On the 16th of the month, however, she experienced her first trial, in a separation from the Grand-Duchess her aunt, Duchess of her sister, who then took their leave, and returned Florence in galleys which were still awaiting them; and they had no sooner left the port, than the Queen, followed by the brilliant train by which she had been surrounded since her arrival in France, proceeded to Aix, where she remained two days; and on the morning of the third, made her entry . Avignon escorted by two thousand horsemen who her before she reached the city. and officiated as a guard of honour. Every street through which she passed was richly decorated; tapestry welvet hangings were suspended from the windows, and draped the balconies; triumphal arches and platforms, splendidly decorated and covered with devices and emblems appropriate to the occasion, will be seen on all sides; and finally, in the great square of the city, her progress was arrested by a stately procession of ecclesiastics, in whose name she was harangued by François Suarés; who having, in the course of his address, expressed his ardent hope that before the anniversary of her entry into Avignon, she might give * François Suarés, a celebrated scholar and theologian, was born at Granada in 1548, and in 1564 became a Jesuit. Intends theology, with great success, at Alcala, Salamanca, Rome, and Coimbra; and died at Lisbon in 1617. His collected works were published in twenty-three folio volumes, and are principally treatises on theology and morals. His treatise on the laws was reprinted in England.

■ Dauphin to France, she momentarily interrupted by exclaiming energetically: "I will pray to God to grant me that grace!"*

The royal train then again moved forward, and Marie took possession of the stately abode which had been prepared the her, amid the firing of musketry, pealing of bells, and the shouts of the excited people, in whom the affability and beauty of their Queen had aroused the most ardent feelings of loyalty and hope.

On is following day, the corporation of the city presented to their young sovereign a hundred and fifty medals of gold, some of which bore - their obverse her profile, and others that of the King, their reverse being in every case a representation of the town by which the offering was made; and - the ensuing evening she attended a banquet given in her honour by the papal vice-legate at the palace of Rouvre, where me conclusion of the ball, as she was about to retire with her suite, the tapestry hangings of the saloon were suddenly withdrawn, and revealed a magnificent collation served upon three separate tables. Among other costly delicacies, the guests were startled by the variety and profusion of the ornamental sugar-work which glistened like jewellery in the blaze of the surrounding tapers; for not only were there representations of birds, beasts, and fishes, but also fifty statues, each palms height, presenting in same material the effigies of pagen and celebrated emperors; so marvellous indeed had been the outlay of the prelate on this one luxury, that in the close of the repeat three hundred baskets of the most delicate confectionary, consisting chiefly of fruits skilfully in sugar, and distributed among the fair and astonished guests.**

During her sojourn at Avignon, Marie received from the hands of M. de Rambure, whom the King had dispatched from Savoy for that purpose, and only his renewed assurances of welcome, but also the costly gifts which he had prepared for her. "After the departure of the princes and cardinals," says the quaint old chronicler, "his Majesty desired my attendance in his chamber, and I had no sooner entered than he exclaimed: 'Friend Rambure, you must go and meet our future Queen, whom you must overtake two days before her arrival at Lyons; welcome her in my name, and present to her this letter, and these two caskets of gems, together with these chests containing all the necessary for her first state-toilette; and having done this, bring me back her answer without delay. You will find a relay of horses awaiting you at every second league, both going and coming, in order that you may use all speed, and give me time to reach Lyons so soon as I shall know that she is to be there." This order could not, however, be implicitly obeyed, as the courtier was only enabled on his return to the King's presence, to inform him that the Princess would have Lyone that very day; upon which Henry instantly ordered post-horses, and accompanied by Sully, Rambure, and ten more of his favourite nobles, he commenced his journey, making, as he rode along, a thousand inquiries relative to his young wife, her deportment, and her retinue; asking with the utmost how she had received the presents which he had sent; and finally demanding of M. de Rambure if he were satisfied with the diamond ring that she had presented to him; a question which he messenger was careful to answer in affirmative, he the same time assuring his Majesty has although he valued the jewel itself he had princess and Queen.

Cayet, p. 187.
 vol. i, p. 440.

On and of December, the Queen reached La Guillotiere, and of the faubourgs of Lyons, where a passed the night; and on the following morning and proceeded to Lamothe, where she assisted at the mass, and subsequently dined. At the close of the repast, all the several civic corporations paid their respects to their new sovereign, and Chancellor replying to their harangue in the name of the Queen; who, immediately that they had retired, ascended her carriage, and entered the city gates in the same state, and amid the same acclamations which had accompanied her entry at Avignon. The suave majesty of her demeanour, the magnificence of her apparel, and the flush of health and happiness which glowed upon her countenance, filled the people with enthusiasm; as her ponderous coach crushed beneath its ungainly wheels the flowers and branches that had been strewn upon her passage; and that, with its heavy ourtains drawn back, a showed herself in all her imperial beauty, dividing her smiles between mi richlystand groups who thronged the windows and balconies, tumultuous multitude who shouting and gesticulating in her side, the popular enthusiasm was as great m though in her person each individual beheld an and of the future prosperity and happiness of nation which she had been called to reign. Triumphal arches, floating draperies, and emblematic devices, scattered over the city; and thus welcomed escorted, she reached the cathedral, where was delivered by M. de Bellièvre, and a "Te Deum" solemnly performed.

* Rambure, Mém., vol. i. p. 276, 277.

In the course of the afternoon the young Queen received III de Roquelaure,† who had been dispatched

Albert Bellièvre was the second son of the celebrated Chancellor Pompone de Bellièvre and of Marie Pruniez, demoiselle de Grignon. Was a distinguished classic and an elegant Having become Archbishop of Lyons, he subsequently transferred that dignity to his younger brother Claude, and retired to his abbey of Jony, where he died, in 1621.

† Antoine de Roquelaure, Seigneur Roquelaure in Armagnac, Guadoux, &c., marshal of France, grand-master of the King's wardrobe, knight of the Orders of St. Michael and the Holy Ghost, perpetual mayor of Bordesux, &c., was the younger son of Geraud Roquelaure, and the representative of an illustrious house.

way to Lyons; and her interview with this new measurement had no terminated than she was invited to pass into the great saloon, where several costly vases of gold and silver were presented to her in the name of the citizens; after which she was permitted to take the repose which she so greatly needed was awaiting the arrival of the King.

Henry, who was not expected until the Into of the month, reached Lyons on me previous evening just as the Queen had taken her seat ... supper-table; and being anxious to form his own judgment of her person and deportment before he declared his identity, he entered the apartment in an undress military uniform, trusting in in disguise to unnoticed among the throng of attendants. The Chancelior had, however, hurriedly seized an opportunity of intimating to Marie the arrival of her royal consort; while the King and no amount crossed the threshold we recognised by several of the nobles; who, by hastily stepping aside to enable him to pass, created a movement which the quick eye of the I'd instantly detected, and of whose cause in did d'Albret, Queen of Navarre and by Henry IV., who loaded him with honours and distinctions in requital of his faithful and zealous services. In subsequently became governor of several provinces, and was created a marshal of France by Louis XIII., in 1615. He restored to their allegiance Clerac, Nerac, and several other revolted fortresses; and died at Leiotoure, in 1625. at the age of eighty-two years.

* Daniel, vol. vii, p. 398.

not remain one instant in doubt. Nevertheless, she betrayed no sign of her consciousness of the monarch's presence; while he, on his side, aware that all further incognite had become impossible, hastily retired.

When he had withdrawn the Queen instantly ceased eating; and, as each succeeding dish was presented to her, silently motioned its removal. Thus the remainder of the repast was rapidly terminated; and at its close, she rose and retired to her private apartments, which she had acarcely reached when a loud stroke upon the door of the ante-room, we authoritatively given was we once made aware of the approach of her royal consort, caused her to rise from the arm-chair in which she was seated, and to advance to the centre of the ficor. She had scarcely done so when the tapestry hanging was drawn aside; and M. le Grand* entered, followed by the impatient monarch. In an instant she was in his feet, but in the next she found herself warmly and affectionately welcomed; nor was it until he had spent half an hour in conversation with her, that the King, weary and travel-worn as he was, withdrew to partake if the refreshment which had been prepared for him. the following afternoon their Majesties, occupying same carriage, attended vespers with great pomp the abbey of Aisnay; after which they passed the ensuing days a succession of see splendid festivities, at which the whole of the court were present (the cost of those of the 13th being entirely in the expense of the monarch, in celebration of his birth-day), until the arrival of the Cardinal Aldobrandini, whom the King had invited from Chambery to be present public celebration of his nuptials, and who entered city in state, when preparations were immediately for the august rits upon which he is confer his benediction.

Duke de Bellegarde,

At the state of a state dinner on the morrow (17th of December), the royal couple proceeded, accompanied by all the princes and great nobles of the court, to the church of St. John; where the papal legate, surrounded by the Cardinals of Joyeuse, Gondy,† and Sourdis,‡ together with the prelates then residing in

- * François de Joyeuse was the second son of Guillaume, Vicomts de Joyeuse, Marshal of France. He was born in the year 1562, and received a brilliant education, by which he profited so greatly as to become celebrated for his scientific attainments. He was successively Archbishop of Narbonne, of Toulouse, and of Rouen; and enjoyed the entire confidence of three monarchs, by each of whom he was entrusted with the most important state. Highly esteemed, alike for his wisdom, prudence, and capacity, he died full of honours at the age of fifty-three years, Avignon, where he had taken up his abode as senior cardinal. He left, as monuments of his piety, a seminary which he founded Rouen, a residence for the Jesuits of Pontoise, and another for the Fathers of the Oratory at Dieppe.
- † Pierre de Gondy (or Gondi), Bishop of Langres, and subsequently Archbishop of Paris, who was called to the conclave by Pope Sixtus V., in 1587. He died at Paris, in February, 1616, at the advanced age of eighty-four years. The Cardinal de Gondy was the first Archhishop of Paris, the metropolis having previously been only an episcopal sec.
- François d'Escoubleau, better known under the name of Cardinal de Sourdis, was the son of François d'Escoubleau, Mar-ity, already awaiting them. The royal retained her Tuscan costume, which was overlaid with the splendid jewels that formed so considerable portion of her dowry; conspicuous them being an ornament serving as a stomacher, which immediately obtained the name of "the Queen's Brilliant." This costly decoration consisted of an octagonal framework of large diamonds, divided into sections by lesser stones, each enclosing a portrait in enamel of one of the princes of her house, beneath which hung three immense pear-shaped pearls. The King was attired in west and haut-de-chausses of white satin, elaborately embroidered with silk and gold, and black cape;* and wore upon his head the velvet toque that had been introduced ■ the French court by Henry III., which string of costly pearls was attached by a of diamonds. Nor were the ladies and nobles of the royal retinue very inferior in the splendour of their appearance even to the monarch and his bride; feathers waved, and jewels flashed on every side; silks and velvets swept Ill marble floor; and the brilliant uniforms of the royal guard were seen in startling contrast with the uncovered shoulders if the dames, which were laden with quis d'Allière, and was of an ancient and noble house. He distinguished himself so greatly by his mental and moral qualities, as to secure the confidence and regard of Henry IV., who, in for him a cardinal's hat; and in the following year he was created Archhishop of Bordeaux, in which city he gems; while, complete gorgeousness of the picture, high light, and wrought gold, and precious stones; and the magnificent robes the prelates and priests who surrounded the shrine, formed a centre worthy of the rich framework by which was enclosed.

* Cayet, p. 191.

At termination of the ceremony, gold and allver coins were thrown to the crowd, and the procession returned to the palace in the same order as a had reached the church.

Great, however, as was the satisfaction which Henry IV. had publicly expressed a his marriage, and lavish the encomiums that he had passed upon the grace beauty of wife, it is, nevertheless, certain that he by no means permitted this legitimate admiration to interfere with his passion for Madame Verneuil, whom he constantly dispatched couriers, charged with both letters and presents; and whom he even permitted to speak of the Queen in her replies in a disrespectful manner. But the crowning proof of the inequality of the struggle which was about to exist between the wife and the mistress, was the departure of the King from Lyons on 18th of December, the second day after his marriage; when, announcing his intention of travelling post to Paris, he left the Queen and her suite to follow at their leisure. That the haughty spirit of Medicis was stung by abrupt abendonment, in that her woman-pride revolted, will admit of no doubt; nor is it wonderful that her indignation and icalousy should have been aroused when and discovered that, instead of pursuing his way to the capital, where public arrangements necessitated by peace with Savoy which he had just concluded, required his prethe King had embarked at Roanne, and then proceeded from Briare where he landed, to Fontainebleau; whence on morrow, after dining Willeneuve, had travelled to Verneuil, and remained three days before he entered Paris. Nor even after his arrival the capital, was his conduct such as to reassure her delicacy; for Bessompierre has left it upon record that the newly-wedded sovereign took up his abode with M. de Montglat, is the priory of St. Nicolas-du-Louvre, where he constantly entertained ladies at supper, as several of his confidential courtiers.*

VOL. I.

* L'Étoile, vol. ii, p.

So singular and insulting a commencement of her married life was assuredly well calculated to alarm the dignity of the Tuscan Princess; and even brief as had been her residence in France, she had already several individuals about her person who did not suffer her to remain in ignorance of the movements of her royal consort; while, unhappily for her own peace, her Italian followers—revolted by an indifference on the part of the monarch which they considered as an insult in their mistress—instead if endeavouring in allay the irritation which she did not attempt in conocal, exasperated her feelings by the vehemence of their indignation. It is indeed but too manifest that the favourite retained all her influence I and arrangements had been formally made for the progress of the Queen to the capital involved so much delay, that it me not possible for her to remain blind to the fact that they had been organized with the view of enabling the monarch to enjoy uninterruptedly for a time the society of his mistress. In consequence of these perpetual stoppages on the road, the harangues to which was condemned to listen, and the dreary ceremonies to which she was condemned, it was not until the III of February, 1601, IIII Marie de IIIIII reached Nemours, where she was by the King, who ducted her to Fontainebleau, at which palace the royal couple made a sojourn of five or six days; and, finally, the 9th of the month, the young Queen entered Paris, where the civic authorities were anxious to afford her magnificent state reception; a purpose which was, however, negatived by the monarch, who alleged as his reason the enormous outlay that they had previously made upon similar occasions, and who commanded that the ceremony should be deferred.* Whatever may have been the real motive of Henry for exhibiting this new slight towards his royal bride, it is certain that partisans of Marie did not fail to attribute it to the malevolence of Madame de Verneuil; another subject of animosity was added to the list.

Bassompierre, Mém., p. 📰

Under these circumstances, the Queen metropolitan city of her new kingdom without any of that pomp which had characterized her progress through the provinces; and alighted the residence of the Gondy,* where the princesses and the principal ladies of the court and city hastened to pay their respects to her Majesty their parrival.

L'Etoile, vol. ii, p. 549.

It was runnoured that one motive for the visit of the King — Verneuil had been his anxiety to induce the insolent favourite (whom he resolved to present — Queen in order that she might be authorized — maintain her place at court) to treat her new sovereign with becoming respect; — with a view to render her presentation as dignified as possible, he commanded the Duchess de Nemours† to officiate as her sponsor. The pride of Anne de Savoie revolted, however, against — which — assigned — her; and she ventured respectfully to intimate her reluctance to undertake so

Jerome (or Albert) de Gondy, peer of France, knight of the King's Orders, and first gentleman of the bedchamber, occupied the hôtel, which was subsequently known as the Hôtel de Condé. He enjoyed the confidence of Catherine de Medicis and Charles IX. so fully that he had the honour of espousing, in the name of that monarch, the Princess Elizabeth of Austria, daughter of the Emperor II. At the coronation of Henry III., he represented the person of the Constable; and II that of Henry IV., he was proxy for the Count of Toulouse.

† Anne d'Este, duchess de Nemours, mas the mother of manufacture de Mayenne, and grandmother of the young Duke de Guiss who aspired to the throne. She was first married to François de Lorraine, Duke de Guise, and subsequently to Jacques de Savois, Duke de Nemours, whose son, after his decesse, also pretended to the crown.

onerous an office; alleging as her reason that such . measure on her part must inevitably deprive her of the confidence of her royal mistress. Nevertheless, Ill King insisted on her obedience; and, accordingly, the mortiduchess compelled lead the mistress of the monarch into the circle, and to name her to the agitated and outraged Queen. Marie de Medicis in this trying emergency sustained by her little blood; and although her lip quivered, she vouchsafed an other token of displeasure; but after coldly returning the curtsey of IIII favourite, who was blazing with jewels and radiant with triumph, she turned abruptly aside to with one of the court ladies, leaving the marquise still standing before her, though she suddenly become acious of her existence. Nor - the Duchess de Nemours receive a more gracious welcome; when, having ventured to interpose in the conversation, she sought the eye of the Queen; for that eye man instantly averted; and she became aware that she had in truth incurred displeasure which she is so justly apprehended.

But although the high-born and exemplary duchess shrank from the anger of her young sovereign, parvenue marquise and far from feeling equally abashed.

* One historian (Sawel. Gallerie des Rois de France, vol. i.) seserts that the King himself presented ministress to his wife; but he is unsupported in this statement was by Bassompierre, who saye: "The King presented Madame de Verneuil to her, graciously received." (Mésoires, p. 25.) Every other authority, however, contradicts this assertion, which is

With a steady step and a proud carriage she advanced a pace nearer to Marie, and in her turn took up the thread of the discourse; nor did the haughtiness of a Queen's deportment her screnity for a moment. The great fascination of Madame de Verneuil existed, as we have already remarked, in her extraordinary wit, and a vivacity of her conversation; while a ably did she on this occasion profit by her advantage, that the disgust of Marie was gradually changed into wonder; and when, the close of one of her most brilliant sallies, insolent favourite even carried her audacity so far as to address her royal mistress personally, the Queen startled into a reply.* — soon, however, recovered her self-possession; and pleading fatigue, broke up the circle by retiring to her own apartments.

The mortification of Madame de Nemours, whose highest ambition had been to secure the affection of her new sovereign, and whose pride to been sorely wounded by the undignified office that she had been compelled to fulfil, had not, however, yet reached its culminating point; for as on the approach of the King, who was in his turn preparing to withdraw, she awaited man acknowledgment of the submission with which she obeyed his commands, she was startled to see a frown gather upon his brow as their eyes met; and still more so to hear herself rebuked for the ungracious manner in which she had performed her task; an exhibition of ill-will which, he averred, was solely the coldness of her reception.

L'Etoile, vol. i, p. 550.

The duchess curtseyed silence; and Henry, withother salutation, slowly pursued his way the ante-room, followed by the officers of his household.

On the 12th of the month the Queen changed her residence, and took up her abode in the house of Zamet,* where she was to remain until the Louvre was prepared for which Henry had utterly neglected; and on the 15th she | length | length herself established in the palace which had been opened to her with so much apparent reluctance. On the Marie appeared in the costume of the French court,† with certain modifications which - became popular. Like those by whom she me now surrounded, she was her bosom considerably exposed, but her back and shoulders we veiled by deep ruff which immediately obtained the mann of the "Medicis;" and which bore a considerable resemblance to a similar decoration much in vogue during the sixteenth century. The "Medicis" was composed of rich lace, and supported by wire, and rose behind the neck to the height of twelve inches.! The dress which was ____ of the most gorgeous description,

This residence, which was situated near the Bastille, and subsequently known as the Hôtel de Leadiguières, was the same in which is well Gastrielle had manual her last.

† Bassompierre, Mén., p. ...

? Wraxall, History of France, vol. vi, p. 187.

materials employed being either cloth of gold allver, welvet trimmed with ermine; while chains of jewels confined it across the breast, descending from thence to the waist, where they formed a chatchine reaching to the Nor did the young Queen even hesitate to sacrifice to the prejudices of her new country, the magnificent hair which had excited so much astonishment on her arrival; but, in conformity with the taste of the French court, of suffering it, as she had previously done, to flow loosely over her shoulders, or to display its luxuriant braids like a succession of glossy diadems around her head, she caused it to be closely cut, and arranged in stiff rows of thickly powdered curls.

Hitherto, since the accession of Henry IV. the French court had been one of the least splendid in Europe; if, indeed, it could in reality have been said to exist at all; a circumstance to which many causes had conduced. During his separation from Marguerite. and before his second marriage, Henry had cared IIII for the mere display of royalty. His previous poverty had accustomed him to many privations as a sovereign, which sought to compensate by self-indulgence as a man; and thus he made a home in the houses of the most wealthy of his courtiers, such as Zamet, Gondy, and other dissipated and convenient sycophants, with whom he could fling off the trammels of rank, and indulge in the ruinously high play, or other still some objectionable amusements to which he was addicted. of the Tuscan princess, however, all was changed; and, as though he sought to compensate to her by splendour and display for the mortifications which awaited her private life, we King began forthwith to revive traditional magnificence of the court.

NAMES OF TAXABLE PARTY.

Two days after their arrival at the Louvre, Henry conducted Queen to the royal palaces of Fontainebleau St. Germain; and on 18th of the month, their Majesties, attended by the whole of their respective households, and accompanied by all the princes and great resident in the capital, partook of superb banquet in the Arsenal, given by Sully in honour of appointment - Grand-Master of the Artillery. At festival the minister, casting aside the gravity of functions and the dignity of rank, forgetful as it would appear of respect which he owed to his new sovereign, not satisfied with pressing upon his guests the costly viands that had been prepared for them, no sooner perceived that the Italian ladies of her Majesty's suite greatly attracted by the wine of Arboia, of which they man partaking freely, quite unconscious of m potency, than he caused the decenters containing the water that they mingled with it to be re-filled with another wine of equal strength, but so limpid as to be utterly undistinguishable to we eye man be purer liquid which had been substituted. The consequences if this cruel pleasantry may be inferred; in heat, in movement, mil moise by which they were surrounded, together with the increased thirst caused by the insidious draughts they were unconstitutely imbibing, only induced the unfortunate mental more perseveringly to their refreshing libations; and length the results became so apparent as to attract the notice of the King, who, already prepossessed like Sully himself against Queen's foreign retinue, laughed heartily treachery which he appeared to consider as the amusing feature of the entertainment.*

During the succeeding days several and a tournament, open to all comers, and at which the Queen presented the prizes to the victors, was held at the Pontau-Change.

At the close of Lent, the Duchess de Bar the King's sister, and her father-in-law the Duke de Lorraine, arrived in France to welcome the new sovereign; who, together with her consort, with them Monceaux, which estate, lately the property of la belle Gabrielle, Henry had, after her arrival in the capital, presented to his wife. Here the court festivals were renewed; and had the heart and mind of Marie been at ease, her life must have seemed rather like a brilliant drum. than a sober reality. Such, however, was far from being a case; for already the of domestic discord which had been sown before her marriage beginning to germinate. We Verneuil was absent from the court; and it was evident to every individual of whom it was composed, that the King rather tolerated than shared in the gaicties by which he was surrounded.

Bassompierre relates during thin sojourn

L'Etoile, v. ii, pp. 550, 551.

Monceaux, Henry was standing apart with himself, M. Sully, and Chancellor, L suddenly informed them that the favourite had confided to him a proposal of marriage which she had received from prince, on condition that she should be enabled to bring with her a dowry of a hundred thousand crowns; and inquired if they would advise him to sacrifice so large " sum for such a purpose. "Sire," replied M. de Bellièvre; "I am of opinion that you would do well to give the young lady the hundred thousand crowns in order that she may secure the match." And when Sully with his usual prudence remarked that it was more easy to talk of such an amount than to procure it, the Chancellor continued, heedless of interruption: "Nay more, Sire; I am equally of opinion that you had better give two or even three hundred thousand, if less will not suffice. Such is my advice."*

It is needless to say that it was not followed.

The only amusement in which Henry IV. indulged freely and earnestly, was play; and was so reckless a gamester, that at an period has the court of France been so thoroughly demoralized by that frightful vice as throughout his reign. In only this own example corrupt those immediately about him, but the rage for gaming gradually pervaded all classes. In nobility their estates where money failed; in citizens trafficked in cards and dice when they should have been employed in commerce or in science; wery gambled in the halls, and the pages in the ante-chambers. Play became the one great business of life throughout capital; and which changed entire destiny of families. One or two traits will suffice to prove this, and we will then dismiss the subject. In wear 1607, M. de Bassompierre relates in his Memoirs, being unable from of to purchase a new and belitting costume in which to appear at the christening of the Dauphin, he nevertheless gave an order to his tailor to prepare him a dress upon which the outlay was to be fourteen thousand ; his actual resources amounting in that moment only - sooner done so than he proceeded with this trifling sum to the hôtel of the Duke d'Epernon, where he won five thousand; while before the completion of the costume, he had not only gained a sufficient amount to discharge the debt thus wantonly incurred, but, as he adds, with a self-gratulation worthy of a better cause; " also a diamond-hilted sword of the value of five thousand growns, and five or six thousand more with which mamuse myself."*

* Basaompierre, Mésa., p. 🌃

In 1609, only one year later, L'Etoile has left on record a stounding and degrading fact. "In month," (March) says, "several academies play have been established, where citizens of all ages risk consums; a circumstance which proves only an of means, but also the corruption of morals. The son of a merchant has been seen at one sitting lose sixty thousand crowns, although had only inherited twenty thousand from his father; and a man named Jonas has hired house in the Faubourg St. Germain, order house in the factories for a fortnight during the fair, and for this house he has given fourteen hundred france."

Beasompierre, Mém., p. III.

•

D'Aubigny and several other chroniclers testimony and while Bassompierre boasts of having won five hundred thousand pistoles in one year, (each pistole being little inferior in value to our own sovereign,) he nevertheless gives multiply to understand that the King was a more reckless gamester than himself; a fact corroborated moreover by Sully. who tells us in his Memoirs: "The least the principal ones, that I employed mu the personal expenses of Henry, were twenty-two thousand pistoles, for which he me on the 18th of January, 1609, and which he had lost play; a hundred thousand livres to party, and fifty-one thousand another, likewise play debts, due Edward Fernandès, a Portuguese." • • • A thousand pistoles for future play: Henry first took only five hundred, but he subsequently Beringhen for the remainder for a different purpose. I carried him a thousand more for play when I Chancellor to Fontainebleau."

• Market vol. iii, pp. 1506.

† Sully, Móm., vol. vž, pp. 180, 181.

Only a short time subsequent to the establishment of the court at the Louvre, what neither the desire and authority of the King himself, nor the arts of his mistress had been able to accomplish, was achieved through the agency of the Queen's favourite attendant, Leonora Galigat,* who all accompanied her royal mistress and foster-sister from Italy at the period of her marriage. On the formation of the Queen's household, Henry had, among other appointments, honoured Richeliest with the post of Illiania of the Robes; but Marie de Minimi having Minimi on bestowing this charge upon Leonora, refused to permit the countess to perform the duties of her office, and requested the King to transfer it to her Italian protegée. This, however, was a concession to which Henry would not consent; and while the Queen persisted in not permitting the services of Madame de Richelieu, her royal bridegroom pertinaciously negatived the appointment of parvenue lady of honour. The high-born countess bore the affront thus offered to her with the complacent dignity belitting her proud station; but such was far Leonors Dori, otherwise Galigai, was the daughter of the nume of Marie de Medicia, who was the wife of a carpenter, and she had consequently agroung from the very dregs of the people. By her great talent and insinuating manners, she had however not only in accuring the affection of her royal patroness, but also in exerting an influence over her actions never attained by any other individual.

† Suzanne de la Porte, wife of François de Plessis, Seigneur de Richelieu, knight of the royal Orders, and grand provost of France.

from being the case with the ambitious and mortified Leonora, who had not been week the French court ere she became aware that all the Italian followers of the Queen were peculiarly obnoxious both to the King and his minister; and who falt am should am fail to push her fortunes upon the instant, she might day be compelled to leave France as poor and as powerless as she had entered it. Not contented, therefore, urging her royal mistress III persevere in her resolution of rejecting the attendance of Madame de Richelieu, began to speculate upon the most feasible be adopted in order to secure her own succession to the coveted dignity; and after considerable reflection, she became convinced that this could only be accomplished through the assistance of the Marquise de Verneuil. Once assured of the fact, Leonora an not hesitate; but, instead of avoiding, as she had hitherto done, the advances of the favourite, who, amon of her unlimited power over mind of the Queen, had on several occasions treated her with a courtesy by no means warranted by her position at the court, she began to court the favour of the marquise in as marked a manner as she had previously slighted it; and ere long the intrigue of the two favourites was brought to a successful issue. Each stood in need of the other, and a compact was accordingly into between them. Madame de Verneuil, whose pride was piqued by her exclusion from the royal circle, was desirous to gain any price the countenance of Marie, and to be admitted to her private assemblies, where alone she could carry out her more extended plan of ambition; while the wily Italian, rendered only more pertinacious by difficulty, and anxious moreover to secure post which would at all times enable her to remain. about the person of the Queen, thought no price too great, even dishonour of her royal foster-sister, to obtain her object; and thus mutual promise was made; the marquise pledging herself that, in the event of the Queen recognising her right to attend her receptions, and treating her with the courtesy consideration due to the rank conferred upon her by the King, she would the appointment courted by Leonora; with equal confidence promised in her turn that she would without delay Madame de Verneuil to receive a summons to the Queen's presence.

Nor did either of these ladies over-estimate the amount of her influence; for the monarch no sooner learnt the reception of his mistress by the haughty and indignant Princess could be purchased by a mere slight to Madame la Grande Provoste, than he consented to sanction the appointment of the Italian suivente of Marie to the post of honour; while Leonora soon succeeded by her tears and entreaties in wringing from her royal mistress a reluctant acquiescence to her request.

then, stated, hollow peace was patched up between the unequal rivals; and Madame Verneuil at length found berself in possession of folding seat in the Queen's reception room; while her coadjutrice triumphantly her place among noblest for the land: but scarcely had result been accomplished, when Henry, profiting by so unhoped-for an opportunity of gratifying the vanity of favourite, assigned to her a suite of spartments in the Louvre immediately above those of the Queen | little, if at all, inferior in them in magnificence.

This, however, and an affront which Marie de Marie could not brook; and she accordingly, with her and independence of spirit, expressed berself in no measured upon the subject, particularly to such of her ladies were likely to repeat her comments to the marquise. The latter retorted by assuming all the airs of royalty; and by assembling about her a court, for which of the Queen herself requently forsaken, especially by the monarch, who found the brilliant circle of the favourite, wherein he always met a made enthusiastic welcome, infinitely more to his than the formal etiquette, and reproachful frowns by which his presence in that of his royal consort was usually signalized.

Nor could the annoyance of the proud Florentine princess be subject of astonishment any rightly-constituted mind. The position a monstrous and unnatural Both wife at the mistress about to become mothers; at the whole court was degraded by so unblushing exhibition of a profligacy of the monarch. Still, however, the French ladies of the household forebore to censure their sovereign; and even sought bersuade the outraged Queen when once had given Dauphin France, the favourite would be compelled to leave palace; but Marie's Italian followers were far less scrupulous, and expressed their indignation in no measured terms. The Queen, wounded in her most sacred feelings, became gradually colder marquise; who, mu though she had only awaited this relapse to sting her still deeply than she had yet done, retorted the slights which she constantly received by declaring that "the Florentine," as she insolently designated her royal mistress, and not the legal a lawful wife of the King, whose written promise, still in her possession, he was, - she asserted, bound to fulfil should she bear him son. This surpassing assurance no sconer reached the of Marie de Medicis than she forbade Madame de Verneuil her presence; but the marquise, strong in her impunity, merely replied by epigram, and consoled herself for her exclusion from the Queen's private circle by assuming man and magnificence than before; and by collecting in her saloons the prettiest women and the most reckless gamblers that the capital could produce. Thus attracted, the infatuated monarch became her constant guest; and his neglected wife, in weak health, and with agonised heart, herself abandoned for a wanton who had we price upon her virtue, and who made a glory of her shame.

Poor Marie! whatever were her was a woman, they were bitterly expiated both as a wife and as a mother! Vain was all the sound of the King was the one hand and those of Leonora on the other to terminate this new misunderstanding; Queen was coldly resolute, and marquise insolently indifferent; would reconciliation, in all probability, again have taken place, had not the interests of the Mistress of the once required it; when her influence the mind of her royal foster-sister sufficed to every obstacle.

Among the Florentines who composed the suite of Marie de Medicis ..... Concino Concini,* .. gentleman of her household, whose extreme personal beauty had captivated the heart of Leonora; while she saw, she believed, in his far-reaching ambition and flexile character the very elements calculated, in conjunction with her firmer nature and higher intellect, to lead her on to the most lofty fortunes. It is probable, however, that had la Galigas continued to attend the Queen in her original and obscure office of waiting-woman, Concini, who was of better blood than herself, and who could not moreover be supposed in in any attraction in the diminutive figure and sallow countenance of his countrywoman, would never have been induced to consent to such an alliance; but Leonora was now on the high road to wealth and honour, while his own position searcely defined; and thus ere long the consent of the Queen to their marriage solicited by Concini himself.

Marie, who foresaw by arrangement, she

Concine Concine was the som of a notary, who, by his talent,

be secretary of the at Florence.

should keep both parties in her service: and who, in desolation of a disappointed spirit clung each day more closely—her foreign attendants, immediately accorded the required permission; but a content of the required permission; but a content of the projected union, than he sterrely forbade it; to a great indignation of the consort, who deeply mortified by this a interference with her personal household, and saddened by the spectacle of her favourite's unaffected wretchedness. In vain did the Queen expostulate, and urged by Leonora and her suitor, — entreat of Henry to relent; all her efforts—this effect remained fruitless; and she was a length compelled to declare to the sorrowing—that she had no alternative save to submit to the will of the King.

Such, however, far from being the intention of the passionate Italian. Too unattractive to entertain any hope from her own pleadings with Henry himself, she once more turned in this man difficulty. Madame de Verneuil; who, in order to display how little she had been mortified or annoyed by the coldness of the Queen, and the time to prove to her that where the earnest entreaties of the latter had failed to produce any effect, her expressed wish would to ensure success, immediately bade Leonora dry her eyes, and prepare her wedding-dress, as she would guarantee her prompt reception of royal consent upon condition, and one easy of accomplishment that she could not fail to fulfil it.

DB III Marie de Medicis had been heard medeclare that in the event of her becoming the mother of a Dauphin, would, the earliest possible period, dance ballet in honour of the King, which should exceed in magnificence every exhibition of the kind that had hitherto been attempted; and the condition = lightly treated by the favourite less than her appearance in royal ballet, should I indeed take place. Even I Galigar herself startled by so astounding proposition: but she discovered, from the resolute attitude assumed by the marquise, that her powerful intercession with the King was not otherwise to be secured; and it consequently with an less of hope than apprehension that the agitated Mistress of the Robes kissed the hand of Madame de Verneuil, and assured her that she would leave no effort untried to obtain the consent of her royal mistress to her wishes. But when she had withdrawn, and traversing the gallery which communicated with the apartments of Marie, she began to entertain serious misgivings: the pretension of the marquise mes monstrous, that, conscious as she was of the extent of her own influence over her fostersister, she almost dreaded communicate the result of her interview, and nearly despaired of success; but with the resolute perseverance which formed marked a feature in her character, resolved to brave utmost displeasure of the Queen rather than forego last hope of an union with Concini. II - nevertheless, drowned in tears, and with a trembling heart, that she presented herself before Marie, as the voluntary bearer of this new and aggravated insult; while, incomprehensible it appear in this age, whatever may have been arguments and entreaties of which she was clever enough avail herself, it is at least certain that they altimately successful; and that she was authorised by the Queen communicate to Malian Verneuil her Majesty's willingness to accede to her request, provided that the marquise pledged herself in return to perform her portion of the contract.

That her partiality for her early friend induced Marie de Medicis to make, in this instance, a most unbecoming concession, is certain; while it is less matter of record that, probably to prevent any opportunity of retractation on the part of Madame de Verneuil, she lavished upon her from that day the most flattering marks of friendship; and publicly treated her with a distinction which was envied by many of the greatest ladies court, even although it excited the censure of all.*

The comparative tranquillity which succeeded this new adjustment of the differences between the Queen and the marchioness continued until the month of September, on the 17th day of which Marie became mother of Dauphin (subsequently Louis XIII.), the palace of Fontainebleau; where, had already been the man the Louvre, the apartments of the favourite adjoined her Nothing could exceed delight of Henry IV. at birth of heir. stood is lower end of the Queen's apartment, surrounded by the princes of the blood, to each of whom the royal infant successively presented; and this ceremony sooner terminated than, bending over him with passionate fondness, he audibly invoked a blessing upon his head; and then placing his sword in the tiny hand - yet unable to grasp it: "May you it, my son," he exclaimed, "to the glory of God, and in defence of your crown and people."* He next approached the bed of the Queen; "M'amie," he said, tenderly, "Rejoice! God has given us what we asked." | Mezeray and Matthieu both | that the birth of the Dauphin was preceded by an earthquake; which, with the usual superstition of the period, afterwards declared to have been a forewarning of the ceaseless by which Europe convulsed during his reign.1

Dreux du Radier, Mémoires des Reines et Régentes de France, vol. vi. p. 81. Conti, Amours du Maria Alcandre, Cologne edition, 1652, p. 41.

* Péréfixe, vol. îi, p. L'Etoile, vol. îi, ..... 573, 574.

† Matthieu, vol. ii, p. 441.

<sup>1</sup> Mezeray, vol. x, p. 178.

ш

death of his elder brother Francis, who born in 1517. Te Deums were in the churches; salvos of artillery discharged the Arsenal; fireworks, bonfires, and illuminations, made a city of flame of Paris for several successive nights; while joyous acclamations the air, and the gratified citizens gratulated each other as they perambulated the sas though each had experienced personal benefit. The fact that Anne of Austrie, the daughter of Philip III. of Spain, born only five days previous the Dauphin, another of delight to the French people, who regarded the circumstance as an earnest of the future union of the two kingdoms; prophecy which afterwards fulfilled by the marriage of the two royal children.

We have already made more than allusion to the belief in magic, sorcery and astrology, which at this period had obtained in France; and by which many, of the enlightened of her nobles and citizens suffered themselves to be trammelled and deluded; and however much of the present day may be inclined to pity to despise so great a weakness, as shall do well to remember human progression during the sixty years has been marked and certain than that which had taken place in the lapse of the three previous turies. It is true there were a few strong-minded individuals at the period of which we treat, who submit their reason to the wild and illogical superatitions which were rife about them; but these formed a very small portion of the aggregate population; and from the peasant in his hovel and monarch on his throne, the plague-spot of credulity and spread and featered, until a presented a formidable feature in the history of the time. It is curious to remark that L'Etoile, the common-place and unimaginative of chroniclers, who might well have been expected in his realism to treat such phantasies as puerile and absurd, seems to justify to his own mind the extreme penalties of the common and the stake as a fitting punishment for and magicians: declaring, as he records them in his usual terms and matter-of-fact style, to be dictated by justice, and essential to the repression of an intercourse between and evil spirits.

* Daniel, vol. vii, p. 407.

Gabrielle d'Estrées was the dupe, if, indeed, not the victim, of her firm faith in astrology. She had been assured that "a child would prevent her from attaining the rank to which she aspired;" and the predisposition of an excited nervous system, probably assisted the verification of the prophecy. The old Cardinal de Bourbon

* Matthieu, Hist. de Henri IV., vol. i, p. 307.

† Charles I. Bourbon, Cardinal-Architishop Rouen, legate of Avignon, abbé of St. Denis, of M. Germain-des-Près, of Duen, of Ste. Catherine of Rouen, and of Orcamp, &c. was the son of Charles, Duke de Vendôme, and was born in 1523. After the death of Henry III., in 1589, he was proclaimed King by the Leaguers and the Duke de Mayenne, under the title of Charles X. Taken captive by Henry IV., of whom he was the whom Leaguers would have made their king, was seduced from his fidelity to the illustrious race from which he sprang by his weak reliance upon the predictions of soothsayers, who was degraded him into tool of the wily Duke de Guise; while in nephew, Charles II., also Cardinal more infatuated than himself, had been impelled to believe that the disease which rapidly sapping wistence, the will of the machinations of a court lady by whom he had been hewitched ! Traitors found excuse for their treason in the assertion that they had been deluded by false predictions, or ensorcerised by magic; princes were governed in their political movements by astral calculations; § grave minister details with complacency, although without comment, various anecdotes of the operation of the occult sciences, and even makes them a study; while an European monarch, strong in the love of his people paternal uncle, he was imprisoned at Fontensy, where he died, in 1594.

De Thou, vol. zi, pp. 154, 155.

† Charles, in natural son of Anthony of Navarre and of Mademoiselle de la Bernudière de la Guiche, one of the maids of honour to Catherine de Medicia.

Such was the plea of the Maréchal de Biron during his imprisonment in the Bastille.

Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy, whose intellect had in respects outrun and whose should have emancipated him from so gross an abuse of reason, never undertook any measure of importance without consulting the astrologers. See de Thou, vol. xiii, p.

|| See the Memoirs of Sully.

and his bravery, the predictions of sooth-sayers and prophets to cloud his mind, and to shake his purposes, while he declares in contempt for all such delusions.*

DE DE

That such was actually the case is proved by Thou, who relates me extraordinary speech made by the King the Louvre, in 1599, on the occasion of the promulgation of the Edict of Nantes, we the deputies of the Parliament of Paris; in the course of which he declared that, twenty-six years previously, when he residing at the court of Charles IX., he about to cast the dice with Henry of Lorraine, Duke de Guise, his relative, amid a large circle of nobles, when at the instant in which they were prepared to their game, drops of blood appeared upon the table, which renewed without any apparent agency m fast they wiped away. Each party carefully ascertained that it could not proceed from any of the individuals present; and the phenomenon was as frequently repeated, that Henry, m he averred, m amazed and disturbed, and to persevere in pastime, considering the circumstance as an evil omen.† Whatever may be the opinion of the reader as to the actual cause of this apparent prodigy, it is a least

It is a certain fact that Henry IV., however he might verbally despise the pretentions of those who exercised what has been happily designated as the " art," nevertheless more than once a conviction of their mysterious privileges.

+ III Thou, vol. x, p. 375.

certain it we verified by subsequent events; well as the extraordinary and multiplied prophecy that the King himself would meet to death in a coach.

.

Under these circumstances, combined with the almost universal credulity of the mation which he governed, it is scarcely matter of surprise Henry IV., on so momentous a occasion at the birth of his son, have sought, even while he feigned to disregard result, W learn the after-destiny of the royal infant; and, accordingly, a few days subsequently, he commanded M. III la Rivière,* who publicly professed the science of judicial astrology, to draw the horoscope of the Dauphin with all the accuracy of which the operation was susceptible. The command was answered by assurance from la Rivière that the work was already in progress; but me another week passed by without any communication from the seer, Henry became impatient, and again summoned him to his presence, in order to inquire the cause of the delay.

"Sire," replied Rivière; "I have abandoned the undertaking, as I am reluctant to sport with a science

*M, de la Rivière had originally been the chief medical attendant of the Duke de Bouillon, who ceded him to Henry IV., by whom he was appointed his body-surgeon, in which office he succeeded d'Aliboust. It was born at Falaise, in Normandy, and was the son of It. Ribel, professor of theology in Geneva. In himself, however, embraced the reformed religion, and died in 1605, sincerely regretted by the monarch, to whom his eminent talents and unwearied devotion had greatly endeared him.

whose secrets I have partially forgotten; and which I have, moreover, frequently found defective."

"I me not to be deceived by so idle a pretext;" said the King, who readily detected that the alleged excuse subterfuge; "you have no such scruples; but you have resolved not in reveal in me what you have ascertained, lest I should discover in fallacy in your pretended knowledge, or be angered by your prediction. Whatever may be the cause of your hesitation, however, I me resolved that you shall speak; and I command you, upon pain of my displeasure, to do so truthfully."

Still la Rivière excused himself, until perceiving that it would be dangerous to persevere in his pertinacity, he length reluctantly replied: "Sire, your son will live to manhood, and will reign longer than yourself: but he will resemble you in no one particular. He will indulge his own opinions and caprices, and sometimes those of others. During his rule it will be safer to think than to speak. Ruin threatens your ancient institutions; all your measures will be overthrown. He will accomplish great deeds; will be fortunate in his undertakings; and will become the theme of all Christendom. We will have issue; and after his death more heavy troubles will ensue. This is all that you shall know from me, and even this is more than I had proposed to tell you."

The King remained for a time silent and thoughtful, after which he said coldly: "You allude to the Huguenots, I see Mil well; but you only talk thus because you have their interests in heart."

"Explain my meaning as you please;" the abrupt retort; "but you had learn nothing from me." And so saying, the uncompromising astrologer made a hurried salutation in the monarch, and withdrew.*

A fortnight after this extraordinary scene, another event took place the Louvre, sufficiently interesting to Henry to wean his thoughts for a time even from the foreshadowed future of his time even from apartment immediately contiguous to that of the still convalescent Queen, Madame de Verneuil became in her turn the mother of son, who baptized with great ceremony, and received the should have covered the King with shame, and roused the nation to indignation, Sully, Mém., vol. vi, pp. 46—49.

† Gaston Henry, the son of Henry IV. and Henriette d'Entragues, Marquise de Vernenil, originally took orders, and became incumbent of several abbeys, among others, that of St. Germain-des-Près. It is subsequently Bishop of Metz, and bore that title for a considerable time. On the st of January, 1662, having been created a knight of the Order of Holy Ghost, and in seful following year a duke and peer, he took the name of Duke de Verneuil, and as such was sent to England, in 1665, am ambassador extraordinary. Finally, in 1666, Louis XIV. bestowed upon him the government Languedoc, his church property, and married (in 1668).

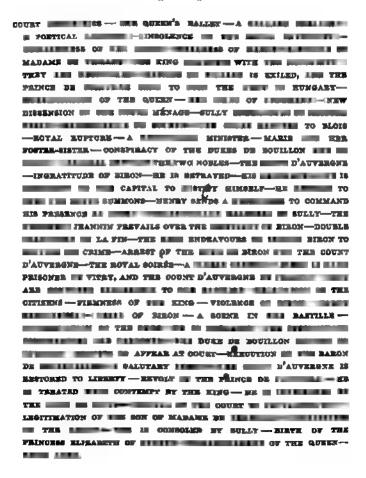

Seguier, widow Maximilian-François Béthune III., Duke de Sully. He died without insue, Wersailles, on the 28th of May.

when the circumstances already detailed considered, but the pretext for new rejoicings.

On the 27th of October, the Dauphin made public entry into Paris. The infant Prince occupied sumptuous cradle presented to him by the Grand-Duchess of Florence; and beside him, in an open litter, Madame de Montglat, his gouvernante, and the royal The provost of the merchants and the metropolitan sheriffs met him at some distance from the gates, and harangued him a considerable length; and Madame de Montglat having replied in his name to the oration, the cortège proceeded to the house of Zamet. Two days subsequently he conveyed in the same state to St. Germain-en-Laye; where, in order that the people might see him with greater facility, the nurse carried him in her arms. The enthusiasm of the crowd, by which his litter constantly surrounded, knew no bounds; and the heart of that exulting mother which was fated afterwards to be broken by his unnatural abandonment, beat high with gratitude to Heaven, her we drank in the enthusiastic shouts of the multitude, and remembered that it was she who had bestowed well-appreciated blessing upon France.

CHAPTER III

[1602.]

CHAPTER III.

[1602.]

THE convalencence of the Queen was the signal for a succession of festivities, and the whole winter was spent in gaiety and dissipation; banquets, ballets, and huntingparties, succeeded each other with bewildering rapidity; and so magnificent were several of the court-festivals that even more of the gravest historians of the time did not disdain to record them. The most brilliant of the whole, however, and that which will best seems his exemplify the taste of the period, was the ballet to which allusion has already been made as given in honour of the King by his royal consort, and in which Marie de herself appeared. In order to heighten its effect, she had selected fifteen of the most heautiful women of the court, Madame de Verneuil being, according to the royal promise, and the limit part of the exhibition took place at the Louvre. The entertainment commenced with the entrance of Apollo and the nine Muses into the great hall of the palace, which thronged with native and foreign princes, ambassadors, and ministers, in midst of whom the King with the Papal Nuncio on his right hand. The god and his attendants sang the glory of the monarch, the pacificator of Europe; and each terminated with the somewhat fulsome and ungraceful words:

" Il faut que tout vous rend hommage, Grand Roi, miracle de notre age."

Thence the whole gay and gallant company proceeded the Hôtel de Guise, where the eight maids of honour of the Queen performed the second act; and this no sconer concluded, than the brilliant revellers removed to the archiepiscopal palace, where the Queen appeared person upon the scene, with her suite divided into four quadrilles. Marie herself represented Venus, and led by the hand César de Vendôme* attired as Cupid; when the splendour of her jewels produced startling meffect that murmurs of astonishment and admiration must through the hall.

He became Governor of Brittany, and superintendentchief of the national navigation. Henry also bestowed him as an apparage the duchy of Vendôme. He married the daughter of Philip Emmanuel of Lorraine, Duke de Mercosur, by whom he had three children: Isabelle, who became the wife of Charles Amédée, Duke de Nemours; Louis, who died single; Isabelle, Duke of his royal consort, Henry smilingly inquired of Nuncio "if he ever before so fine squadron?"

"Bellissimo pericolosissimo l" reply of the gallant prelate.

represented a virtue; arrangement which, when a remembered that Madame de Verneuil of the chosen, rendered their attributes least equivocal. This royal ballet revertheless considered worthy of a poetical immortality by Berthault,* popular bard of the day, who left little behind him worthy of preservation, but who enjoyed great vogue among the fashionables of the court that period. Its important result was, however, the marriage of Concini and Leonora; to which, in consideration of the honour done to the favourite by the Queen, Henry withdrew his opposition; was authorising royal consort to present rich presents the bride, and to celebrate the nuptials with considerable ceremony.

All these royal diversions mean suddenly and disagreeably terminated some months afterwards by me

Jean (or Bertaut) men born at Caen in 1552. He was first-almoner of Catherine Medicia, Abbé Aulnai, and subsequently Bishop of Séez. was a pupil of Ronsard, and a Desportes. He wrote a great number of and profane poems, pealms, and somets. He also produced a Funeral Oration on Henry IV.," Translation Ambroise." He died 1611.

† Amoure 🔤 Grand Alcandre, p. 41.

intrigue which once more threw the King and his courtiers into a state of agitation and discomfort.

i regards Marie de Medicis herself, she had long ceased to derive any gratification from the splendid festivities of which she was one of the brightest ments; her ill-judged indulgence, far from exciting gratitude of Madame de Verneuil, having rendered the insolent favourite still more arrogant and overbearing. To such an extent, indeed, did the marquise carry her presumption, that she is to believe herself indebted for the forbearance of the Queen to the conviction of the latter that she had a superior claim upon the monarch her own; and while she permitted herself to comment upon the words, actions, and tastes, and even upon the personal peculiarities of her royal mistress, she declared her conviction of the legality of the written promise obtained by her from the King; and announced her determination. were that she had become the mother of a son, to enforce its observance.

These monstrous pretensions, which make made known the Queen, at once wounded and exasperated her feelings; and she anxiously awaited the moment when make new imprudence of the favourite should open the eyes of the monarch that mere argument on her own part would avail nothing.

Several writers, and among them even female ones, yielding to the prestige attached to the name of Henry IV., have sought an solution of all his discomfort in the "Italian jealousy" of Marie de Medicis; but surely is not difficult to excuse it under circumof such extraordinary trial. Marie was a wife, a mother, and a Queen; and in each of these characters she was insulted and outraged. As a wife, she saw her rights invaded—as mother, the legitimacy of her questioned—and Queen her dignity compromised. What very inferior have produced disastrous in private life! The only subject of astonishment which is rationally entertained, is the comparative patience with which is this period of her career she submitted to the humiliations that heaped upon her.

In vain did she complain to her royal consort of the insulting calumnies of de Verneuil; he either affected to disbelieve that she had been guilty of such absurd assumption, or reproached Marie with self-respect in listening to the in tattle of caves-droppers and sycophants; alleging that her foreign followers, spoiled by her indulgence, and encouraged by her credulity, were the scourge of his court; and that would do well to dismiss them before they accomplished her own unhappiness. A hint to this always sufficed to silence the Queen, to whom the society and support of Leonora and her husband becoming each day necessary; and thus devoured tears, and stifled her wretchedness, trusting arrogance and presumption of the marquise would ultimately serve her better than her own remonstrances.

Such was the position of affairs when the intrigue to which allusion has been already made promised produce the second result; and it create no surprise that Marie should cagerly indulge the hope of delivering herself from boundaries and formidable rival, when the opportunity presented itself of accomplishing so desirable and without betraying her agency.

During lifetime of belle Gabrielle, her sister, Juliette Hippolyte d'Estrées, Marquise M Cérisay, who, in 1597, became the wife of Georges III Brancas, Duke de Villars, had attracted the attention of the King, whose dissipated tastes always flattered by novelty; although if to credit the statements of the Princess de Conti, this lady, so far from rivalling the beauty of her younger sister, had no personal charms recommend her beyond her youth and her hair.* Being unscrupulous as Duchess de Beaufort herself, Juliette exulted in the idea of captivating King, and left no effort untried to secure her supposed conquest; but this caprice on the part of Henry only momentary, and in passion for Henriette d'Entragues, he forgot his passing fancy for Madame de Villars. The duchess herself, however, was far from being equally oblivious; and listening to and dictates of her ambition and self-love, she became persuaded that she indebted to the marquise alone for sudden coldness of the King; all accordingly wowed an eternal hatred the woman whom she considered in the light of a successful rival. Up to the present period, anxious as she avenge her wounded vanity, the been and secure apportunity of revenge; but having a particular moment won the affection of the Prince de Joinville, who had been a former lover of Madame de Verneuil, and with whom, a she was well aware, he had maintained an active correspondence, she made his surrender of the letters of that lady the price of her own honour. For a time the Prince hesitated; he felt all the disloyalty of such a concession; but those were times in which principle waged an equal war against passion; and the letters ultimately placed in the possession of Madame de Villars.

* Amours du Grand Alcandre, p. 42.

The duchess was fully cognisant of the fact that I from an impulse of self-preservation alone that M. de Joinville had been induced to forego his suit to the favourite, and to absent himself from the court; I consideration which should have aroused her delicacy as I woman; but she was by no means disposed to yield to so inconvenient a weakness; and she consequently sooner secured the coveted documents than she prepared to profit by her good fortune.

* Claude de Lorraine, Prince de Joinville, was the fourth son of Henry, Duke de Guise, surnamed the Balafré, brother of Charles, Duke de Mayeune, and of Louis, Cardinal de Guise. He married Marie de Rohan, Duke de Monthazon, and peer of France, was subsequently known as Duke Chevreuse. He died 1657.

Henriette d'Entragues — really loved — Prince—if indeed so vensil and vicious a woman can be supposed capable of loving anything — herself—and thus — which — to Madame de Villars, many of them having been written immediately after their separation, were filled with regrets — absence, professions of unalterable affection, and disrespectful expressions concerning the King and Queen; — latter of whom was ridiculed — slandered without pity. It — easy to imagine the triumphant joy of the duchess. — held her enemy at her mercy, and — had no inclination to be merciful. She read and re-read the precious letters; and finally, after deep reflection, her plans — matured.

The Princess de Conti was her personal friend, was, moreover, attached to household of the Queen, whom Madame de Villars, from circumstances which require no comment, had hitherto been comparatively atranger. Marie de Medicis, who had experienced little sympathy from the great ladies of the court, having thrown herself principally upon her Italian followers for society, had in consequence been cold and distant in her deportment to the French members of her circle; who, their side, trammelled by the rigorous propriety of her conduct, quite satisfied to partially looked, in order that their own less scrupulous bearing might munnoticed by so rigid a censor; and thus, when, upon request of Madame Villars be introduced to the more intimate acquaintance of the Queen, in Princess succeeded in obtaining for her the privilege of the petites entrées (unaware powerful passport favour which she possessed), in found it difficult to for the eagerness with which the ordinarily unapproachable in greeted the appearance, and courted the society of the duchess; nor did she for an instant dream that by facilitating the intercourse between them, she undermining fortunes of a brother whom she loved.

...

It appears extraordinary that of I the ladies about the Queen, Madame de Villars should have selected the sister of the Prince de Joinville to enable her to effect her purpose; but let her have acted from whatever motive she might, it is certain that day by day her favour became more marked; and the circumstance which most excited the surprise of Madame de Conti, was the fact that her protégée and often closeted with the Queen when, for reasons sufficiently obvious, herself and Leonora Galigai excluded. In encouraging the vengeance of her me friend, Marie well was that she was committing an imprudence from which the man long-sighted Florentine would have dissuaded her; and thus, with impetuosity which was destined through life be her scourge, resolved only to consult her own feelings. The of discovery was consequently divulged her favourite; and as her cheek burned, and her flashed, while lingering over the insults to which had subjected by unscrupulous and of the monarch, she urged Madame de Villars to lose no time in communicating the contents of the obnoxious letters to her sovereign.

The undertaking was as well as dangerous; and in the case of the duchess it required more than usual tact caution. She had not only to the risk of arousing the anger of Henry by accusing the woman whom he loved, but also to combat his wounded vanity when he should me his somewhat mature passion made a subject of ridicule, and, at the time, to conceal her own motive for the treachery of which she guilty. This threefold trial, daring as she was, the duchess feared to hazard. In communicating the fatal letters to the Queen, she had calculated that the indignation and jealousy of the Italian princess would instigate her to take instant possession of formidable a weapon against her most dangerous enemy, and to work out her own vengeance; but Marie had learnt prudence from past experience, and she was anxious to conceal her own agency in the cabal until she could avow it with a certainty of triumph. Perceiving the reluctance of Madame de Villars to take the initiative, she hastened to explain to her the suspicion which would naturally be engendered in the mind of the King, should he imagine that the affair had been preconcerted to satisfy her private animosity; and moreover suggested is the duchess should, in interview with monarch, carefully avoid the mention of her name. Encouragement and entreaties this caution; while a few rich presents sufficed to convince her auditor—and ultimately, Madame de Villars (who had too long waited patiently for such an opportunity of revenge to ahrink from her purpose when it was secured to her), having gained the favour and confidence of the Queen at the expense of her rival, resolved to terminate her task.

The pretext of urgent business easily procured for her a private interview with the King, for a name of d'Estrées still acted like a spell upon the mind and heart of Henry, and the duchess was a consummate tactician. Notice was given to her of the day on which the sovereign would visit St. Denis; and as she presented herself in the chapel where he had just concluded his devotions, Henry made a sign for his attendant nobles to withdraw, when the duchess found herself in a position to explain her exrand, and to assure him that she had only been induced to make the present disclosure from her affection for his person, and the gratitude which she owed to him for many benefits that she had experienced from condescension. Having briefly dwelt on the contents of the letters which she delivered into his keeping, she did not even seek an excuse for the means by which they had come into her own possession, but concluded by observing: "I could not reconcile it to my conscience, Sire, to conceal so great an outrage; I should have felt like a criminal myself, had I been capable of suffering in silence such treason against the greatest king, the master, gallant gentleman on earth."*

158

Henry was not proof against this compliment. It believed himself to be all that the duchess had asserted, but he liked to hear his own opinion confirmed by the lips of others; and, although smarting under the mortification of wounded vanity occasioned by the unitary of the letters of his perfidious mistress, he are all complacently upon Madame de Villars, thanking her for her zeal and attachment to his person, and assuring her that both were fully appreciated.

She had no sooner retired than, as the Queen had previously done, he repeatedly read over each letter in turn until his patience gave way under the task; when hastily summoning the Duke de Lude, he desired him to forthwith proceed to the apartments of the marquise, and to inform her in his name that "she was a perfidicus woman, a monster, and the most wicked of her sex; and that he was resolved never to see her again."

At this period Madame de Verneuil — quitted the palace, and was residing in an hôtel in the city, which had been presented to her by the King: a fortunate circumstance for the envoy, who required time and consideration to enable him to execute his onerous mission in manner — might not — to — subsequent discomfiture; but on the delivery of the royal message, which even the courtly de Lude could not divest of its offensive character, Madame de Verneuil (who was well that the King, however he might yield to his momentary anger, — even less able to dispense with her society than she herself was to lose the favour which alone preserved her from the ignominy her conduct had justly merited), did not for — instant lose her self-possession. "Tell his Majesty," she replied, as calmly as though — sense of innocence had given her strength — "that being perfectly assured that I have never been guilty of word or deed which could justly incur his anger, I cannot imagine what can have induced him to treat me with so little consideration. That some one has traduced me, I cannot doubt; but I shall be revenged by a discovery of the truth."

* Amours & Grand Alcandre, pp. 272, III.

† Dreux Radier, vol. vi, p. 85. Saint-Edme, p. 218.

then rose from her seat, and retired to her private-room, much more alarmed and agitated she was willing to betray. De Lude had, during the interview, suffered a few remarks to escape him from which she was enabled to guess whence blow had come; and conscious of the enormity of her imprudence, she lost no time in confiding to her most confidential friends the difficulty of her position, and entreating them to discover some method by which she might escape its consequences.

been previously arranged between them, Madame de Villars, at her audience of the King, had carefully abstained from betraying the share which the

Amours du Grand Alcandre, a 1111

Queen had taken in the intrigue, and had assumed herself the very equivocal honour of the whole proceeding; and it was, consequently, against the duchess alone that the anger of the favourite was excited. Even the Prince de Joinville was forgiven, when with protestations of repentance, he threw himself in the fact of the marquise, and implored her pardon;—he could scarcely fail to be understood by such a woman, when he pleaded the extremes to which passion and disappointment could urge an ardent nature—while the Duke de Bellegarde no informed by the Princess in Continual the fortune, and perhaps even the life, of her brother were involved in the affair, than he devoted himself her cause.

We have already stated that the time was not one of unnecessary scruple, and the peril of the marquise imminent. The letters not only existed, but were in the hands of the King: no honest or simple remedy could be suggested for such a disaster; and thus, as it was imperative to clear Madame de Verneuil from blame in order save the Prince, was ultimately determined to deny authenticity of the documents, and attribute forgery to a secretary of the Duke de Guise, who was celebrated for his aptitude in imitating every species of handwriting. The attempt was hazardous; infatuation of Henry for the fascinating favourite was so well known, that the conspirators were assured of the engerness with which he would welcome any explanation, however doubtful; and they, accordingly, instructed marquise boldly to disavow the authorahip of the obnoxious packet. The advice was, unfortunately, somewhat tardy 1 as, in her first terror, Madame de Verneuil had declared her inability to deny that she had written the letters which had aroused the anger of the King; but she modified the admission, by declaring that her hand had betrayed her heart, and she had never felt what, in a moment of pique and annoyance, she had permitted herself to express. These were, however, mere words; and she had no sooner become cognizant of the expedients suggested by her advisers, than she resolved to gainsay them; and, accordingly, without a moment's heaitstion, she dispatched a message moment to entreat that he would allow her to justify

TERM IN

For a few days, Henry remained inexorable, but length his passion triumphed over his pride; and, instead of summoning the marquise to his presence as criminal, he proceeded to her residence; listened blindly to her explanations; became, or feigned to become, convinced by her arguments; and, ultimately, confessing himself to have been sufficiently credulous to be the culprit rather than the judge, he made a peace with his exulting mistress which was comented by a donation of six thousand livres.

As is usual in such cases, all the blame was now visited upon her Madame de Villars was, a exiled from the court—a her almost as terrible as that of death, wedded as she was to a pourtlife, and by unexpected result, separated from the Prince de Joinville, whose pardon she hoped to secure by her apparent zeal for the honour of the monarch. The Prince himself was directed to proceed forthwith to Hungary to serve against the Turks; and the unfortunate secretary, who had been an unconscious instrument in the hands of the able conspirators, whom it necessary to consider guilty of a crime perfectly profitless himself whatever might be a result, was committed to a prison; there to moralise at his leisure upon the vices of the great.

No mortification could, however, equal that of the Queen; who, having felt assured of the ruin of her rival, had incautiously betrayed her exultation in a manner better suited to a jealous wife than to an indignant sovereign; and who, when she became apprised of the reconciliation of the King with his wily mistress, expressed herself with so much warmth upon his wilful blindness, that a fortnight elapsed before they met again.

Nothing could be man ill-judged upon the part of Marie than this violence, as by estranging the King from herself she gave ample opportunity to the marquise her empire over his mind. It nevertheless appears certain that although he resented the sarcasms of the Queen, he was less the dupe of Madame de Verneuil than those about him imagined; he fascinated, but not convinced; and is probable had de Medicis at moment sufficiently controled her feelings to remain neuter, she might, for a time least, have retained her husband within spell of her attractions. Such, however, was not the case; and between his suspicion of being deceived by his mistress, mil his irritation m being openly taunted by wife, the King, who shrank with morbid terror from domestic discomfort, instead of finding repose in the privacy of his own hearth, even while he was anxious to shake off the trummels by which he had been long fettered, and to abandon liaison which ceased to inspire him with confidence, only sought to escape by transferring his somewhat exhausted affections to some object. The struggle was, however, a formidable one; for although the marquise had forfeited his good opinion, she im not lost her powers of fascination; and she - well knew how to - them, that, despite his better reason, the sensual monarch still remained her slave.

Thus his life became at this period am of perpetual worry and annoyance. Marie, irritated by what she justly considered as a culpable weakness and want of dignity on the part of her royal consort, persisted in exhibiting her resentment, and in loading the favourite with every mark of contempt and obloquy; while he de Verneuil, in her turn, renewed her assertions of the illegality of the Queen's marriage, and the quent illegitimacy of the Dauphin. The second of such a feud may be readily imagined: the court soon became the great and and who frequented the circle of marquise forbidden and another; apartments. One intrigue succeeded another; while Marie, with jealous vengeance, endeavoured fortunes of those who attached themselves the party of Madame de Verneuil, the marquise on untried injure the partisans of the Queen. This last rupture an irrevocable one.*

In vain all Sully endeavour to restore peace. Ille could control the finances, and regulate the defences of a great nation; but he was as powerless as the King himself when he sought to fuse such jarring elements these in the social crucible; while he was striving against hope to weaken, even if he could not wholly destroy, an animosity which endangered the dignity of the crown, and the respect due to the most powerful monarchs of Christendom, that monarch himself, wearied of a strife which he and not the moral courage either terminate to sustain, sought consolation for his trial in the smiles of Mademoiselle de Sourdis, whose favour he purchased by giving her in marriage to

Amoure du Grand Alcandre, p. 276.

† Mademoiselle de Sourdis was the daughter of François d'Escoubleau, Seigneur Jony, de Lauray, Marquis &c., and of Imbelle Babon, dame d'Alluie, daughter of Babon, Seigneur de la Bourdsisière, sunt of He was deprived of the government of Chartres by the League; but was restored by Henry III., at the entreaty of Gabrielle.

Count d'Estanges. caprice, engendered rather by ennui affection, however, soon terminated, as new favourite could not, either personally mentally, sustain comparison with de Verneuil; and great coldness still existed between the royal couple when the court removed a Blois.

During sojourn of their Majesties in city, a misunderstanding infinitely more serious than any by which it will been preceded took place between them; length became threatening, that although in night was far advanced, the King dispatched d'Armagnac, first valet-de-chambre, to desire the immediate presence of M. de Sully at the castle. Singularly enough, the duke in Memoirs most morbid reluctance to allude to this outbreak, and professes his determination, in accordance with promise to that effect made to both parties, not to reveal the subject of dispute; while the same time he admits that, after a long interview with Henry, he spent the remainder of might in passing from the chamber the other, endeavouring to restore harmony between the royal pair; during which attempt many of the attendants of the court were enabled intervals to hear all parties mention the names of the Duke Duchess of Florence, the Duchess of Mantua, Virgilio Ursino, Don Juan Medicis, William III Bellegarde, Joanini, Concini, Leonora, Gondy, Caterina Selvaggio,* Gondy, and more frequently still, of de Verneuil;* a circumstance which was quite sufficient to dispel all mystery, as it at once became evident to mentally combined these significant that the royal quarrel was a recriminatory one; that while the Queen was indulging in invectives against the marquise, and her champion M. le Grand, the King retorted by reproaching her with the insolence of her favourites, and her own weak submission to their thrall.

Caterina Selvaggio was one Queen's favourite Italian waiting-women.

Capefigue, in his history, has shown less desire than Sully envelop this royal quarrel in mystery; and plainly asserts, although without quoting his authority for such a declaration, that mutual reprosches had passed between Henry and his wife, the Queen became enraged that she for of bed, and throwing herself upon the monarch, severely scratched him in the face; a violence which he immediately repaid with interest, and which induced him to summon the minister to the palace, whose care was to prevail upon the King to retire to another apartment.

Marie, exasperated by the persevering infidelity of her husband, considered herself, with arms reason, as aggrieved party; she had given a Dauphin to France; her fair fame was untainted; and are persisted in

* Sully, Mém., vol. iv, pp. 93, 94.

† Rambure, MS. Méss., vol. i, p. 332.

<sup>1</sup> Capefigue, Hist. de la Réforme, de la Ligue, et du Règne de Henri IV, vol. viii, par 147, par 1

Henry, on his part, was equally unyielding; it was, as have already shown, several hours before the bewildered minister of finance could succeed in restoring a semblance of peace. To every argument which advanced the Queen replied by enumerating libertine adventures of her husband, (with the whole of which she proved herself to be unhappily only familiar,) and by declaring that she would and day ample vengeance his mistresses; strong in the conviction that to whatever acts of violence she might be induced by the insults heaped upon her, no rightly thinking person would be found to condemn just revenge.*

This declaration, let Sully modify it as he might, could but aggravate the anger of the King; and, accordingly, he replied by threat of banishing his wife to one of his distant palaces, and must of sending her back Florence, with the whole of her foreign attendants.

From this project, if he really seem seriously entertained it, Henry was, however, at once dissuaded by minister; who, blinded by passion than himself, instantly recognised its enormity when proportioned the offence which it was intended to punish; and sequently did must to represent odium which unjust must call down upon there is, however, no doubt that Marie de Medicis, from the strict propriety of her conduct to the last, under every provocation, would ultimately have become an attached and devoted wife. Her ambition satisfied, and her heart interested in her maternal duties; but the open and unblushing licentiousness with which Henry pursued his numerous and frequently ignoble intrigues, tended throw her completely into the power of the ambitious Italians by whom was surrounded; whom the Concini, a woman of firm mind, engaging strong national prejudices; who, in following fortunes of her foster-sister, deceived herself into the belief that they would be almost cloud; and it is therefore probable that disappointment in this expectation, which, moreover, involved her personal interests, bitter in her judgment of the débonnaire monarch who showed the débonnaire de la attractions of her idolised mistress.

Histoire de la Mère et du Fils, a continuation of the "Memoire Michelieu," incorrectly Mezerny, vol. i, p. 7.

.

* Sully, Note to Memoirs, vol. iv, 195, 18

† Richelieu, La Mère et la Fils, vol. i, p. 7.

The subsequent ingratitude of Marie, indeed, only tends to increase the admiration of a dispassionate critic for an ill-requited Leonora; as whom, a would appear, and a close analysis of her character, that ample justice has a yet been done; for ambitious as she was, it is certain that this unfortunate woman are sought the welfare of the Queen, to whom she cwed her advancement in life, even when the about-sighted selfishness of her husband would have induced him to sacrifice all other considerations in his own insatiable thirst for power.

Unfortunately, however, the very excess of her affection rendered her a dangerous adviser the indignant and neglected Princess, from whose private circle Henry period almost wholly absented

Nor domestic anxieties only ones against which the French king had to contend at this particular crisis; for while the court circle had been absorbed in feasting and festivity, the seeds of civil sown by a few of the still discontented nobles, began to germinate; and Henry constantly received intelligence in provinces. On shores of the Loire and the Garonne the symptoms had already ceased to be problematical; while to Rochelle and Limoges the inhabitants had the government officers who sought to levy obnexious tax.

ministers, that these hostile demonstrations were encouraged, if not suggested, by the suggested agents of Philip III. of Spain, and the Duke of Savoy, who had been busily engaged such time previously in dissuading and Grisons from renewing the alliance which they had formed with Henry III., and which became void his death. This attempt was, however, frustrated by offer made them by Sillery of million in gold, payment of the debts still due to them from the French government for their past services; which sum reached them through the hands of the Duke de Biron, to whom, as well as to memory of his father, the old marshal, many of Switzers are strongly personally attached.

Day by day, also, the King had still most beyond a doubt that the Duke de Bouillon, the head of the Huguenot party, who were increased against Henry for having deserted their faith, was secretly engaged in a treaty with Spain, Savoy, and England; a circumstance doubly dangerous from the Protestants still places in Guienne, Languedoc, and other provinces, which would necessarily, should the negociation prove successful, be delivered into hands.

In can no doubt, moreover, that monarch keenly ingratitude of noble, whom he had himself raised to independent sovereignty of the duchy whence derived title; but his mortification was increased upon ascertaining that the Maréchal de Biron, who had been one of his friends, and in whose good-faith and loyalty lever placed implicit trust, also numbered among enemies, endeavouring to own personal advancement by betraying his master.

No two men could probably have been selected throughout the whole nation more fitted endanger the stability of the royal authority. Both marshals of France, and alike celebrated for their talent as military leaders, well for their insatiable ambition. Of the two, perhaps, however, the Duke de Bouillon likely to prove the most formidable enemy to sovereign; from the fact of his being by far the more able and the more subtle politician; and, moreover, gifted with a caution in judgment which more entirely wanting in impetuous and reckless Biron.

Bouillon, who possessed great influence in counsels of the Huguenots, was supported by the Duke la Tremouille,* co-religionist, another leader * Claude, Seigneur de la Tremouille, second Duke de Thouars, peer of France, Prince de Talmond, was born in the year 1566, and first bore arms under François de Bourhon, Duke de Montpensier. He embraced the reference religion.

formed party; and secretly also by the Duke d'Epernon,* fortunes having greatly deteriorated since the death of Henry III., considered himself harshly treated, fortunes of Henry of Navarre, subsequently King of France, whom he followed to the sieges of Roman and Poitiers, and the battle of Fontaine-Prançaise; after which the King conferred upon him the rank of peer of France. He was the brother-in-law of the Itam ide and the He died in the castle of Thouars, to which he had ratired, suspected of treason, after refusing to return to court to justify himself, on the 25th of October, 1604, in his thirty-eighth year.

Jean Louis de Nogaret de la Valette, Duke d'Epernon, was the younger son of an old Gascon family, who cought his fortunes at the French court under the name of Caumont. After the death of Charles IX., he offered his services to Henry of Navarra. subsequently Henry IV.; but was ultimately admitted to the intimacy of Henry III., who caused him to be instructed in politics and literature, and made him one of his mignons. He was next created Duke d'Epernon, first peer, and admiral of France, colonel-general of infantry, | | everal governments. On the death of Henry III., this ennobled adventurer once more became a partisan of his successor, and commanded the royal forces during the war in Savoy; but throughout the whole of this reign he lived in constant misunderstanding with the court and the King, and was even suspected of the act of regicide which deprived France of her idolised monarch. I was the Duke d'Epernon who, immediately after that event, convoked the Parliament, caused the recognition of Marie - Medicis as Regent, and formed a privy council over which he presided. Banished by the Concini during their period of power, he reappeared a court after their fall; but Richelien would not permit him to hold any government office, and, moreover, deprived him of all his governments save that of Guienze. He died in and was ready join every cabal which was formed against although he always avoided any open demonstration of hostility which might compromise his personal safety.

A third individual pointed out to the King as one of his active enemies — Charles de Valois, Count d'Auvergne, the step-brother of Manier & Verneuil; whom, not only in consideration of his royal blood, but also as the relative of the marquise, Henry had ever shown a favour which he little merited. Such despise, for he well knew the count to be more dangerous as a friend than as an enemy; his cowardly dread of danger constantly impelling him to betray others in order to save himself at the merest prospect of peril; while his cunning, his gratuitous and unmanly cruelty, and the unblushing perfidy which recalled only with much vividness the character of his father, Charles IX., rendered him once unsafe and unpleasant as an associate. Despite all these drawbacks, Biron with his usual recklessness had nevertheless accepted him m partner in meditated revolt, d'Auvergne having declared that he would run all risks in order to revenge dishonour brought upon his family by the King; in reality only seeking to himself in a struggle where he had little to lose, and might, as he believed, become a gainer.

The madness of the Duke de Biron in betraying the interests of a sovereign who had constantly him honour distinction, can only solution in his over-weaning vanity, as he was already wealthy. powerful and popular; and had, moreover, acquired the reputation of being one of in first soldiers in France. had been appointed admiral, and subsequently marshel: and had even been intrusted with the command of the King's armies at the siege of Amiens, where he bore the title of marshal-general, although several princes of the blood, and the connétable himself were present. He was decorated with all the Royal Orders: was a duke and peer of the realm, and Governor of Bordeaux; and, in fine, every attainable dignity had been lavished upon him; while he yielded precedence only to royalty, and to the Duke de Montmorency, to whose office it was vain to aspire during his lifetime.*

Such was the Maréchal de Biron, when, in the vainglorious hope of and day becoming the sovereign of certain of the French provinces, he voluntarily trampled under foot every obligation of loyalty and gratitude, and leagued himself with an enemies of his royal master, to wreat from him the sceptre which he so firmly wielded. The first intelligence of the duke's defection which reached the monarch—to whom, however his conduct had long appeared problematical—he through the treachery of the maréchal's most trusted agent; a man whom Biron had constantly employed in all his intrigues, and from whom he had no secrets. individual, who, from cartain circumstances, reason to believe that the plans of the duke must ultimately fail from their very immensity, and who feared for his own safety in the event of his patron's diagrace, resolved save himself by communicating the whole conspiracy to the King; for which purpose he solicited audience. declaring that he had important matters to reveal, which involved not only the throne of the sovereign, but even his life; and he so confidently insisted upon this fact, that an interview was at length accorded to him Fontainebleau; where in the presence of Henry and the Duke de Sully, he confessed that conceiving himself to have been ill-used by the court, he had from mortified vanity adopted the interests of M. de Biron, and participated in the conspiracy of which he was now anxious to anticipate the effects; and from which he had instantly retired when he discovered involved the lives of his Majesty and Dauphin.

Daniel, voi. vii, p. 408.

He then solemnly asserted that when the marechal Biron proceeded to Flanders to receive the oath of peace from the Archduke Albert, the Spaniards, who once detected the extent of his vanity and ambition, had flattered his weakness, and encouraged his hopes; they had ultimately dispatched to him an individual named Picoté, who for some crime had been from Orleans, and who was authorized to give him the assurance that it only depended upon the duke himself to secure brilliant position through their agency should he see fit become their ally. The maréchal, his associate went on to say, listened greedily to the proposition; and expressed his willingness to treat with Spain whenever it might be deemed expedient to confide to him the real meaning of the message; reply which the Spaniards with proper caution, they should find no difficult undertaking to make him entirely to their interests; or, failing in this attempt, to rid themselves of a dangerous adversary by rendering him the victim of his own treason.

Elated by the brilliant prospect which thus opened upon him, Biron gradually became energetic in the service of his legitimate master; and after the peace of Vervin, finding his influence necessarily diminished, he began to murmur, affecting to believe that the services which he had rendered to the sovereign had not been duly recognised; and it was at this period, according to his betrayer, their acquaintance had commenced, which so rapidly ripened into friendship that ere long he became the depository of his patron's most cherished secrets.

many and anxious consultations, principally caused by the uncertainty of the duke as to the nature of the honours which were to be conferred upon him, it had been at length resolved between the conspirators that they should dispatch a priest to the Duke of Savoy, mank of Citeaux to Milan, and Picoté himself to Spain, to treat with the several princes in the name of the maréchal; and what was even more essential to monarch to ascertain, was the fact that a short time subsequently, and before he visited Paris, the Duke of Savoy entered into a man negotiation with Biron, and even led him to believe that he would bestow upon him the band of one of his daughters; by which marriage maréchal would have become the cousin of the Emperor of Germany, and the nephew of the King of Spain; an alliance which, to so ambitious a spirit, opened up an opportunity of self-aggrandizement never to be realized in his own country, and under his own sovereign.

In return for this concession, Biron had pledged himself to his wily ally that he would provide so much occupation for Henry in the interior of his kingdom, that he should have no leisure to attempt the invasion of the marquisate of Saluzzo; a pledge which more than any other gratified M. de Savoie, who lived in constant dread of being driven from his territories. During the war, the maréchal nevertheless took several of the duke's fortresses in Brescia; but a perfect understanding been established between them which rendered IIII circumstance comparatively unimportant; and on the refusal of Henry to permit the appointment of a governor of his own selection = the of Bourg, Biron became incensed by what he designated as the ingratitude of his sovereignthough was fully aware who by countenancing such an arrangement, the King must necessarily leave the fortress entirely in his power—that he no longer restrained himself, but declared that the death of the French sovereign was essential to the accomplishment of his projects; and meanwhile he gave the Duke of Savoy, whom he thenceforward regarded as his firmest friend, constant information of the state and movements of the hostile army.

A short time afterwards, it was definitely arranged between the conspirators that the Duke of Savoy should give his third daughter in matriage to the maréchal, with a dowry of five hundred thousand golden crowns, while the Spanish monarch should cede to him all his claims of sovereignty upon the duchy of Burgundy; and that the Count of Fuentes* and the Duke of Savoy and march their combined forces into France, thus disabling Henry from pursuing his design of reconquering the long-coveted duchy.

This treasonable design, owing circumstances upon which the impetuous Biron had failed to calculate, proved, however, abortive; and had an sconer convinced himself of the fact, and comprehended the perilous position in which he had been placed by his imprudence, than he hastened to Lyons where the King was then sojourning; and having obtained an audience, he confessed with a seeming frankness irresistible to so generous and unsuspicious a nature as that of Henry, that had been sufficiently misled by his ambition secretly to demand from the Duke of Savoy the hand of his younger daughter; and that, moreover, in the excess of his mortification at the refusal of his Majesty to appoint a governor of his own selection m Bourg, he had even been induced to plot against the state; for both which crimes he humbly solicited the royal pardon.

Pietro Henriques Azevedo, Count de Fuentes.

Full well did Henry and his minister remember this occurrence; nor could the King forget that although he had urged the maréchal to reveal to him the whole extent of the intrigue, we had dextrously evaded his most searching inquiries, and constantly recurred to his contrition. Henry owed much to Biron, whom he had long loved; and with a magnanimity worthy of his noble nature, after a few expostulations and reproaches, he not only pardoned him for what he believed to have been a mere temporary abandonment of his duties, but even assured him of his future favour, and bade him return in all surety to his post.

Unhappily, however, the demon of ambition by which duke mee possessed proved too powerful for the generous elemency of the King; and he resumed his treasonable practices; but a misunderstanding having ensued between himself and the false friend by whom he was now betrayed, all the private documents which had been exchanged by himself and the foreign princes through whose aid he trusted to obtain the honours of sovereignty, were communicated on this occasion to the monarch whose dignity and whose confidence he had alike outraged.

A pardon was to the traiter through extent of the intrigue, on condition that he should reside within a precints of the court, and the should reside within a precint of the court, and the which a perfidious confident readily consented a with a tact worthy of his falsehood, he soon succeeded in reinstating himself in the good graces of the duke, by professing and the correctly engaged in France in furthering his interests, and by giving him reason to believe and he mustill devoted in the same still devoted in the same

To this deception, and to his own obstinacy, Biron owed his fate.*

The threatening facts which had thus been revealed to them, were communicated by Henry and im minister to certain members of the privy council, by whom report was drawn up, and placed in the hands of the Chancellor; and, this preliminary arrangement completed, it was determined to recal the maréchal to court either to justify himself, or to undergo the penalty of his treason. In order to effect this object, however, it was necessary exercise the greatest caution, as Biron was then in Burgundy; and his alarm having already been excited by the evasion of his most confidential agent, they he might, should his suspicions be increased, place himself at the head of the troops under his command, by whom he was idolized, and thus become doubly dangerous. It was, consequently, only by a subterfuge in there was any prospect of inducing him m approach the capital; and the King, by the advice of Sully, and without a latent hope that he might be enabled to clear himself of blame, openly asserted that he put no faith in the disclosures which had been made to him, and that would advise the maréchal to be careful of those about him, whose envy or enmity led them to put a misconstruction upon his motives as well as upon his actions. The Luz,* the confidential friend Biron, for whose ear these declarations were especially designed, did not fail to communicate them on the instant to the accused party; while Ls Fin,† by whom had been

* Montfaucon, vol. v, pp. 405-407.

Edme Malain, Baron de Lux, Lieutenant-Governor of Burgundy, was the son of Joachim de Malain and Marguerite d'Bpinac. He and deeply involved in the conspiracy of the Maréchal de Biron, and would infallibly have periahed with him, had he not been induced by the President Jeannin to reveal all that he knew of the plot to Henry IV., on condition of a free pardon. He survived his treachery for ten years, and in 1613 was killed in a duel by the Chevalier de Guise. His son, Claude de Malain, having sworn to avenge his death, in his turn challenged M. de Guise, at whose hands he met with the same fate as his father.

† Jacques de Lanode, Sienr de la Fin, was a petty Burgundian nobleman, whose spirit of intrigue was perpetually involving those to whom he attached himself in cabals and factions. He had been actively engaged at one time in the affairs of the Duke d'Alençon; and at another he was no less busily engaged in instigating Henry III. to aggressive measures against the Duke de Guise. Since that period he had negociated with the ministers of Spain and Savoy; and by these means he had contracted a great intimacy with the Duke de Biron, to whom he affected to be distantly related, and over whom he acquired such extraordinary betrayed, likewise wrote to assure him that in revealing conspiracy to the King and the ministers he had been cautious not to utter a word by which he could be personally implicated. It certain, however, duke placed little reliance either upon the assertions of Henry, or the assurances of his treacherous ally; as on the receipt of a letter from the sovereign, announcing his own instant departure for Poitou, where he invited Biron to join him, in order that he might afford him his advice himself; alleging, as a pretext for his disobedience to the royal command, the rumour of a reported aggression of Spaniards, and the necessity of his presence a meeting of the states of Burgundy which had been convoked for the 22nd of May, where it would be essential that he should watch over the interests of his Majesty.*

The King did not further insist at that moment; but having ascertained as his return from Poitou been made in Burgundy, in Saintonge, in Perigord, and in Guienne, which threatened to prove inimical his authority, and that couriers ascendancy by his subtle and unceasing fattery, that the weak marshal became a mere puppet in his hands; and marshal by his vanity, suffered himself to be personded that his merit had been overlooked, and his services comparatively unrewarded; and that he was consequently fully authorized in aspiring even to regal honours, and in using every exertion to attain them.

Matthieu, Histoire des Derniers Troubles arrivez en France, Book 11, p. 411.

.

stantly passing from one of these provinces to the other | he sent to desire presence of the Sieur Descures.* an intimate friend and follower of the maréchal, whom he commanded to proceed with all speed to Burgundy, and to inform his lord that if he did not forthwith obey the royal summons, the sovereign would go in person to bring him thence. This threat was sufficiently appalling; and the rather as Sully, by his authority m grandmaster of artillery, had taken the precaution on pretext of recasting the cannon, and improving the quality of powder in the principal cities of Burgundy, cripple Biron's resources, and to render it impossible him attempt rational resistance the royal will. The maréchal soon perceived that he had been duped, but, nevertheless, he would not yield; and Descures left him, firm in his determination | | himself within the precincts of the court.

The King, who, from his old attachment to Biron, had hitherto hoped that he had been calumniated, and that, in lieu of crimes, he had only been guilty of follies, offended by so resolute an opposition to his will, began, like his ministers, to apprehend that he must in truth thenceforward number the duke among his enemies; and he consequently suffered himself, shortly after the return of his last messenger, to be persuaded to dispatch resident Jeanning as the heaver of a third summons to the marechal, and to represent to him how greatly he was increasing the displeasure of the sovereign by his.

* Pierre Fougeuse, Sieur Descures.

† Pierre Jeannin was the architect of his own fortunes. In was born at Autum, in 1540, where his father followed the trade

of a tanner, and was universally respected, alike for his probity sound judgment. The future president, after receiving the of education in his native town, was removed to Bourges, where he became a punil of the celebrated Cujas. In 1569, he man entered as an advocate in Parliament of Burgundy, where he greatly distinguished himself during the space of two years, at the expiration of which time is was appointed provincial advocate, and member of the Burgundian states; and in this capacity he justified, by his extraordinary talents, the choice of his fellow-citizens. On one occasion a wealthy individual, enchanted by his eloquence, waited upon him at his house, and expressed a desire to have a a con-in-law; inquiring, however, in the same time, the amount of his property. Jeannin, by no means disconcerted the abruptness of his visitor, pointed with a smile first to his head and then to his books; "You see it before you;" I said with honest pride; "I have not, I require, a greater fortune." Tradition is silent as regards the termination of the interview. In the following year (1576), Jeannin was present at all council which was held during the frightful massacre of St. Burtholomew, where he secured the friendship of the Count de Charny, at that period grand equerry of France, lieutenant-general of Burgundy, and provisional governor of the province during the absence of the Duke d'Aumale, Governor Paris; and in the same year he deputed from the tiers-état of Burgundy to the States-General, convoked at Blois by Henry III. It was on that the began to comprehend the designs of the Guises, and made the celebrated speech in favour of religious toleration, which does so much his memory. By Henry III. a successively appointed governor of chancelry of Burgundy, counsellor of provincial Parliament, and subsequently president.—Petitot.

disobedience, as well as strengthening the suspicions which were already entertained against him. Finally, the president was instructed to assure the haughty and imperious rebel that the King had not forgotten the good service which he had rendered to the nation; and that he ascribed the accusations which had reached him rather to the exaggerations of those who in making such reports sought to increase their own favour at court, than to any breach of trust in the maréchal himself.*

100

Somewhat reassured by these declarations, and unconscious of the extent of La Fin's treachery, Biron allowed himself to be persuaded by the eloquence of Jeannin, and reluctantly left Dijon for Fontainebleau, where he arrived on the 18th of June. As he was about to dismount, La Fin approached to welcome him; and while holding his stirrup whispered in his ear: "Courage, my master; speak out boldly, for they know nothing." The duke silently nodded his reply, and at once proceeded to the royal chamber, where Henry received him with a gay countenance and open arms; declaring that in had done well to accept his invitation, or he should assuredly have gone to fetch him in person as he had threatened. Biron excused himself, but with a coldness extremely displeasing to the King, who, however, forebore to exhibit any symptom of annoyance; in which no further allusion was made — position of — maréchal, Henry, as he had often previously done, proposed to show him the progress of the new buildings upon which he was then actively engaged; and, leading the — to the gardens, he did in fact for a time point out to him every object of interest. This done, he suddenly turned the discourse upon the numerous reasons for displeasure which the recent acts of Biron had given him (being careful, nevertheless, not to betray the extent of his knowledge); and earnestly urged him to confess the real amount of the imprudence of which he had been guilty; pledging his royal word, that should he do so with frankness and sincerity, the avowal would ensure his pardon.

* Daniel, vol. vii, pp. 414, 416. Pécéane, vol. ii, p. des Derniers Troubles, Etc. 11, p. 411.

But the infatuated that had no intention of conceding. The whispered assurance of La Fin still vibrated on his ear; and he also calculated largely on his intimacy with d'Auvergne, which secured to him the influence of Madame de Verneuil. He consequently replied with an arrogance as unbecoming as it was misplaced, that he had not come to court to justify himself, but in order to ascertain who were his accusers; and that having committed no crime, he did not require any pardon; nor could either Henry himself, or the Duke de Sully, with whom he had subsequently a lengthened interview, succeed in inducing him to make the slightest confession.

The mid-day repast was no sooner over than the

King sent to summon the maréchal to his closet, where he once more exerted every effort to soften the obduracy of the man to whose valour he was well aware that he had been greatly indebted for his crown, and whom he was consequently anxious to save from dishonour and ignominy | but, unfortunately for his own interests, Biron retained as vivid a recollection of the fact as Henry himself; and so highly estimated the value of his services. that he resolved to maintain the haughty position which III had assumed, IIII to persist in a denial that was fated to cost him his life. Instead, therefore, of throwing himself upon the elemency of the King by an undisguised avowal of his treason, he merely replied to the appeal by again demanding to know who were his accusers; upon which Henry rose from sest, and exclaiming: "Come, we will play a match at tennis-" hastily left the room, followed by the culprit.

The King having selected the Count de Soissons* as his

* Charles de Bourbon-Conti, Count de Soissons, espoused the cause of the King of Navarre, whom he accompanied to the battle of Coutras, in 1587. Henry promised to him the hand of his sister, Catherine de Navarre, to whom he presented him immediately afterwards, when a reciprocal affection was the result. M. de Soissons, however, abandaned the reformed party, and did not return to it until after the similar Henry III. He served actively and scalously during the League; but having discovered that the King did not intend to felfil his premise of marrying him to the Princess, he quitted him during the siege of Rouen, in 1592, on the pretext of illness, and hastened to Bearn, hoping to induce Catherine to become his wife before the King could inter-second, sgainst the Duke d'Eperson and the maréchal, this ill-assorted party continued for some time apparently absorbed in the game; and so thoroughly did it recal past scenes and times to the mind of the monarch, that he resolved, before he abandoned in once faithful subject in his fate, to make one last endeavour to overcome in obstinacy. He accordingly authorised M. de Soissons to exert whatever influence he possessed with the rash man who was so blindly working out his own ruin; and represent to him the madness of persisting in a line of conduct which could not fail to irritate and anger his royal master.

"Remember, Monsieur;" will the Prince, who was as anxious as the monarch himself that the scandal of public trial, and the certainty of an ignominious death, should be spared to so brave a soldier: "remember that a sovereign's anger is the messenger of destruction."

Biron, however, persisted in declaring that he had no reason to fear the displeasure of Henry, and had consequently no confession to make; and with this fatal answer the count was fain to content himself.

fere to prevent their union; and by enguging himself to support his brother, the Cardinal de Bourbon, to make himself master of the possessions of the house of Navarre, beyond the Loire. In reaching Bearn, however, he found Henry already there, and was obliged to withdraw without having accomplished either object. A short time subsequently he renewed his friendship with that monarch, and officiated as Duke of Normandy at his coronation, at Chartres, in 1594.

Péréfixe, vol. ii, p. 369.

-

The King rose early on in following morning full anxiety and apprehension. He could not look back upon the many gallant acts of the unfortunate maréchal without feeling a bitter pang at the idea that an old, and formerly zealous servant was about in become a victim to expediency; for the spirit of revolt, which he hitherto endeavoured to suppress by clemency, had now risen hydra-headed, threatening M dispute right of reprisal, and to involve the nation once more in war. He painfully felt, that under circumstances like these, lenity would become, not only a weakness, but a crime; and possessing, as he did, the most indubitable proofs of Biron's guilt, he himself compelled to forget the friend in the sovereign, and to deliver up the attainted noble to the justice of his betrayed country.

A privy council was consequently assembled, which Henry declared his determination to arrest the duke, and to put him upon his trial, if, after mature deliberation, was decided that he deserved death as otherwise he was resolved not to injure his reputation by any accusations which might tarnish his renown, or embitter his existence. To this last relenting he received in reply an assurance that no further deliberation was requisite, as the treason of the maréchal was so fully proved, and the facts so amply authenticated, that he would be condemned to the axe by every tribunal in the world.

On finding that his councillors were unanimous in this opinion, the King summoned MM. de Vitry,* and de Praslin,† and gave them orders to atrest both the Duke de Biron and the Count d'Auvergne; desiring them as as as time to act with a greatest caution, and carefully to avoid all noise and disorder.

When their Majestics had supped, they retired to the private apartments; where, among other courtiers, they were joined by the two conspirators, both of whom were peculiarly obnoxious to the Queen—d'Auvergne from his general character, as well as his relationship to Madame de Verneuil; and Biron from his intimacy with the brother of the favourite, who had renewed her pretended claim to the hand of Henry; a subject which always tortured the heart of Marie, involving, as it did, the legitimacy of her son, and her own honour. It was not, therefore, without a great exertion of self-command that she replied to the ceremonicus compliments of the duke by courteness equally lip-deep; and,

Louis de l'Hôpital de Vitry, chevalier of all the Royal Orders, and captain of the King's body-guard, was descended from the illustrious and ancient family of the Marquises de Sainte-Même and de Montpelier, Counts of Entremons.

† Charles de Choiseanl, Marquia de Praslin, the representative of one of the most illustrious families of France, was a descendant of the sucient counts of Langres. He distinguished himself at the siege of La Fère in 1580, at that of Paris in 1589, and at the battle of Aussale in 1592. Henry IV. made him a captain of his body-guard; and Louis XIII., in 1619, bestowed upon him the battle of marshal of France. He died in 1626, in his sixty-third year.

at the express desire of the King, was induced to accept him as her companion at the card-table. During the progress of the game Burgundian nobleman named Mergé approached the maréchal, and murmured in low voice, as he affected to examine his cards, that he was about to be arrested; but Biron being at that moment deeply engaged by his occupation, did not hear or heed the warning; and he continued to play on in the greatest security until d'Auvergne, to whom Mergé had communicated the ill-success of his own attempt, in turn drew near the royal table, and whispered as he bowed profoundly the Queen, by which means he brought his lips to be level with the duke's ear: "We are not safe here."

Biron did for an instant lose his presence of mind; but without the form of muscle again gathered up his cards, and pursued his game, which was only terminated at midnight by an intimation from the King that it was time for her Majesty to retire. Henry then withdrew in his turn; but before he left the room, he turned towards the maréchal, and said with marked emphasis: "Adieu, Baron de Biron, you know what I have told you."

Mesersy americ, and with greater probability, that Henry's parting words were: "Since you will not speak out, the Henry's (Hist. France, vol. x, p. 201); while Péréfixe gives a third version, asserting that the King took leave of him by saying: "Well then, the truth must be learnt elsewhere; adieu, Baron de Biron."—Hist, de Henri le Grand, vol. ii, p. 371.

As the duke, considerably startled by this dinary address, was about to leave the ante-chamber, Vitry seized in right arm with one hand, with the other laid a firm grasp upon his sword exclaiming: "Monsieur, King oonfided the care of your person to me. Deliver up your sword." A few of the gentlemen of the duke's household who were awaiting him made a show of resistance, but they were instantly seized by the guard, upon which the maréchal demanded an interview with the monarch.

" His Majesty has retired;" replied Vitry. " Give me your sword."

"Ha! my sword;" said Biron with a deep sigh of indignant mortification; "that sword which has rendered him so much good service;" and without further ment or expostulation he placed the weapon in the hands of the captain of the guard, and followed him to the chamber in which he was to pass the night.

The Count d'Auvergne had meanwhile also been arrested in the gate of the palace by M. de Praslin, and conducted to another apartment.

The criminals were no sooner secured than the King dispatched a messenger to Sully to inform him of the fact, and to desire his immediate attendance the palace; and on his arrival, after narrating to him the mode of their capture, he desired him to mount his horse, and to repair without delay the Bastille, in order to prepare apartments for them in the fortress. "I will forward them in boats to the water-gate of the Arsenal," In pursued; "In them land there, but be careful that they are seen by no one; and convey them thence to their lodgings as quietly as possible across your own courts and gardens. So soon as you have arranged everything for their landing, hasten to the Parliament and to the Hôtel-de-Ville; there explain all that has passed, and say that on my arrival in the capital, I will communicate my manual for what I have done, of the justice will be a supparent."

This arrangement was made upon the instant, and on the ____ the prisoners were embarked in separate boats upon the Seine, under a strong escort of the King's body-guard; and on their arrival Bastille they were delivered into the express keeping of the Duke de Sully; while upon subsequent into Paris on the afternoon of the same day, Henry was received with acclamation by the citizens, who of the fruitless made by monarch to induce the marechal to return to his allegiance, and whose joy and of the most enthusiastic description the escape of their beloved sovereign from a foul conspiracy.† The Maréchal de Biron, like all men who have attained to a high station, and whose ambition prompts them to conciliate the good-will of those by whom they are approached, possessed many friends; but the accusation of lèse-majesté under which he laboured, was one of so formidable a nature that they remained totally passive; was only his relatives who ventured to peril their own favour by making an appeal in his their supplications, earnest and humble though they were, failed, however, to shake the resolution of Henry, whose pride had, in this instance, been doubly wounded alike as a monarch and as a man. He could be a monarch and as a man. He are bel, but that the confiding friend, who had been ready upon the highest appearance of regret or repentance, once to forgive, been treated with distrust, and recompensed by falsehood.

10 M

Sully, Mém., vol. iv, pp. 109.

† Daniel, vol. vii, 415—417. Matthieu, Hist. Troubles, IIII II, pp. 413—415. Memmy, vol. pp. Péréfixe, vol. ii, 369—379.

While those closely connected with him were deavouring, by every means in their power, to appease the just indignation of the sovereign, and to intercede in his behalf, Biron himself, as though his past services necessarily suffice to make his impunity, was indulging, even within the formidable walls of the Bastille, in the grossest and most ill-judged vituperations against the King; and boasting of his own exploits, rather like a maniac than a brave and gallant soldier who had led armies into the field, and there done his duty gallantly. He partook sparingly of the food which was presented to him; and instead of taking rest, spent the greater portion of the night in pacing to and fro the narrow spartment. It was evident the had firm faith either in the royal pardon, or in the means of escape being provided for him by his friends; but as day by day went by, and that he received no intelligence from without, while he every individual who entered his chamber was fully armed, and that the knives upon his table were not pointed, in order that he should be unable to convert them into defensive weapons, he became somewhat less violent; and he no escertained that Henry had refused to comply with the petition of his family, he said, with a bitter laugh: "Ha! I that they wish me to take the road to the scaffold." Thenceforward he ceased to demand justice on his accusers, became less imperious, and even admitted that he had no rational hope save in the mercy of the monarch."

Mezexny, vol. x, p.

On the 27th of July, the preliminary arrangements having been completed, the maréchal was conducted to the palace of justice by the Sieur de Montigny,† the Governor

Matthieu, Hist. des Troubles, IIII II, pp. 415, 416.

† François de la Grange d'Anquien, Seigneur de Montigny, Sery, &c., afterwards known as the Maréchal de Montigny, served with the Catholics at Coutras, where he was taken prisoner. In 1601, Hepry IV. made kim Governor of Paris; in 1609, lientenant of the King in the three bishopries; and subsequently, in 1616, Marie de Medicis procured for him the 5400 of marshal of France. He commanded the royal army against the malcontents in Nivernais, and died in the same year (1617). He had but one son, who left no male issue; but his brother had, among other children, Henri, Marquis d'Anquien, whose daughter, Marie Casimire, married Sobieski, King of Poland, and died in France, in 1716, two years after her return to her native country.

Paris, in a covered barge escorted by twelve or fifteen armed men. Previously, however, to his being put his trial, he privately intercogated by the commissioners chosen for that purpose; but this last judicial effort to me him only tended to secure his ruin. When confronted with his judges, Biron appeared to have lost all consistency of character; the soldier was sunk in the sophist; he argued vaguely and inconsistently; and compromised his own cause by the very clumsiness of the efforts which he made to clear himself. Unaware of the revelations of La Fin, when he was confronted with him he declared him to be a man of honour, his relative, and his very good friend; but the depositions of the Burgundian noble no sooner made known to him than he retracted his former assertion, branding him as a sorcerer, a traitor, an assassin, ond the vilest of men, with other epithets too coarse for repetition.* These terrible accusations, however, came too late to serve his cause; he had already committed himself by his previous panegyric; and, perceiving that such was the men he hastened to support his testimony against his former accomplice by asserting that Renazé alive and in France, he should be able to prove the truth of what he advanced, and to justify himself. Unfortunately, for the success of this assurance, Renazé in his turn made his appearance in court; having, by a strange chance, recently escaped from Savoy where the duke had held him a prisoner; and Biron had the mortification of finding that this, another of his ancient allies, had not been more faithful to him in his adversity than La Fin. These two witnesses, indeed, decided his fate; as the letters which were produced against him, were proved to have been written before the previous pardon granted to him by Henry at Lyons, and they were consequently of a avail as regarded the present accusation.

Mezercy, vol. x, p. 204.

The Parliament was presided by Messire Pomponne de Bellièvre, Chancellor of France, beside whom the was invited to take his place upon a low wooden stool. Matthieu that, although neither duke nor peer had obeyed the _____ of the chambers, the number of his judges nevertheless amounted to one hundred and twelve; and it is probable that this very fact gave him confidence, aduring the two long hours occupied by his trial be once lost self-possession, but argued as closely, and m saguciously as though he had yielded to no previous intemperance of language. He urged the pardon previously accorded to him by the King: earnestly protested that he had never entered into any cabal against the throne or dignity of his sovereign; and denied that any man could be proved a traitor, whatever might be his wishes, so long as he made no effort to realize them. He admitted that he might have talked rashly, but appealed to his judges whether he had not proved himself equally reckless in the field; and required them to declare if so venial a fault had not, by that fact, already been sufficiently expiated. He then recapitulated the events of his career as military leader; but he did so temperately and modestly, trace of the arrogant bombast for which he had throughout his life been celebrated. So great was the effect of this unexpected and manly dignity. that many members of the court were seen to shed tears; and had his fate been decided upon the instant, is probable that his calm and touching eloquence might have saved his life; but so much time had already been exhausted that enough did not remain for collecting the votes, and the result of the trial was consequently deferred; the maréchal meanwhile returning to the Bastille under the same escort which had conveyed him to the capital.*

* L'Etoile computes them at one hundred and twenty-seven.—

Jour. de Henri IV., vol. iii, p. 21.

1.00

On the 29th, the chambers having again assembled, remained in deliberation from six o'clock in the morning until hours after mid-day, when sentence of death unanimously pronounced against the prisoner; and he was condemned to lose his head in the Place de Grève, "as attainted and convicted of having outraged the person of the King, and conspired against his kingdom; all his property to be confiscated, his peerage reunited to the crown; and himself shorn of all his honours and dignities."

On the following day, the decision of the Parliament

Mezcray, vol. x, p.

having been made public, immense crowds collected in Place Grève in order to witness the execution: scaffoldings were erected on every side for the modation of the spectators; and the tumult | length became me great that it reached me ears of me maréchal prison-chamber; who, rushing the window, whence he could command a view of some portion of the open leading to the Rue St. Antoine. along which groups are making their eager way, exclaimed, in violent emotion: "I have been judged, and I am a dead man." One of his guards hastened to him that the outery cocasioned by a quarrel between two nobles, which about to terminate in a duel; and the unhappy prisoner thus remained for a short time in uncertainty was to ultimate fate. Yet still, me he sat in his dreamy chamber, he heard the continued murmur of the excited citizens, who, believing that he was to be put to death by torchlight, persisted in holding their weary watch until hour before midnight.*

The King had, however, determined to postpone the execution until the morrow; when, apparently yielding solicitations of the duke's family, but, as many surmised, anxious to avoid a tunnult which the great popularity of Biron with the troops, and the numerous followers whom possessed about the court, led him to apprehend might prove the result of so public a diagrace to his surviving relatives, Henry consented to change the place of execution to the court of the Bastille, where the marechal accordingly lost his head at five evening. The circumstances attending his decapitation are too painful for detail; suffice it last struggles for displayed a cowardice which ill accorded with his previous gallantry, and that it was only by a feint that the executioner at last succeeded in performing the ghastly office; while so great had been the violence of the victim, that his head bounded three upon the scaffold, and emitted the blood than the trunk from which it had been severed.

Matthieu, and des Troubles, and u., pp. 426, 427.

It was said that the father of the culprit, the former maréchal, had mone occasion, during an exhibition of violence in which Biron so continually indulged, bitterly exclaimed: "I would advise you, Baron, as soon as peace is signed, to go and plant cabbages on your estate, or you will one day bring your head to the scaffold." A fearful prophecy fearfully fulfilled.

The corpse was conveyed to the church of St. Paul, where II was interred without any ceremony, but surrounded by a dense mass of the populace, many of whom openly pitied his fate, and lamented over hig fall.†

La Kin and Renazé were pardoned; but Hubert, secretary of the maréchal, suffered "the question," half-ordinary and extraordinary, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, having refused to make fession. Was, however, ahort time subsequently, restored to liberty; but the remembrance of all that he had undergone rankled at his heart, and in no found himself once more free than he abandoned his country, and withdrew to Spain, where he passed the remainder of his life.

Montfaucon, vol. v, p. III

† Péréfixe, vol. is, p. 377. Mezerny, vol. x, p. 209.

_

The Baron de Luz, who had revealed all he knew of the conspiracy on the promise of a free pardon, was not only forgiven for the share which he had taken in the plot, but had an all his appointments confirmed; and was made governor of the castle of Dijon and the town of Beaune. The governorship of Burgundy, vacant by the death of Biron, was given to the Dauphin; and the lieutenancy of the province and conferred upon the Duke de Bellegarde, by whom the young Prince was ultimately succeeded in the higher dignity.

A Breton nobleman, named Montbarot, a committed to the Bastille on suspicion of being involved in the cabal; but no proof of his participation having transpired, he was shortly afterwards liberated.

The Duke de Bouillon, who was conscious that he Wrongly suspected of complicity with Biron, he made no effort to evade the consequences of the accusation, but suffered himself to be arrested in the seat of his government, whence he was conveyed to the Bastille; and although he succeeded in establishing his innocence, he found himself, on his liberation, deprived of his

had not been altogether guiltless of participation in the crime for which the cautious Biron inst suffered death, deeming it expedient to provide for his own safety, took refuge in his viscounty of Turenne, where, however, he did not long remain inactive; and reports of his continued disaffection having reached ears of the King, he was, in his turn, summoned to the royal presence in order to justify himself; will the example of his decapitated friend was still too recent to encourage him to such a concession; and instead of presenting himself at court he dispatched thither very eloquent letter, in which he informed the monarch, that, being aware of the falsehood and artifice of his accusers, he entreated him to dispense with his appearance in the capital; and to approve instead, that, for the satisfaction of his Majesty, the French nation, and his own honour, he should present himself before the chamber of Castres; that assembly forming an integral portion of the Parliament of Toulouse, which held jurisdiction over his own viscounty of Turenne, Having forwarded this missive to the sovereign, he hastened to Castres, where he appeared as he had suggested, and caused his presence to be registered. The determination of Henry to compel im attendance at Paris was, however, only strengthened by this act of defiance; and having ascertained that the King was about to dispatch a messenger to compel his obedience, M. de Bouillon left Castres in haste for Orange, whence he proceeded, by way of Geneva, to Heidelberg, placed himself under the protection of the Prince Palatine, after having declared his innocence to Elizabeth of England and the other Protestant sovereigns, and entreated their support and mediation.

Thus far, with the exception of Biron himself, all the members of this famous conspiracy had escaped with their lives, and some among them without loss, either of freedom or of property; one of their number, however, was fated to be less fortunate, and this one was the Baron de Fontenelles,* a man of high family, who had for several years rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to the King and his ministers, and whose

"Guy Eder de Beaumanoir de Levardin, Baron de Fontenelles, was a Breton noble, who, according to de Thou, had been a celebrated Leaguer and brigand. From the year 1597, he had held, in the name of the Duke de Mercouur, the fort of Douarnene in Brittany, and the island of Tristain in which it is situated. Since that period he had continually been guilty of acts of piracy upon the English, and had even extended his system of theft and murder indiscriminately both on sea and land. might, had he been willing so to do, have profited by the benefit of the edict accorded to the Duke de Merceur in 1598, but he affected to hold it as a point of honour to obtain a distinct one for himself, and he even appears to have continued in the enjoyof his government despite this obstinacy; but having been convicted, during a period of profound peace, of maintaining an intelligence with the Spaniards, he was made prisoner by a stratagem, by Nicolas Rapin, provost of the connétablie (or constable's jurisdiction), as an accomplice of the Duke de Biron, as he was on the point of delivering up both the fort and the island to his dangerous allies.

atrocious berbarities caused him to fall unpitied. This wretched man, after having been put to the torture, was, by the sentence pronounced against him by the council, broken alive upon the wheel, where a suffered the greatest agony during an hour and a half. His lieutenant was hung and strangled for having been the medium of an communication with the Spanish Government; although, even as he was ascending the fatal ladder, a continued to declare and he had always been ignorant of the contents of the packets which he was charged to deliver, and could neither read nor write.

With the life of Biron, the conspiracy had terminated; while his fate had not failed to produce universal consternation. It devotion to the early fortunes of the King had been at once so great and so efficient, his military renown was so universally acknowledged, and his favour with the monarch was so apparently beyond the reach of chance or change, that his unhappy end pointed a moral even to the proudest, and so paralyzed the spirit of those who might otherwise have felt inclined to question the royal authority, that even the nearest and dearest of his internal uttered no murmur; while those individuals who are dreaded themselves compromised by his ruin, and who, to their equal surprise and satisfaction, discovered that, while he had unguardedly preserved all the papers which could tend to his own destruction, had destroyed every vestige of their own criminality, rejoiced at their escape, and flattered themselves that their participation in his treachery would ever remain undiscovered; a circumstance which rendered them at once patient and allent.

L'Etoile, vol. x, pp. 37.

That the necessity for taking the life of the maréchal had been bitterly felt by the King himself, we have already shown; and it was further evinced when that to those who interceded for the doomed that had his personal interests alone been threatened by the treason of the criminal, he should have found it easy to pardon the wrong that had been done him; but that, when he looked into the future, and remembered that the safety of the kingdom which had been confided to him, and of the son who was to succeed him upon the throne, must both be compromised by sparing one who had already proved that his loyalty could not be purchased by mercy, he held himself bound to secure both against an evil for which there was no other safeguard than the infliction of the law.

Many argued, that, having spared the lives of the Dukes of Epernon, Bouillon, and Mayenne,* all of

Charles de Lorraine, Duke de Mayenne, was the second son of François Lorraine, Duke de Guise, and was born in 1554. He distinguished himself at the sieges of Poitiers and La Rochelle, and at the battle of Montcomtour, and fought ancessfully against the Calvinists in Guienne and Suintange. His brothers having been killed at the states of Blois, in 1588, he declared himself chief of the League, and assumed the title of Heutenant-general whom had at different times been in arms against him, Henry might equally have shown mercy to Biron; but while they urged this reasoning, they omitted to rememher that the political crime of these three nobles had been aggravated, like that of the maréchal, by private wrong; and that they had not, by an unyielding obstinacy, and ungrateful pertinacity in rebellion, forbearance of indulgent monarch. Moreover, Biron, in grasping at sovereignty, had not heritated to invite the intrusion of foreign and hostile troops into the French territory, or to betray the exigences and difficulties of the army under his own command to his dangerous allies; thus weakening for the moment, and perilling for the future, the resources of a frank and trusting master; two formidable facts, which once justified the severity alike of his King, and of his judges.

of the kingdom and crown of France; and by virtue of this self-created authority, caused the Cardinal de Bourbon to be declared King, under the name of Charles X. Having inherited the hatred of his brothers for Henry III., and his successor, Henry IV., he marched eighty thousand men against the latter Prince, but was defeated, both at Arques and Ivry. He unnihitated the faction of the Sixteen; I was ultimately compelled to effect a reconciliation with the King in 1599, when Henry IV., with his usual elemency, not only pardoned his past opposition, but bestowed upon him the government of the Isle of France. The Duke de Mayenne died in 1611, leaving by his wife, I have de Savoie, daughter of the Count de Tende, one son, Henry, who died without issue in 1621.

The leason was a salutary one to the French nobility; who had, from long impunity, learnt to regard their personal relations with foreign princes as matters beyond the authority of the sovereign, and which involve neither assisty their honour; for taught them that the highest head in the realm might fall under an accusation of treason; and that, powerful as each might be in his own province or his own government, he was still responsible to the monarch for the manner in which he used that power, and answerable to the laws of his country should he in rash enough to abuse it.

That Henry felt and understood that such must necessarily be the effect produced by the fate of the maréchal, there can be little doubt; as well as that he was still further induced to impress so wholesome a conviction upon the minds of his haughty aristocracy by the probability of a minority, during which the disorders incident to so many conflicting and imaginary claims could not fail to convulse the kingdom, and to endanger the stability of the throne; while it is no less evident that, once having forced upon their reason a conviction of his own ability to compel obedience where his authority was resisted, and to assert his sovereign privilege where he felt I to be essential to the preservation of the realm, he evinced no desire to extend his severity beyond its just limits. Thus, as me have seen, with the exception of the Baron Fontenelles, who had drawn down upon himself the terrible expiation of a cruel death, rather by a long 20.4

succession of crime than by his association in the conspiracy of Biron, all the other criminals already judged had escaped the due punishment of their fault; while the Count A'Auvergne, after having been detained during a couple of months in the Bastille, was restored to liberty the sister, Madame de Verneuil; who pledged berself to the monarch that he was guilty only in so far that he had been faithful to the trust reposed in him by the maréchal, and had forborne betray his secret; while he had never actively participated in sonspiracy. She moreover assured Henry, who was only anxious to find an opportunity of pardoning the count-an anxiety which the tears and intercessions of the marquise, as well as his own respect for blood of the Valois inherited by d'Auvergne from royal father, tended naturally to increasethat the prisoner was prepared, since the death of Biron had liberated him from all further necessity for silence, to communicate to his Majesty every particular of which he was cognizant. The concession was accepted; the count made the promised revelations; and his liberation was promptly followed by a renewal of the King's favour.

Towards the close of the year, intelligence having reached Henry that the Prince de Joinville, who was serving in the army of the Archduke, had, in his turn, suffered himself to be seduced from his allegiance by the Spaniards, he gave instant orders for his arrest; but the Prince no sooner found himself a prisoner, than declared his readiness to confess everything, provided im were permitted to do so to the King in person, and in the presence of Sully. His terms were complied with and. as both Henry and his minister had anticipated from frivolous and inconsequent character of their new captive. became apparent that no in of treason had been blent with the follies of which he had been guilty, but that they had merely owed their origin to his love of notoriety. A correspondence with Spain had become, we have shown, the fashion of French court; and Joinville bad accordingly, in order to increase his importance, resolved to affect in his turn an understanding with that country. During his audience of the King he thoroughly betrayed the puerility of his proceedings, that the monarch at resolved to treat him as a silly and headstrong youth, towards whom any extreme measure of severity would be alike unnecessary and undignified; and he is consequently no sooner heard his narration to an end, than he desired the presence of his mother the Duchess de Guise, and his brother the duke; and as they entered the royal

-

Charles de Lorraine, Duke de Guise, born in 1571, was the son of Henry, Duke de Guise, who was assessinated at the states of Blois, in 1588. It the period of his father's death he was conveyed to the castle of Tours, where I was retained a prisoner August, 1591, I have been that he would become the impression in the capital had been that he would become the father of Isabel, I daughter of Philip I.

Spain, who would cause him to be proclaimed King; an ar-closet, somewhat startled by so sudden a suramons, and said, directing their attention to the delinquent; There stands the prodigal son in person; he has filled his head with follies; but I shall treat him as a child, and forgive him for your sakes, although only on condition that you reprimend him seriously; that you, my nephew," addressing himself particularly to the duke; "become his guarantee for the future. I place him in your charge, in order that you may teach him wisdom, if it be possible."

In obedience this command, M. L. Guise, who was well aware with how rash and intemperate a spirit he was called upon to contend, at once, with the royal sanction, reconducted him to his prison; where, during several months, the young Prince exhausted threats, murmurs, and every species of verbal rangement which the Duke - Feria, the Spanish ambassador, proposed to the League, in 1593. The Legate, the Sixteen, and the doctors of the Sorbonne, alike favoured this election; and the negociations proceeded so far that the Spaniards and Neapolitans in Paris rendered him regal honours. The young Prince, who had it this period only attained his twenty-second year, expressed great indignation at being made the puppet of so absurd a comedy, feeling convinced that neither the Dake de Mayenne, or the Dake de Nemours, both of whom coveted the crown, would finally favour his accession; and there can be little doubt that the state of extreme poverty to which he was reduced at the time, caused him to consider the project as still more extravagant than he might otherwise have done; it being stated (Mén. pour l'Hist, de France) that his corvants were, on one occasion, compelled to pawn one of his cloaks and his saddle-cloth, in order to furnish bim with a dinner.

gance; until wearied by the monotony of confinement, in finally subsided into repentance; and was, upon his carnest promise of amendment, permitted to exchange his chamber in the Bastille for a less stringent captivity in the château de Dampierre.* Such was the lenient punishment of the last of the conspirators; and it was assuredly a clever stroke of policy in the monarch thus to cast a shade of ridicule over the close of the cabal; which, having commenced with a tragedy, had, by his contemptuous forbearance, almost terminated in an epigram.

The court, after having passed a portion of summer at St. Germain, removed in the commencement of August to Fontainebleau; the advanced pregnancy of Queen having rendered her anxious to return to palace. But any gratification which she might have promised herself, in this her favourite place of residence, was cruelly blighted by the legitimation of the son of Madame de Verneuil, which was formally registered this period. Nor was this the only vertaion to which she was exposed, the notoriety of the King's intrigues becoming every day more trying alike to her temper and to her health; while the new concession which had been made to the vanity-or, as the marquise herself deemed it, to the honour-of the favourite, induced the latter to commit the most indecent excesses; and to increase, if possible, the almost regal magnificence of her attire and her establishment; the same time that her deportment towards the Queen was by an insolent disrespect which involved the whole court in perpetual misunderstandings.

Sully, Mén., vol. iv, pp. IIII Daniel, vol. vii, p. 423. Mesersy, vol. x, p. IIII.

As had already become only too evident that unfortunate Marie de possessed but little influence affections of her husband. however im might be compelled to respect im perfect propriety and dignity of her character, the cabal of favourite daily increased in importance; and the Queen's mortification overflowed. when, soon after the royal visit to Fontainebleau, Henry took leave of her in order to visit Calais, and she tained that he had on his way stopped at the château de Verneuil, whither he been accompanied by marquise. It in vain that M. de Sully—to whom the King had given strict charge to endeavour by every method in his power to reconcile the Queen to bis absence, and to provide for her amusement every diversion of which she was in a condition to partake-exerted himself to obey the command of the monarch; was too deeply wounded to derive any consolation from such puerile sources; nor was it until the return of her royal consort, when his evident anxiety increased tenderness once more led her to believe that she might finally wean him from his excesses, and attach him to herself, that she once more became calm.

11th of November the anticipated event took place, and the Queen gave birth to her eldest daughter,* in the same oval chamber in which Dauphin is light.† The advent of Elizabeth of France was not, however, hailed with the same delight by Marie, - had been that of - first-born; contrary, her disappointment extreme on ascertaining the sex of the infant, from the fact of her having placed the most entire confidence in the assurances of a devotee named Sœur Ange, who is been recommended to her notice will protection by the Sovereign-Pontiff; and who had, before she herself became cognisant of the negociations for her marriage, foretold that she would one day be Queen of France. This woman, who still remained in her service, had repeatedly assured her that she need be under me apprehension of bearing daughters, as she was predestined by Heaven to become the mother of three princes only; and after having, with her usual superstition, placed implicit faith in the flattering prophecy, Marie an aconer discovered its fallacy than she abandoned herself to the most violent grief, refusing to listen to the consolations of her attendants, and bewailing herself that she should have been cruelly deceived; until the King, although he in measure participated in her annoyance, succeeded in restoring her composure, by bidding her remember that had not been of the same sex as the child of which she is just made him the father, and could is have herself realised the previous prediction of Sœur Ange; an argument which, coupled with the probability that the august infant beside her might in her turn ascend an European throne, was, in all probability, the most efficacious one which could have been adopted to reconcile her to its present comparative insignificance.

* married, in 1615, Philip IV. of Spain.

† Вазоомрісте, Ме́т., 🚃 📖

CHAPTER IV.

[1603.]

COVER PROTESTING -- MADAME OF VERNEVIL IS RECEIVED IN THE PALACE --

SET STYLE STEEL TO A SALESTON AND SELECTION OF THE SECOND
DE QUINE-ITALIAN COMPANIA AT MUTE-SEPAT PROCESDA
TENTER, AND THE STATE OF T
DUES N'SPERMON-THE STREET DE SEL SES SES DE LORRAINE
ARRIVE PARMUS—HILLMESS IN COMEN INVESTMENT OF MUSICAND-HER DEATE - OF THE PRESCR KING - SULLY AT PONTATNESARE - COMPIDENCE IV. IN MIN - IV.
FECOMES.—FENEMED SYSSION OF
THE REAL OF THE QUEEN—QUARRE, OF THE COUNT IN SOURCES
THE DUES BE SULLY IN THE STREET MADAMA OF THE COURT IN SOUTH BESUGE OF MADAME OF THE CUREN-PRALOUSY OF TEX WITH THE AT MINE AT MINE PARTYEE MAN PROVINCE OF LOWER SELECTION OF COURT BE CHEMINE PARPARES TO LEAVE THE COMMENT MANAGEMENT OF THE STATE OF THE APOLOGY OF THE TRE ORDER OF
THE REPORTS OF THE PERSON OF THE PERSON OF MAR - CRIEF OF THE REST THE NUMBER OF THE PROPERTY HERE THE BEVELATION THE STREET A SHEET STREET
BECAPE OF L'EGRE—BIS
MENT OF RIS TO THE MAND OF THE RIGHT-THE COURT D'AUVERGNE ELTIRES FROM ARRESTOR ESCUES SERVICES CONTRACTOR OF COLS OF THE RING-DEDICATION OF MARIE-THE RESOLVES TO OBTAIN THE WRITTHN PROMISE OF THE THE PAYOUEITS—WEARVESS ADVICE of aulit—Parallic Berwaite & wife and a migrephy—a lamb
APOLOGY—TEX THE KING AND THE PAYOURITY - MEMORITHANCES - SULLY -A DELICATE

10 EFFECT
BECONCILIATION WITH THE QUEDY-TEMPORARY
ADDINATED BY THE PROPERTY OF T
JEALOUSY OF WARANE VERNIEUIL — CONSTRAINT OF THE NATURAL CHE INTENTANCE OF THE MARKET BELLE RECORDING THE BOYAL ANDMENT IS RESTTO ABOVE AND COMPANIES LOGICE AND COMPANIES OR MER THE PARTY CONTRACT APOLOGY IN THE COUNT
D'ANTRACTES-PROBLIES OF BEHINN OF SPAIN TO THE COMMENSATORS
MINISTER PROPERTY AND DESCRIPTION OF AUTOSOMO-	ı
MOAPM IN HIS CONTINUED WARE THE AND CONTINUED TO THE STATE OF TH
ABQUIREMENTS A PRISONER—HIDSEN
WITH D'ENTRAGUES—HAUGETY
MADAMI DE COMPENSANTAMENTE MINISTER-MONTEY.	ı
GATION IN DR REGIL - NAMES
SMELLIGHES THE CITY OF PARIS, AND UNDERSAUGE OFFICE GREAT	1
William I Branch	,

CHAPTER IV.

[1608.]

A FEW weeks after the birth of Madame Elizabeth. the court returned to Paris; where, in honour of the little Princess, several ballets were danced, and a grand banquet was given to the sovereigns by the nobility; but the heart of the Queen was too full of chagrin to enable her to assist with even a semblance of gratification in the festivities by which those around her were absorbed. The new-born tenderness lately exhibited by her husband will gradually diminished; while assumption of the favourite, who was once more in her turn about to become mother, exceeded all decent limits. The daily, and almost hourly disputes between royal couple renewed with greater bitterness than ever; and when, on the III of January, Madame de Verneuil, like herself, and again under the same roof, gave birth to a daughter. Marie de

* Gabrielle-Angelique de Bourbon, who was declared legally legitimate as her brother had previously been, married, in Felli, Bernard de la Valette et de Foix, Duke d'Eperson, and died in child-birth, in April, 1627.

Medicis no longer attempted to suppress the violence of her indignation; nor was it until the King, alike chafed and bewildered by her upbraidings, declared that should she persist in rendering his existence one of perpetual turmoil and discomfort, he would fulfil his former threat of compelling her to quit the kingdom, that he could induce her to desist from receiving him with complaints reproaches. Henry that he had discovered, by assertion of this resolve, a certain method of silencing his unfortunate consort; who, had she been childless, would in all probability gladly have sacrificed her ambition to her sense of dignity; but Marie was a mother, and she felt that her own destiny must be blended with that of her offspring. Thus, she had nothing left to her save to submit; and deeply as she suffered from the indignities which were heaped upon her as a wife, she shrank from a prospect so appalling as a separation from the innocent beings to whom she had given life.

Meanwhile the King, wearied alike of the exigences of his mistress, and the cold, unbending deportment of the Queen, again made approaches to Mademoiselle Guise, upon whom he had already, a year or two previously, the last those attentions which bespoke alike his and his designs; but he was not destined to be more successful with this lady than before; her intimacy with the Queen, to whose household was attached, rendering her still more averse than formerly to encourage the licentious addresses of the monarch. The of this new passion nevertheless, sufficed for a time to wear Henry from his old favourite; and forgetting his age in his anxiety to win the favour of the beautiful and witty Marguerite, he appeared on the 19th of February, in a rich suit of white satin, in the court of the Tuileries, where he had invited the nobles of the court to run at the ring, and acquitted the model of the sections of the spec-

From this period until the end of the month, the royal circle were engaged in one continual succession of festivities; of which high play, banquets, ballets, balls, (at the latter of which a species of dance denominated Braules, and corrupted by the English into Braule, which became afterwards so popular the court of Elizabeth, was of constant occurrence, as well as the Corranto, a livelier but less graceful movement;) and theatrical representations, formed the principal feature. An Italian company invited to France by the Queen, under the management of Isabella Andreini, also appeared before the court, but no record is left of the nature of their performance.*

From this temporary oblivion of all political anxiety, Henry was, however, suddenly aroused by a rumour which reached the court of a revolt in the town of

* Matthieu, Hist. de Heari IV., vol. ii, Book vz, p. 446.

Metz, which proved to be only too well founded. For some time previously great discontent had existed among the citizens, who considered themselves aggrieved by the tyranny of the two lieutenants* of the Duke d'Epernon their governor; and to such a height had their opposition to this delegated authority | length risen, that the duke found himself compelled to proceed to the city, in order, if possible, to reconcile the conflicting parties. In intelligence been been communicated to the King, than he resolved to profit by so favourable an opportunity of repossessing himself, not only of the town itself, but of the whole province of Measin, in order to disable the Duke d'Epernon, (against whom his suspicious had already been aroused.) from making hereafter a disloyal use of the power which his authority over so important a territory afforded to him of contravening the measures of the sovereign. The fortress was one of great importance to Henry, who was aware of the necessity of placing in the safe keeping of an individual upon whom he could place the fullest and most perfect reliance; and the rather that I d'Epernon had, during the reign of Henry III., rather assumed in Metz the state of a sovereign prince than fulfilled the functions of its governor | and that he would, as the King = once felt.

* Raimond de Comminge, Sieur de Sobole, und his brother, noblemen of Gascouy.

11 G III

opposed, resist any encroachment upon selfconstituted privileges. The revolt of the Messinese, (for, as was soon ascertained, the disaffection was confined to the city, but extended throughout the whole of the adjoining country,) opening for the royal interposition; and Henry instantly decided upon visiting the province in person, accompanied by his whole court, before the two factions should have time to reconcile their differences, and to deprecate his interference. At the close of February he accordingly commenced his journey, despite the inclemency of the weather, will the unfavourable condition of the roads, which rendered travelling and at times even dangerous for the Queen and her attendant ladies; and pretexting wisit to his aister the Duchess de Bar, he advanced to Verdun, where he remained for a few days, ere he finally made his entry into Metz.

So unexpected a apparition paralysed parties.

M. d'Epernon having refused to consent to removal of Sobole, who was, as he knew, devoted interests, had failed to appeare the indignation of Messinese, who consequently obtain justice from the King; while Sobole himself, after momentary vision of fortifying the citadel, and defying royal authority, became convinced to design feasible; and accordingly obeyed without murmur sentence of hanishment pronounced against him, gave up the furtress unconditionally, and left the province.

Sobole had sooner resigned his trust, than the King appointed de Montigny lieutenant-governor of the province of Messin; and his brother, d'Arquien,* lieutenant-governor of the town and fortress; while the garrison was replaced by a portion of the body-guard by which the monarch had been accompanied from the capital.

The vexation of the Duke d'Epernon was extreme, he mail not expostulate, although he M once perceived that his power was annihilated. III long as his lieutenants had been creatures of his own, his dominion over the province had been absolute; but when they were thus replaced by officers of the King's selection, influence became merely nominal; great, moreover, had been the tact of Henry, that he had found means to compel the duke himself to solicit the dismissal of Sobole and his brother, in order to assure his own tenure of office; and he was consequently placed in a position which rendered all semblance of discontent impossible; while the citizens delighted to find themselves thus unexpectedly revenged upon their oppressors, and proud of the presence of the sovereigns within their walls, man profuse in demonstrations of loyalty and attachment.

* Antoine, Seigneur d'Arquien, was Governor of Calais, Sancerre, &c.

A slight indisposition having detained the King for longer period than he had anticipated. Metz, the Duchess de Bar, the Duke de Lorraine, and the Duke and Duchess de Deux-Ponts, arrived on the 16th of March to welcome him to the province; and series of entertainments was given distinguished guests which was long matter of tradition among. Measurese; and which resulted in betrothal of Mademoiselle de Rohan. It the young Duke de Deux-Ponts.

While still sojourning at Metz, information reached Henry of the serious illness of Elizabeth of England; a despatch having been forwarded to the monarch by the Count de Beaumont,† his ambassador at the court of London, informing him of the apprehensions which entertained that her Majesty could not survive so grave a malady. The effect of this intelligence was to induce the King to hasten his return to his capital, and he, accordingly, prepared for immediate departure; but he was finally prevailed upon to sojourn for a few days.

Nancy, where Madame (his sister) had prepared a magnificent ballet, which was accordingly performed, greatly to the admiration of the two courts. Henry,

Henri, Duke de Deux-Ponts, who married Catherine de Rohan, was descended from a branch of the royal house

† Christophe Harlai, Beaumont, Corlons. He died in 1615.

however, whose anxiety exceeded bounds, caused courier after courier to be dispatched for tidings of the illustrious invalid, and took has ahare in the festivities which were designed to do him honour. He was probably on the eve, as he declared in a letter to the Duke de Sully, of losing an ally who was the enemy of his enemies, and a second self, while he was totally ignorant of the views and feelings of her

His forebodings was verified, for the last; which intelligence immediately conveyed him, together with the assurance that her council had secured the person of the Lady Arabella Stuart, the cousin of the King of Scotland, and that there was consequently nothing fear as regarded the succession. The death of Elizabeth did not in fact in any respect affect the relative position of the two countries; neither Henry IV. nor James I. being desirons to terminate the good understanding which existed between them; and on the soft July, treaty of confederation was concluded between sovereigns by Sully, in which they was mutually pledged to protect the United Provinces of the Low Countries against their senemy Philip of Spain.

But, notwithstanding apparent certainty of continuance of his amicable relations with England, intelligence operated upon the bodily health of the King, or that his hasty journey homeward had overtaxed his strength, it is certain that on reaching Fontainebleau, he had so violent an attack of fever as to be compelled to countermand council which had been convened for the third day after his arrival. The court physicians, bewildered by so sudden and severe an illness, declared the case to be an hopeless one; while Henry himself, believing that his end approaching, caused a letter to be written. Sully to desire his immediate attendance.* So fully, indeed, did he appear to anticipate a fatal termination of the attack, that while awaiting the arrival of the minister, he caused the portrait of the Dauphin to be brought to him; and after remaining for a few accords with his eyes earnestly fixed upon it, he exclaimed, with a deep sigh: "Ha! poor child, what will you have a suffer your father should be a from you!"

Sully lost no time in obeying the melancholy summons of the King; and, on arriving at Fontainebleau, at once made his way to the royal chamber, where he indeed found Henry in his bed, but with no symptoms of immediate dissolution visible either in a comment. The Queen sat beside him with one of his hands clasped in hers; and as he remarked the entrance of the duke, he extended the other exclaiming: "Come arrival. Within two hours after I had written to you, I was in great degree relieved from pain; "I have gradually recovered from the Here," tinued, turning towards the Queen " is the most trust-worthy and intelligent of all my servants, who would have assisted you better than any other in the preservation alike of my kingdom and of my children, had I been taken away. I am aware that her humour is somewhat austere, and it times perhaps too independent for a mind my yours; and that there would have been many wanting who might, in consequence, have endeavoured to alienate from her the affections of yourself and of my children; but should it ever be so, an not yield too ready a credence to their words. I sent for her expressly that I might consult with both of you upon the best method to avert so great mevil; but, thanks be to God, I feel that such precaution was in this instance unnecessary."

L'Btoile, vol. iii, p. 94.

† Capefigue, vol. viii, p. 163.

VOL L

Suily, in describing this scene, withholds all comment upon the King's perfect confidence in the heart and intellect of his royal consort; but none can fail to feel that the moment must have been a proud one for Marie, in which she became conscious that the nobler features of her character had been thoroughly appreciated by her husband. The vanity of the woman could to slumber while the value of the wife and of the Queen was thus openly and generously acknowledged.

And truly did Marie de Medicis need a memory like this to support her throughout her unceasing trials; scarcely had King recovered strength encounter the exertion than he determined to remove to Paris; and, having intimated his wish to the Queen, immediate preparations were made for their departure. They arrived in the capital totally unexpected in nine o'clock in the morning, and alighted in the Hôtel in Gondy, where Henry took in temporary leave of in wife, and hastened to the residence of Madame de Verneuil, with whom he remained until an hour after mid-day; thence he proceeded to the intil of M. la Grand with whom he dined; in was it until a late hour that he rejoined the Queen, who is once became aware that the temporary separation between the monarch and his favourite, occasioned by the journey to Metz, had failed to produce the effect which she had been sanguine enough to anticipate.

* Sully, Man., vol. iv, 197—199.

Nor did Marie deceive herself; for, during the sojourn of the court at Paris, which lasted until the month of June, Henry abandoned himself with even less reserve than formerly to his passion for the marquise; while the forsaken Queen—who hourly received information of the impertinent assumption of that lady, and who was assured that she had renewed with more arrogance, and more openly than ever, her pretended claim to the hand of the sovereign—unable to conceal her indignation, embittered accurate intercourse between herself and her royal concert with complaints and upbraidings which irritated and angered the King; and length caused an estrangement them greater than any which had hitherto existed. There can be little doubt that this period of Marie's life was a most unhappy one. Deprived even of the presence of her children, who, from considerations of health, had been removed to St. Germain-en-Laye, and who could in consequence be the solace of every weary hour, she found her only consolation in the society of her immediate household, and the zealous devotion of Madame de Concini; whose first-born and her became joint sponsor with the de Soissons, greatly to mannoyance of the King, who watched with a jealous eye the ever-increasing influence of the Florentine favourite.

L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 88, 89.

_

Previously to her marriage with the Duke Bar, Madame, the King's sister, had affianced herself to M. de Soissons; but the circumstance no became known to Henry than he expressed his distaste to such an union, and directed the Duke de Sully to expostulate with both parties, and induce them, should it be possible, to abandon the project, and give a written promise man to renew engagement. In this difficult and delicate mission the minister ultimately succeeded; but, since period, a coldness had existed between the two nobles which length in mutual dissension and avoidance. It consequently, with considerable surprise that while preparing for his embassy England, where was intrusted with the congratulations of his own sovereign to James I. - his accession, M. de Sully, found himself on one occasion addressed by Prince in an accent of warmth and friendliness to which he had long been unaccustomed from his lips; and heard him cordially express his obligation in some service which, in his official capacity, the minister had lately rendered him. and declare that thenceforward he should never recur to the past, but rather trust that for the future they might be firm and fast friends. Sully answered in the same spirit; it thus a misunderstanding which had disturbed the whole court, where each had partisans who violently his cause, and thus schism more serious than it might otherwise have been, was apparently terminated; but the duke had no sooner returned to France than it was renewed more bitterly than ever, to the extreme annoyance of the King, who was reluctant to interfere; the high rank of M. de Soissons the one hand, and the eminent services of Sully on the other, rendering him equally averse to dissatisfy either party.

In the month of August, 1603, the Duke de Soissons, whose lavish expenditure made it important to him to increase his income by some new concession on the part of the monarch, held an consultation with de Verneuil, with whom he was on the closest terms intimacy, as to the most feasible method of effecting his object; and it was at length determined that the Prince should solicit the privilege of exacting a duty if fifteen sous upon every bale of cloth, either imported or exported throughout the kingdom; while the marquise pledged herself to exert her influence to induce it. King the arrangement, which service she was to receive one-fifth of the proceeds resulting from the tax. Extraordinary as such demand appear in the present day, a seconding to Sully, by means an unusual one in that period; when, by his rigorous retrenchments, he had greatly reduced the revenues of the court nobles, and put it out of the power of the monarch to bestow upon them, as he had formerly done, the levish sums from his own privy purse; thus inducing them to adopt every possible expedient in order to increase their diminished incomes. Sympathising with annoyance of his impoverished courtiers, and anxious to silence their murmurs, the good-natured and reckless sovereign seldom met their requests with a denial, and from this abuse a number of petty taxes, each perhaps insignificant in itself, but in the aggregate amounting to ■ heavy infliction upon the people, were levied on all aides, and upon all pretences; and the evil me length became so serious that the prudent minister found it necessary to expostulate respectfully with his royal master upon the danger of such a system, and to entreat of him to disany further imposts which had no tendency to increase the revenues of the state, but merely served to encourage the prodigality of the nobles.

It was precisely this unpropitious

M. de Soissons proffered his demand, which was warmly seconded by Madame de Verneuil, who represented to the monarch the impossibility of his refusing a favour of this nature to a prince of the blood, when he had so frequently made concessions of the man nature to individuals of inferior rank; and the certainty that, were his request negatived. M. de Soissons would not fail to feel himself injured and aggrieved. Still, aware of the promise which had been extorted from him by Sully, King hesitated; but upon being more ungently pressed by the favourite, he at length demanded what would be the probable yearly produce of the tax, when he was assured by the count that a could not exceed thousand crowns; upon which Henry, who anxious not to irritate him by a refusal where the favour solicited was - comparatively insignificant, once signified compliance; as the subject been cleverly mooted by the interested parties - Fontainebleau, while imminister of finance was absent in capital, Madame de Verneuil, by and of importunity, succeeded in inducing the monarch to sign an order for the imposition of duty in favour of M. de Soissons; before he was prevailed upon to this, he declared to the Prince that he should withdraw his consent to the arrangement, if it were proved that the produce of the tax exceeded the yearly sum of fifty thousand france, or that it pressed too heavily upon the people and the commercial interests of the kingdom. This reservation by no palatable to M. de Soissons, who had, when questioned as to the amount likely to be derived from the transaction, answered rather from impulse than calculation; but as the said reservation was merely verbal, while the edict authorising the levy of the impost was tangible and valid, the Prince, after warmly expressing his acknowledgments to the monarch, carried off and document without one misgiving of success.

Henry, however, when he began to reflect upon the nature of the concession which he had been prevailed upon a make, and not suppress a suspicion in it was more important than it is at first appeared; and, used to be accertain the extent of his imprudence. He accordingly, the same evening, dispatched a limit is Sully, in which, without divulging what is a limit place, is directed him to ascertain the probable proceeds of such a tax, and the effect which it was likely to produce upon those on whom it would be levied.

unexpected an inquiry startled the finance-minister, who instantly apprehended that a fresh attack been made upon the indulgence of the monarch; and he forthwith anxiously commenced a calculation, based upon and well-authenticated documents, which resulted in a discovery that the annual amount of such an impost could not be less than three hundred thousand crowns; while necessarily so seriously affect the main in flax hemp, that it was likely to ruin the provinces of Brittany and Normandy, as well as a great part of Picardy.

Under these circumstances it was decided between Henry his minister, the latter should withhold his signature to the order which had been exterted from King; without which, or letter from sovereign specially commanding the registration of the edict by the Parliament, document was invalid. There can be no doubt that the most manly and dignified course which the monarch could have adopted, would have been to inform M. de Soissons of the result of the verification which had been made; and to have declared that, in accordance with La expressed determination when conditionally conceding the edict, he had resolved, upon ascertaining the magnitude of the sum which must be levied by such a tax, not to permit its operation. This was not, however, the manner in which Henry met the difficulty. He felt that his position was an onerous one, and me gladly transferred his responsibility M. de Sully; who accordingly, upon the application of the Prince for his signature, in order that the document might be before the Parliament and thus rendered available, declined to accede to the request; alleging that the affair was one of such extreme importance, that he dared not take upon himself to forward it without the congurrence of the council.

de Soissons urged and expostulated in vain; the minister in inflexible; and length Prince withdrew, but not before he had given vent his indignation with a bitterness which convinced his listener thenceforward kindly feeling between them an end.

But if the count thus suffered himself to be by a first refusal, Madame de Verneuil was by no means inclined to follow his example. Baffled but not beaten, resolved upon returning to the charge; and accordingly the drove the residence of the minister, met him at an door of his cabinet, as he was about to proceed to the Louvre, in order to have an interview with the King.

There was an expression of haughty defiance in the eye of the favourite, and a heightened colour upon her cheek, which a once betrayed to Sully the purpose of her visit while he on his side received her with a calm courtesy which was ill calculated to inspire her with any hope of success; and she had scarcely seated herself before agave her reason to perceive that he was as little inclined to temporise as herself. When they met he held in his hand a roll of paper, which, even after she had entered the apartment, he still continued to grasp with a pertinacity that did not fail to attract her attention.

"And what may be the precious document, Monsieur le Ministre," she demanded flippantly; "of which you find it so impossible to relax your hold?"

A precious document indeed, Madam;" we the abrupt reply; " and one in which you figure among many others." saying, he unrolled the acroll, and read aloud a list of edicts, solicited or granted, similar to that of the Count de Soissons, one of which bore her own name.

"And what are you about to do with it?" she saked.

"To make it the subject of a remonstrance to his Majesty."

"Truly," exclaimed the marquise, no longer able to control her rage; = the King will be well-advised should he listen to your caprices, and by so doing affront twenty individuals of the highest quality. Upon whom should be confer such favours as these, if not upon the princes of the blood, his cousins, his relatives, and his mistresses?"

"That might be very well," replied the minister, totally unmoved by her insolence; "if the King could pay these sums out of his own privy purse; but that they should be levied upon the merchant, the artisan, and the labourer, is entirely out of the question. It is they who feed both him and us; and one master is enough, without their being compelled usupport us many cousins, relatives, and mistresses."

Madame de Verneuil could bear more | but rising passionately from her chair, she left the room without even a parting salutation to the plain-spoken minister, who saw her depart with as much composure as he had seen her enter; and quietly rolling up the obnoxious document which had formed the subject of discussion between them, he in his turn got into his carriage, and proceeded to the Louvre.

Furious alike ther want of success, and the affront which had been put upon her, the marquise drove from the Arsenal to the hôtel of M. Soissons where, still smarting under the rebuff of the uncompromising duke, she did not scruple sufficiently to garble his words to give them all the appearance of a premeditated and wilful insult to the Prince personally. She assured him that in reply to her remark that the relatives of the monarch possessed the greatest claim upon his liberality, which de Sully had retorted by the observation which the King had too many kinsmen, and that would be well for the nation could we delivered from some of them.

* Sully, Mén., vol. v, 11 45-50.

This report so exasperated M. de Soissons, that on the following morning he demanded an audience of the sovereign; during which is bitterly inveighed against the arrogance and presumption of its minister, and claimed instant redress for this affront to his honour and his dignity is prince of the blood; haughtily declaring that should the King refuse to do him justice, he would find means to avenge himself.

The unseemly violence of the count, by offending the self-respect of the monarch, could not have failed, under any circumstances, to defeat its own object; but aware as he was that Sully had sought only me prescrvation of his personal interests, Henry was even less inclined than he might otherwise have been, in yield to a dictation of this imperious nature. excess of his indignation consequently rendered him calm and self-possessed, and thus at once gave him a decided advantage over his excited companion. Instead of retorting angrily, and involving himself in an undignified dispute, replied to the intemperate language of the count by calmly inquiring if he were to understand that I de Sully had addressed the obnoxious remark which was the subject of complaint, to the Prince himself; if it had merely been reported to him by third person. To question M. Soissons impatiently replied insult had indeed been uttered to himself personally, but that the individual by whom it was communicated to him was above all suspicion; while he moreover considered that his assurance of its truth ought to suffice, as he was incapable of falsehood.

Were I so, cousin; said Henry coldly; you would greatly from the other members of your family, especially your elder brother; but since you appear to place so perfect a reliance on the veracity of your informant, you have only to name him to me, and to explain precisely what he alleges to have passed, and I shall then understand what is necessary to be done, and will endeavour to satisfy you as far as I can reasonably do so."

M. de Soissons was not, however, prepared to involve Madame de Verneuil in a quarrel which threatened the serious results; and he consequently declared he had plighted his word not to divulge the identity of informant; a promise which he, moreover, considered to be utterly unnecessary, as he was ready in pledge himself to the entire truth of what he had advanced.

"So, cousin;" said the King with an ambiguous smile; "you was yourself under as shadow an oath from revealing to me what I desire to know; then I, in my turn, swear not to believe one syllable of your complaint beyond what M. Sully may himself report to me; for I hold his truth in as great estimation as you do that of the nameless partisan to whom you are indebted for the fine story you have inflicted upon me."

was in somewhat the same frame of mind in which arranged and quitted the finance minister, that II de Soissons, as the King rose and thus indicated the termination of the interview, passed from the royal closet; now did he retire until he had indulged in such unrestrained threats of vengeance, that Henry considered arranged expedient dispatch are without delay to the Arsenal to warn Sully to be upon his guard against the impetuous Prince, and not to venture abroad without a sufficient suite; while the same time the messenger was instructed to inquire if the obnoxious expression had indeed been used, and to whom.

On being apprised of the visit which had been paid by Madame de Verneuil to the duke, the King instantly comprehended the whole intrigue, and monce declared that it was useless to search further; as he well knew that she possessed both malice and invention enough to distort the words of the minister to her own purposes; an admission which indicated for the moment a con-

That this had, however, already become evident, was exemplified by the fact that upon some rumour of the kind being addressed to the Duchess de Rohan, coupled with an inference that the infidelity of Madame de Verneuil had become known to the King, young duchess and gaily replied: "What it is anticipate? How was it possible for love to nestle between a mouth and chin which are always interfering and each other?"

* Sully, Mém., vol. v, pp. 49-53. Dreux de Radier, vol. vi, Saint-Edme, pp. 222, 223.

It is scarcely doubtful that the present incautious proceeding of the marquise tended to shake the confidence which Henry had hitherto felt in an affection so admirably simulated, that it might have inspired in an individual of far inferior rank. He could not overlook the fact that Madame de Verneuil had presumed to declare herself hostile to his favourite minister, and had even made a tool of one of the princes of the blood; an affront to himself which he resented after his accustomed fashion, by withdrawing himself from her society, and assiduously appearing in the private circle of the Queen.

On this occasion, however, week succeeded week, the monarch still continued to avoid the enraged favourite; and even occasionally alluded to her with a contempt which stung her haughty and presumptuous spirit beyond endurance.

The melting away, her flatterers dispersing, and her friends becoming estranged; nor could she conceal from herself that if she failed shortly to discover some method of estranging Henry from the Queen, and once more asserting her ewn influence, all her greatness would be scattered to the winds. Her vanity was also as deeply involved as her ambition, for she had hitherto believed her power over the affections of the King to be so entire that he could not liberate himself from her thrall; yet now, in the zenith of her beauty, in the pride of her intellect, and in the very climax of her favour, she found herself suddenly abandoned, as if the effort had not cost a single struggle to her royal lover.

Capeágue, vol. viii, p. 130.

Marie de Medicis, meanwhile, ma happy. and cared not to look back upon the past; she sought not to look forward into the future; to her the present was all in all; and she began to encourage bright dreams of domestic bliss, by which she had never before been visited since the first brief month of her marriage. So greatly indeed did her new-born happiness embellish the exulting Queen, that it was me this period that the profligate monarch declared to several of his confidential friends, that had she not been his wife, his greatest desire would have been to possess her as a mistress.* The whole of her little court felt the influence of her delight; she lavished on all sides the most costly gifts | she surrounded the King with amusements of every description; and day after day the heart of the irritated favourite was embittered by the reports which reached her of the unprecedented guiety and splendour of the Queen's private circle.

Richelieu, La Mère et le Fils, vol. i, p. 17.

As the dissension which had arisen between Sully and the Count Soissons rather increased in intensity than yielded the royal expostulation, Henry resolved give a public proof of his continued regard an minister; and for this purpose he caused him to be informed an his way Normandy (whither he was about to proceed in order to investigate the truth of certain rumours which had reached him of a meditated insurrection in that province), he would pass by Rosny, and should claim hospitality for one day with his whole court. As the King was on the eve of his departure, Sully once in the capital, and by travelling with great speed, he reached the château four days before his expected guests, for whose reception he made the magnificent preparations of which so brief an interval would admit. As the approaches to the domain were not yet completed, and it was necessary to level the road by which their Majesties would arrive, the duke, in order to accomplish this object, incautiously caused a canal by which it was traversed, and which bridge still unbuilt, to be dammed up; and this arrangement made, he directed his whole attention internal decorations of the castle. Unfortunately, however, while his royal and noble guests still seated is the elaborate and costly banquet which had been prepared for them, a terrific storm burst over the edifice; information was brought in host that the waters become so swollen as to have overflowed their banks, while the pent-up channel which is had VOL. I.

just driven back, had inundated the court, and pouring itself in a dense volume through the offices. The alarm instantly became general; the Queen, princesses, and the ladies of the court, sought refuge in the upper rooms of the castle, whither, as the danger momentarily increased, they soon by Henry his retinue; meanwhile Sully gave instant orders that workmen should be dispatched to clear the bed of the canal, and thus afford an escape invading element. This was happily plished without any loss of life; and the accident entailed no further evil consequence than the destruction of all the fruits and confectionary by which the banquet have terminated. After this misadventure tho court proceeded to Caen, where at the close of a patient investigation, the King withdrew the government of the city from M. de Crevecceur Montmorency, who accused of being engaged in a treasonable correspondence with the Duke de Bouillon, the Count d'Auvergne, and the Duke de la Trémouille, his relative, and bestowed upon M. de Bellefonds.† Hence the royal party removed to Rouen, where Henry succeeded in reestablishing perfect order throughout whole province of Lower Normandy.

his return to Paris, the King learnt that M. de Soissons, who had declined accompany him in journey, so deeply his visit Rosny, the purpose of which he had comprehended upon the instant, that he had resolved in consequence to quit the kingdom. As the voluntary expatriation of princes of the blood tended weaken weaken and undermine his authority, Henry directed MM. de Bellièvre and de Sillery to wait upon the count, and to assure him that, so soon as he produced certain proof of the culpability of the Duke de Sully, he should receive ample satisfaction for the alleged affront; but that until such proof was furnished abould continue to protect the minister, to consider him innocent of the offence imputed to him. The chancellor was, moreover, instructed to inquire into the motive which had induced Prince to declare his intention of leaving France.

* Sully, Mean., vol. v, pp. 54, 55.

† Bernadin Gigault de Bellefonds.

- V

-

To this message M. de Soissons coldly replied by observing that he had been insulted by the duke, to whom he had given no cause of offence; but that as it nevertheless appeared by the statement to which he had just listened, that it was the pleasure of his Majesty to defend accused rather than the accuser, he considered that he need not advance any further reason for absenting himself from the kingdom. After the departure of MM. de Bellièvre and de Sillery, however, the Prince requested the Duke de Montbazon and the Count de St. Polt to wait upon the sovereign, in order to explain to him his reason for quitting the country; to assure him of the regret which he felt that recent circumstances had him mother alternative; and to his Majesty to pardon him if he ventured to take his leave through the medium of these in friends, rather than by appearing in person incur the risk of aggravating his displeasure.

* Rohan, Monthazon.

† François d'Orienns-Longueville, Count - Pol, Governor Picardy.

144

Having seen the two nobles depart upon their mission, M. Soissons mounted his horse, and at proceeded to Paris, to make the necessary preparations in the journey which he contemplated; but before he had taken any definitive to that effect he was rejoined by his friends, who had been directed by the King to follow him with all speed, and to explain to him that he altogether mistaken the message intrusted to the chancellor, message intrusted to the chancellor, tection which his Majesty had declared his intention of affording M. de Sully, was against his threats of personal violence; while in the second place, they were instructed inform him is the King strictly enjoined him will quit Paris, as a want of obedience upon like point would prove very prejudicial to his Majesty's interests; and, finally, they authorised is assure him that, in the event of his compliance with the royal wishes, a should receive ample satisfaction in the affront of which we complained.

given no ground the apprehensions expressed by monarch for the safety of his minister; and that he had never entertained any design injure the sovereign; while the knowledge that his withdrawal from the country might have such a tendency, was a more powerful preventive to his departure than "though and been and by a hundred chains;" and that all he required from his adversary was a public acknowledgment of the offence which he are committed against him.

.

The concession of the irate Prince was followed by a still greater one on the part of the minister; who anxious to relieve the mind of his royal master from the annoyance which he felt at a quarrel in which every noble of the court had taken part, and which threatened to become inveterate from day to day, addressed a letter to de Soissons, wherein, although he explicitly denied "having uttered the expression which was imputed to him," he overwhelmed the Prince with the most elaborate and hyperbolical assurances of respect and devotion; declaring "that he would rather die than forget himself."

This submissive letter was accepted as an apology; and a hollow pure between in disputants are thus effected, which restored for a time the tranquillity of the

On the 2nd of February, 1604, the Queen man invited participate in a ceremony which, had she been less happy and hopeful than she chanced to be a that particular period, could not have failed to excite in her breast feelings of irritation annoyance. This reception of Alexandre-Monsieur, the second legitimated son of a monarch and d'Estrées, into the order of the Knights of Malta. The King having decided such should be the good of is young Prince, was anxious that he should a once assume the name and habit of the Order; and he accordingly wrote to the Grand Master to request that he would dispatch the necessary patents, which were forwarded without delay, accompanied by the profuse acknowledgments of that dignitary. Ill order to increase the solemnity and magnificence of the inauguration, Henry summoned with the capital the Grand Commanders of France and Champagne, instructing them to bring in their respective trains - many other commanders and knights as could be induced to accompany them; and he selected as the scene of the ceremony the church of the Augustines; an arrangement which was, however, abandoned the entreaty of the Commander de Villeneuf, the Ambassador of the Order, who deemed it more dignified that it should take place in and of the Temple, which are of their principal establish-

At the hour indicated the two sovereigns accordingly drove — Temple in — carriage, Alexandre-Monsieur being seated between them | and on alighting — the principal entrance of the edifice, the King delivered the little Prince into the hands of the — Prior who was there awaiting him, attended by twelve commanders and twelve knights, by whom he — ducted up — centre sisle. The church was magnificently ornamented; and the altar, which blazed with gold jewels, already surrounded by Cardinal de Gondy, the Papal Nuncio, and a sum of bishops, attired in their splendid sacerdotal vestments. In the centre of the choir a throne had been erected for their Majesties, covered with cloth of gold; around the chairs of grouped the princes, princesses, other grandees of the court, including the ambassadors of Spain and Venice, the Connétable-Duke Montmorency, Chancellor, the seven presidents of Parliament, and the knights of the Order of the Holy Ghost.

The coup d'ail one of extraordinary splendour. The whole of the sacred edifice was brilliantly illuminated by the innumerable tapers which up the several shrines, and which casting their clear light upon every surrounding object, brought into full relief the dazzling and gleaming weapons that glittered on all sides. The organ pealed out its deepest and most impressive harmony; and not a sound was heard throughout the vast building as the Grand Prior, with his train of knights and nobles, led the youthful neophyte to place assigned him. The ceremony commenced by the consecration of the sword, and the change a raiment, which typified that about to take place in the duties of the Prince by his entrance into an Order which enjoined alike godliness and virtue. The mantle was withdrawn from his shoulders, and his outer garment removed by knights who stood immediately around him; which was presented alternately with a see of white satin elaborately embroidered in gold all silver, having alcoves enriched pearls, waist-belt with jewels, a cap of black velvet ornamented with a small white plume and a band of large pearls, and a tunic of black taffets. In this costume the Prince was conducted the high alter by the Duke and Duchess de Vendôme, followed by a commander to assist him during the ceremony; and they are no taken their places than Arnaud de Sorbin,* Bishop of Nevers, delivered short oration eulogistic of the greatness and excellence of the brotherhood of which he about to become member. The prelate then performed solomn high mass; and when he had terminated the reading of the gospel, Alexandre-Monsieur knelt before him with taper of white in hand, to solicit admission to the Order. He had no sooner bent his knee than the King rose, descended the steps of the throne, and placed both for his piety and his learning. He was originally curate of the parish of Ste. Pay, where he had been placed by Georges, I and I d'Armagnac, Bishop of Toulouse, who afterwards removed him from that parish, in order to keep him near his person. The Cardinal d'Est, aware of his great worth and extraordinary talents, conferred upon him the rank of doctor of divinity of the cathedral of Auch, the capital of his archbishopric; but he did not retain I long, having been recalled by his first patron to assume the same position in his church at Toulouse, where he was universally loved and respected. He was successively lecturer to Charles IX., Henry III. and Henry IV.; and was consecrated, on his elevation to the see of Nevers, by the Cardinal de Gondy, Bishop of Paris. Monseigneur de Sorbin died in Nevers, on the 1st of May, 1606.

-

himself by his side, saying aloud, that is put off for awhile is sovereign dignity that he might perform his duty is parent, by pledging himself is when is Prince should have attained is sixteenth year, is should take the vows, and in all things conform himself to the of the institution. The procession then passed out of the church in the same order as it is entered; the young Prince immediately put into possession of the income arising from the commandery, which income arising from the commandery, which is estimated it forty thousand annual livres.

MARKET STREET

This ceremony are followed by a series of court festivals, which were abruptly terminated by the arrival of a courier from Lorraine with intelligence of death of the Duchess de Bar; an event which it well known would deeply affect the King, that the principal personages of the court, and the members of his council, determined to go in a body to communicate it, in order that they might offer him the best consolation in their power. This, however, was a grief beyond their sympathy; the affection which Henry bore towards his sister having been unshaken throughout their lives; and the distressing intelligence no imparted to him than he burst into passionate flood of tears, and desired that every one should withdraw, and leave him alone with God. He was sooner obeyed caused the windows of his closet to be closed, admittance refused to all councrs: after which he threw himself upon his bed, and ahandoned himself to all the bitterness of a sorrow alike unexpected and irremediable. Several days passed away in this ungovernable grief; and when its violence at length partially subaided, King issued worder that whole deepest mourning, and that no one should presume to approach him in any other garb. only, therefore, all the great officers of the and all the court functionaries, from M. le Grand to the lacqueys in the ante-chambers, clad in the same sable livery, but even the foreign ambassadors, auxious alike to avoid giving offence to the monarch, and to escape inconvenience of being excluded from his presence and thus rendered incapable of furthering the interests of their several sovereigns. adopted similar habit. The mourning of the Queen and her household more than satisfied all the exigences of the King; for Marie de Medicis not only sympathised deeply in the sufferings of her royal consort, but also that in Madame Catherine she had lost a sincere friendthat rarest of all luxuries to a crowned head !-- and it was consequently in her outward apparel alone that she gave testimony of her unfeigned regret, for in abandoming her usual garb, she also abandoned every species amusement, in forbade all movement in immediate circle beyond that which was necessitated by the service of her attendants.

L'Etoile, vol. ai, pp. 152-154.

- 2

There however, one exception to general concession, and that one was consequently so spicuous as to excite instant remark. The Papal Nuncio had no intention to conform to universal demonstration which had draped the throne and palaces of France in sables; and the monarch no sooner escertained the fact than he caused it to be made known to the prelate, that he had no desire to oblige him to assume a garb repugnant to his feelings, but that he requested to be spared his presence until the period of his own mourning was an end. This greatly embarrassed Nuncio, who once that, by persisting in the course he had adopted, he should be deprived of the frequent audiences essential limit interests of Sovereign-Pontiff; and, accordingly, he resolved no longer to offer any opposition to the express wishes of the King; but after having written to Rome to explain that he had put on mourning simply to secure himself against the exclusion, and thereby me enabled watch over the welfare of the Holy See, he ultimately followed the example of those around him, and demanded permission in his turn to offer his compliof condolence to in monarch.

This he did, however, in a manner little calculated to reconcile Henry to the reluctance which he had exhibited in performing this duty; for, after having declared his sympathy with the suffering of his Majesty, he went on to remark that those who knew who he was, and for whom spoke, could not to be such a by such an assertion; although he, so part, could assure his Majesty of his sincerity, as while others weeping over the body of Madame, who had died a Protestant and beretic, his and himself mourning for her soul.

To this unexpected exordium King replied considerable indignation, that he had man faith in the mercy of God than to believe that a Princess, who had passed her life in the fulfilment of all her social duties, was destined to be condemned from the nature of her creed; and that he himself entertained no doubt of her salvation. After which he diverted the conversation into another channel, with a tone and manner sufficiently indicative to the Nuncio that he must not presume to recur to so delicate a subject.

The body of Madame was, at King's desire, conveyed to Vendôme, and deposited beside that of her mother; a dispensation to this effect having been, after many delays, accorded by the Pope; although too late for the duchess to have been made aware, this, the wish of her heart, had been conceded.

At this period a new cause of uneasiness aroused the sovereign from his private grief. To his extreme surprise he had received intelligence from the Sieur de Barrault; the secret deliberations of his council were forthwith communicated the King of Spain, without a trace of the source whence this important information could be derived; and for a time the mystery defied all the investigations which were bestowed upon by Henry and ministers. At length, however, long impunity rendered the culprit daring; and it ascertained that Philip III. was in possession of copies of the several letters written by the French monarch to the King of England, the Prince of Orange, and other friendly powers, all inimical Spain; circumstance which rendered apparent this troachery must be the work of official in whom the greatest confidence had hitherto been placed; and steps were forthwith taken to secure the identification of the traitor, which me effected through me agency of another equally unworthy subject of Henry himself. A certain native of Bordeaux, named Jean Leyré (otherwise Rafis), who had been one of the most violent partisans of the League, and who had been banished from France, had entered the Spanish service, and long enjoyed a pension from the sovereign of that country, in recompense of the zeal and ardour with which he rendered every evil office in his power the kingdom whence he had been we out.

* Cayet, Chron. Septen.,

† Emeric Gobier, Sieur de Barrault, ambaseadou — the court of Spain.

1460

.

Circumstances, however, tended to Leyré useful to Philip, who had, as we have shown, secured much agent, and the ill-acquired pension accordingly been diminished; while the traitor had no difficulty in perceiving that the favour which he hitherto experienced his new master was lessened in the same proportion; a conviction which him to make vigorous effort to obtain the permission of his offended sovereign to return to France. In order to effect this object, Leyré attached himself to such of his countrymen as were, like himself, domiciliated in Spain; and finally made acquaintance of Jean Blas, who, in a moment of confidence, revealed to him that a secretary of the Count de Rochepot# (the predecessor of M. Barrault as ambassador at the court of Madrid), who will subsequently returned the service of the Duke de Villeroy, and maintained a correspondence with the Spanish secretaries of state, Don Juan Idiaque Francheséz, and Prada, to whom, in consideration of a pension of twelve hundred of gold, he betrayed the most important of the French cabinet.

EII A

This man, whose name was Nicholas l'Hôte, menthe son of an old and trusted follower of the Duke de Villeroy, to whose family his own ancestors had been attached several generations; while he himself was the godson of the Duke, who had obtained for him the honourable of secretary to M. de Rochepot, when nobleman accepted the embassy Spain. On the return of the Count to France, L'Hôte, whose services were no longer him, was dismissed, and, upon an application to his old patron, was unhesitatingly received into his bureau; where, believing loyalty and devotion to himself were beyond all suspicion, he was employed by M. de Villeroy in decyphering his despatches; an occupation which afforded him ample means of continuing his nefarious correspondence with his Spanish confederates.

Antoine de Silly, Count Commercy, Count Rochepot, knight of the Order of the Holy Ghost.

Leyré had no sooner obtained this important information, and convinced himself of its probability by various circumstances connected with L'Hôte which he was careful to learn from other sources, than he proceeded to the residence of M. de Barrault, and solicited an interview on business connected with his government. The ambassador, who still striving by every method in his power to discover the author of the active and harassing treason by which his official measures were perpetually trammelled, with a vague hope that the object of this request might prove to be connected with the mystery which so disagreeably occupied his thoughts, at once granted the required audience; when Leyré, having explained his own position, and expressed the deepest contrition for his past disloyalty, together with his ardent desire to obliterate, by an essential service to his rightful sovereign, a fault which was now irreparable, proceeded to inform M. - Barrault that is was prepared to reveal a system of treachery which was even at that moment in operation to prejudice of France; but added that, as in communicating is secret in the compelled immediately to escape from Spain, he would not consent to a so until the ambassador pledged himself that he should MARK.

be permitted to return to his own country with a free pardon, and pension to-secure him against want; I concluded by saying an should it be beyond the power of M. de Barrault to give such a pledge without III royal authority, and IIII he should consider in necessary in mention him by name, and to it the nature of III promised service to his government, he must entreat him in make this revelation solely in the monarch, by means to commit the affair to writing.

To the term M. de Barrault readily agreed; but after the departure of Leyré, conceiving that the extreme mystery enjoined by that personage was merely intended to enhance the implied value of his revelation; and convinced, moreover, that the sovereign would immediately communicate such a circumstance to his ministers, he addressed himself, as he was in the habit of doing, to the Duke de Villeroy, from whom he shortly afterwards received the required promise of both pardon and pension.

were, however, no sooner placed in the hands of the Leyré, than, perceiving that they bore the counter-signature of Villeroy, instead of the of Lomenie,* Brienne, de Lomenie, Seigneur de la Ville-aux-Clerce, ambassador-extraordinary England, in 1595, and secretary of state, was the representative of a distinguished family of Berri, whose father, Marshal de Brienne, registrar of the council, fell a victim to the massacre of St. Batholomew. He died in 1628, bequeathing to the Royal Library three hundred and forty manuscript volumes, known as the "Manuscripts of Brienne."

which would have been the case had they been forwarded through the personal medium of the King, he revealed the whole transaction to M. de Barrault; representing that the traitor being under the roof of the minister by whom they had been dispatched, and entirely in confidence, already be apprised of danger, as well as fully prepared to avert it by the destruction of his betrayer; and accordingly he declared that, in order to save his life, he must at once get into the saddle, and endeavour distance to pursuit which the fail to be made with a view to seize his person.

This reasoning walld that the ambassador not only consented to his immediate departure, but also caused him to be accompanied by his own secretary, M. Descartes, by whom was to be introduced to the sovereign. The precaution proved salutary, as no later than the following morning legal officers were sent to the house of Leyré, who being unable to find him, mounted in their turn, and took the road to France. Fortunately for the fugitives they had, however, already travelled considerable distance; and although hotly pursued, they was alleged reach Bayonne without impediment, whence they proceeded to Fontainebleau to report their arrival to the King.

Before they reached their destination, they encountered the Duke de Villeroy, who was on his way to his château of Juvisy, and to whom Descartes concealing and their errand, concealing of the culprit whom they were vol. 1.

about to accuse. The duke listened incredulously; and when the travellers offered, should it meet with his approbation, to return at once to Paris and arrest his secretary, in order that he might himself deliver him up to the monarch, he declined to profit by the proposal, desiring them to fulfil their mission as the service of the King required; and adding, that he should shortly join them at Fontaineblesu, where he was to be met on the morrow by the accused party, when the necessary steps for ascertaining the truth of the statement might be at once taken; but that until he had obtained an audience of the monarch, and ascertained his pleasure, all coercive measures would be premature.

With this unsatisfactory reply Leyré and his panion were fain to content themselves; and having, as they were desired to do, delivered into the hands of the duke the detailed despatch of M. de Barrault with which they had been intrusted, they saw him calmly resume his way to Juvisy, while they continued their route to Fontaineblean.

Early the day de Villeroy in his turn reached the palace, and at once proceeded to the royal closet; where, the command of the King, he began to read aloud papers which had been thus obtained; he had not proceeded beyond name of the when Henry vehemently interrupted him by exclaiming:

■ And where ■ this L'Hôte, your secretary? Have you caused him to be arrested?"

"I think, Sire;" was the reply; "that he is at my hôtel; but he is still at liberty."

THE RESERVE AND ADDRESS OF THE PERSON NAMED IN

"How, Sir!" said the King still more angrily; "you think that he is a your hôtel, and you have not had him about since you were informed of this act of treason, to which you should at once have attended? See to it instantly, and secure the culprit."

The Duke de Villeroy quitted the royal presence in anxious haste, and made his way to the capital with all speed, feeling convinced that should be fail in arresting his delinquent secretary be could not escape the suspicion of the King. L'Hôte had, however, profited by the intervening time to explain his predicament to the Spanish Ambassador, who instantly perceived that not must be lost. I were accordingly provided, the detected traitor, accompanied by steward of the ambassador, made the best of his way to Meaux, whence they were to travel post to Luxembourg.

Orders had, meanwhile, been dispatched to all the postmasters not to supply horses to any traveller answering the description of L'Hôte; but as he were a Spanish costume similar to that of his companion he might still have passed undetected, had he not, while endeavouring to mount at Meaux, trembled so violently as to fall from the saddle; a circumstance which attracted the attention of the groom who held his stirrup, and who immediately inferred that he must be some who iflying justice. On re-entering the house he related the incident to his master; and upon comparing the height, and bulk, and features of the fugitive with the written detail furnished by the authorities, both parties became convinced they had suffered the very individual whom they missioned to arrest, to pursue his journey in the frontier through their agency; and thus impressed, the postmaster hastened to M. Prévôt Maréchaux,* who lost no time in following upon in track. The fugitives had, however, changed horses with anxious functionary and his attendants could arrive to interpose their authority; but despite the darkness of the night, which prevented them from obtaining a glimpse of those whom they were endeavouring to overtake, they persevered with confidence, being before the close of second stage, a ferry must be passed, which would necessarily detain the travellers.

The event proved the accuracy of their calculation, II of the hour compelling L'Hôte and his companion to rouse the reluctant ferryman from his rest,

The Prévôts des Maréchaux were megistrates whose duties consisted in trying vagrants, and persons who could not prove their identity; culprits previously sentenced to corporal punishments of fine; soldiers, highway robbers, and the members of illicit societies. The Prévôts des Maréchaux took the title of Equery-Councillors of the King, and their place on the bench of the criminal court was immediately after that of the presiding judge.

a which involved considerable delay; and they consequently scarcely midway of a river when they heard the clatter of horses' hoofs upon the bank, the voice of the maréchal hoursely shouting conductor instantly return, the should hanged for his disobedience.

•

The fugitives at once felt that they are the land they permit him to comply; and accordingly the Spaniard drew his sword, threatening to bury it in the heart of the affrighted ferryman should be retreat at inch; while L'Hôte, at the was traitor, could only urge the boat forward by the rope, groaning at intervals: "I am a dead man!"

On gaining the opposite shore neither of the attempted to remount; but, abandoning their horses, they set off their best speed on foot; while the postilion by whom they had been accompanied, had great difficulty, during the return of the boat, in accuring the three animals who man thus suddenly committed to his sole charge.

L'Hôte, terrified and bewildered by the voices of the Prévôt and his men, who had, in their turn, passed the ferry, and unable in the darkness to discern any path by which he might secure accept, parted from his companion, and continued his course along the river-bank; until, attracted by some sallows which as supposed to be an island in the middle of the stream, he threw himself into the water in order to reach it; but soon getting beyond his depth, and being unable to regain the shore, as well as alarmed by the rapid approach of his pursuers, he perished miserably; and was found on the following morning not twenty yards from the spot where he had ahandoned the land.

The Spanish steward, who was captured on the morrow in a hay-loft about leagues the river, conducted to Paris with corpse, which was consigned the prison of the Châtelet, where it was publicly exposed during days, and then drawn upon a hurdle to the place of execution, where it was torn asunder by horses; the quarters of the body being subsequently attached to four wheels which were placed in the principal roads leading to the capital.

The ignominy with which the body treated, as Sully asserts, in accordance with the request of the Duke de Villeroy, who could not disguise from himself the difficulty of his own position; nor was it until after several days' deliberation that Henry, remembering the extent of the confidence placed by the duke in the traitor by whom his interests had been so seriously compromised, sufficiently control his indignation to assure him that he in wise suspected him of complicity, but should continue to regard him with the same trust and favour as heretofore. people were, however, less amenable; nor did they scruple to access III de Villeroy of participation in the crime of his follower. They could not forget that he had been an active member of the League; and they looked with jealousy upon every transaction in which I was involved; while, fortunately for the duke, the King was ultimately prevailed upon to believe in the sincerity of his regret, and to remember that since he had attached himself to the royal cause, he had rendered essential service to the country; nor did the murmurs of his enamies, who had began to hope that the treason of his secretary must involve his own ruin, induce monarch to exhibit towards him either distrust or severity; so lenient, indeed, did the King show himself, that having been detained for a short time in prison, the Spaniard who had been taken with L'Hôte in the liberty, as too insignificant for trial, and as the mere tool of his master.*

While this affair had monopolised the attention of the King, Madame de Verneuil, enraged by a continual estrangement which threatened the most dangerous results to herself; and resolved at all hazards to recal the attention of the monarch, began to assert more openly and arrogantly than ever her claim upon his hand, and the right of her son to the succession; while the time time her brother, the Count d'Auvergne, pretexting a quarrel with M. de Soissons, quitted court, and proceeded to the Low Countries, where had for some time past been actively engaged in organizing a conspiracy, in support of this extravagant and hopeless pretension.

* L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 185—193. Matthieu, Hist. des Derniers Troubles, Book 11, pp. 435—437. Sully, Mén., vol. v. 109—121. Menersy, vol. x, pp. 254—257.

The double personage enacted by the marquise was one which necessitated the utmost tact and caution, for was aware that involved her liberty, if not her life; and consequently, in order to secure the sympathy of the people, while she was at the same time exciting the passions of those discontented nobles who being remnants of the League still retained an unconquerable jealousy of the power by which they had been prostrated, she the deepest and winlent repentance for her past errors; and william the permission of the King to retire from France with her children, that she might expiate, by a future of retirement and piety, the faults of which she had been guilty. To this request Henry, without moment's hesitation, replied by the assurance that she was perfect liberty to withdraw from the country whenever she saw fit to do so; adding, however, that he would not permit the expatriation of her children; and that before her own departure she deliver into his hands the written promise of marriage, which, although according to the decision of all the high ecclerisation of the kingdom totally void and valueless, she had nevertheless been so ill-advised as to render a source of uneasiness and annoyance to the Queen.

This demand was, however, arrogantly rejected; marquise declaring that she would neither part from her children, nor from a document that rendered her the legal wife of the King; a decision which so incensed Marie de Medicis that she bitterly reproached her royal consort for an act of weakness by which her whole married life had been embittered; and refused to listen any compromise until the obnoxious passes should be restored.

Thus circumstanced, Henry at length resolved to exert all his authority; and despairing of success through the medium of a third person, he determined himself to visit the marquise, and to exact its restitution. At this period, however, Madame de Verneuil was too deeply involved in the conspiracy of her brother to prove a willing agent in her own defeat, and she accordingly received the monarch with an unvielding insolence for which he was totally unprepared; violently declaring that the promise had been freely given, and that the birth of her son had rendered it valid. In vain did the King resist upon the absurdity of her pretensions; only repited by sneering at the extraction of the Queen, and asserting her own equality with a petty Tuscan princess, whose gestures and language were, as she declared, the jest of the whole court. The King, outraged by m gross an impertinence, imperatively commanded her silence upon all that regarded the dignity m pleasure of his royal consort; a display of firmness which more and more exasperated the favourite, who retorted by observing that since the monarch had seen fit to retract a solemn engagement, and thus to brand herself and her children with disgrace, an only remained for her to reiterate her demand for permission to leave the country, with her son and daughter, and her father and brother, both of whom were prepared to share her fortunes, gloomy as they might be, the fear of God not permitting her to recur to the past without the most profound repentance.

To this persistence Henry coldly answered that in his turn he reiterated his declaration that she was at liberty to retire to England whenever she thought proper to do so, and to place herself under the protection of her kinsman, the Earl of Lennox, but that he would not suffer any other member of her family to share her exile; nor should she herself be permitted to reside either in Spain or the Countries, where the treasonable practices of the Count d'Auvergne and the party of the discontented nobles with whom she had recently allied herself, had already given him just cause for displeasure.

Madame de Verneuil, perfectly unabashed by this reproach, assured the King and a smile of haughty defiance, that she could be as firm as himself where her own honour and that of her children was involved; and added that should he persist in demanding the restoration of the written promise by which he had triumphed over her virtue, he might seek it where it was to be obtained, as he should never receive from her hands; while as regarded a extrangement from himself, it had ceased to be a subject of regret, as since had become old, he had also become distrustful and suspicious, and his affected favour only tended to render her an object of public jealousy and indignation.

Outraged by this last insult, the King rose angrily from his seat, and without vouchsafing another word to the imperious marquise quitted the room. It was not, however, in the nature of Henry IV. to find himself once more in presence of his managed; and although the indignity to which he had been subjected throughout the interview just described, sufficed to inspire him only with disgust for the woman who had thus emancipated herself from every observance respect towards wo own person, and decency towards the Queen, it I nevertheless certain that his very anger was mingled with admiration; and that not even his sense of what was due to him both as a monerch and as a man could overcome the attraction of Madame Nerneuil. Their temporary separation, during which he had failed to find any equivalent for her wit and vivacity, gave an added charm to every word she uttered; he sighed to ber once more and happy, devoting her intellect and her fascinations to his amusement; and even while complaining to Sully of her impertinent and uncompromising boldness, he could not forbear uttering a panegyric upon her better qualities, which convinced minister that their misunderstanding was not destined to be of long duration; an opinion in which he was confirmed when the weak and vacillating Henry, at the close of this enthusiastic apostrophe, proceeded to institute a comparison between the marquise and the Queen, which the latter suffered on every point. The earnest wish to please of the favourite was contrasted with the coldness of Marie de Medicis: the wit of the one with the haughty superciliousness of the other; in short, the longer that the King discoursed upon the subject, the more perfect became the con100 viction of his listener that the late meeting, tempestuous as was, had sufficed to restore to Madame de Verneuil at least a portion of her former power.

-

"I have no society in my wife;" pursued the monarch in the neither amuses nor interests and. She is harsh and unyielding, alike in manner and in speech; and no concession either to my humour or my When I would fain meet her with warmth, she receives me coldly; and I am glad to escape from her apartments to seek for amusement elsewhere. My poor cousin de Guise is my only refuge; and although she occasionally tells me some home-truths, yet she does with so much good humour that I cannot take offence, and only laugh at her sallies."

It was sufficiently evident at that moment that the "poor cousin" of the monarch, beautiful and accomplished though she was, faded into insignificance before the pampered and presuming favourite.

Perhaps;" says Sully, with a calm sententiousness better suited to some question of finance; "the Queen had only herself to blame for not having released him from the snares of her rival, and detached him from every other affair of gallantry, as a appeared to me perfectly sincere when he urged me to induce her to conform a tastes, and character of evidently possessed little knowledge of a woman's nature, and the workings of a woman's pride. Wh have seen what the "tastes" of Henry IV., and what was the "character of his mind;" and although it would undoubtedly have proved both pleasant and convenient to the harassed minister that Marie de Medicis should have devoured her grief and mortification, and have received the mistresses of the King as the intimates of her circle, it was a result little to be anticipated from a pure-hearted wife, who saw herself the victim of every intriguing beauty whose novelty or notoriety sufficed to attract the dissolute fancy of her consort. Even ..... the very moment in which M. de Sully records this reproach upon Queen, he admits Henry was once more in the thrall of the marquise, and _____ the obsequious friend of Mademoiselle Guise; and yet he seeks to visit upon Marie the odium of a disunion which can only be, with any fairness, attributed to the King himself; who, even while professing to return to his allegiance as a husband, was openly indulging in a system of licentiousness calculated to degrade him in the eyes of a virtuous and exemplary WOMAN.

M. de Sully, great as he was in his official capacity,

* Sully, Mém., .... v, p 137.

That Marie de Medicis had many faults cannot be denied by her most zealous biographer, but that she was outraged both as a wife and as a mother is no less certain; and adopting, as we have a right to do, the conjectural style of M. de Sully. Perhaps—we say in our turn—had the Queen, from the period of her marriage, been treated with the deference and respect which were her due, the haraber features of her character might have become softened, and the faults which posterity has been compelled to couple with her name, might never have been committed. Assuredly her period of probation was a bitter one; and ill may be doubted whether the axe of our own eighth Henry were not after all more merciful in reality, than the wire-drawn ill daily-recurring the to which high-spirited woman who was fated to find herself the victim of his vices.

The foreboding of M. de Sully was verified, for within a few days of the interview just recorded between King and Madame de Verneuil, and during the continuance of his estrangement from his wife, it soon became known that the favourite had re-assumed her empire. In vain did the mortified minister protest against this new weakness, and assure his royal master that it could not fail to increase the anger and indignation of Marie de Medicis; Henry only replied by asserting that when Sully should have succeeded in inducing the Queen to change her humour, and to exert herself to please him, instead of persisting in closeting herself with her foreign followers, and permitting them to criticise his conduct and to aggravate his defects, he would forthwith relinquish his bigison with the marquise. Such an answer, however, did not check the zeel of his anxious adviser; who, fearful lest this last schism should prove more important than those by which it had been preceded, and undeterred even by the impatience with which the King listened to his representations, persisted in assailing him with arguments, remonstrances, and warnings, peculiarly unpalatable at all times, but especially so at the very moment in which he had effected a reconciliation with the favourite that promised a renewal of the entertaining intercourse whence he derived so much gratification.

"You have now, Sire;" resolutely urged the undaunted counsellor: " an admirable opportunity of terminating in a manner worthy of your exalted rank, the difficulty by which you are beset; and of ensuring your own future tranquillity. Assume the authority which appertains to you as a sovereign; compel the Queen to silence; above all, strictly forbid her any longer to include in public in those idle murmura lamentations by which your dignity so severely in the eyes of your subjects; and visit with the most condign punishment every disrespectful word of which others may be guilty either towards yourself or her. This effort, Sire, will be insignificant beside others which you have made, and in which your personal tranquility was not involved; be no less courageous in your own cause; and in in in your reputation to be tarnished by weakness incomprehensible in m great and powerful a monarch. By exacting consideration which are your due, you are guilty of no tyranny; for it is the indisputable privilege of every crowned head to enforce both. Let me then entreat of your Majesty, so once to assert yourself, and thus put a period to the domestic differences by which the whole court is convulsed."

"Your advice may be good;" was the evasive reply of the King; "but you do not yet understand or you would be aware that I cannot bring myself to exercise severity against persons with whom I am in habits of intercourse, and especially against a woman."

"In that case, Sire;" said Sully; "you have but one alternative. Exile your mistress from the court, and make the required concessions to the Queen."

"I am prepared to do so;" said Henry hastily; "if, in return for this sacrifice on my part, she will pledge herself no longer to annoy me by her jealousy and violence, and to meet me in the same spirit; but I have little hope of such a result: she is perfectly unable to exercise the necessary self-command, and is perpetually mistaking the impulse of temper for that of reason. Her intolerance and rancour forbid all prospect of sincere harmony between us. She is perpetually threatening her vengeance every woman upon whom I chance to turn my eyes; and even the children of Gabrielle, who were in being before her arrival in the kingdom, are as hateful to her as though she had been personally injured by their birth; nor have I the least reason to anticipate that she will ever overcome so irrational an antipathy. Nor can she be won by kindness and indulgence. Not only have I ever treated her with the respect and deference due to the Queen of a great nation, but even in moments of pecuniary pressure I have been careful, not merely to supply her wants, but also to satisfy her caprices; and that too when I was aware that the sums thus bestowed were to be squandered upon the man rabble whose incessant study it has been to poison her mind against both myself and her adopted country. Would to Heaven, Rosny, that | had followed your advice on her arrival. and compelled the mischievous cabal to recross the Alps; but it is now too late for such regrets; and if you can indeed succeed in inducing the Queen to become amenable to my wishes, and mindulgent to my errors, Ventre Saint-Gris I you will effect a good work, in which I shall be ready to second you. But mark, you must do this apparently upon your responsibility, and be careful not to let her learn that I have authorised such a measure, or you will only defeat your own purpose, and render her more impracticable than ever."*

Such was the unsatisfactory result of the effort made by the minister to reconcile the royal couple; while, in addition to all his other anxieties, he found himself placed in a position once so difficult and so dangerous, that he was a loss how to proceed, until a circumstance fortunately occurred of which he hastened to avail himself. In exchanging the petty court of Florence for that of France, Marie had speedily emancipated herself from which she had been accustomed from her childhood, and become reckless in her expenditure to an excess which constantly disturbed the equanimity of the prudent minister of finance. The current expenses of her household amounted annually to the sum of three hundred and forty-five thousand livres, while she was so lavish to her favourites, that she was constantly applying for further supplies; and on one occasion, when these were withheld, had actually pawned the crown jewels, which it was necessary to redeem by disbursement from the public treasury. In addition to these resources, her income was also considerably increased by gratuities, bribes from contracting parties,* and edicts created in her favour; the last of which were peculiarly obnoxious . Sully, from the . of

* Sully, Mém., vol. v, pp. 139—142.

The French term which I have ventured thus freely to translate, is pos-de-via, and literally signifies a sum of money given to a third party who is able to ensure the success of a bargain or negociation, of whatever nature. Thus, for example, in the granting and acceptance of a lease which has been effected by such means, a contracting parties jointly pay down the stipulated amount, irrespective of the value of the lease, for the benefit of the person through whose agency it has been concluded; while so general is the system throughout the country, even to this day, that servants give a pos-de-via to the individual to whom they are indebted for their situation, in which instance, however, the bribe or recompense is also called a deraier 4 Diex, their harassing the people without any national benefit; and was accordingly with great reluctance, and frequently not without expostulation, that he was to countersign these documents.

The circumstance to which we have alluded as affording to Sully an opening for the delicate negociation with which he was intrusted by the King, was an offer made to Marie de Medicis of the sum of eighty thousand livres, in the event of her causing an edict to be issued in favour of the officials of the salt-works of Languedoc, which she forthwith dispatched to the minister by M. d'Argouges,* with a request that he would use his influence to obtain it.

Having made himself acquainted with the nature and tendency of the edict, M. de Sully desired the to inform her Majesty that he was of opinion that sovereign might safely authorise its operation without any injury to the public interests; but added that he feared the moment was an unpropitious one as regarded the Queen herself, King being deeply offended by some of her recent proceedings; nor would he advise her to venture upon such an application until she had succeeded in disarming his anger; for which purpose he respectfully suggested that she should endeavour to conciliate her royal consort by some concession, which he would exert all his ability to enhance in the eyes of his master | and in every way endeavour to advance her interests as | had already done on several previous occasions.

* Queen's Queen's His son was first president of the Parliament of Brittany, and subsequently privy

Marie, eager to possess herself of the large sum thus proffered acceptance, consented to his advice; and decided upon addressing a letter in the King, expressive of her regret at the coldness which between them, and her willingness to meet his wishes, should a condescend to explain them.

letter, having been read and approved by the finance-minister, forthwith forwarded from Fontainebleau where Marie de was then residing, to the King ... Paris; but it ..... not without a struggle that the Queen had compelled berself to such an im of selfabnegation; and her courier was sooner dispatched than she complained in bitter terms to M. de Sully of the humiliations to which she subjected by the infatuation of the monarch for Madame de Verneuil declaring the she could never submit to look with favour on indulgence upon a mount who ind the presumption to institute comparisons between herself and her reign; who was rearing her children with all the pretensions of princes of the blood royal, and encouraging them in demonstrations of disrespect towards her own person; and who was, moreover, fomenting sedition, by encouraging is discontented nobles is manifestations of disloyalty their monarch; Will Him King, blinded by his passion, made no effort to rebuke, or even to restrain, impertinence.

The minister listened calmly and respectfully to these outpourings of her indignation; but the her reply that it only depended upon herself to annihilate the influence of the favourite, by a system of consideration for the feelings of her royal consort, of which she had not hitherto condescended to test the efficacy. He, moreover, implored her to make the trial; and represented so forcibly the benefit which the accrue by a restoration of domestic peace, that the length admitted the justice of his arguments, and pledged herself to accelerate, by every means in her power, a full and perfect reconciliation.

Gratified by this almost unhoped-for success, Sully shortly afterwards withdrew; and the reply of the King to the letter which she had addressed to him was delivered to Marie when she was surrounded only by her own private circle. I was at once courteous and conciliatory; and it is probable, that had it arrived before the departure of the duke, it would have been acknowledged in the same spirit; but, unfortunately, the Queen had no sooner communicated its contents to her confidential friends, than she was met by the assurance that the monarch had, on the receipt of her missive, carried it in the marquise, where her credulity had excited great amusement; an assertion which was followed by other commentaries so distasteful to her pride, that, instead of persevering in the prudent course she had been to adopt, haughtily 1 informed the royal courier by whom it had been brought that she intrust him with no written reply, but should expect his Majesty on the following day according to his own appointment.

This impolitic demonstration of disrespect excited ancw the resentment of Henry, who openly expressed his indignation in the most unmeasured terms, and that so publicly, that indignation is few hours Marie informed of every particular; and in breach which Sully had fondly flattered himself that he was about to heal, became wider and more threatening than ever.

vourite was far from affording to the former all the gratification which he anticipated from renewal. The coquetry—to designate it by harsher term—of Madame de Verneuil, irritated the jealousy of the monarch, who could not forget that she had taunted him with his advancing age, and who her unbhashingly encourage the admiration and attention of such of the courtiers as she could induce brave his displeasure; while her lavish expenditure and unceasing demands, slike upon his patience and his purse, involved him in perpetual difficulties with his finance-minister, which her extravagant attempts assume the airs, and to usurp the privileges of quasi-royalty, did not tend to diminish.

The French King was, in fact, at this period, the victim of his own vices; the sovereign of a great and powerful nation, without a home or a hearth, a wifeless husband, and a discontented lover; tenderly attached to all his children, without being able to confer a favour upon the offspring of one mother, without incurring the resentment of the other; and while feeling himself degraded by the thrall in which he lived, totally devoid of the moral courage necessary to his escape from so disgraceful a bondage.

Sully, Mém., vol. v. pp. 144—146.

It is in moments such as these that virtue and honour assert their well-earned privileges without even the effort of enforcing them. Weary of his perpetual discomfort, harassed by the heartless conduct of his mistress, and pining for the mental repose which he greatly needed, Henry once more turned towards his wife as his only probable and legitimate haven of rest; but, hopeless of success through his own agency, he again addressed himself to Sully for assistance and support.

Suddenly summoned by the monarch, the manster presented himself the Tuileries, where he found him in the orangery, in which he had taken refuge from a shower of rain, pale, agitated, and anxious. The subject of his reconciliation with the Queen was mooted on the instant, repeatedly man upon Sully his advice as to the best and surest method of effecting Conscious that his counsels had hitherto been eit disregarded, rendered abortive by the King hims the duke endeavoured to escape this new demand up his patience, but Henry was peremptory.

" then you command me speak, Sire;" he said at length; "I will be frank. In order to plish the object which you have in view, you only pursue one course. Put the sea between yourself and five individuals by whom you beset, and cause as many others to pass the Alps."

"Your first suggestion is practicable;" was the reply: "there is nothing prevent in from banishing malcontents who are conspiring in my very court, but I am differently situated with regard to the Italians; for, in addition with the which I should draw down upon myself from mation proverbially vindictive, the Quren would never forgive maffront offered to her favourites. In order to free myself from these, she must be induced herself to propose their return to own country, and I know no more likely than you, Rosny, to effect an object at once so desirable and so imposent. Make the attempt therefore; and should you acceed, I pledge myself from moment take from every intrigue of gallantry. Reflect upon I have suggested in my turn; and consider the means by which this may be accomplished with the least possible delay."

So saying, the King, after ascertaining that the pather had again cleared, abruptly quitted the orangery, ving M. Sully perfectly aghast at the new duty ich had thus been suddenly thrust upon him.

As it was utterly impossible to propose such a measure Marie de Medicis as that of dismissing her favoured attendants until perfect reconciliation had been effected between the royal couple, it was to that object that the prudent minister first turned his attention; and successful did he ultimately prove, that after brief correspondence, the King and Queen had an interview, during which the whole of their recent misunderstanding calmly discussed, and declared by both parties to have been occasioned by ill-judged interference of those by whom they were severally surrounded; nor did they separate until they had mutually pledged themselves to consign the past to oblivion, and thenceforward to close their ears against all the gossiping of the court.

The effect produced by this matrimonial truce (for it was unfortunately nothing more, and lasted only for the short space of three weeks) was of the most happy description. Nothing was seen or heard of save projects of amusement, which, not content with absorbing the present, extended also into the future. This calm, like those by which it had been preceded, was not, however, faind to realise the hopes of either party. Henry was too much addicted to pleasure to fulfil his part of the compact; the Queen had, unhappily for her own peace, so long accustomed herself to listen to the comments and complaints of her favourites, that it was not long ere they found her as well disposed as she had previously been, to lend a willing ear to their communications. In Madame de Verneuil they, of course, possessed a fruitful topic; and as Marie, despite all her good resolutions, could not restrain her curiosity with regard to the proceedings of this obnoxious personage, she ere long betrayed her knowledge of the new affronts to which she had been subjected by the marquise.

The result of this unfortunate enlightenment was such as, from her impulsive character, might justly have been anticipated. She no sooner found herself in the society of the King that the sound herself in the society of the this new dilemma Sully resolved, as a last and crowning effort to establish peace, to suggest to Marie, that as her happiness had again been destroyed solely by the evil tongues about her, she should secure to herself the gratitude and affection of her royal consort by dismissing all her Italian household, and surrounding herself entirely by French friends and attendants.

The indignation of the Queen at this proposal was beyond the reach of all argument. She declared herself to be sufficiently unhappy separated from her family, and neglected by her husband, without driving from her presence, almost with ignominy, the few persons who still remained faithful to her interests, and who sincerely sympathised in her sufferings; and although the duke ventured again and again to recur to the subject, and always with the same carnestness, Marie continued to reject his counsel as steadily as when it was first offered.*

Sully, Mén., vol. v, 147—149.

The new attachment, felt or feigned by the King for Mademoiselle de la Bourdainière, had again awakened her jealousy; and she complained with equal reason that Henry, even while indulging in this new passion, made no attempt to restrain the arrogance and bitterness of the forsaken favourite. Nor was Madame de Verneuil less indignant than the Queen; for even while affecting an extreme devotion, and surrounding herself with ecclesisstics, who will content with labouring to effect her salvation, were also feeding her vanity with the most fulsome panegyrics, she could ill brook to see herself so easily forgotten; and once more she indulged in such indecent liberties with the name of Marie Medicia. King, whose patience the easily exhausted from the fact will believed himself to be at independent of her fascinations, again driven to resort to the assistance of M. de Sully, in order to compel restoration of the written promise of marriage which he had been weak enough to place in her hands.

It was, indeed, impossible for the sovereign of a great nation longer to temporise with an insolence which this period had exceeded all endurable limits; for not only did the marquise assert, as she had previously done, the illegality of the King's union with his wife, but so thoroughly the her devotion wrought upon the minds of the priests about her, that several among them were induced to support her pretended claim, and even publicly to declare the bans of marriage between and the monarch.* Among these, capucins, Father Hilaire of Grenoble, and Father Archange, har confessors, the last in France, and the first in Rome, themselves recklessly her interests,† while the numerous pamphlets were distributed in capital, advocating her the Eternal City Cardinal d'Ossat considered expedient to a letter to the French Government upon the subject, which implicated in this conspiracy both

Sully, Mém., vol. v, p. 155.

† Saint-Edme, vol. ii, p.

I In order to convey some idea of the effect produced by the devotion of Madame de Verneuil unon those who her credit for sincerity, we need only quote a passage in the dedication of d'Hemery d'Amboise to his translation of the works of Gregory de Tours, in which, addressing himself to the marquise, he gravely says: "that she had deduced from impired writings of the fathers their salutary doctrine; and that she practised it so faithfully, that her firmness had triumphed her adversities, and her her happiness." "Your life," he adds, with the same unblushing sycophancy "serves as a mirror for the most pious, and compels the admiration of all who see so boly and resolute a determination exerted. at an age that has scarcely attained its prime; and at which, deepising mere personal beauty, and the other precious advantages with which you have been richly endowed by Heaven, you have devoted the course of your best years to the contemplation of the marvels of God, joining spiritual meditation to good works," -Droug du Radier, vol. vi, pp. 94, 95.

the King of Spain and the Duke of Savoy; who, through the agency of Father Hilaire, were represented as upholding the pretensions of Madame de Verneuil. These circumstances, and especially impotoriety of a which involved the dignity of her husband, and her honour, greatly exasperated the temper of Queen, that she no longer attempted wontrol her irritation; and on coccasion when, constantly the case, we pretended claim of the marquise became subject of discord between the royal couple, Marie thoroughly forgot the respect which she owed to the King, that she raised her hand to strike him. Fortunately, however, for both parties, the Duke de Sully, who present during the altercation, and who instantly detected her intention, sprang-forward and seized her arm; but in make he was compelled to do this so roughly that she afterwards declared he had given her a blow, adding, however, that am grateful to him for having thus preserved her from a worse evil.

So great, indeed, was her sense of the obligation thus conferred, the theoretorward Marie regarded infinance-minister with favour the she had hitherto done; and occasionally requested his advice during her misunderstandings with the King. The could have chosen a counsellor, for although Sully not, in any instance, attempt to diaguise his dislike to the Tuscan princess, in incapable of betraying so sacred a trust; and if, as generally occurs in such cases, his advice was frequently neglected, she never once had cause to question its propriety.

This communication startled M. de Sully; and while he me endeavouring to frame a reply by which he might remain uncompromised, Concini with his usual presumption followed up the declaration of the Queen, by asserting his own conviction that it was the wisest measure which she could adopt; as it would a once convince her royal consort that she desired to keep nothing secret from him in which he was personally interested.

This interruption afforded time for the duke to collect his thoughts; and heedless of the interference of the Italian, he remarked in his turn that her Majesty pardon him if he declined to offer any opinion on so delicate a question, as it was one entirely beyond his province; after which, resolutely changing the tone of the discourse, he continued to converse with the Queen upon indifferent topics until Concini had retired. Then, however, he voluntarily reverted to subject which she had herself mooted, and implored her to abandon her design; assuring her that he had her interest too aincerely heart to her without anxiety about place herself in a position at once false and dangerous as such an assurance from her own lips could not fail to excite in the breast of the King the greatest and most legitimate suspicions; for every man of once feel that no individual, be his rank what it might. would have dared to declare his passion to a person of her exalted condition, without having previously tained that its expression would be agreeable to her, and having been tacitly encouraged to do so; while, on the other hand. - far from discovering any merit in such an avowal, or regarding it as a proof of confidence, his Majesty would immediately decide in the motive by which she had been actuated in making it, must have been either the fear of discovery, or a desire to rid herself of persons of whom ahe had become weary, in order that she might be left at liberty to encourage new suitors; or, finally, that she had been urged to this unheard-of by individuals who had obtained sufficient influence over her mind to induce her to sacrifice her peace and her honour to their own views.

Happily for herself, Marie de Medicis admitted

Richelieu, Hist. de la Mère et du Fils, vol. i, pp. 8-11.

validity of these arguments, and amount her ill-advised intention; and she was the more readily induced to do this from the assurance which she received from M. de Sully that the restoration of the promise given to Madame de Verneuil by the King was about to enforced, and that she would consequently be speedily relieved from the anxiety by which she had been so long termented. Nor the pledge one, as immediate measures were adopted to effect this of justice towards the Queen. The negociation renewed by two autograph letters from the King himself, addressed respectively to the Count d'Entragues, and the Marquise de Verneuil, which were long preserved in the library of Joly de Fleury, but are supposed to be lost. Copies of both been, however, fortunately taken by the Abbé de l'Ecluse,* and as they highly characteristic of the monarch, and fail to prove interesting to the reader, we shall insert them at length.

To M. d'Entragues the King wrote m follows:

"M. d'Entragues, je vous envoye ce porteur pour me rapporter la promesse que je vous baillay a Males-herbes je vous prys ne faillir de me la renvoyer et le vous voulez me la rapporter vous meame je vous diray les raisons qui m'y poussent qui sont domestiques et non d'estat par lesquelles vous direz que jay raison et reconnaîtrez que vous avez été trompé, et que jay un natural plutost trop bon que autrement, massurant que vous, obeyres à commandement, je finirai que je suis votre bon mestre."

The letter addressed to the de Verneuil bears samé date, and thus:

Mademoiselle, lamour, lhonneur les que vous avez reçus de moi, eussent la plus legere ame du monde si elle n'eut point pagnée d'un mauvais naturel le vostre. Je ne picqueray davantage bien que je le peusse dusse fair, le je vous prie de me renvoyer la promesse que savez et ne me donnez point la peine de la revoir par autre voye: renvoyez moi aussi la bague, que je vous rendis l'autre jour : voilà le sujet de lettre, laquelle je veux avoir reponse à minuit."

These specimens of royal eloquence were unavailing: evasive returned by the King's messenger; and entreaties having proved ineffectual, threats subsequently substituted; upon which the arrogant marquise ultimately induced relinquish her claim to ascend the throne of France, on condition that should the moment of delivering up the document, receive in exchange the sum of twenty thousand silver crowns, and the promise of a marshal's for her Count d'Entragues, who had never been upon of battle. This condition, appears, accepted; and the father of the lady finally, but with evident reluctance, restored the pernicious document to the King in the presence of the Count de Soissons and

Duke de Montpensier, M. de Bellièvre, Sillery, de Maisse, de Jeannin, de Gêvres, and Villeroy, by whom it was verified; and who signed declaration to this effect,; although it was afterward proved that d'Entragues M. only delivered into the hands of Henry a well-executed copy of the paper, while he manufactured the original.

This ceremony over, the marquise was commanded w

- André Hurault, Seigneur de Maisse, had been ambassador to Venice under both Henry III. and Henry IV.; and, in his official capacity, had frequent disputes with the nuncios of V. and Clement VIII., in consequence of which those prelates exerted all their influence to injure his interests in the court of Rome. André mentions M. de Maisse as an far-sighted agaci admodum ingenio. In 1595, Henry IV, again sent him to Venice to offer his thanks to the Sefor the exteordinary embasey which they had forwarded to him during the previous year; and as Maisse travelled on this occasion with the Cardinal Duperron, who was instructed to pass by that city on his way to Rome, great alarm was created in the ' mind of the Pope that the French ambassador was about to visit the papal court in his company; an event which he deprecated, from the distrust which he felt of the designs of an individual who had already frustrated the measures of his accredited agents. His Holiness was, however, quitte pour la peur, the instructions of M. Maisee having restricted him to his Venetian mission.
- † Louis Potier de Gêvrea, secretary of state. It is from him that the branch of his family still bearing the name of Gêvres is descended, while that of Novion owes in origin to his elder brother, Nicolas Potier de Elanomenil.
  - Mezeray, vol. x, p. 261.
  - Le Laboureur sur Castelnau.

leave the court, and for a short time peace was perfectly restored. The King had already become weary of his new conquest, and the hand of Mademoiselle de la Bourdaisière was bestowed upon a needy and complaisant courtier; but still the absence of the brilliant favourite, despite le her insolence, le void in existence of Henry which an legitimate sufto fill; and it was consequently not long became enamoured of Mademoiselle de Bueil,* voung beauty who had recently appeared court in the suite of the Princess de Condé. The extraordinary loveliness of the youthful orphan at miveted the attention of the King, and her own inexperience made , her, in so licentious a court as that of Henry IV., an easy victim; so easy, indeed, that the libertine monarch did not even affect towards her the same consideration which he had shown to his former favourites; although her extraordinary personal perfections sufficed to render her society this period indispensable to him.

DE DE

It was not long ere the exiled favourite was apprised of infidelity, yet such men her reliance upon her own power over the passions of the King that she it with contempt; but although

_

Iscqueline Bueil, subsequently Counters de Moret, was the daughter of Claude de Bueil, Seigneur de Courcillon and La Machère, and of Catherine de Monteclu, who both died in Island The family of Bueil traced their descent from Jaen, the first of the name, Sieur de Bueil in Tournine, who was equerry of honour to Charles-le-Bel, in 1321.

she scorned admit that she could feel any dread of being supplanted by a rival, after-events to prove by no so indifferent the circumshe she endeavoured to appear; and being windictive in her hate was unmeasured in her ambition, she could not forgive the double insult which been offered to her pride. Forgetting the of which she had been guilty, and the forbearance of the King, not only towards her faults, but even towards her vices, she determined on revenge, and unhappily she within her reach.

The Count d'Auvergne, although he had been a second time pardoned by Henry, who we ever too ready to receive him into favour, and was wont declare that although he was a prodigal son, he could never make up his mind to see the offspring of his King and brother-in-law perish upon a scaffold,* devotedly attached in his sister, and of intriguing spirit which delighted in every species of cabal and conspiracy; while François de Balsac d'Entragues, her father, overlooking the fact that he limbelf become the leaded of a whose reputation was lost their marriage, loudly of dishonour which the King had brought upon his family; resented, with great an attempt made by Henry seduce his younger daughter, Mail de

Dreux du Radier, vol. vi, p. 97.

For this lady, who subsequently became in different quarters of the wood, in order to take his life. Happily for Henry, he will attacked, defended himself in resolutely and on being attacked, defended himself in resolutely and on being attacked, defended himself in resolutely and on being attacked, defended himself in resolutely that he escaped almost by a miracle.

The disappointment of M. d'Entragues II this failure was III great that he compelled his daughter to propose another meeting in a solitary spot which he indicated, and where he made every preparation III the assassination of the imprudent monarch; but although she dispatched the letter containing the assignation, Marie de Balsac found III to apprise her royal lover of the reception which awaited him; and he consequently failed to keep the appointment. That the Count d'Entragues, twice foiled in his meditated vengeance, should lend himself willingly to any conspiracy against the honour III life of his sovereign, III consequently scarcely surprising, when III remember how many nobles III in turn caballed against Henry IV.

Wrazall, vol. v, pp. 356, 357.

with scarcely pretext for their disloyalty; and mean-while Madame de Verneuil, fully conscious of the hatred of Philip of Spain for the French king, had no sconer resolved upon revenge than she conce turned her attention towards monarch, by exciting passions, succeeded in securing support. She found able and zealous coadjutor in Don Balthazar de Zuniga, the Spanish ambassador at the court of France: while step-brother, Count d'Auvergne, to successful with Duke of Savoy, who, like Philip III., was happy than when discovered and profited by an opportunity of harassing the French sovereign.

This conspiracy; as absurd as it criminal, was, moreover, supported by many of the discentented nobles, who had never pardoned Henry for the suppression of the League; and, wild a such a project to appear in these days, have authority of Amelot de la Houssaye* for the that the Count d'Auvergne induced Philip by a treaty to promise his assistance in placing Henry de

Abraham-Nicolas Amelot In Houseaye was born Orleans, in the year 1634; and passed nearly all his life in composing works of history, and in translating the historians by whom he had been preceded. His principal productions are "A History of Government of Venice;" "Historical, Political, Critical, and Literary Memoirs;" and translations of the "History of Trent," by Fra Paolo; of the "Prince," by Bourbon, the son of Henry IV. White Indiana Werneuil, on the throne of France, to the detriment of the legitimate offspring of Marie de Medicis.

In the act by which Philip bound himself thus to recognise the pretended claim of the marquise, he also gave a pledge to furnish her with five hundred thousand livres in money, and to dispatch the Spanish troops which at that moment occupied Catalonia, a support the support the catalonia cabal in Guienne and Languedoc.

Report also said that M. d'Auvergne, not submed by this attempt to undermine the throne of Henry IV., had formed a design against life; but the rumour obtained credit from his enemies.*

Whatever extenuation may be found for Madame de Verneuil in such an attempt as this; whatever indulgence may be conceded to a suppositious baffled in her ambition, misled by her confidence in a supposititious claim, and urged on by a blind and uncalculating affection for her children, it is difficult to find any for the persevering ingratitude of her step-brother. As regards M. d'Entragues, a have already shown he had more than sufficient cause for seeking revenge upon a monarch who sacrificed every important consideration to a passion of a moment; Count d'Auvergne had experienced nothing save indulgence from Henry; and it consequently in cold blood that he organised a conspiracy, which, had it succeeded, have plunged the whole nation into civil. He was, moreover, the culpable he had, in order to secure pardon for his previous participation the crime of Biron, assured to too-credulous monarch, that in the event of his restoration favour, he would, if permitted too-continue his interwith Philip of Spain as unrestrictedly theretofore, profit by the facility thus afforded the him reveal this Majesty all the continue of the Spanish government.

Mezersy, vol. x, pp. 261,

There can be no doubt that such a proposal must have startled, and even disgusted the frank nature of the French king; but a was nevertheless too tempting to be rejected; and be himself avowed to Sully, when the conspiracy of d'Auvergne became known him, that it consideration for the children whom she had borne to him, than in the hope that he might, through the medium of the count, be enabled to contravene the medium of his most subtle and dangerous enemy, had been induced on that occasion apardon his disloyalty.*

By this unwise and ill-calculated concession, King had afforded an opportunity to the restless and disaffected noble of pursuing a correspondence with Philip as dangerous as it was convenient. Couriers permitted come unquestioned; and was long ere every measure of the French cabinet intimately known Madrid it was in the privy council of Henry himself. This evil was, moreover, increased by the unconditional pardon which had enabled M. d'Auvergne, after strange and degrading offer, to return to the court; and he profited eagerly by the opportunity which thus him, that he had little difficulty convincing and vindictive Philip and the moment length in which he might overthrow the power of sovereign whom he hated.

Sully, Mém., vol. iv, p.

M. de Lomenie, however, who unaware of the promise made by the count. Henry, became uneasy the constant communication which the former maintained with the court of Spain, length determined satisfy himself as to its nature; and for this purpose he intercepted some letters, by which he instantly became convinced of the meditated against his royal master. Indignant at the discovery which supervened, he suffered his displeasure in reach the ears of culprit, who forthwith quitted capital, and hastened to secure himself from arrest in Auvergne, of which province he the governor; and where he made instant preparations leave thingdom, should such a step become necessary.

consequently in vain the King, when informed of circumstance, dispatched in Sieur d'Escures the count to presence in

* Fougeu, Mind d'Racures.

httely refused to quit his retreat until he had received a formal promise from the sovereign that he should be all blame of whatever description, and received by his Majesty with his accustomed favour; alleging as a pretext for making this demand, that he was on bad terms with all the princes of the blood, the grand equery, and even with his sister Madame de Verneuil; and that he could not make supported by the King.

The expostulations of the royal messenger were fruitless; the count being more fully alive to the danger of his position than M. d'Escures himself; and every argument and denegation of the anxious envoy he consequently replied by saying that it useless to urge him to compromise his safety while he felt certain that his ruin had been decided; a fact of which he was convinced from the circumstance of his having received no letter from any of the intimate friends of the King since he had withdrawn from the court; while he was sufficiently acquainted with the bad disposition of Madame de Verneuil, to be assured that in the event of her being enabled to effect a reconciliation with the monarch expense, she would not accuple to sacrifice his interests to her

The embassy of M. d'Escures thus signally failed; and instead of furthering the purpose for which | was warned by this attempt to regain possession of his person, induced M. d'Auvergne adopt the extraordinary precautions. If from that only refused to enter any town or village where he might be surprised, but he also declined to hold any intercourse even with his most familiar friends on a highway, in some plain or forest where the means of escape were easy; and when hunting, a sport to which he was passionately attached, and which and period the only relaxation he could enjoy with safety, he caused videttes to be stationed upon the surrounding heights, who were instructed to apprise him by a concerted signal of the approach of strangers.*

All his caution was, however, vain; his capture being object of too much importance to the King, the present conjuncture, to readily relinquished; and accordingly it was length effected by a stratagem. By the advice of the Duke de Sully, this enterprise was intrusted M. Murat, who associated with himself M. de Nérestan 1 and the Viscount de Pont-Chateau, who by his instructions, paid several visits in the count château of Borderon Clermont, without, however, inducing him in quit its walls.

Daniel, vol. vii, pp. 453, 454.

† Tressurer | | | war department, and lieutenant-general at

† Philibert de Nérestan, knight of Malta, and captain of the body-guard of Henry IV., was as celebrated for his admirable qualities of mind and heart as for the antiquity of his birth. He was grand master of the Orders of St. Lazarus and Nôtre-Dame de Carmel, the latter of which was instituted by the sovereign at his intercession.

These gentlemen, nevertheless, made themselves agreeable self-exiled conspirator, listened patiently his complaints, that their society became mecessary to him; and thoroughly did they succeed in gaining his confidence, that they finally experienced little difficulty in persuading him to present a review of the light cavalry of the Duke de Vendôme, of which he was the colonel-general, and which was about to take place in a little plain between Clermont and Nonant. Im accordingly proceeded Im the spot with only two attendants; and he seen approaching, than M. de Nérestan and the Viscount de Pont-Chateau advanced from the ranks. apparently to welcome him; but on reaching his side the latter seized the bridle of his horse, while his companion arrested him in the name of the King.* of course impossible; and thus the Count d'Auvergne, despite all his precautions, found himself a prisoner.

L'Etoile,† with a naiveté well calculated provoke a smile of pity, calls this a "brave" and subtle stratagem: on its subtlety we may be silent, but we leave its courage house honesty to the judgment of readers.

* Hist. Troubles, III, p. Péréfixe, vol. ii, 406, 407.

† L'Etoile, vol. iii, p.

Sully admits* that not only the two captors, Murat himself, who ancient grudge against d'Auvergne, spared pains insinuate themselves into confidence; it equally certain that it was to his perfect faith in their professions that he owed his capture.

Having secured their prisoner, M. Man ..... coadjutors caused him to deliver up his sword, and to exchange the powerful charger upon which he mounted, for a road-back that had been prepared for him, upon which he proceeded under a strong guard to Briare, whence he conducted in a carriage to Montargis; and, finally, conveyed in boat to Paris. During this enforced journey his gaiety and deserted him; nor did he appear to entertain the slightest apprehension to the result of his imprisonment; throughout the whole of the way he jested, drank and laughed, m though his return to the capital had been voluntary; and when he was finally met at the gates of the city by de Chevalerie, the lieutenant-governor of the Bastille, he in such exuberant spirits in astounded deemed expedient to remind that they had not come together to dance a ballet, but for a totally purpose.

It only when he found himself conducted very chamber which had been occupied by the Maréchal de Biron previous to his execution, that shade of anguish passed over the features of the count. He could remember that the traitor-duke, who had rendered great and good service to his sovereign, had suffered for the same crime of which he was in his turn accused without any such plea for mercy; and it is therefore accreely surprising that he should have been startled upon finding himself installed as the successor of the condemned marshal.

Mémoires, vol. v, p.

<sup>† 🕒 🕶 🖚</sup> tol, iii, p.

100

M. d'Auvergne was not, however, of a temperament long to yield segloomy ideas; and consequently, unhappy wife* was lost in tears, and endeavouring by every exertion in her power to save him from a fate which appeared inevitable, he availed himself to the of the leniency of igalors, and indulged in every luxury and amusement which he was enabled to command. Agonised by her apprehensions, the unhappy countess is length resolved to throw herself at the feet of the King; where, with a humility which contrasted strangely with the unbending arrogance of her sister-inlaw, Madame de Verneuil, she besought in the most touching that Henry would spare the life of her husband, and once more pardon his crime. Her earnest supplications evidently affected the King; while Marie de Medicis, who was present, wept with the heart-broken wife, and warmly seconded her petition; but the monarch, who probably feared the result of such an act of mercy, having raised her from her knees with a gentle kindness which made her the flow afresh, led her the do of the Queen upon whose arm he placed had hand as he firmly: Deeply, Madam, do I pity you, and sympathise in your suffering; but were I to grant what you ask, I necessarily admit my wife to be impure, my son a bastard, and my kingdom the prey of my enemies."

Charlotte, eldest daughter of Henry, Duke de Montmorency, High Constable of France.

All, therefore, that the communicate with her husband, a concession of which she hastened to take advantage; when, in reply to her anxious inquiry as to what he desired of her, she received by her messenger the heartless reply that she might send him a good stock of cheese and mustard, and that she need not trouble herself about anything else.

The intercepted letters of the Count d'Auvergne having also implicated step-father M. d'Entragues, his sister Madame de Verneuil, both subsequently arrested; the former by the Provost Defunctis in his castle of Marcoussis; and the latter her residence in the Faubourg St. Germain; while her children were taken from her, and sent, under a proper escort, to the palace of St. Germain-en-Laye. So important did it, appear to the French ministers to ascertain the exact extent of the conspiracy, that the provost was accompanied to Marcoussis by M. Lomenie, in order that a search might be instituted upon the premises; the result of which tended to prove, beyond all possibility of doubt, that the original engagement delivered by tather of the marquise to the sovereign, had, in fact, not been restored, but had been skilfully copied by pen; importance which was still attached to the real document by the family of Madame Werneuil may be gathered from the fact that was discovered by the secretary of state in a glass bottle carefully scaled, and enclosed within a second, which was laid upon a heap of cotton, and built up in a wall of see of the spartments. Nor was this the only object of importance found in the possession of M. d'Entragues; as, together with the promise of marriage which had professed to restore to the King, M. de Lomenie likewise discovered, secreted with equal care, sundry letters, the treaty between Philip of Spain and the conspirators, and the cypher which had been employed in their correspondence.*

* L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 247—249.

† Jean Defunctis, licutement criminal of the Provest of Paris.

—Hist. — Is Chancell. de France, p. 1

From these documents it was ascertained that King of Spain had stipulated, an oath, that, an the condition of Madame de Verneuil confiding her am to his guardianship, he should be immediately recognised as Dauphin of France, and heir to the throne of that kingdom; while five fortresses on the territory of Portugal should be placed at his disposal, and subjected to his authority, as places of refuge, should such a precaution become necessary. A provision made for the marquise herself; and an income amounting to twenty thousand pounds English was also promised to the quasi-Prince for the support of his household.

Wraxall, Note quoted from "Le Laboureur sur Castelnau,"
 vol. v, p. 856.

Nor was addenestic arrangement by any means the important feature of the conspiracy, appointments, both civil and military, involving considerable pecuniary advantages, were also promised the Count d'Auvergne and step-father; and simuliaryasion was arranged by the Duke of Savoy in Provence, the Count de Fuentes* in Burgundy, and Spinola † in Champagne.

On the 11th of December, M. d'Entragues conveyed in a close carriage to the prison of the Conciergerie at Paris, accompanied by his M. de Marcoussis horseback, but without a single attendant; and make in confinement for a considerable time before

- * Pietro Henriques Azevedo, Count de Fuentes succeeded to the command of the Spanish army on the demise of the Archduke Ernest.
- † Ambroise Spinola, Marquia de los Balbazez, one of the most distinguished generals of the seventeenth century, was the descendant of an illustrious family of Geneva, whose branches spread alike over Italy and Spain. was born in 1569, and first bore arms in Flanders. In 1604, being in command of the army, he took Ostend; and, in consequence of his important services, was appointed General of the Spanish troops in the Low Countries. When apposed to Prince Nassau, counterbalanced alike his renown and his success; and in 1629, when serving in Piedmont, he took the town of Casal; but died in the following year of mortification at having failed to reduce the fortress of that city.

was allowed either fire in light; with on the same day, Madame de Verneuil was placed under the charge of M. d'Arques, the lieutenant of police, who informed that he must answer with his life for her safe-keeping, and who accordingly garrisoned her residence with strong body of his guards and archers.

The Count d'Entragues was no sooner incarcerated, than his wife,* following the example of her daughter-

* Marie Touchet, Counters d'Entragues, was an daughter of an apothecary - Orleans; who, on the occasion of a visit of Charles IX, to city, obtained permission to see his Majesty in public, where her beauty so impressed monarch that he inquired her at at close of the repast, dispatched III. de Latour, the master of his wardrobe, to desire her attendance in his closet. The regociation did not prove a difficult one; as the lady, although at moment strongly attached to de Monlue, the brother de Bishop of Valence, could de resist the prestige of royalty. Charles, anxious to retain her near him, requested Marguerite his sister, to receive her into her household as a waiting-woman; but as she shortly afterwards became pregnant, he removed her from the court and established where she gave birth to Charles, Count d'Auvergne. Although tenderly by the King, Marie Touchet still retained her attachment to Monluc, with whom she carried on an active correspondence, which was at length discovered by Charles; who, having on see occasion been apprised in had at the moment a letter from her former lover in her pocket, instantly caused a number of the court ladies to be invited to supper; and they were no sooner assembled than he sent to desire a man named Chambre, the chief of a band of gipties, to disperse a dozen of his most expert followers about the apartment, with orders to away the pockets of all the guests, and to bring them carein-law, obtained audience of Henry, order implore pardon of her husband; but marked that, earnest as she was in his behalf, she never once, during whole of the interview, made alightest the cither the Count d'Auvergne Madame de Verneuil; doubtlessly feeling in the the well-known respect of the King for blood of the Valois, and in the other his passion for marquise, would plead more powerfully in their behalf than the most emphatic entreaties. Like that of fully to his closet when he retired for the night. He then caused the faithless favourite be seated beside himself, in order that she might not have an opportunity of disposing of the letter elsewhere; and the Bohemians having admitty obeyed his instructions, the King found himself a few hours afterwards | possesof the booty. In the pocket of Marie Touchet he discovered, as he had anticipated, the letter of M. de Monluc; which, on the following morning he placed, with the most bitter reproaches, in the hands of its owner; who, on finding herself detected, declared that the pocket in which the King had discovered it was not hers, a subterfuge by which, as ill letter bore no address, hoped to escape the anger and indignation of her royal lover. Unfortunately, however, Charles recognised several of the trinkets by which it had been accompanied; and she had, consequently, no alternative save to acknowledge her fault, and mentreat for pardon. Charles, who could not resist her tears, was soon induced to promise this, provided she pledged herself to relinquish all intercourse with Monluc; and in order to render her performance of this pledge more sure, he shortly afterwards married Count d'Entragues, whose complaisance he rewarded by government of Orleans .- L' Etaile, Heari IV., vol. iii, 247--249.

Counters d'Auvergne, attempt, however, proved abortive, save that Henry accorded her prayers a mitigation of the rigour with which her husband had hitherto been treated.

Meanwhile, Madame Vernouil, far from imitating humility of her relatives, openly declared that, whatmight be the result to herself, she should regret the which she was adopted obtain justice for herself and her children; and when on cocasion she was urged make the concessions by which alone she could hope for pardon, she answered haughtily: "I have fear of death; on the contrary, I shall welcome it. If the King takes my life, it will at least be allowed that he sacrificed his own wife, for I Queen before the Italian I ask but three favours from his Majesty; pardon for my father, rope for my brother, and justice for myself."

Her mean for this expression may be found in the fact that during three examinations which he underwent, the Count d'Auvergne finally acknowledged everything, and threw the whole blame upon the marquise; feeling convinced that, under every circumstance, her was safe; although he had previously (placing entire reliance on the good-faith and secresy of the Chevillard, to whom he had, in conjunction with his sister, confided the original treaty with Spain, and prehending discovery of documents deposited Marcoussis), declared innocence in the solemn manner; and concluded his address to commissioners by saying: "Gentlemen, show me one line of writing by which I can be convicted of having entered into any treaty, either with the King of Spain his ambassador, and I will immediately sign beneath it my sentence of death, and condemn myself to be quartered alive."

Radier, vol. vi, p. 98. Saint-Edme, vol. ii, p. 227. L'Etoile, vol. iii, p. 247.

† Antoine Engène Chevillard, general treasurer of the genof France.

Nor the confidence placed by M. d'Auvergne in his friend misplaced; for when Chevillard in his turn taken to the Bastille as his accomplice, he so carefully concealed the treaty in the skirt of his doublet that it escaped the search of the officials; and on seeing himself treated prisoner of state, he contrived by degrees to swallow it in his soup, in order that it should not afterwards into their hands, in the event of his condemnation.*

The indignation of the marquise may consequently be imagined, when, after such a declaration as that which he are originally made, she ascertained that the Count had not only confessed his guilt, but that he had, are over, revealed the most minute details of the plot; in order to convince the King that he placed himself entirely at his mercy, had even given up to him the promise made between himself and la Dukes of Bouillon and Biron on the occasion of the previous conspiracy. Her arrogance also encouraged by Henry, anxious to less pretext for pardoning her treachery, sent secretly to inform her IIII II she would confess her all and ask in forgiveness, il should be granted a consideration of the past, and from regard for their children; to which message the marquise vouchsafed no further reply than that Ihim who had committed crime, required no pardon; and in addition being informed that some of her friends, anxious to save her in spite of her own obstinacy, had asserted that she had solicited the clemency of the monarch, she bitterly reproached them for their interference, declaring that they were liars and traitors, and that she would die rather than submit to such an humiliation.*

* Sully, Mén., vol. v, p. 161, quoted from la la Houssaye.

During the exile of marquise, the King, whose passion for Mademoiselle de Bueil had began to decrease, and who discovered that man personal beauty offered no equivalent for the wit and fascinations of his old favourite, resolved to provide for her as he had previously done for Mademoiselle de la Bourdaisière by bestowing her upon a husband; he accordingly her marriage with Henri de Harlay, Count de Chésy, young noble, whose poverty, as well his want of court influence, gave every security for his

Dreux du Radier, vol. vi, p.

ready submission to all the exactions of his royal master.*

The monarch, whom absence thus only sufficed to render devoted than ever to marquise, and who resolved under diremstances pardon her, continued employ every method in his power induce her her error; although in searching her papers numerous letters had been discovered which revealed make of infidelity on her part has should have awakened his pride, and induced him to abandon her her fate; and, at length, despairing that minor influence would suffice to alter her resolution, and to lower her pride, he instructed M. de Sully to see her, and if possible to convince her of the injury which she doing to her own cause by the obstinacy with which ahe rejected the suggestions of the King.

The minister had alternative save obedience; he consequently presented himself the residence of Madame de Verneuil, whom he found self-possessed and self-confident in the palmiest days of her prosperity. Instead of concessions she made conditions; and complained loudly and arrogantly of proceedings the sovereign; by whom she declared that she had been outraged in her honour, and from whom sought redress rather than indulgence. The tirade was seasoned by professions of piety and repentance which were appreciated at their real value by her listener; who, having the her to exhaust herself by her own vehemence, instead of temporizing with her vanity the her friends had previously done, took up the subject in his turn, and told her that she would do well to remember that she was that moment prisoner under suspicion of treason; and that she might consider herself very fortunate if she that permitted to expiate her crime by self-exile that any country except Spain; bidding her remark, moreover, that this lenity could not be exhibited towards her until she had undergone criminal examination, and demanded the pardon of the King for her disobedience.

* Mademoiselle de Bueil became Countess de Chésy on the 5th of October, and two months later she obtained a divorce.

Chésy died in 1652.

M. de Sully next proceeded to upbraid her with her unbecoming conduct towards the Queen; assuring her every word or act of disrespect of which any were guilty towards the wife of the sovereign of offence against his person, and was likely to entail upon the culprit a very person, and was likely to entail upon the culprit a very penalty. He then reproached her for her indecent expressions; and especially for her having more than and declared that had she not been treated with injustice, she should have been in the place occupied by "the banker's daughter;" and, finally, he reprimanded her very severely for the impertinent and absurd affectation with which she had assumed place herself upon a level with her royal mistress, and her children upon a par with the Dauphin of France; reminding her, moreover, that perpetual disunion of their Majesties was to be solely attributed to her malignant and malicious insinuations; and advising her to lose no time in requesting permission to throw herself the feet of the Queen, her pardon for the past, and her indulgence for the future.

Partine, vol. ii, p. 401.

To this harangue, un different from the conciliatory obsequious discourse of her partisans, Illiania all Verneuil listened without any display of impatience, but with an ostentatious weariness which intended to impress upon the minister the utter inutility of his interference; and when he paused to take breath, she assured him with placid smile that she woodliged by his advice, but that she was have time to reflect before she could decide upon such a measure. M. de Sully, however, not to be deceived by this well-acted composure; he had not carefully studied the character of the marquise without perceiving how ill she brooked control = remonstrance; and, accordingly, she had == sooner ceased speaking, than he resumed the conversation by expatiating upon the enormity of her conduct, in affecting the sudden devotion behind which she had to entrench herself, while she and daily indulging her jealousy and her hatred, by endeavouring and only ruin the domestic happiness of the monarch, but the interests of his kingdom; and when his offended listener remarked, with chilling haughtiness, he in position to impugn her sincerity, he only answered the intended rebuke by persisting that her assumed piety was more grimace, which could not impose upon any man of sense; a fact which forthwith proved by detailing all her past career, and thus convincing her that no one incident of her licentious life had remained may mystery to him.

"Can you tell me," he asked; "that adventures existed only in the jealous imagination of the King, as you have so often assured his Majesty himself? And will you persist in denying that you have deceived him in most unblushing manner? Believe me, Madam, if you had indeed become penifor your past errors, and had, from a sincere return to God; desired to withdraw from the court, you would nonce have obtained permission do so with honour yourself; but you have simply acted part, and that muskilfully as have deceived one."

At this period of the interview Madame de Verncuil not wholly suppress her emotion, but she controlled it sufficiently to reply only by a condescending bow, and the exclamation of: "Proceed, M. le Ministre!"

"I will do so, Madam;" said M. Sully; "by a transition from remonstrance to inquiry. Have you any legitimate subject of complaint which you ceive your failure of respect towards their Majesties?"

"If this question was dictated to you by the King, Monsieur;" was proud reply; "he wrong to put it, as he, better than any other person, could have decided; if he your sugges-nature, it beyond your power to apply remedy."

"Then, Madam, it only remains for me to be informed of what you desire from Majesty."

"That which I am aware will prove less acceptable to the King than to myself, III. III Ministre; but which I nevertheless persist in demanding, since I am authorised by your inquiry III repeat my request. I desire immediate permission to leave France with my parents, my brother, and my children; and to take up my permanent residence in some other country, where I shall have excited less jealousy and less malevolence than in this; and I include my brother in this voluntary expatriation because I now have reason III believe that he is suffering entirely for my sake."

Sully startled: Le could not place faith in her sincerity, and he consequently induced her to repeat her request must than once; until she at length added condition which convinced him the she we indeed perfectly serious in the desire that she expressed.

"Do not, however, imagine, Monsieur;" she said, with aignificant smile; "that I have any intention of leaving kingdom, and taking my abode with strangers, with the slightest prospect of dying by hunger. I am by no means inclined to afford such a gratification to the Queen, who would doubtlessly rejoice to learn that this had been the close of my I must have an income of a hundred thousand frances, fully and satisfactorily secured to me in land, before I leave France; and this is a mere trifle compared with what I have a legal right medemand from the King."

"I shall submit your proposition to Majesty, Madam;" said the minister as he rose to take his leave; and will shortly acquaint you with the result."

Greatly to the disappointment of M. M. Sully, however, he found Henry decidedly the departure of Werneuil; nor could the arguments by which he endeavoured to convince the infatuated monarch. that the self-exile of the marquise was calculated to ensure his were future tranquillity, avail to overcome his distaste to the proposal.* I was weary of his purely sensual intercourse with de Moret, whose facility had caused him from the first to attach but little value to her possession; while her total want of intellect and knowledge of the world, continually caused him remember with regret the dazzling although dangerous qualities of her predecessor. Maris m Medicis, moreover, who had originally looked with complacency upon in liaison with Mademoiselle Bueil, rejoicing in any event which tended to estrange his affections from marquise, had, since her melodramatic marriage, and her accession of rank, began to entertain apprehensions that another formidable rival was about embitter her future life; while the reproaches which she constantly the monarch, to which li compelled submit on subject of a woman who had merely pleased fancy without touching his heart, another of irritation; and only tended make him look back upon the past with an ardent longing to repair it. Thus he continued to employ his most intimate associates in an attempt urge marquise make such concessions would enable him to pardon her, with the carnestness of repentant lover, rather than the elemency of an indulgent sovereign; when the stern minister so signally to convince her reason by his representations, the King endeavoured to arouse her vanity and self-interest by the flatteries and inferences of the more courtly Bassompierre, La Varenne, Sigogne, and others in whom he placed con-

* Sally, Mém., vol v, 193-15/.

MARKET AND ADDRESS.

Guillaume Fouquet, Sieur de la Verenne, sone of those singularly-gifted individuals who, by the unaided power of intellect are raised from obscurity to fortune. On his first introduction to the court of France, his position was merely that of cloak-bearer to the King: but his excessive acuteness and his genius for intrigue, soon drew upon him attention of a cabinet. that originally procured for him the favour by which he so largely profited in the sequel, was a to Spain, voluntarily undertaken under unusual difficulties. The courier who was conveying Philip the despatches of the Thin of Mayenne and in other chiefs of the League, having been taken by the emissaries of Henry IV., and the despatches opened by his ministers, it decided that copies wall made, and originals rescaled, forwarded their destination by some person who might bring back the replies. In order I more perfect judgment might be formed by the council of their probable result. For such an undertaking as this, however, it was obvious that a

м

fidence; but all this ill-disguised anxiety only served to convince the wily favourite that she should prove victorious in the struggle; as since Henry could not bring himself to consent to her expatriation, there was no probability that he would ever be induced to take her life.

And the marquise judged rightly:
was not only safe herself, but the palladium of her family. The King was no longer young; he had become satisted with the tame and facile pleasures for that was indebted to his sovereign rank; and although opposition and haughtiness in a wife angered and disgusted him, there was a piquancy and novelty in the deflance of a mistress by which he was alike amused and interested. He could calculate upon the extent to which the Queen would venture indulge her displeasure; but he found himself quite unable to adjudge messenger must be found at once faithful, expert, and courageous; and such an one offered himself in the person of La Varenne, who, without a moment's hesitation will his services to the King, and acquitted himself in dextrously of his self-imposed task, that he succeeded, not only in procuring in interviews with the Spanish council, but even an audience of Philip, without once exciting suspicion; and his arrival at Madrid had been so well-timed, that although a second courier was dispatched in all haste by the League, to announce the capture of his predecessor, he was enabled in the return to France with the reply of the Spanish monarch, by which Henry and his ministers were apprised of the plans and pretensions of that potentate. (Amelot de la Houssaye, which is a Cardinal d'Ossat, vol. 11, p. 17, note.) La Varenne was subsequently master-general of the Post Office.

the limits of Name de Verneuil's daring; and thus his passion — constantly stimulated by curiosity. In her of fascination she delighted — fancy, and in — of irritation ahe excited — astonishment. Like II— ocean, she assumed — new aspect every hour; and to this — infinite variety " she was in — probability indebted for the duration of her empire over the sensual and — affections of her royal lover.

Conscious of her power the marquise continued inexorable; and, finally, Henry found himself compelled include her in the public accusation brought against the other conspirators; and to issue an order to the Parliament, the supreme criminal tribunal of the kingdom, to without further delay the prosecution of the delinquents.

A new anxiety at this time divided the attention of the King with that which he felt for the vindication of the favourite. His permission had been asked by Huguenots to hold meeting Châtellerault, and this had conceded; but circumstances having arisen which induced the council to apprehend that the intrigues of the Duke de Bouillon, supported by MM.

Trémouille, and du Plessis-Mornay, were about

Philippe de Mornsy, Seigneur de Plessis-Marty, Governor of Samur, was born in the year 1549, at Bussy, in the department of the Oise, of a Catholic father and a Protestant mother (Françoise Bec), the latter of whom educated him in the reformed faith. Having escaped the manners of St. Batholomew, he visited Germany, Italy, and England, and finally assertice of proceeded Poitou under pretext of taking possession of his new government, and by his unexpected appearance on scene of action counteracted project of the conspirators; while a short time subsequently Duke de la Trémouille fell into a rapid decline which terminated existence at a early of thirty-four years, and deprived the reformed party of one of their zealous leaders.

Meanwhile, amid the dissensions, both political and domestic, by which Heary IV. had latterly been harassed, his earnest desire to improve and embellish his good city of Paris and its adjacent palaces, had continued unabated. Henry III., during whose reign the Pont Neuf been commenced, had only lived long enough see two of its arcades completed, and the piles destined to support the remainder raised above the river; this

Henry IV., while he was still King of Navarre, who sent him on a mission to Queen Elizabeth. His science, his valour, and his high sense of honour, rendered him after the abjuration of the monarch, the chief of the Protestant party, and caused him to be called the Huguenot Pope. — sustained against Duperron, Bishop of Evreux, the famous conference of Fontainehleau, at whose close each of the two parties claimed the victory. Louis XIII. deprived him of his government of Sannaur; and he died in 1623, leaving issue by his wife, Charlotte de l'Arbalète, widow of the Marquis — Feuquières, — (Plessis-Mornsy, — de Bauves) who was killed in 1605, while serving under Prince Maurice in the Low Countries, and three daughters, the younger of whom married the Duke de la Force.

undertaking completed; numerous workconstantly employed on the galleries of the Louvre, and the châteaux of St. Germain-enLaye, Fontainehleau, and Monceaux; the of which, less have already stated, the monarch had presented to Queen on her arrival in Paris; while, emulating to royal example, the great nobles and capitalists of the city building on sides, and increasing alike the extent and splendour of the metropolis.* It was this period that Henry joined the Faubourg St. Germain the city, and caused it to be paved; constructed the Place Royale; repaired the Hôtel de St. Louis for the purpose of converting it into plague-hospital; and commenced building the Temple Square.†

Other great works were also undertaken throughout the kingdom; the junction of the Garonne with the Aude, an attempt which presented considerable difficulty, and which was only terminated during the reign of Louis XIV., we vigorously commenced; other rivers, hitherto comparatively uscless, mer rendered navigable; and the canal of Briare, with its two-and-thirty locks, although not more than half completed the of Henry, had already cost the enormous sum of three hundred thousand Numerous of munication established by highways which previously existed; bridges built, aroads paired; taxes which paralysed the manufactures of the country remitted: In fabrication of tapestried hangings wrought in worsted, silk, and gold carnestly encouraged; mulberry plantations - formed, and in foundation laid for the production of the costly silks and velvets for which Lyons has ever since been = famous. An imitation of the celebrated Venetian glass also introduced with great success and, above all, in the midst of these expensive undertakings, of four annual millions of france, hitherto raised by the customs upon the different classes of citizens, was altogether abolished. Hope and energy alike aroused by vigorous a measure; and thus the people ceased to murmur, and were ready to acknowledge that the King had indeed began to verify his celebrated declaration that "if he were spared, there should not exist workman within his realm who are not enabled to cook a fowl upon the Sunday."

* Mezersy, vol. 254,

† Bonnechose, Hint. de France, vol. i, p. 7th edition. VOL. I.

Bonnechose, vol. i, p. 438.

CHAPTER V.

[1605.]

TRIAL OF THE D'ATTRICKS - AND THE PERSON NAMED IN ADDRESS OF THE PERSON NAMED IN REPUBLIC TO THE REPUBLIC TO THE COURSE OF TH GUES - THE TWO MEN AND THE TO PEACH - MADAMS PE THE 24 SENTENCED TO SELECT THE SECOND A MOTHER'S INTERCESSION—THE SING DEATE PASSED ON THE NOBLES TO SELLS FROM THE COURT AND IMPRISONMENT THE PRIVE DESCRIPTION OF RESIDENCE OF PERSONNEL PORT OF THE PERSONNEL PORT O THE QUEKN - MARRIAGE OF THE DUES DE - INSULAR - A TILT AT THE LOUTER - SASSOM-PRINCE IN COLUMN TO THE PRINCE OF THE PRINCE VIII.—NURCTION OF LEG XL.—RIA # OF MINING V.--TRE COURT D'ENTRAGUES ES AUTRORISED 🔤 ESTURY 🔤 MARGOUSSIS-MADAME DE VERMEUIL 10 PARBONED AND EXCALLED-MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCE IN CONTY -- MADEMOISELLE DE SUISE --MARRIAGE OF THE PROBES OF THE PROPERTY. -SHE ARRIVES IN PARIS-GRATITUDE OF SER RING-RES RECEPTION -MURDER BY THE ROTEL ON ATTHEWN THE OF SHE ADMINISTRA MARGURATTI GOMESTIS DE TRE PAUDOURG DE COMPENSANTE PER MINIS COMMENSATION WHEN HIS BOOK SHOW OF BURN PAVOURITY—HER DISCOLUTE CANNEL—HEA 11 g. pk NIMITE IN COLUMN TO SERVE AND ADDRESS OF THE PARTY OF THE THE MYSTERIAS IN COVERNMENT—" MARAME IN RÉSERTE "—A TEMELY

CHAPTER V.

[1605.]

THE year 1605 commenced, had been the case each year since the peace, with a succession of court-festivals; had and tournaments, had and masquerades, occupied the attention of had privileged; presents walue were exchanged by the sovereigns and princes; and during all this incessant dissipation, the Parliament was diligently employed upon the trial of the conspirators.

On Saturday, the self-to of January, the Count d'Auvergne was placed on the sellette,* where L'Etoilet asserts that he communicated much more than was required of him; while the Queen, anxious to secure condemnation of Madame de Verneuil, and time intimidate in favourites by whom might succeeded, appeared in person as one of the accusing witnesses; Henry, who had already upon the pardon of the marquise, attempt to dissuade her from this extraordinary measure; and it is probable as the design of the King merely humble pride of haughty marquise, in order render her submissive his authority, he was by no means disinclined to suffer Marie to give vent her indignation contempt.

* A very low wooden atool upon which accused persons were formerly scated during their trial; an arrangement deemed so great a degradation by persons of condition that many attainted nobles indignantly appealed against it.

† L'Etoile, vol. iii, p.

The Parliament had nominated in its commissaries, Achille in Harlay, the first president,* and MM. Etienne Dufour and Philibert Turin, counsellors, to whose interrogatories, however, the Count d'Auvergne ifirst * Achille de Harlay was the representative of a distinguished family, many of whose members were celebrated during four conturies both as magistrates and ecclesiastics. He was born on the 7th of May, 1536, and was the son of Christophe de Harlay, President de Mortier of the Parliament of Paris, one of the most learned and upright magistrates of his time. Achille was a parliamentary counsellor at the age of twenty-two years, president of the Parliament of Paris at thirty-six, and succeeded his fatherin-law, Christophe de Thou, as first president, in 1582. During the time of the League under Henry III., he made to the Duke de Guise the celebrated snewer which covered him with glory, and paralysed the strength of the malcontents: " My soul belongs to God, and heart to my King, although my body is in the power of rebels." He was imprisoned for a time by the chiefs of the League, after which he returned to the service of the King. He resigned his office in favour of Nicolas de Verdun and died on the 23rd of October, 1616, at the age of eighty 700 refused to reply, alleging as his reason pardon which had been accorded to him by Henry during the past year. In the emergency, M. Louis Servin, H. King's advocate, deputed to to Majesty the remonstrance of the commissaries; and to represent the accused the already been convicted of spiring, first with Maturin Carterie, and subsequently with the Duke de Biron, he unworthy of pardon on third occasion; while the most imperious necessity existed that an example should be made, order to the safety of their Majesties and the Dauphin, which moreover, as a natural consequence, involved the tranquility and welfare of the state.

To this appeal the King replied that the abolition accorded to the accused on the two former occasions had been granted with a view of inducing him to return to his allegiance; but that since it had failed to produce the desired result, it could form no pretext for his escape from the penalties of this new crime; and that should he persist in refusing to reply to the questions put to him by his judges, his silence must be construed into an acknowledgment of treason; upon which d'Auvergne immediately endeavoured to redeem his error by revealing all the details of the past plots, as well as those of the one in which he was now implicated.

Louis Servin distinguished himself from an early age by his extraordinary learning, and his extreme attachment to his sovereign. He was indebted for the rank of King's advocate to the Cardinal de Vendôme; and acquitted himself so admirably of the duties of his office as to justify the confidence of his patron.

M

Males de Verneuil, who led been summoned appear II III same time, excused I upon plea of indisposition; and it was asserted ill she limit caused herself to bled, a order that the temporary delay in her examination thus secured might enable her, ere she appeared before the commissaries, to ascertain to what waters that had been implicated by the revelations of her step-brother. She no sooner learnt, however, that the count had thrown III the odium of the conspiracy upon herself, than she hastened to obey a second mons, and presented herself with her arm in a sling, to undergo in her turn the necessary interrogatories. Her manner as firm, and her delivery haughty and energetic. She insisted upon the innocence of her father; declared that whole cabal had been organised by d'Auvergne; and admitted that feeling herself wronged, she had willingly entered into his views; but it ime she coupled with this admission the assurance having nothing with which reproach herself, she asked for no indulgence, and was quite prepared to abide by the consequences of her attempt to do justice herself and her her examined, he did not seek to deny his participation in the plot; but placed in the hands of his judges a written document, setting he had rendered to the King since his accession, and which im merely been recompensed by the government of Orleans, a dignity of which he was moreover shortly deprived in order that it might be conferred upon another, although in his zeal for the monarch he had not only exhausted his own resources, but had raised considerable loans which all remained unliquidated. Yet, as he stated, he had uttered no complaint, although he was reduced to poverty, and deprived of was of eligibly establishing his children, will lim still had faith in the justice and generosity of his sovereign; and with this trust he had retired to his paternal home, old, sick, and poor, to await as best he might, the happy moment in which his claims should be remembered. And then it was, me he emphatically declared, that the last and crowning misfortune of a long life had overtaken him. Then it was that the King conceived unfortunate attachment for his younger daughter, which deprived him of the greatest solace of his old age, and exposed him to the raillery and contempt of his fellow nobles, coupled with sarcastic congratulations upon the advantages which he was supposed to have derived from the dishonour of his child; an event which had clouded his remnant of existence with shame and despair. had, as haserted, several times requested of his Majesty that im might be permitted to withdraw entirely from the court, and finish his days in retirement and in the bosom of his family; but this favour had constantly been denied. As a last effort he had then represented the deplorable state of his health, and entreated that he might be permitted to travel in order to regain his strength, leaving his wife and children. Marcoussis; a favour which was also only refused, but rendered doubly bitter by a prohibition either to see or correspond with his daughter whose safety was at that moment endangered by the menaces of the Queen. He then entered briefly into the circumstant of the conspiracy, and concluded by declaring or the Dauphin had ever been contemplated by himself or by any of his accomplices.*

Such was the defence of the dishonoured old man who had placed himself beyond the pale of sympathy by his own degrading marriage. Yet he was still a father; and who shall decide that the shame which in his own case had been silenced by the voice of passion, did not crush him with double violence when involved reputation of his child? Who shall say that is had not, in the throbbing of his wrung heart, mourned with an undying remorse the fault of which he had himself been guilty, and felt that it was visited in vangeance upon the dearest object of his paternal love? Contemporary historians word upon the rained noble, the disappointed partisen, and the disgraced father; yet the scene must have been a pitiable one in the midst of which he stood an attainted criminal, blighted in every affection, and in every hope; the creditor of his King, and the victim of his paternal ambition.

L'Etaile, vol. iii, 255-257. Mezerny, vol. x, 279. Daniel, vol. vii, p.

The sentence of the Parliament was pronounced on the 2nd of February. The Counts d'Auvergne and d'Entragues were condemned to death for the crime of lèse-majesté; and Madame de Verneuil imprisonment convent of Beaumont Tours, until more ample information could be obtained of the exact to be prohibited from holding any communication with the sisterhood.

On the same day, the sentence baving been instantly communicated to Madame d'Entragues, with the information that the King was about to repair to the chapel of the palace to attend mass, she hastened, accompanied by her daughter Marie de Balsac,* to the Tuileries; where the two unfortunate women threw themselves on their knees before Henry as he entered the great gallery : and with tears and sobs entreated mercy, the one for her husband, and the other for her father. The monarch burst into tears as he saw them at his feet. He could forget thus prostrate before him were the mother and the sister of the woman whom he still loved; and as he raised them from the ground, he said soothingly: "You shall see that I am indulgent—I will convene a council this very day. Go, and pray to God to inspire me with right resolutions,

Marie de Balanc d'Entragues, in pursuit of whom the King incurred the risk of while I proceed in my turn to mass with the same intention."*

The King kept his word. In the afternoon council again met, when he charged them upon their consciences to deliberate seriously before they demned two of their fellow-creatures to an ignominious death; but they remained firm in their decision; declaring that by extending pardon to crimes of so serious a nature as those upon which judgment had just been passed, nothing but danger and disorder could ensue; and that the execution of Duke Biron, the convicted of the conferce could not be suffered to escape with impunity, without endangering by such misplaced elemency the safety of the kingdom; while revocation of the contempt upon the judicial authority.

Henry listened, but he would not yield; and before the close of the meeting, contrary to the advice of all his council, he announced that he commuted the pain of the instances to perpetual imprisonment; and revoked the sentence to the cloister, which he superseded by an order of exile to her own estate of Verneuil.

To express the disappointment and mortification of the Queen when this decision was announced to her, would be impossible; as she instantly and any further attempt be destroy influence of the favourite prove ineffectual. She no longer and any violence, but became with the deepest melancholy; weeping where she had formerly reproached, and seeking her only consolation in prayer, and in society of her chosen friends. Upon Henry, however, of his extraordinary and ill-judged leniency different. Although mercy, and indulgence, will been extended towards the marquise without eliciting one word either of entresty of acknowledgment, he felt convinced that marked a exhibition of his favour must be recompensed by a return of affection on her part; and thus be continued to participate in the gaieties of the court with which strangely contrasted by the gloom and and of lim royal consort; and even derived amusement from the epigrams and satires which were circulated = his expense among the people.

Français, Paris, 1611, year 1605, .....

100

STREET, SHE SHOULD BE

.

On the 13th of the month M. Rohan* was married

Henri, Duke Roban, Prince de Léon, was the eldest son of Réné, Wiscount de Roban; and was born at Blein in Brittany, in 1579. In made his first campaign under Henry IV., by whom he had been adopted, and who had declared his intention to make him his successor on the French throne should Marie de Medicis fail to give him a son. Henry created him duke had peer in 1603, and colonel-general of the Swiss guards in 1605; but after the death of the King, he entered into a struggle with the court, declared himself the head of the Protestary, which was terminated by his compelling that monarch at Ablon* to Marguerite de Béthune, the daughter of Sully, whom Henry had previously determined to bestow upon the Count ...... Laval ;†

(in 1629) to sign for the second time, a confirmation and re-establishment of the Edict of Nantes. He next entered into a negociation with the Ports for the purchase of the island of Cyprus; and subsequently became Generalissimo of M. Venetians against the Imperialists; then General of the Grisons; and, finally, displeased and disgusted with the French court, he withdrew to the territories of the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, in whose service he made killed, in 1638. M. left m only child, Marguerits, who married Henry de Chabot, and whose descendants took the name of Rohan-Chabot.

Ablon was a small village upon the Seine, distant about leagues from the capital, where the their worship before they built the church Charenton, which was subsequently destroyed.

† Guy, Count de Laval, was one of the richest and most accomplished noblemen of his time. He not only inherited all the wealth of his father, but also that of his grandfather François de Coligny | a fact which, after his death, caused a lawsuit between the family of La Trémouille and the Duke d'Elbourf. His qualities, both physical and mental, were worthy of his extraordinary fortune ; and his devotion to literature and the fine arts was unwearied. M. de Laval had been reared in the Protestant faith; but to the great regret of the reformed party, who had hoped to find in him as scalous a defender as they had found in his ancestors, he embraced the Romish religion. His valour as a soldier was as as his attainments; and he had sourcely reached his twentieth year when he saked, and obtained, from the King, the royal permission to serve under the Archduke Matthias in Hungary against the Turks. Accompanied by fifteen or sixteen gentlemen, and attended by a retime belitting his rapk and wealth, he only did a confer the honour of his presence upon well-dowered bride, but he also signed her marriage-contract, and presented to her ten thousand crowns the purchase of her trousseau, with a similar sum to her bridegroom to defray the expenses of the wedding-feast. A singular ceremony succeeded to the nuptial blessing; for M. de Rohan had no similar led his newly-made wife from the altar, than his ducal coronet placed upon his brow, his ducal mantle flung upon shoulders, and in a pompous costume the close of the banquet, escorted to Paris by the princes and nobles who had been the guests of M. Sully.

Seldom the King evinced more gaiety of heart than this particular period, appeared derive greater amusement from gossipay of the court, and the gallantries of the courtiers; and he ascertained that Mademoiselle d'Entragues had become the mistress of Bassompierre, than he laughingly Duke de Guise: "D'Entragues despises all in her idolatry of Bassompierre. I have good grounds for what I state."

"Well, Sire;" was the reply; " you can be 🔳 no eminently distinguished himself by the manner in which he effected the retreat after the siege of Strigonia; but his first triumph was fated to be his last, as during the struggle he received a gun-shot wound of which he died a few days subsequently, deeply regretted by the Prince in whose cause he had fallen, and by the troops, to whom he had already endeared himself by his noble qualities.

loss to revenge the affront; while for myself, I know of no means so fitting as those of knight-errantry, and I am consequently ready to break three lances with him this afternoon, and any hour and place which your Majesty may be pleased to ordain."

The preparations for combat graphically described by Bassompierre himself, and so characteristic of the manners of the time, that shall offer no apology for giving them in his own words.

"The King acceded our wishes, as such states were by no means unusual, and told us that the tilting should take place in the great court of the Louvre, which he would cause to be covered with sand. M. de Guise selected as his seconds his brother Prince de Joinville, and M. de Thermes; while I

"César Auguste de St. Lary, Baron de Thermes, was the son of Jean de St. Lary and of Anne de Villemur, and was the younger brother of Roger de St. Lary, Duke III Bellegarde, Grand-Equerry of France. IIII was first created Knight of Multa and Grand-Prior of Auvergne, and subsequently, on the diamission of the Duke de Bellegarde, Grand-Equerry in his stead. Having incurred the displaneure of Murie de Medicis, III was compelled to leave the court, when he proceeded to Holland where he was warmly welcomed by Prince Maurice; a welcome which was IIII lessened by the fact of his being accompanied by forty gentlemen. The anger of the Queen having subsided, he returned to France, where, as previously stated, he succeeded to the honours of his brother, was made a knight of St. Minhael and the Holy Ghost, and died of a wound which he had received at the siege of Clerac in July, 1621.

chose M. Saint-Luc* Count Sault.† We all six dressed armed ourselves house of Saint-Luc; and liveries ready every occasion, my party silver-mail, with plumes of red and white, as stockings; while Guise and troop, on account of the imprisonment of Madame de Verneuil, of whom he secretly the lover, dressed and armed in black and François d'Episney, second of Ille was the son of François d'Epismay, Seigneur de Saint-Luc, knight of 🎟 Michael and 📓 Holy Ghoet, and grand-meater of artillery, who was killed the siege of Amiens in 1597. In the preceding year, I carly of fourteen, the young Saint-Luc had a quarrel with Emmanuel-Monsieur, the son of the Duke de Mayenne, by whom he conceived will bed imm insulted; who, upon his demanding the affront were was a jest, or designed as an insult, replied he might interpret it as he pleased, inquiring the same time if he were not aware who he was? "Yes, I know you;" was the reply of the high-spirited boy; "you are the son of the Duke de Mayenne; and you are in your turn aware that I am the son of Saint-Luc, a loyal gentleman who has always is his country with fidelity, and never borne arms against his lawful sovereign." This quarrel between two mere youths having reached the ears of the King, he forbade the disputants to proceed further; but the young Saint-Luc had thus already, alike by his courage and his ready wit, given ample promise of his future loyalty and prowess.

† Guillaume de Sault (or Sault) was the son of the celebrated Gaspard de Sault, Maréchal de Tavannes. — married Chrédier d'Aguirre, — daughter — Michel d'Aguirre, a celebrated jurisconsult of the diocese of Pampelsana; was created Lieutenant-Governor of Burgundy, and died in gold. In this equipage we arrived at the Louvre, myself and my being the upon the ground."*

Henry, with the whole court, both male and female, were present on the occasion, and the lists were placed immediately beneath the windows of the Queen's apartments; but the diversion was not fated to be of long duration, for at the first encounter the lance of M. In entered the body of his antagonist, and the so formidable a wound that he was carried from the spot, and upon the bed of the Duke at Vendôme, apparently in a dying state. After his hurt had been dressed, the Queen sent her sedan chair to convey him residence.

Although Bessompierre, in the preceding column, assures his readers that "such encounters by means unusual," he goes on to state that directly he fell, the King not only forbade the continuance of the tournay, but would man permit another to place; and that this man the only one which had held in France for preceding century.†

"No me can imagine," says the wounded hero in continuation; "the multitude of visits that I received, especially the ladies. All the princesses came me; and Queen three occasions throught me by Mademoiselle de Guise, stayed during whole afternoon."

Bassompierre, Mém., p. .

† *********

The courtly diversions were abruptly terminated by the intelligence which reached Paris of the death, on the 3rd of March, of Pope Clement VIII.* The piety of distinguished Pontiff, and amment services which he had rendered to im French king, caused his loss we be deeply felt by Henry; but when, on 📰 1st day of April, Alessandro 🖶 Medicis, 📖 cousin of the Queen, was unanimously elected as his successor under the title of Leo XI., nothing could exceed the joy which manifested throughout country. Paris was illuminated, bonfires lighted on the surrounding heights, and salvos of artillery rang from the dark walls of the Bastille. This demonstration proved, however, to be premature, me the next courier who arrived in the French capital from Rome, brought the fatal tidings of his death. On the day succeeding his elevation he had made his solemn entry into St. Peter's; m Easter Sunday the triple tiars was placed upon his brow; and the public procession St. John de Latran took place me the 17th; but on returning from this ceremony, the Pontiff

* Hypolito Aldohrandini, subsequently Will., was a Florentine by birth, who, in the year 1585, was made grand penitentiary and cardinal by Pope Sixtus V. His diplomatic talents caused him to be sent as legate to Poland to arrange the difficulties and the Archduke Maximilian, who had both been elected King of Poland by their several particular on the death of Innocent IX., Aldohrandini was raised to pontifical man (1592), which a occupied during thirtsen plained indisposition, and on the 27th he breathed his last; and was in his turn succeeded, on the Day of Pentecost (29th of May) by Paul V.

About this time the King wearied of the perpetual coldness of Madame de Verneuil, which not even his excessive elemency had to overcome, made attempt to compel her gratitude by forwarding letters under great seal, authorising the Count d'Entragues retire to his estate of Marcoussis; and re-establishing himself and his son-in-law in all their wealth and honours, the posts which they under the crown, their respective governments. D'Auvergne, however, was prisoner in the Bastille; where, after lashing himself into fury for a few months, he adopted the prudent and manly alternative of study, and thus contrived educe enjoyment even from his privations.

Yet still haughty spirit of the marquise scorned

* Camillo Borghèse was a native of Rome, whose family were originally from Sienna. Clement VIII. called him to a seat in the conclave in 1598. After his elevation to the pontifical chair, he quarrelled with the republic of Venice, the result of the difference between the two states being the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Venetian territories. He anocceded in effecting the union of the Nestorians of Chaldea to the Romish church, and in appearing for a time several controversial members of his own communion. Paul V. greatly embellished the city of Rome; it was he who completed the façose of St. Peter's, and the palace of the Quirinal. He died in 1621, at the age of sixty-nine years.

111

yield. She was indeed living in her own house, gift of monarch against whom it is this firm and calm defiance, and surrounded by luxuries, the whole of which she owed to his uncalculating generosity; but she could not, and would not, forget ahe mevertheless, exile from the court, and prisoner within the boundary of her estate, while the Queen, whom she will affected to despise. triumphing in her disgrace; nor was it until the month of September, when Heary, who was pining for her return, finally declared, that proof of culpability having been brought against her, she must be forthwith duly and fully acquitted of the crime with which she had been charged, that the icy barrier was at last borne down, and the haughty marquise condescended to acknowledge herself indebted to her sovereign. The King did not satisfy himself with this mere declaration, though he had caused it to be legally registered by the Parliament; but, fearful lest man further revelations might be made, by which the might become once involved, he moreover strictly forbade his attorneygeneral take any steps whatever relating the conspiracy, or tending further to incriminate any of presumed members.*

The jealousy which existed between the two houses of Bourbon and Lorraine, which Henry anxious if possible terminate, coupled perhaps with no small feeling of wounded vanity, determined him to bestow — of Louise Marguerite — Lorraine, Demoiselle de Guise, (who, since she had been in the household of the Queen had lent a less willing ear than formerly — his renewed gallantries), upon François, Prince de Conti; and, accordingly the marriage — celebrated with great pomp in the month of July, in the presence of their Majesties and the whole court. Madame de Conti herself asserts that the Queen first suggested this union, and did everything in her power to effect it;* for which it is highly probable — had — double motive, — the antecedents of Mademoiselle de Guise might well excuse her jealousy.

Mezerwy, vol. x, p.

While besieging Paris, and before his public liaison with Gabrielle d'Estrées, Henry had sent to demand the portrait of Mademoiselle de Guise, giving her reason believe that so soon as the war should be terminated, he was desirous to make her his wife; a prospect which, make very naïvely acknowledges, led her to despise the addresses of the Count de Giury,† who make her declared suitor, as well as those of the other nobles who sought her favour. One day, however, during a brief truce of six hours, puchess de Guise and herself, accompanied by several other ladies, having ascended the rampart to converse with such of their friends as were in the besieging army, all the young gallants crowded foot of the walls to pay their respects to the fair being whose presence offered so graceful a contrast to the objects by which they were more immediately surrounded; and among the rest came Roger, Duke de Bellegarde, and period the handsomest and a France.

Amours Alcandre, p. 47.

† Marguerite Huranlt, ** Giury, who subsequently married Marguerite Huranlt, ** Count de Chiverny, Chancelles of France under Henry III. and Henry IV.

_

It was the first occasion upon which Mademoiselle de Guise the duke had met; and have authority of Im lady for stating in the attraction me mutual. M. de Bellegarde had long been the avowed lover of belle Gabrielle : but, inconstant = the fair d'Estrées herself, he at once surrendered his previously-occupied heart to this new goddess. Im prior attachment not, however, the only reason which should have deterred Mademoiselle de Guise from thus suffering her fancy to overcome her better feelings, as M. de Bellegarde was accused of having been accessory to the assassination of her father; but neither of siderations to have had any weight with the young Princess. According to her own version of the circumstance, Gabrielle conceived so violent a jealousy, that the duke was compelled to condescend to every imaginable subterfuge in order to conceal the truth; while the King, who became good of the intelligence which subsisted between will lovers, to feel any inclination to raise Mademoiselle de Guise to the throne of France; although, - have he was by no means insensible either to the charm of her wit, a last attraction of her beauty.

In order to follow up his great design of pacification, Henry, after having re-established Philip of Nassau in his principality of Orange, also effected his marriage with Eléonore de Bourbon,* by which alliance he secured another design ally.†

During the development of the limit conspiracy, the monarch land been indebted for much of limitinformation received relative to the intrigues of the Count d'Auvergne, in the intelligence afforded by the Queen Marguerite; who having limit into possession of many facts which could not otherwise have been known the King, had assiduously imparted him every circumstance that she conceived to be of importance; service for which he limit not failed express his gratitude. That Marguerite had, however, been in no small degree actuated in this matter by feelings of self-interest, there can be no doubt, d'Auvergne having long enjoyed the proprietorship of limit county from whence he derived his title, and which had been bestowed in him by Henry III.; well as several other which monarch inherited from mother Catherine de Medicis: said territories having formed a portion of her dowry on her union with Henry II. Marguerite's memories of her brother, as the reader will readily comprehend, were not sufficiently attaching induce her submit patiently such a substitution; as she are that, by riage contract, the property in question was settled upon the female offspring of Catherine in default of male issue; and her lavish expenditure and errant adventures having exhausted her seems she resolved to exert every effort establish her claim. She already upon several occasions solicited permission to return the French capital; and, although it had never been distinctly refused, it me coldly conceded that her pride had hitherto prevented her availing herself of indulgence thus reluctantly accorded; but aware at the present moment that she could so materially serve the King as to ensure a more gracious reception than she might previously have anticipated, she resolved is seize the opportunity; and, accordingly, greatly in surprise, not only of the whole court, but of the monarch himself, she arrived in Paris without having her intention, he the permission should be revoked.

* Elécnore de Bourbon was the daughter of Henry I, de Bourbon, Prince de Condé, who succeeded his father in the command of the Calvinist party, conjointly with the King Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. This Prince raised a body of foreign troops, 1575, and distinguished greatly Coutras, in following year, having, as was asserted, been poisoned by his wife, Charlotte de la Trémouille, at St.-Jean-d'Angely.

† vol. v, p. 418.

.

For five-and-twenty years, the survivor of illustrious house of V and existed in obscurity and poverty the mountains and precipices of illustrious for the first form of the first f inhospitable county of Auvergne, apparently forgetting for time that world by which she had been so readily forgotten; Marguerite began at length to yearn for a restoration of her privileges as a member if the great human family. Could not have chosen a more judicious im which to hazard so extreme a step; as in addition to the respect which, despite all her vices, she could still command as the descendant of a long line of sovereigns, she had latterly many claims upon the gratitude of the King. II was impossible for him not to feel, and that deeply, the generous selfabnegation with which she had lent herself to the dissolution of their ill-omened marriage, when not only his own happiness, but that of the whole nation, required the sacrifice; nor could be fail to remember that while those upon whom he lavished alike his affection and his treasure, had constantly laboured to embitter his domestic life, and to undermine the dignity of his Queen, the repudiated wife had were evinced slightest disposition withhold from her the deference respect to which she was entitled.

Thus then, when her near approach to the capital was suddenly announced to him, Henry lost not a in hastening, with his royal and a brilliant retinue, to receive her before could reach the gates; and gave orders that the palace of Madrid in the Bois de Boulogne should immediately be prepared in a befitting manner for her residence. Nor was Marie de Medicis less willing than himself to welcome the trush Princess, to whom she was aware that she owed many obligations; and the meeting was consequently a cordial one on both sides. After usual ceremonies been observed, Marguerite, abandoning the litter in which she had hitherto travelled, took her place in the state coach beside their Majesties, by whom was conducted appointed abode; nor was it until repeated expressions of regard had been exchanged between the ex-Queen and her successor, that the royal party returned to the Tuileries.

After a sejourn of six weeks in the palace of Madrid, during which time Marguerite not only revealed to the monarch all the details of the Verneuil conspiracy, but also the particulars of another, still more serious, as it involved the cession of Marseilles, Toulon, and other cities to the Spaniards, she became wearied of the forest-villa, and established herself in the archiepiscopal Hôtel de Sens; an arrangement to which the King

This hôtel was the property of the Bishop of Bourges, known as M. de Sens, who died in September, 1606, at the age of seventy-nine years; and who was interred at Notre-Dame, at his own request, pomp or ceremony of an description. This prelate had been involved in so many delicate, but withal conspicuous affairs, that he had become the object of very general curiosity and slander. At the commencement of the reign of Henry IV., a satire made its appearance, entitled: "Library of Madame de Montpensier, brought to light by the advice of Cornac, and with the consent of the Sieur de Beaulieu, her equerry;" in which mention was made of a supposititious work called: "The Art of not Believing in God," by M. de Bourges, in which an consented on condition that she should make him two promises, one of which was that she would be more of her health, "and not turn night into day, and day into night," = she was accustomed = do; other, she would restrain her liberality, endeavour to economise. To these requests the Princess cheerfully answered that she would make an effort obey Majesty upon the point, although would would privation almost beyond endurance, from the habit in which she had so long indulged of enjoying we sunrise before she retired we rest; but with regard to the other she must decline to give a pledge which she certain to falsify, Valois having over succeeded in such an attempt. It is probable that Henry, from a consciousness of his own peculiar prodigalities, did not feal himself authorised to insist upon rigid observance of his expressed wish, although attempt was made to convict the prelate of Atheism. The was attributed to the reformed party; while the libel was strengthened by the indignation felt by the court of Rome at the circumstance of III de Bourges having taken upon himself to absolve Henry IV. without the papel authority, on his conversion in the Roman Catholic faith. The manner of his death, however, gainsayed in calumny; although so slight had been in respect felt for his sacred office, that the ex-Queen Marguerite had no sooner taken possession of his hôtel, than the following placard was found affixed to the entrance-gate:

"Comme Reine, tu devais être

Ku ta royale maison;

Comme ——, s'est bien raison

Que m loge au logis d'un prêtre."

Marguerite had so frankly refused to regulate her expenditure with more prudence, she nevertheless permitted to remain in the asylum which she had chosen; this she continued to do until 5th of April, 1606, when she was driven from it by a tragedy that rendered it to ber.

her retinue, it unfortunately included a young favourite named Saint-Julien,* who from some private pique had induced her to discharge from her service two attendants who had from their youth been members of her household, the and the other maid of honour; and who had ultimately married with her consent and approbation, but upon being thus and off, found themselves ruined; no noble house being willing to receive the dismissed attendants of the dishonoured Queen. Of this union son had been born, however, possessed of less patience and self-government than his unfortunate parents, who after having clung to Marguerite through good and evil fortune, me found themselves abandoned to all miseries of poverty and neglect. This youth, called by L'Etoile Vermond, and by Bassompierre Charmond, made his way to Paris as best he might, and arrived in acapital after Marguerite had taken up her residence as already in the Faubourg St. Antoine. There can be doubt that the utter destitution of his parents had made him desperate, for he could not rationally indulge the alightest hope of impunity; suffice it, that as the Princess was alighting from her coach on her return attending the abbey of Celestines, between mid-day and one o'clock the 5th of April, while her favourite stood beside the steps to assist her to descend, the unhappy Vermond shot through head; and then, turning his horse towards the gate of St. Denis, endeavoured to make his escape. He was, however, ill-mounted to succeed in the attempt; the carriage of the ex-Queen having been followed by many of the nobles who were anxious to propitiate the favour of the King by so easy a display of respect to the unthroned Marguerite; and are he reached the barrier the wretched young man found himself a prisoner.

Bassompierre calls Missint-Sulliendat.—Mém., p. 4.

The body of his victim had, meanwhile, been conveyed to an apartment on the ground-floor of the hôtel, where on his arrival he was immediately confronted with it is but no sign of remorse or regret was visible as he gazed upon the corpse. "Turn it over;" he said huskily, after he had gazed for awhile upon the glazed eyes and the parted lips. "Let me see if he be really dead." It request was complied with; and as he became convinced that life had indeed departed from the already stiffening form, he exclaimed joyfully: "It is well—I have not failed—my task is accomplished. Had it been otherwise I could yet have repaired the error."

When this scene was reported to Marguerite, who, absorbed in the most passionate grief, had retired to her apartment, she vowed that she would not touch food until she had vengeance on the murderer; and she kept her word, as she persisted in her resolution till, on the third day after he had committed the crime, the unhappy young man was decapitated in front of the house, and almost upon the very spot still recking with the blood of his victim. But the nerves of the ex-Queen could endure no further tension; and on the morrow she removed to a new residence in the Faubourg St. Germain, where she was shortly afterwards visited by Bassompierre, who was charged with the condolences of the King on her late loss.*

This fact alone tends more fully to develope the manners and morals (?) of the age than a thousand comments; and thus we have considered it our duty to place it upon record.

Meanwhile, M. de Saint-Julien was far from having been the only favourite of the profligate Marguerite, who divided her time between devotional exercises and the indulgence of those guilty pleasures to which she was so unhappily addicted; but while the citizens were all slow to remark her excesses, she gained the love of the poor by a profuse alma giving, and enjoyed a perfect impunity of action from the real or frigned ignorance of the King relative to the private arrangements of her household. She was, moreover, the avowed patroness of men of letters, by whom her table was constantly surrounded; and in whose society she took so much delight that she acquired, by this constant intercourse with the most learned individuals of the capital, a facility not only of expression, but also of composition, very remarkable in of her sex that period.* Carefully avoiding all political intrigue, she made no distinction of persons beyond that due to their rank; and thus, while her intercourse with the Queen was marked by an affectionate respect peculiarly gratifying to its object, she was no less urbane and condescending to the Marquise de Verneuil; who had, may have been anticipated, already regained all her former influence the mind of the monarch, passion even appearing have derived strength their temporary estrangement.

* L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 353, 354. Benompierre, Mém., p. 46.

-

The peculiar situation of the Queen, however, who about once to become mother, and whose tranquillity of mind he feared to disturb at such moment, rendered the monarch unusually anxious conceal this fact; and it consequently, not until some weeks afterwards, that Marie de Medicis was apprised of the most triumph of her rival.

The month of December accordingly passed away without the domestic which which have arisen had the Queen been less happily ignorant of her real position; but it was nevertheless and to be an event-ful one. The death of M. de la Rivière, the King's body-surgeon, a loss which was severely felt by Henry, was succeeded by the execution of M. de Merargues,* whose conspiracy to deliver up Marseilles to the Spaniards was revealed to the monarch by Marguerite and who, tried convicted of lèse-majesté, decapitated in Place de Grêve, body quartered and exposed at the four gates of the capital, and his head carried to Marseilles, and stuck upon a pike over principal entrance of the city; while, on wery day of his execution, as the King was returning from a hunt, and riding slowly were the Pont Neuf, about five in the afternoon, a man suddenly sprang up behind him, and threw him backwards upon his horse, attempting at the same time to plunge a dagger which he held into the body of his Majesty. Fortunately, however, Henry was so closely muffled in a thick cloak, that before he could effect his purpose, the attendants were enabled to seize him and liberate their royal master, who was perfectly uninjured. The consternation was nevertheless universal; nor was it lessened by the calmwith which when interrogated, the assassin declared that his intention had been to take the life of the sovereign. It was soon discovered, however, by the * Louis de Lagon de Merargues was a nobleman of Provence, who claimed to descend from the Princes of Catalonia or Aragon. His position of procureur-syndic of the department, and the importance of the relatives of his wife, who was closely connected with the Duke de Montpensier, together with the command of two galleys which he held from the King, enabled him any moment to possess himself of the part; while his office of Viguier, or royal provost, gave him great anthonity over the citizens.

* Richelieu, La Mère et le Fila, vol. i, p. 326.

- 10

incoherency of his language, that he was a manisc; and although many of the nobles urged that he should be put to state as an example to others, the King resolutely resisted their advice, declaring that his family, who had long been so of infirmity, below blame than himself; and commanding that he should be placed in security, and thus rendered unable to repeat any act of violence. He was accordingly conveyed to prison, where he shortly afterwards died.

At this period, whether it that the King hoped by occupying her attention with subjects of more moment, be enabled to pursue liaison with Verneuil difficulty, or lie his advancing rendered him in reality anxious initiate her into the mysteries of government, is certain he endeavoured induce Queen to take more interest than she is hitherto done in questions of national importance; and revealed her many secrets, not one of which, as he afterwards declared to Sully, did she was communicate, was to her confriends. But Marie de Medicis - far from evincing the delight which he had anticipated in his avowed wish that she with him in the hopes and disappointments of royalty; her ambition is not then been thoroughly awakened; she as a a and as woman rather than as Queen; and an insolence de Verneuil occupied her feelings more nearly threatened conspiracy. In great, indeed, was her distaste to the new character in which she was summoned to appear, that when the King occasionally addressed her with a gay smile as Madame la Régente, a cloud invariably gathered upon her brow. Upon occasion, when the royal couple were walking in the park - Fontainebleau, attended by the court, that monarch, who is the Dauphin by the hand, vainly endeavoured to induce him to jump across a little stream which ran beside their path, Henry became so enraged by his cowardice and obstinacy that he raised him in his arms to dip him into the pigmy current, a punishment which was, however, averted by the entreaties of his mother; and the King reluctantly consented that he should suffer nothing than the mortification of being compelled to exchange her care for of governess, Madame de Montglat. As the child led away King sighed audibly, but in a few seconds he resumed the conversation which had been thus unpleasantly interrupted; and once more he the Queen as Madame la Régente.

"I entreat of you, Sire, not to call me by that name;" Marie; "it is full of associations which cannot fail to be painful to me."

The King looked earnestly and even sadly upon her for a moment ere he replied, and then it was in a tone as grave as that in which she uttered her expostulation.

You are right;" he said; "quite right not to wish to survive me, for the close of my life will be the mencement of your own troubles. You have occasionally shed tears when I have flogged your son, but one day

_

My favourites have often excited your displeasure, but you will find yourself some time hence by those who obtain an influence over the actions of Louis. Of thing I can assure you; and that is, knowing your temper so well as I do, and foreseeing that which his will prove in after-years—you, Madam, self-opinionated, not to say headstrong, and he obstinate—you will assuredly break than an lance together."

Poor Marie! She was little aware at that moment how soon so mournful a prophecy was to become a still more mournful reality.

* Richelien, La Mère et la File, vol. i, pp. 19, 20.

CHAPTER VI.

[1606.]

ATA THE STORE OF STREET
₩ A DESIRON — A SECOND OF THE SECOND SECON PUBLIC PRETVITIES A BALLET ON THE PROPERTY OF THE PROPERTY TO THE BULK SO
OF HANRY—THE COURT COMMENT OF TOROY—QUARANDER OF SOVERNOUS ENTER TEL
CITIERNI CTATE FARIS-TEB COURT JUSTICE
THE REPORT MARGUERITE THE COUNTY OF AUVERGRE THE "TE DEFEN"—MARGURETTE MARRIE A DOPARTOR THE REA
DAUPEIM — OF MARGINITY - PEALOUST OF THE QUEEN OF MADAME BE MORRE—DICTEASING COLD
TIMO TOWARDS THAT LADY-THE STYATE-PRINCIPLY BRACONS—DISHERATION OF THE COMMENTS SAGAPE
OF THE KING AND GURBH - GRAFITURE OF THE GUREN TO KIN
PLEASANTRY OF THE MARAVISE DE VERNEUTL OF THE DUE BE SAN
—THE RING INVITES THE DOUBLES OF MANTON TO BROOMS SPONSON TO THE DAUPEN, AND THE DUEL DR LORMAINS TO THE YOUNGER PRINCESS—" HEE MANTUAN SURTE"—PREPARATIONS HE NOTES-DAME
-THE STREET OF STREET
THE ROYAL CHRISTIANS INCREASE OF THE PLACES NOTAL
712

CHAPTER VL

[1606.]

THE description given by M. de Sully of In interview with their Majesties on the morning of the 1st of January, 1806, a characteristic of the time that cannot conscientiously pass it over, although the feeling of the present day compels us to exclude many of details. Early in the forenoon the Duke proceeded the Louvre to pay his respects to the august couple, and to present the customary offerings; but on reaching the apartment of the King, he was informed by MM. d'Armagnac and l'Oserai, the two valets-de-chambre on duty, his Majesty was in the chamber of the Queen, who had been seriously indisposed during night. He consequently proceeded in the ante-room of his royal mistress, and as he found it vacant, advanced to the door of the chamber itself, against which he gently, in order water the attention Selveggio or de la Renouillère, her health without awakening her. II had no sooner done so, however, was several voices loudly inquired who was there? and among them the duke recognised those of Roquelaure, Frontenac, and Beringhen.

Having declared his identity, and been announced to King, he immediately summoned in a cheerful voice by Henry himself: "Come in, in, Sully;" monarch; "you will think in very idle until you learn what has kept in bed a late. My wife has been ill all night; but I will tell you all about it when there are not so many people present; and, meanwhile, let in what you have brought for as new year's gifts; for I observe that your three secretaries are with you laden each with a velvet bag."

"It is true, Sire;" answered the duke; "I bered that the last occasion upon which I had seen your Majesties together, you was both in excellent spirits; and trusting to the the case to-day, when are all anticipating the birth of a second Prince, I have brought you was offerings which as sure please you, as they cannot fail to gratify those to whom they are distributed in your name; a distribution which I trust may take place weening in your presence, and that of the Oueen."

"Although she nothing you;" laughed the King; "according to her custom of pretending be asleep, she is as thoroughly awake as myself; but she is very angry with both of us. However, we will talk of that some other time. And now let us see your presents."

"They are not perhaps, Sire;" grand-master;

"such as might be expected from the of a wealthy and powerful monarch; but they are, I convinced that they will afford more gratification those for whom they are intended, and excite gratitude towards your own person, all the costly gifts which you lavish upon individuals who, I well know, only repay your profuse liberality by ingratitude and murmurs."

"I understand you;" exclaimed the King; "it is useless to explain yourself further; rather show what you have brought."

The duke made a signal to his secretaries to approach the bed. "Here, Sire;" he said; "in my dispatch-bag, three purses with gold tokens, with a device expressive of the love borne towards your Majesty by your people. One of these I offer to yourself, another the Queen, and third Monseigneur Dauphin, rather, I ought say Mamanga,* her Majesty does not retain it, alm always done on similar occasions. In the man bag are eight purses of silver tokens with the same device, two for yourself, two for the Queen, and four for la Renoullère, Catarina Selveggio, and any other of the ladies who sleep in the chamber ther Majesty.

Mamanga was the name given in playfulness by the Dauphin to Madame de Montglat.

The second bag contains twenty-five purses of tokens in silver, to be distributed among Monacigneur Dauphin. Montglat, Drou, Mademoiselle de Piolant,† the nurses and other attendants of Monseigneur and his sister, and the waiting-maids of the Queen | in the third bag there are thirty sacks, each containing a hundred crowns in half-franc pieces, coined expressly for the purpose, and so large that they appear to be of twice the value. These are intended for all the subordinate rank attached to the household of her Majesty and the royal children, according to your orders. I have left, moreover, in my carriage below, in the charge of my people, two great bags, each containing hundred in twelve sous pieces, making the sum of twelve thousand for division among the poor and sick upon the quays of the river near the Louvre, which are, as I am told, already crowded | and I have in consequence sent twelve citizens upon whom I can rely, to distribute the money conscientiously secording to the necessities of each applicant, All these poor people, and even the waiting-women of her Majesty, exhibit more delight on receiving trifling coins, Sire, than you can well believe. They all say that it is not so much for the value of the gift, as because it proves that you remember and regard them; and, moreover, the attendants of the Queen prize them in conse-

* Madame de Druu was the governess of the infant Princess.

† Mademoiselle de Fiolant, femme-de-chambre to the royal children.

.

their being to appropriate them they think fit, they compelled to employ their respective salaries according to the instructions which they receive; as they thus have hundred crowns to expend in any finery for which they may take a fancy."

"And you bestow all happiness upon without being rewarded even by a kiss?" asked Henry gaily.

"Truly, Sire;" answered the Duke; "since the day when your Majesty commanded them a recognise their obligation in that manner, I have never it necessary to remind them of your royal pleasure, for they voluntarily tender their acknowledgments according to order; while Madame de Drou, devout a she is, only laughs during the performance of the ceremony."

"Come now, M. le Grand-Mattre;" persisted King; "tell me the truth; which do you consider to be the handsomest, and consequently the welcome among them?"

Henry laughed heartily. "How you, gentle-;" exclaimed, addressing the courtiers who thronged the chamber; "Have we here a prodigal treasurer, and makes such presents as these in the expense of his master, and all for a kies?"

Of course the royal hilarity found a general and immediate echo, which than King exclaimed: "And now, gentlemen, your breakfasts, and leave us to discuss affairs of greater importance."

In a few minutes all had left me room save Sully himself, and the two waiting-women of Queen; and he had no sooner ascertained that such was the case than Henry said affectionately: "And now, sleeper, awake, and do not scold any longer; for I have, on my part, resolved not to think any more of what has passed, particularly at such a time as this. You fancy that Sully blames you whenever - bave a difference; but you are quite wrong, as you would be aware, could you only know how freely he gives me his opinion on my own faults; and although I am occasionally angry with him, I like him none the less; on the contrary, I believe that if he ceased to love me, he would be more indifferent to all that touches my welfare and honour, as well as the good of my people; for, do you see, ma mie, the best-intentioned among us require at times to be supported by the wise advice of faithful and prudent friends; in he is constantly reminding me if the expediency of indulgence towards yourself, and of the necessity of keeping your mind at peace, in order you, nor the Prince whom you about to give to France-for the duke feels satisfied that it will be Prince—may suffer from contradiction, or annoyance of any kind."

"I thank M. Grand-Maître;" the Queen length, in voice of great exhaustion; " it is impossible for the feel either calm or happy while you persist in preferring the society of persons who are obnoxious to me, to my own. My very dreams are embittered by this consciousness; and doubly so, because I have the know that while I their victim, they the word would be yourself; and, moreover, detest you in their hearts. You may doubt this;" added with greater energy; "but I appeal to the duke himself, and he will tell you if this is not the case."

M. de Sully, however, on no inclination was sully testimony to the truth of an assertion of this nature the position involved too great a responsibility to be agreeable even to the experienced himself; and accordingly, with his accustomed prudence, generalised the subject by declaring that he experienced a heartfelt satisfaction in perceiving that their Majesties had length yielded to refeeling of mutual confidence, which could not fail to put an end to all their domestic discomfort; adding that if he might presume moffer his advice, he would suggest that should any new subject of difference arise between them, they should immediately refer to the arhitration of a serion, upon whose probity and attachment they could severally rely; resolve to leave the totally in his hands, without aggravating the will by any personal interference, or even considering themselves aggrieved by the remedy which he might suggest.

He then offered, should they place sufficient confidence in his own judgment and affection, to become himself the arbitrator whom he recommended I and he had no sconer done so than the King eagerly declared himself ready to comply with his advice, and to sign a pledge to that effect; but Marie de Medicis, who was as well aware as her royal consort that the first step adopted by Sully would be the exile of her Italian followers, was less willing to bind herself by such an engagement; she therefore merely remarked that the proposition had upon her so suddenly, that she must have time to reflect before she thus placed herself entirely in the hands of a third party. She then, as if anxious to terminate the discussion, summoned her women; and the duke, by no summoned her women; and

At this period the King made a journey into Limousin, at the head of a body of troops, in order to overawe the malcontents in that province; and while at Orleans he withdrew the scals from Pomponne de Bellièvre, in order to bestow them upon Sillery, the former, however, retaining the empty title of chief of the privy council. The pretext for this substitution was the failing health of the chancellor; but it was generally attributed to the influence of Madame de Verneuil, in whose fortunes M. de Sillery had always exhibited as lively an interest as he had previously done in those of the Duchess de Let it, however, have arisen from whatever cause it might, is certain that deeply indignity which had been offered to him; for Bassompierre asserts that when he shortly afterwards is Bellièvre.

* Sully, Mon., vol. vi. pp. 151--161.

Artenay, the indignant minister commented with considerable bitterness upon his recent deprivation, wainly endeavoured to reconcile him the affront by reminding him that he was still in office, and would preside at all the councils as chancellor, as he immediately replied with emphasis: "My friend, a chancellor without seals is an apothecary without sugar."

On the 10th of February the Queen gave birth to second daughter; in the palace of the Louvre, to her mortification; assured her that she was about to become the mother of a Prince. The citizens of Paris were, however delighted, no royal child had been born in the capital for great length of time;; while princes and nobles, throughout whole of the following month, vied with each other in their entertain their Majesties, and to cause them to forget their disappointment. would appear, indeed, that Marie herself soon became reconsiled to the sex of the infant Princess, as Bassompierre has left upon record, that even before she sufficiently recovered to leave her room, she used to send for him always welcome to the handsome and dissipated courtier.* She no provided in public, however, than other more amusements provided for her; consisting of jousts, banquets, dies, and court halls; but all these were exceeded in interest by a ballet that was performed on horseback in the great court of the Louvre, which had been thickly strewn with sand and surrounded by barriers, save at one opening opposite the seats prepared for their Majesties, through which is four nobles by whom the entertainment had been devised, were to enter with their respective trains from the Hôtel de Bourbon.

Bassompierre, Mém., p. 45.

† Christine Prance, who subsequently Duchess of Savoy.

<sup>1</sup> L'Etoile, vol. iii, p. 365.

The balconies and windows of the palace were crowded with splendidly dressed nobles and courtiers of both sexes, while a dense mass of people occupied every available spot of ground beyond the enclosure, where platforms had also been erected for the respectable of the citizens and their families. The King and Queen man seated in the belcony of the window, which was draped with crimson velvet, having on their right and left several of the princes of the blood, and ladies of the highest rank; while immediately behind them were placed the great officers of the crown, and the captains of the bodyguard. The hour selected for this novel and extraordinary exhibition was ten at night; and hundreds of lamps, and double number of torches to the facade of the palace, towards which every eye upturned from the compact crowd below. The was designed in represent the four primary Elements; and the appointed moment had no sooner arrived than of trumpets announced approach of the Duke de Bellegarde, who with his party, per-Water. The procession opened by twentyfour in d of silver, each by two torch-bearers; these were followed by twelve Syrens playing m hautboys, who may in their may ceeded by a pyramid, whose summit was crowned by a gigantic figure of Neptune, surrounded by water-gods, and marine divinities and insignia of every description. This stupendous machine paused for moment beneath window of their Majesties, and the aquatic having made their obeisance, it passed on, and gave place to twenty-four other pages, habited and attended like the former ones. These preceded the duke himself at the head of twelve young and brilliant nobles, all clad in cloth of silver, with plumes of white feathers in their jewelled caps, and their horses richly caparisoned in white and silver. Having made the tour of the court, whole party drew closely together in one angle if the enclosure, in order to make way for the second troop, but not before they led their equesskill, and self only approving of the courtly who contemplated them from above, but also the vociferous acclamations of admiring thousands by whom they were hemmed in. The Duke de Bellegarde and his train had no

* Mémoires, p. 46.

VOL.

B B

ALCOHOL: NAME OF PERSONS ASSESSMENT

40

100

sooner taken up their station than a second fanfare greeted the approach of the powers of Fire, who were ushered in by twenty-four pages dressed in scarlet, closely followed by four blacksmiths dragging an anvil, upon which, when they reached the centre of the court, they began to strike with great violence, and at every blow discharged such a shower of rockets into the air. that many a fair dame crouched behind her neighbour for protection from the falling sparks; while the lamps and torches which lit up the palace walls were momentarily eclipsed. As the last rush of rockets burst, and fell back in a Danaëan shower, a train of salamanders, phoenix, and other anti-inflammable creatures, appeared in their turn, and were followed by the Duke de Rohan, as Vulcan, with his twelve companions in the garb of Parthians, all similarly dressed, and armed with lances, swords, and shields, on which their arms were splendidly emblazoned. Renewed feets of dextrous horsemanship were exhibited by this brilliant band; after which, as their predecessors had previously done, they themselves in an angle of the lists; and made way for the representatives of Air. First came in forming an escort to the goddess Juno, with her attendant eagle, and a multitude of other birds, all skilfully imitated and grouped; and when the feathered pageant had passed on, appeared the Count de Sommerive* and his

Charles Emmanuel de Lorraine, Count & Sommerive, second son of the Duke de Mayenne, who restored the city of Laon to the King in 1594, and died at Naples in Lane.

noble band, all wearing the same costume and bearing a same arms. Lastly Earth, in pages succeeded by cormous elephants, artistically constructed, and bearing upon their amall towers filled with musicians, who, as they advanced, poured volume of sound, which several horses, draped with cloth w gold, led by Moors, moved in cadence like the grooms by whom they conducted. Then pages, and a band of trumpeters, whose occasional flourishes overpowered the softer instruments of who marched in front; and finally, twelve Moorish knights, led by the Duke de Nevera, all resplendent with gold and jewels, closed the procession, in fell to the remaining extremity of the enclosure. A combat then commenced between the knights of and those of Water; first single-handed, then in couples, and finally troop against troop; and so soon as this had terminated, the cavaliers of Air and Fire went through the same evolutions; when each having exhibited dexterity in the manage and his skill in arms, the whole of the four bands joined in the melée, shivering their lances, their arrows, and their shields; and then of the combatants seized a torch which had prepared for him, and after having ridden round and round each other, making wandering lights wandering lights appearance of meteors, and entire company formed more into order, and returned to Hôtel de Bourbon like a long line of fire.

* Charles de Gonzaga de Clèves, Duke de Nevers, was the son of Louis de Gonzaga, Prince of Mantna, Duke de Nevers, and Governor of Champagne (who died in 1601, and to whose title he succeeded), and of Hanriette de Clèves, Duchess of Nevers and de

These precisely the entertainments

Henry IV. seger to encourage, they involved amount of outlay which frequently crippled means of those by whom they years; and he was accustomed to declare that I was frequently poverty of his nobles that he indebted for their fidelity, as they no sooner found themselves in a position to arm a few retainers and offensive, than they forthwith began organise cabal.

The King having, in the month of March of this year, determined upon proceeding in person quell the disturbances in the provinces, and to compel the Duke Bouillon, who was known at the inatigator of these disorders, to obedience, made preparations on an attensive scale for this purpose, and raised a powerful army in order to prove his resolution atterminate all similar attempts. In project he warmly encouraged by the Queen, who was to accompany him in his journey, the land de Sully having urged her with most arguments, auggest his Majesty although was personally, the

Mercure Français, 100, 101.

his prowess and authority, to resist the insidious aggressions of M. de Bouillon, the case would be widely different the infant Prince by any sudden dispensation of Providence to be and upon supply place. "The rebel duke, Madam;" and it prudent upright minister; "would prove a formidable enemy to a woman and a child; and this should be looked to while your royal consort is still in the plenitude in health and strength."

Marie de Medicis at once felt the force of this reasoning; and although the caution might probably appear in her somewhat premature, she nevertheless lost no time in entreating the King to make such an example of the restless and ambitious Bouillon, might deter others from following in his track.

"You are at once right and wrong, " saie;" replied Henry with his usual promptitude; "There can be no doubt that the temper and projects of this man tend to disturb peace of the kingdom, and were to lose his head a great peril would be escaped; but we must not forget that he is a prince of the blood, and that he may be severely punished through his pride. I have resolved to take Sedan out of his hands, and to humble him upon the very threshold of his power; and this vengeance upon his rebellion will be ample, as has taught himself believe I dare not attack him in his stronghold. Once subdued he will be undeceived; and I shall then be enabled to pardon him without having my elemency mistaken for fear; and I will

such measures as shall ensure his future submis-

On the 15th of the month, the Court of Parliament, on a summons from the sovereign, proceeded to the Louvre, where Henry explained to them his reasons for besieging the Maréchal de Bouillon in Sedan, and possessing himself of the town and citadel. "A failure:" he concluded; "is impossible; as as as of the Queen will accompany me. To-morrow we commence our journey; but do not conceive that I set forth against the duke with any preconceived design of vengeance. My arms will be open to him should he acknowledge his error, for I have been his benefactor, and have made him what he is. Is should be decline to offer his submission and to recognise my authority, I trust that God will favour my arms. Above all things, during my absence, I entreat of you to administer the strictest justice; and I leave in your hands the Dauphin, my son, whom I have caused to be removed from St. Germain to Paris, in order to place him under your protection; and I do so with the most entire confidence, as next to myself he should be to you the most sacred trust on earth."†

On the morrow accordingly the King and Queen set forth, accompanied by a brilliant retinue, and closely followed by the Duke de Sully with fifty pieces of ordnance, and twenty-five thousand men; a fact which dispatched messengers to Toroy, the frontier village of France, who were authorised to pledge themselves that the duke was willing to deliver up the citadel of Sedan for the space of ten years, if at the termination of that period his Majesty would consent to restore it, should he, in the interim, have become satisfied of loyalty and devotion. He, however, annexed another condition to his surrender, which was that an act of oblivion should be passed, and that he should never thenceforward be subjected to mijury, either of property or person, for whatever acts of disobedience to the royal authority he might have previously been considered responsible, and should be left in untroubled possession of all his honours, estates, and offices under the crown.

* Richelieu, La Mère et le Fils, vol. i, p. 14.

† Mereure Français, 1606, p. 102.

Having carefully perused this treaty, the King at once consented to the proposed terms, on the understanding that the maréchal should at the following morning present bimself at Donchery, where the court were to halt and night, before their Majesties should have risen. This he accordingly did on the 21st, when upon his knees beside the royal couch, he repeated and ratified the pledges of fidelity contained in his appeal for pardon, and had the honour of kissing hands with both sovereigns; the King assuring him as he did so, that he valued the citadel of Sedan far less than the recovery of so valued a friend and subject.

Their Majesties then made a solemn entry into the city, attended by a train of princes and nobles, and were received loud and long-continued "Long live King ?" "Long live Queen the Dauphin!" Salvos of artillery were fired from the ramparts of the and citadel, and whole progress of the royal cortège through the streets resembled triumphal procession. In the evening the entire city illuminated; who woodferous cheering of the limit people their delight the bloodless and peaceful termination of an expedition from which they had anticipated themselves only danger and distress.

The whole population was in a folding of delirium: Troyal equipages of they traversed the streets were followed by admiring crowds; the sea and gaudy nobles watched by bright eyes, and welcomed by rosy lips; the civic authorities dreamt only of balls and banquets; and in short, the rock-seated city, bristling as it was with cannon, and frowning with fortifications, appeared to have become suddenly transformed into the chosen abode of the Loves and Graces.

Having remained five days Sedan, the King appointed seem governor returned to Paris, whither he was accompanied by the whole of the royal party, which was moreover augmented by the presence of Duke Bouillon, who, according Bassompierre, as much his ease, and as arrogant in his deportment, as though had never incurred the risk of the headsman as a rebel and a traitor. The court dined at La Roquette, and was near dusk when they reached the barrier Antoine, where they were met by the corporate bodies. Henry himself was horseback. preceded by eight hundred in full dress; and by four princes of the blood, in whose train came other princes, dukes, and officers if the court, among whom were the Maréchal de Bouillon and Prince Juan de Medicis. The Queen occupied her state coach. having beside her the Duchesses de Guise and de Nevers, and Princess W Conti. As the royal party at the barrier, the civil lieutenant, M. de Miron, provost of merchants, delivered a congratulatory the King in the name of the city; but this loyal effusion was rendered inaudible by the booming of the cannon from the Bastille, man the crashing and whizzing of the rockets and other fireworks, which, by order of the Duke de Sully, were let immediately im monarch had passed the gates.* So and as the address terminated, the gorgeous procession resumed march, Sully riding on the in hand of the King, by whom this enthusiastic reception is been deeply nor did his gratification suffer any decrease on observing as in passed on that every window upon his way was growded with and animated faces. As he glanced towards the Bastille, the minister attracted his attention Countess d'Auvergne, who had latterly been permitted to visit her husband, and who was gazing wistfully from one of the narrow casements. As Henry recognised her, withdrew plumed cap, will be his head with a courtesy and kindness which was remarked and commented upon by those around him | but his most gracious recognition was vouchsafed to the Countess de Moret; who was seated a window in the Rue Antoine, surrounded by a bevy of beauties, who only served to render her own loveliness the more conspicuous.*

Merenre Français, 1606, p. 106.

.

Thus, amid the deafaning report of artillery, and enthusiastic plaudits of the people, Henry and his Queen at length reached the Louvre, and their bloodless campaign.

On the 30th of May the legal courts, after three long patient sittings, declared the ex-Queen Marguerite to be the lawful heir to the counties of Auvergne and Clermont, barony of La Tour, and other which had appertained to the late Queen Catherine de Medicis; asserting that they had hitherto been unjustly possessed by Charles de Valois, who had also wrongfully derived his en of Count d'Auvergne from one of them; and directed that the said territories should forthwith be transferred to the ex-Queen Marguerite, to whom they rightfully belonged. When me decision was pronounced, the Princess was assisting at the celebration of mass in the church of St. Saviour, whither M. Drieux her chancellor proceeded with the glad tidings, which he had me sooner imparted. than, overjoyed by the intelligence, she rose from her knees before the service was concluded, and leaving the church, hastened to the monastery of Cordeliers, she caused a "Te Deum" to be chanted in gratitude for her success.

L'Etaile, vol. iii, p. 358.

A few days subsequently, while at the Louvre, the ex-Queen, in the presence of Marie de Medicis, made a donation of the recovered estates to the Dauphin, on condition that they should be annexed to the crown, and never under any consideration, or upon any pretext, alienated. Marguerite, however, reserved to the income data and from these possessions during her life; and she no sooner found her means adequate to the undertaking, than she commenced the enlargement of the hôtel which she had previously purchased in the Faubourg St. Germain, near the Pré aux Clercs, and the embellishment of the specious gardens which swept down to the bank of the river opposite the Louvre.

Here was, under the very shadow of the palace which should have been her home, that Marguerite held her little court; passing from her oratory to scenes of vice and voluptuousness, which, happily, are unparalleled in these times; one day doing penance with bare feet and a robe of serge, and the next reposing upon velvet cushions, and pillowed on down—now fasting like an anchorite, and now feesting like a bacchante; one hour dispensing charity so lavishly as to call down the blessings of hundreds on her head, and the next causing her lacqueys to chase with ignominious words and blows from beneath her roof honest creditors who claimed their hard-earned gains. Extreme in everything, she gave a tithe of all that she possessed to the monks, although she did not shrink from ing that her favourites cost her a larger annual sum while she encouraged appreciated the society of men of letters, and profited largely by their companionship, condescended to the most frivolous follies, and abandoned to the most frivolous follies.*

The insipidity of Madame de Moret counteracted spell of her beauty; although on his return from Sedan the King had appeared to be more by her extraordinary loveliness than even m the first period of their acquaintance, it was not long ere he listened with a patience very unusual to him, to the indignant remonstrances of the Queen .... this infidelity, and ____ assured her that her reproaches ____ misplaced. Marie, who perceived the prodigality with which the King lavished upon the frail fair one the most costly gifts, and who me her, through the mock marriage which she had contracted, assume a place at court which occasionally even brought her into contact with herself, could == readily lay aside her suspicions; and although she had at rejoiced to find it the fancy of the monarch could be diverted from Madame Verneuil, had anticipated that the liaison would have endured | long. Henry, however, profited by this mistake; and while the Queen was still jealously watching the proceedings of Madame Moret, renewed with less secrecy his commerce with the witty and seductive marquise, unconscious and she was at that period encouraging the addresses of the III ... Guise. Nor did partial desertion tend wound vanity of Madame de Moret, or to excite her ire against her rival: Prince Joinville, who appeared to take a reckless pleasure in braving anger of monarch, led found favour in the eyes of one of his mistresses, and was established as the admitted lover of the countess. Thus deceived both sides, Henry had annoyance to apprehend from either of the frail rivals; but such could not long remain the case with the Queen. There were too many eyes and as about her ever open to discover to retain the gossipry of the court, and too many tongues ready to reveal all which might at the moment appear acceptable to her wounded feelings, and insatiable desire to dwell upon the details of her unhappiness.

Mezeray, vol. p. 1

HE T

Princes should pause before they err, for they are a world's beacon. Every eye turns towards them a example and for support; and thus, where the example and the other wanting, the results of the prove incalculable. The in diamond, alloy in the gold, the stain in the purple, blot upon the ermine—all these are detected upon the instant; the value of the jewel decreased, price of the metal is deteriorated, the glory of the bue is tarnished, the purity of mantle is sallied; and where minor imperfections may unperceived, mighty social lens is bearing upon un great.

Angered and disappointed, the Queen, who had passed a time in comperative tranquility, once more found herself a prey to mortification and neglect | and so greatly did the renewed intercourse between Henry and his favourite that for upwards of a fortnight not a word was exchanged between mi royal pair." At length, however, through the intervention of Sully, Sillery, and the other ministers, a sort of hollow peace was effected, and the court removed to St. Germain, where the royal children constantly resided. Here they remained until the 9th of June, on which day, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, they forth their return to the capital. Their Majesties occupied a coach, in which, together with themselves, were the Princess de Conti and the Dukes of Vendôme and Montpensier: tother carriages followed with the ladies of the Queen's retinue; and a numerous train of nobles and attendants on horseback preceded the bodyguard. At that period no bridge existed . Neuilly, where the river was crossed in a ferry-boot which was waiting to receive is royal party, who, in consequence of the heavy rain, were driven on board; but unfortunately the beating of the water against the side of the frail bark, occasioned by the swollen and of the and the violence of the wind, so terrified the leaders of the royal coach, that it had no sooner left the land, than they awerved so violently as to destroy the equilibrium of the boat, which instantly capsized, when the carriage upset into the water, and immediately filled. The King, who was an excellent swimmer, was soon rescued by the attendants, a score of whom threw themselves from their horses into the river to afford assistance; but he no sooner reached the bank than he once more swam back to the rescue of the Queen and her companions. Marie, however, already in safety, having been with considerable difficulty carried to land by the Baron is la Châtaigneraie,* who was compelled to seize her by her hair, to prevent her from being carried down by the current, and who,

* Dreux du Radier, vol. vi, pp. 102,

† Henry de Bourbon, Duke de Montpensier, Governor of Normandy, peer of France, Prince of La Roche-sur-Yon, Dauphin d'Auvergne, &c., was born in Tournaine in 1573. During the lifetime of his father, he bore the title of Prince de Dombes. The King confided to him the command of the army which he dispatched to Brittany against the Duke de Mercour. He subsequently became Governor of Normandy, and reduced that revolted province, which still held out for the League, to obedience. He was present at the memorable siege of Amiens in 1597, where he led the van-guard of the army, and accompanied

Henry on his expedition against Savoy and Brescia. He was a knight of all the King's Orders, and presided at the assembly of the nobles of Rouen. He died in Paris, of lingering consumption, in having placed her under the care of her ladies, returned assistance of de Vendôme, whom he also succeeded in saving. The Princess de Conti and M. Montpensier, having immersed on the landward of carriage, were rescued with comparative ease; but the peril had povertheless been great, and the consternation general. Marie de Medicis, when brought ahore, was in a second of insensibility, and it was a siderable time before she recovered consciousness; she yet opened her eyes when she gasped an an agitated inquiry for the King.* Finally, however, all the party were enabled to take possession of one of the carriages of the suite, and to pursue their journey; but not before the Queen had desired that the person by whom she been saved should be desired to attend her; upon which M. de la Châtaigneraie presented himself, with the water pouring from his embroidered mantle; and was not without surprise and gratification that their Majesties ascertained that not only ill gallant Châtaigneraie, but also several other members | the royal escort, and flung themselves into the river, withwaiting throw off either their cloaks or swords. Marie made her acknowledgments to the gallant young an courtesy which would in have been a sufficient recompense for his exertions; but while speaking, she also detached from her dress a magnificent diamond cluster, valued a four thousand crowns, which she tendered to him with the intelligence that a was from that moment the captain of her body-guard, at that a should thenceforward further his fortunes.

The Baron de la Châtaigneraie was an officer of the Queen's guard.

Richelieu, La Mère et le File, vol. i, p. 18. Mercure Français, 1606, p. 107. L'Etoile, vol iii, p. 370,

† Mercure Français, 1606, p. 107.

_

"And now, gentlemen;" said the King gaily, the agitated grateful young courtier knelt to han hand which was extended towards him; "let us resume journey. When the Fontainebleau I was, myou all know, suffering agonies from toothache, which is the cured; this bath has been the best remedy I have ever applied; and if any of us dined too heartly upon salt provisions, we have atleast the satisfaction of feeling that have been enabled to drink freely since."

A few hours after his arrival in the capital, the King paid wisit to the Marquise de Verneuil, to whom he related the escape of himself and his companions;† but even on so serious an occasion as this, and one which had threatened such tragical consequences to the Queen, the

VOL. L.

L'Etoile, vol. iii, p. 870.

† It had frequently been foretold to the King that he would die in a carriage, and the prophecy had made so great an impression upon his mind, that he always endeavoured to conocal a under a show of gaiety, particularly when any accident occurred by which a sppeared likely to be verified. In the year 1597, while he was travelling near Mouy, in Picardy, the coach in which he rode was precipitated down a precipice; while the danger incurred at Neuilly was scarcely less great; and the prediction was fatally accomplished in 1610.—Lettres de Pasquier, Book I, lett. i.

in sarcastic and bitter pleasantry which she always in making any allusion in royal mistress. After feeling feigning great anxiety on the subject of Henry's own escape, she said with malicious gaisty: "Had I have exclaimed with great composure, 'The Queen drinks.'

Unfortunately, the King, taken by surprise, laughed heartily in this sally; in circumstance which in duly reported to Marie de Medicis, and which greatly increased her irritation. This new cause of offence was so grave that she could not forgive the levity of the King more readily than the heartless insolence of his mistress; and she carried her to so extreme a pitch that she refused to receive him in her apartments. Such a determination in naturally productive of serious confusion in the palace, in it infringed upon all the accustomed stiquette of the court, and created great perplexity among the officers of state; but remonstrances were vain. Marie, stang to the soul by the insult to which she had been subjected, and which her royal consort had not only suffered to pass unrebuked, but to

* In order to render this impertinence intelligible, it is necessary to explain that anciently, when the sovereigns of France were about to swallow their first draught at table, the cup-bearer announced in a loud voice: "The King drinks;" upon which a flourish of trumpets, at a given signal, announced the important fact to those who were not present.

had in some degree contributed, would not rescind her resolution; while the King was, in his turn, equally violent. In vain did the Duke a Villeroy, Sully, and others of the great nobles, endeavour mediate between them: reason was lost in passion on both sides; and once more Henry declared his determination to exile the Queen to one of his palaces. From he was, however, dissuaded by his ministers; and at length, after the estrangement between the royal couple had lasted nearly three weeks, a partial reconciliation was effected; but Marie, although she ma induced by the representations of her advisers to restrain her indignation, was from that hour alienated in heart from her husband, by whom she felt that her dignity had been compromised both as a Queen and as a wife.

Profiting, however, by this partial calm, several of the nobility proposed to add to the annual of the carnival, in commemoration of the recent escape of their Majesties, a ballet in which the Queen consented to appear; and the preparations were already far advanced when the King solicited her permission to include Madame de Moret among the performers; but Maris, who had previously condescended to associate herself in a similar exhibition with the Marquise de Verneuil, had been rendered less amenable by recent circumstances, and she peremptorily refused to appear in such intimate association with another of her husband's mistresses. The concession was not one upon which Henry could insist with any propriety, a fact of which the Queen was well aware, that in order to terminate the affair as gracefully as possible, and declined altogether either assist in the entertainment, we even to witness it, a decision which caused it to be abandoned altogether.* This mortification was, however, compensated to the abandoned in the abandoned five hundred francs.*

At the commencement of July the King will were the Maréchal de Bassompierre as his ambassadorextraordinary ... Lorraine, to be present ... the marriage of the Duke de Bar, his brother-in-law, with the daughter of the Duke of Mantua, the Queen's niece; and had also furnished him with instructions to invite Im Duchess of Mantual to become the godmother of the Dauphin, and the Duke of Lorraine to act sponsor to the younger Princess. The marriage took place Mancy, where M. de Bassompierre, m the representative of his sovereign, man magnificently and gratuitously entertained. Numerous balls will given, and a joust concluded the feativities; which were no sooner terminated than I'm courtly envoy communicated the royal invitation, which we received "with proper respect and honour;" and he then hastened his return

* Saint-Edme, vol. ii, pp. 237,

† Sully, Mém., vol. vi. p. 233.

! Medicis, wife of Vincent I., Duke Mantus, and sister will will queen.

S Bassompierre, Mén., p.

Paris, in order to prepare the gorgeous dress already alluded is elsewhere, as having been defrayed by his gains in play.

14

Towards the close of the month, the millustrious sponsors reached Villars-Coterets, where they were by the King and Queen, with the whole court, and thence conducted to Paris. The arrived in such of such magnificence to with a slender a retinue as to provoke the sarcasms of the courtiers; who declared that they recognised her rank only by the carriage in which she rode; and the Mantuan suite accordingly became a favourite topic with the idle and the censorious. Great preparations made M Notre-Dame for the ceremony, which to take place on the 14th of September; and meanwhile nothing thought of pleasure and preparation. pierre gives an amusing account of the distress of the tailors and embroiderers of the capital, who was unable to comply with the demands of their employers, and many of whom were kidnapped and carried if by persons of the highest rank, in order to seems themselves against disappointment. All Paris was in turmoil; the great busy in devising costumes which war la transcend all that had previously been seen I the French court; and be operatives were equally occupied in executing the orders which they received.

In midst of this excitement, however, plague, which long existed in the capital, declared limit more fatally; several officers of Queen Marguerite's household died under her roof; and the alarm became so great with the King removed his court to Fontaine-bleau, where the baptismal ceremonies were performed with great magnificence on the day previously appointed.

These ceremonies were so curious and characteristic, that we shall offer me apology to our readers for giving them in detail.

Each of the royal children had been privately baptized a few days after its birth; but the public christening had been hitherto deferred in order that it might be celebrated with becoming splendour. The desire of the King had always been that the Sovereign-Pontiff should appearance being, as he declared, the eldest son of France being, as he declared, the eldest son of the church, and the successive and Clement VIII.* and Leo XI.† had accordingly delayed celebration of the ceremony. Paul V.‡ was, how-

Hippolyto Aldobrandizi, subsequently Pope Clement VIII., was born Fano. He was created a cardinal in 1585, and in 1592 succeeded Innocent IX. He reconciled Henry IV. to the church of Rome; attached the duchy of Ferrara to the Holy See, and organized the famous congregations de carillie on grace and free-will, and contributed to the peace of Vervins. He died in 1605.

† Alessandro de Medicis, who succeeded Clement VIII. in 1605, and died the same year.

Camillo Borghese, subsequently Pope Paul V., was a native of Rome. A quarrel with the Republic of Venice, which resulted ever, no apprised of the wishes of the French monarch, than he dispatched a brief the Cardinal de Joyeuse for registration in the Court of Parliament, by prelate was constituted papal, legate and representative, in instructed in things support the holiness and dignity of the Apostolical Sec.

The turret-court is Fontainebleau selected the sum appropriate spot for the construction of temporary chapel, the great is of the palace being totally inadequate to contain the thousands who had collected from every part of the country to witness coremony.

This immense was completely enclosed by the costly gold-woven tapestry of which the manufacture had been, we have stated, introduced and encouraged by the King; and had in its centre a square space, thirty in extent, surrounded by barriers, and similarly hung and carpeted with tapestry. In the front of this enclosure stood an alter magnificently ornamented with the symbols of the Order of the Holy Ghost, and a table gorgeously draped, both being surrounded by canopies. Behind the table stood a platform raised three steps from the floor; and in the midst of in the expulsion of the Jesuits from that state, the reunion of the Nesturians of Chalden to the Romish Church, and several disputes on particular points of faith, rather appeared than terminated, were the principal features of his pontificate. This Pope greatly embellished Rome. Completed the façade of St. Peter's and the Quirinal, and died in 1621, at the age of sixty-nine years.

this was placed a column covered with cloth of silver, upon which rested the font, protected by a superb christening-cloth, and a lofty canopy. On and of the altar a gallery had been erected which was filled with musicians; and beneath wo upon right hand was a tapestried bench for the archbishops, bishops, members of council; while immediately in front of the shrine were placed the sests of the Cardinal de Gondy, who was to perform the baptismal ceremonies, and the almoners and chaplains of his suite. The whole of the court was lined by the Swiss guards, each holding a lighted torch, whose rays reflected by the myriad jewels that adorned the persons of the courtly spectators. All the princes of the blood great nobles were their mantles clasped and embroidered with precious stones, their plumed caps looped with diamonds, and their sword-hilts encrusted with gems. That of the Duke d'Epernon was estimated at more than thirty thousand crowns; and several others were of almost equal value. The attire of the princesses and ladies of the court was, however, still splendid, many of them standing with difficulty under the weight of the closely-jewelled brocade of which their dresses composed, and wearing upon their heads of heilliants which might have ransomed a province. The Queen, whose dowry, as we have elsewhere shown, in a great measure consisted of costly ornaments, appeared on this occasion with magnificence almost fabulous; her robe of cloth of gold and velvet being studded with no less than thirty-two thousand pearls, and three thousand diamonds.

-

While their Majesties and their illustrious guests took possession of their respective seats, the prescribed ceremonial of preparation was in progress with the royal children, who had all been placed in beds covered with ermined draperies under canopies of crimson velvet.

In the Elisabeth, the alder Princess, being surrounded by the thin who privileged to assist at her levée, the outer coverlet of her bed withdrawn by Countess de Sault and the Countess de Guissen; she then lifted from it by Madame de Lavardin, undressed by Madame de Randan, and robed in her state costume by the Marquise de Montlor.

Madame Christine the younger meanwhile uncovered by the Duchess de Guise and Mademoiselle de Mayenne, lifted in the man of Mademoiselle de Vendôme, undressed by the Duchess de Rohan, and robed by the Duchess de Sully.

The Dauphin underwent the man ceremonies, but he man attended only by princesses of the blood. It was the Princesses of Conti and Soissons who drew off the ermined quilt; Princess de Condé and Duchess de Montpensier by whom undressed, and Mademoiselle de Bourbon who adjusted robes.

When all the royal children were attired, a procession was formed. The Swiss guards moved first, each carrying a lighted torch, and on arriving within the court they defiled, and, as before-mentioned, lined the walls; the hundred gentlemen on duty in the palace followed; and these were succeeded by the ordinary members of the household, and the gentlemen of the bedchamber all carrying tapers of white wax. After them came the drums, fifes, hautboys, and trumpets, together with nine heralds, behind whom walked the grand-provost of the palace, the knights of the Holy Ghost, and, finally, the children of France with their respective retinues. The first group consisted of the train of the younger Princess, in which the Baron de la Châtre* bore the vase; M. de Montigny† the basin; the Count de la Rochepot the Claude de la Châtre, Marahal of France, was the son of Claude de la Châtre, Baron de Nancy, Besigny, and Baune de la He was created a knight of St. Michael and of the Holy Ghost, by Henry III., in 1588, and was Governor of Berry and Orleans. He distinguished himself in several engagements; and his own valour, combined with the protection of the Constable de Montmorency, of whom he had been a page in his youth, rapidly acquired for him both fortune and renown. After the death of Henry III., M. de la Châtre embraced the cause of the League; when the Duke de Mayenne, at the solicitation of M. de Guise, created him Marahal of France, in which character he seciated at what were called by the Leaguers the States of Paris.

† François de la Grange, Seigneur de Montigny and de Sery, was a member of the court of Henry III., and was one of his mignous. He was, under that monarch, successively gentleman of the bed-chamber, captain of the palace-guard, head-steward of the household, and Governor of Berry, Hlais, &c. He acquired great distinction by his bravery at the battle of Coutras, and cushion; M. de Chemerault the taper; M. de Liancourte the christening-cap, and the Maréchal de Fervaquest the salt-cellar. The Marquis de Bois-Dauphint carried the infant in his arms, and Madame de Chemerault bore her train. She was followed by a suite of twelve nobles, each bearing a flambeau M his hand I and after these came the Duke de Lorraine as godfather, with Don Juan Medicis, son of the Grand-Duke Ferdinand of Tuscany, as proxy for the Grand-Duke Ferdinand of the other sponsor; the ladies who had assisted M her levée closing the train.

This party had no somer taken possession of the the sieges of Aubigay, Rouen, and Fontaine-Françoise, and was admitted a knight of the King's Orders the same year (1595). Finally, in 1616, he was created Marshal of France.

Nicolas du Pleasie, Count de Liancourt, Count de Beaumont, first equerry to the King, and Governor of Paris. He married Management Pone, Marquise de Guercheville, the widow of Henry de Silly, Count de la Rocheguyon; a lady of extraordinary beauty, who had been reared in the court of Henry III.

† Guillaume de Hautemer, Count de Granoy, Seigneur de Fervaques, knight of the King's Orders, and Marshal of France.

! Urbain Laval, Marquis Bois-Dauphin, Count Bresteau, Seigneur de Persigny, &c., was the son of Réné de Laval, second of the name, Seigneur de Bois-Dauphin, and of Jeanne de Lénouscourt-Monteuil, his second wife. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Ivry, and was created Marshal of France by the Duke de Mayenne. Henry IV. confirmed him in this dignity, and restared to him his estates of Sably and Château-Gontier.

place assigned to them, then the second group began to enter the enclosure. First came the Maréchal Lavardin with the ewer, then the Duke de Sully with the cushion, the Duke de Monthazon with the taper, then the Duke d'Epernon with the christening-cup, and, finally, Duke d'Aiguillon with the salt-cellar. The Prince de Joinville carried the Princess, whose ermine

Jean de Beaumanoir, Marquis de Lavardin, was the son of Charles de Beaumazoir, who was killed at the massacre of St. Bartholomew. He had been brought up a Protestant at the court of Henry IV., when that monarch was King of Navarre; but after the death of his father, he embraced the Catholic religion, and the age of eighteen commenced the career of arms, in which profession he acquired so much celebrity, that he commanded the armies of the King during the absence of the Duke de Joyeuse. In 1595, he was honoured with the cordon of St. Michael, was created a Marshal of France, and his estate of Lavardin was erected into a marquisate. At the coronation of Louis XIII. grand-master: an anbsequently ambaseador-extraordinary in England; and died m min 1614. † Hercule de Rohan, Duke de Monthason, and Prince de Gnémenée, was born in 1568; and was the father, by his first marriage, of Marie de Rohan, who married Louis Charles d'Albert, Duke Luynes, from whom she was divorced, in 1621, and subsequently became the wife of Claude de Lorraine, Dake de Chevreuse. The Duke de Montbezon, had issue by his second marriage with Marie d'Avangour of Brittany in 1628, François, a branch of the house of Souhise, which became extinct in 1787; Marie Elécucre, abbens of the convent of the Trinity ... Caen : and Anne, who became the second wife of Louis Charles WAlbert, train was borne by Mademoiselle de Rohan. There was no godfather; and Duchess d'Angoulème* walked alone as the proxy of the Archduchess Elisabeth of Flanders, immediately behind Madame, followed by Montmorency as her train-bearer, and the ladies who had assisted at the levée.

Duke de Luynes. M. de Monthazon died in 1654.

Finally appeared the third and last division of the procession, headed by the Prince de Vaudemont,† carrying the taper; and then followed in succession the Chevalier de Vendôme with the christening-cap, the Duke de Vendôme with the salt-cellar, the Duke de Montpensier with the ewer, the Count de Soissons with the basin, and the Prince de Conti with the cushion; the Sieur Gilles de Souvry carried the Dauphin, whose right hand held by the Prince de Conti; while the train of his velvet mantle, edged with ermine, was borne by the Duke de Guise, behind whom followed twenty great nobles bearing lighted flambeaux. These was succeeded Diana of France, Duchess d'Angoulème, born in 1588, was legitimated daughter of Heavy II. Philippa Duco, a lady. The first married (in 1553) The first married (in 1553) The months; and subsequently, to Maréchal Montmorency, the son of the Counétable, in 1557, of whom she became the widow in 1579. In firmness and prudence conspicuous during the civil wars; and it was through her exertions that the reconciliation was the between Henry III. and Henry IV., when the latter was King of Navarre. She died in 1619.

† The Prince de Vandemont was the brother of the Duke de Lorraine.

by the Cardinal-Legate de Joyeuse, who represented Paul V. as sponsor, and the Duchess of Mantua, the godmother; the princesses of the blood who had assisted at the levée closing the procession.

The Dauphin having been placed upon the table, the cardinal approached him, and demanded: "Sir, with do you ask?"

"The sacramental ceremonies of baptism;" replied the little Prince, according to the instructions which he had received from the Almoner of Boulogne.

"Have you already been baptized?" again inquired the prelate.

"Yes, thank God;" said the Dauphin firmly. To all the other interrogations the cardinal imaginary answered: "Abre mentio."

After the unction, when questioned on his belief according to the ordinary form, the little Prince responded audihly "Credo;" and, finally, he recited without error or hesitation, the Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, and the Creed.

The princesses were then successively placed upon the table; when the elder was named Elisabeth, after her illustrious godmother the Archduchess of Flanders; and the younger Christine.

The baptismal ceremonies were followed by a grand banquet served upon four different tables. The attendants at that of the King were the Princes of Condé, Conti, and Montpensier; while the Queen was on by the Dukes of Vendôme, Guise, and Vaudemont; the Legate by the Count de Candale and the Marquis de Rosny; the Duchess of Mantua by the Baron de Bassompierre and the Count de Sault.

On the following day the morning was occupied by the courtiers in tilting at the ring, the prizes being distributed by the Queen and the Duchess of Mantus; and dusk the whole of the royal party proceeded to the wide plain which lies to the east of Fontainebleau, in the centre of which the Duke de Sully had caused a castellated building to be crected, which was with rockets and other artificial fireworks, and which besieged, stormed, and taken, by army of satyrs and savages. This spectacle greatly delighted the court; while not the least interesting feature of the exhibition was presented by the immense concourse of people (estimated upwards of twelve thousand) who had collected to witness the magnificent pyrotechnic display, and who rent the air with their acclamations of loyalty.†

All further rejoicings were, however, rendered unseaby rapid increase of plague, which having declared itself with great virulence Fontaine-

* Maximilian de Béthune, Marquis de Rouny, was the elder son of the Duke de Sully, and of Anne de Courtenay, his first wife. He was superintendent of fortifications, Governor of Mantes and Gergean, and was destined to succeed his father as grandmaster had he survived him. He died in 1634.

† Mercure Français, 1606, pp. 110-113.

bleau, induced the hasty departure of the court 1 and the illustrious guests having taken leave of the King and Queen laden with rich presents, their Majesties, will a limited retinue, repaired for m time to Montargis.

These baptismal festivities had not, meanwhile, been without alloy to the dissipated monarch. Despite the fascination of the wily marquise, and the charms of the Countess. Moret, Henry was by no means insensible to the attractions of the many beautiful more who followed in the suite of the Queen at the august ceremony just described; and, among others, he especially honoured with his notice the Duchesses of Montpensier* and Nevers.†

In neither case, however, was he destined be successful; both these possessing too much self-

Catherine, Duchess Joyeuse, daughter heiress of Henry de Joyeuse, Count de Bouchage, Marshal of France, who died a Capuchin under the name of Père Ange, and of Marshal at la Valette. She had, in 1597, become the wife Henry Bonrbon, Duke de Montpensier, &c., Prince of his line, who dying in 1608 left her a widow. After the of Henry IV. (1611), remarried with Charles Lorraine, Duke de Guise, and died in 1656, the age of seventyone years.

† Catherine de Lorraine, daughter of Charles, Duke de Mayenne, and niece of Guise le Balafré. She married (in 1599) Charles de Gonzaga, Duke de Navers, who subsequently became by the death of Vincent I. Duke of Mantna. She died on the 8th of March, 1618, at the early age of thirty-three years.

respect to accord any attention to his illicit gallantries and this failure, especially with the latter of whom he . had become seriously ensmoured, only seriously in reengage him with Madame de Verneuil. Throughout all period occupied by the christening festivities, Madame . Nevers had been the object of his especial pursuit; but so carefully did she avoid all occasions of private conversation, that the King, unaccustomed me decided a resistance, became irritated to a degree which induced her to escape as soon as she found it practicable from the court; and accordingly, on very day after the festivals, she left Fontainebleau without any previous intimation of such a design, resisting all the efforts made by the sovereign to detain her. Nor did she yield to his subsequent endeavours for her recal; but on the appointment of her husband during the following year to the embassy Rome, she accompanied him thither; and several months elapsed, ere she reappeared in France, where her duty having compelled her to pay her respects to the Queen on her return, Henry was so little master of himself as display his mortification by inquiring who was, and me her name being announced, to exclaim loud enough for her hear his reply: "Ha! Madame la Duchesse de Nevers! She is terribly altered."

The shaft fell harmless. The lady evinced the most perfect composure under the royal criticism; and having fulfilled ber duties as a subject towards her sovereigns, ahe once more withdrew from the court; and terminated her life as she had commenced it, without soundal or reproach.*

VOL. L D D

* Amours ... Grand Aloundre, p. 48. Dreux ... Radier, vol. vi, pp. 88-90.

CHAPTER VII.

[1607.]

CHAPTER VIL

[1607.]

DESPITE the presence of the pestilence the gaieties of the past winter had surpassed, alike in the court and in the capital, all that had hitherto been witnessed in France. The profusion of the nobles, whom no foreign war compelled to disburse their revenues in arming their retainers, and in preparing themselves to maintain their dignity and rank in the eyes of a hostile nation, was unchecked and excessive; while, as we have already shown, the monarch inclination to control am outlay by which they thus voluntarily crippled their resources.

The year 1607 commenced, with exception of the fatal scourge which still existed in and about Paris, in greatest abundance, and the perfect peace. The court celebrated the new year St. Germain-en-Laye; and on the following day proceeded to Fontaine-bleau, where during the caréme-prenant* ballet danced, and several magnificent entertainments were given their Majesties by the great nobles of the household. These festivities were, however, unfortunately interrupted by an event which created universal consternation and anxiety. The most glaring evil of the reign of Henry IV. had long been the prevalence of duelling, which he in the first instance neglected to discountenance; and which had, in consequence, attained an extreme threatened the most serious results, and only in the principal personages of the kingdom, but even to whose comparative insignificance in society and have shielded them from all participation in so iniquitous and practice. Like computes the number of individuals who lost their lives in these illicit encounters at several thousands; nor did the tardy edicts issued by the King produce a cessation of the custom. On the 4th of February, the Prince Condé, conceiving himself aggrieved by expression used by the Duke Nevers, sent him a challenge, to which the duke instantly responded; and he was already and the ground watching the approach of antagonist, when a pany of the King's body-guard arrived, who, in the name of Majesty, forbade conflict, and escorted the two quasi-combatants in the royal presence, where, " more in than in anger," Henry reprimanded both princes; reminding them of their disobedience to his expressed commands, of the fatal example which their want of selfgovernment would afford in their inferiors, and of the loss which the death of either party would have inflicted upon himself. He then particularly M. de Nevers, and reproached him severely for having evinced so little respect for the blood royal of France as to accept, under any circumstances, a challenge from a relative of his sovereign, who should have been sacred in his eyes.*

The careino-present includes the three days which precede Ash-Wednesday.

Whether arguments of the King convinced nobles, their loyalty sufficed render them conscious of their error, is unimportant. Henry had astisfaction reconcile the misunderstanding between them, and from the royal closet they proceeded to the spartments of the Queen, in order to allay an anxiety which, from her friendship and affection for Madame de Nevers who then absent on for her estates, had been painfully great.

The expressed displeasure of the King these encounters did not, however, have already stated, suffice to prevent their frequent occurrence; and on 22nd of same month another hostile meeting took place between the Duke de Souhiset and M. de Boccal,

L'Etoile, vol. iii, — 411, 412.

which had nearly proved fatal to the former; but it having been proved to the monarch that the antagonist of 1. de Soubise had long withstood the provocation of the duke, declaring that he dare not raise his hand against one so nearly connected with throne; and that he had not yielded until the impetuous and intemperate violence of his antagonist had left him no other resource, Henry, with his usual elemency, forgave the crime.*

In addition to these occurrences, which moreover succeeded by others of the same description during the month, the anger of the King was excited by discovery which he made of the infidelity of Madame de Moret. Indulgent to his own profligacy to a degree which rendered him insensible to his self-abasement, Henry was peculiarly alive to the degradation of sharing with a rival the affections, or perhaps it ____ fitting to say the favours, of his mistresees. He readily forgot the fact that he had himself been the first to initiate them into the radiments of vice—to induce them to abnegate their self-respect, and to brave the opinion of the world and their own reproaches—while he could not brook that they should reduce him to a level with one of his own subjects, and that they should so far emancipate themselves as to feel a preference for younger and more attractive men when they had been honoured by his notice. The dissolute monarch did not pause to L'Etoile, vol. iii, 414, 415.

...

Madame de Moret la long been diname to Prince de Joinville; who, young, reckless, and impetuous, returned her passion, and scarcely made any conceal his rivalry with the monarch. Courtiers have, moreover, sharp eyes, and it was not long ere the King was apprised of the intrigue. Bassompierre relates he hastened to warn the imprudent lovers of their danger, but that believing him have personal motive for his interference, they disregarded the caution;* | the fact of their mutual passion at length became so well-authenticated, that Henry, whose pride rather than his heart wounded by the levity of the countess, reproached her in the most insulting terms with her misconduct.+ Madame de me not attempt to deny her attachment to the Prince; but excused by reminding the monarch, that, honoured as she was by his preference, she could not forget that she was merely his mistress, and could anticipate no higher destiny, while M. de Joinville was prepared to make her his wife.

"In Madam;" King; "you forgiven. I can permit my subjects to espouse my mistresses, but I cannot allow them to play the gallants favour. You shall not be disappointed in your expectations, and this marriage shall have my sanction without delay."

Mémoires, p. 57.

† Saint-Edme, vol. 2, p. 238.

are can searcely be doubted that this ready assent must have been no slight mortification to the vanity of Madame de Moret, while it is equally certain that it was perfectly sincere on the part of the King, although from altogether independent of countess In fact, the Prince de Joinville having previously rendered himself obnoxious to the monarch by marked attentions to the Marquise de Verneuil, the latter was anxious to see him married, and thus to rid himself of a dangerous rival. Such an alliance must, moreover, as he at once felt, deeply wound the pride of the Guises, whom it was his interest to humble by every in his power; and accordingly he hastened upon leaving Madame de Moret, to summon the young Prince in his presence, and to insist upon the fulfilment of his promise.

by so unexpected an order, M. de Joinville feigned a ready compliance; but on his dismissal from the royal closet, he expressed his indignation in no measured terms; declaring that had any other than the sovereign proposed to him so disgraceful an alliance, whatever might have been his rank he would have resented the insult upon the instant; while no sooner did the duchess his mother become apprised of the circumstance, than she hastened to throw herself — the feet of the King, beseeching him rather to take her life than to subject her son to such dishonour.

"Rise, Madam;" said Henry gravely; "yours is a petition which I cannot grant, as I never yet took the life of any woman, and have still to learn the possibility of doing so."

"A Guise, Sire;" pursued the haughty duchess, see she once more stood erect before him; "cannot marry the mistress of any man, even although that man should chance to be his monarch."

"Every man, Madam;" retorted the King; "must pay the penalty of seeking to humiliate his sovereign, even although that man be a Guise."

"M. de Joinville, Sire, shall become the husband of Jacqueline de Beuil."

"Neither, Madam;" said the King angrily 1 "shall he ever become her gallant. This is the first occasion upon which he has had the insolence to interpose between and my favourites. I have yet forgotten his intrigue with Madame de Verneuil; and if I pardoned him upon that occasion, it was not on his own account, but from respect for the relationship which exists between Neither, Madam, has escaped my memory that the house of Guise endeavoured to wrest from me the crown of France; and, in short, finding myself so ill-requited for my indulgence, I am weary of exercising a lenity which has degenerated into weakness. Your son is at perfect liberty to marry my mistress, since he has seen fit to desire it; will be shall do so, or repent his obduracy in the Bastille, where he will have time and leisure to learn the respect which he owes to his sovereign."

"It is your Majesty who are wanting in respect to yourself;" and duchess haughtily.

"Madam!" exclaimed King; "do give me forget that you are sunt. I can hear more until you assume a tone better suited to our relative position. You have heard my resolve, and may retire."

Thus abruptly dismissed, Madame de Guise withdrew, and hastened to apprise her of the impending peril, upon which he escaped from the capital before the order issued for his arrest could be put in execution; while his relatives endeavoured by humility and submission obtain forgiveness. Henry, however, had been too deeply wounded, alike by the levity of the son and the overbearing haughtiness of the mother, to yield to their entreaties; and the only concession which he could be induced to make was a conditional pardon involving the perpetual exile of the culprit.*

Nor was the King, who at once discovered that he had been duped, less inclined to visit upon Madame de Moret the consequences of her falsehood, and he openly declared that she should also have been compelled to Saint-Edme, vol. ii, pp. 239, 240. L'Etoile, vol. iii, p. 360.

 Amours du Grand Alcandre, p. 49.

quit the country had she not been on the eve of becoming a mother.*

This event shortly afterwards took place, but, although during a following year Henry legitimated son,† he ever afterwards treated her with the greatest coldness; nor did the birth of the child in any way affect her position as had been the case with the Duchess of Beaufort and the Marquise de Verneuil, and King tenting himself by sending to her a present of money and jewels, but evincing no disposition to increase her rank.

It would appear, moreover, that the indifference mutual, as, only a short time subsequently, she couraged the assiduities of the Count de Sommerive, from whom, according to Sully, there could be doubt that she did actually obtain a written promise of marriage; and the King was no sooner apprised of the circumstance than he expressed, as he had previously done in the of the Prince de Joinville, his perfect willingness consent to the alliance; merely desiring M. de Balagny; a gentleman of in household upon whom a could rely, to watch the proceedings of

Baseompierre, Mém., p. 51.

† Autoine de Bourbon, Count de Moret, the son of Henry IV. and Madame de Moret, was legitimated in 1608, and was killed during the subsequent reign at the battle of Castelnandary, while serving under the Duke de Montmorency.

† Damin de Montine, Seigneur de Balagny, son of Jean, Prince

Cambray, and of the de Bussy Bussy He was one of the most confidential friends of the King.

lovers, and to acquaint him with every particular, should he have cause to suspect that the intentions of the Prince equivocal. M. de Sommerive, however, who soon discovered that he was an object of espionnage, became so much exasperated that, having on one occasion encountered the royal confident as a convenient moment for the purpose, he drew his sword and attacked him so vigorously that his intended victim was compelled to man himself by flight.

In this instance Henry, who had ceased to feel any interest in Madame de Moret, contented himself by reprimanding the culprit, branding him with the name of assassin, and finally exiling him to Lorraine, with strict orders not to leave that province without his express permission.

We will here terminate the history of the exfavourite, who is already occupied only too much space. After this last adventure she ceased to make any figure court, her influence over the monarch having entirely ceased; and seven years subsequent to his death, she became the wife of Réné du Bec, Marquis de Vardes; and the mother of two sons, the elder of whom, François Réné, Count Moret, was famous during the reign of Louis XIV. under the title of Marquis de Vardes.*

The estrangement of the monarch from Madame Moret, coupled with his increasing coldness towards the

* Saint-Edme, vol. ii, p. 241,

Marquise de Verneuil, once more, at this period, restored Ill unhappy Queen III comparative peace II mind, which she was not, however, long fated to enjoy; the close of the year a new candidate for the royal favour presented herself in the person of Mademoiselle des Essarts.* This lady, who was a member of the Beaumont-Harlay, had accompanied her mistrees . England, whither M, de Beaumont-Harlay | been accredited a management : and on the return of her patroness to France she appeared in her suite at court, where instantly attracted the attention of the dissolute King. Her reign was happily a short one; and at the close of two years she retired with the title of Countess - Romorantin. having previously been privately married to the Archbishop of Rheims.1

We shall pass over in silence the other licisons of

* Charlotte, daughter of François des Essarts, Seigneur de Santour, equerry of the King's stable, and of his second wife, Charlotte de Harlay de Chanvallon.

† The Count Christophe de Beaumont-Harlay, Governor of He died in 1615.

Louis de Lorraine, Cardinal de Guise, son of Henry, Duke de Guise, who was killed at the states of Blois. He a dispensation from the Pops, so effect his marriage with the line. He was a warlike prelate; and his death, which took place at Saintis in 1621, was caused by the extreme fatigue that he underwent during the campaign of Guienne, and at the siege of Saint-Jean-d'Angély, he be accompanied Louis XIII.

the monarch, as they were too transitory greatly to affect the tranquillity of the Queen, until we are once more compelled to to them, in order to record his unhappy passion for the beautiful Princess de Condé a passion which at one period threatened to involve me European war.

On the 6th of April Marie de Medicis gave birth to her second son, who received the second of Duke d'Orleans. that duchy having always since the time of Philip VI. been the apparage of a prince of the blood, or one of the first nobles of the kingdom. The public rejoidings were universal; and the satisfaction of the King without bounds. The little Prince was privately baptized by the Cardinal de Gondy, until the state ceremonies of his christening could take place; and on the 22nd of the month be was invested by the sovereign with the insignia of St. Michael and the Holy Ghost, in the presence of the cardinals, and the commanders and knights of those Orders, with great pomp; after which a banquet was given by the King in the great hall Fontainebleau, and mightfall the park was illuminated in all directions by immense bonfires, and a pyrotechnic display, which was witnessed by admiring and exulting thousands.

The intelligence which mached Paris on the following day that peace had been restored between the Pope and the Venetians, through the intervention of the French monarch, that the papel excommunication which had against that republic repealed, and a general accorded, excited the enthusiasm of the French people a its greatest height. They augured from this fact a brilliant future for the Prince, who had come into the world at the very moment when the great work had been achieved; this feeling was shared by the august parents of the royal infant. So little a human foresight the designs of the Almighty Disposer of all things! Men congratulated each other in the public streets; and, forgetting at Huguenot origin of Henry, considered him only as the champion of the Romish faith; while they coupled his name and that of the Queen with every endearing epithet of which they were susceptible.

The remainder of the summer was occupied by the monarch in the embellishment of the capital, in high play,* and in his rapidly-waning passion for Madame de Verneuil; while the court resided alternately at Fontainebleau and St. Germain; the Queen confining herself more and more to the society of her children and her immediate favourites, listening with jealous avidity to every rumour of infidelity on the part of her royal consort, and occasionally renewing those unhappy differences by which the whole of their married life had been embittered.

The kingdom are at peace, but anarchy still reigned within the walls of the palace. It is true that the advancing age of the monarch appeared to offer a guarantee for his moral reformation, but the daily experience of the Queen sufficed to convince her that hope for domestic happiness; conviction doubtlessly place her more thoroughly in power of those treacherous who, in order strengthen their influence, did exaggerate (where exaggeration was possible) the painful errors of her husband. self idolized by the people, who regarded her with earnest affection as the mother of two princes whom they looked upon - pledges for the safety and prosperity of France, while she found herself at the same time an object of indifference to the monarch whom they destined to succeed; and who, while he lavished upon wildren incessant tokens of tenderness, sacrificed her personal happiness we every passing fancy, we the time that he affected to repreach her with a coldness of which he was himself the cause.

5 B

* Bassompierre, Mém., p. 📖

Again me fearlessly repeat that the historians of the time have not done Marie de Medicia justice. They expatiate upon her faulta, they enlarge upon her weaknesses, they descant upon her errors; but they touch lightly and carelessly upon the primary influences which governed her after-life. She arrived in her new kingdom young, hopeful, and happy—young, and her youth was blighted by neglect; hopeful, and her hopes were crushed by unkindness; happy, and her happiness—by inconstancy and insult. Her woman-nature, plastic as it might have been under more fortunate circumstances, became indurated to harshness; and it is not they who strive work upon the solid marble, who should complain if the chisel with which they pursue purpose, become blunted in the process.

On the 5th of September of this year died M. de Bellièvre, — Chancellor of France, whose probity and justice had rendered him dear to the people, and in whose eyes the withdrawal of — court favour only tended — enhance his valuable qualities. He was, as — natural consequence, succeeded by Brulart de Sillery, who had already superseded him as keeper of the seals; — his body — attended to the church of St. Germain-l'Auxerrois by a vast concourse of the citizens.

His demise in November, followed by that of Cardinal de Lorraine,* who, with the usual superstition of the age, was declared to have been bewitched because his malady had baffled the skill of his physicians; while that which renders the circumstance more melancholy, is the individual accused of destruction was burnt in Nancy, having been previously subjected to series of lingering tortures.

* Charles, Cardinal de Lorraine, Bishop of Metz and Strasbourg, and Abbot of St. Victor-lès-Paris. The Cardinal de Givry succeeded him in the see of Metz, having the Marquis de Verneuil as his condjutor; while Leopold of Austria replaced him as Bishop of Strasbourg, having been elected to that dignity by the chapter; while the Protestants named George, Marquis of Brandebourg, administrator to that see, which caused great dissention the two concurrents, until a conciliation was effected through the good offices of Duke Frederic of Wirtemberg, who induced them to enter into a truce for fifteen years, during which period they divided between them the revenues of the benefice, Leopold of Austria retaining the title of bishop.

4400

The court meanwhile, according I Sully, I more dissipated had been during any previous winter since the arrival of Marie de Medicis in France; the mount given of the mount of morals throughout the capital by L'Etoile, which will bear transcription. The wee year (1608) commenced in same manner. Ballets and danced both the Louvre and the residences of the great nobles. The ex-Queen Marguerite gave mentertainment in honour of the birth of the young Prince, which terminated with a running at the ring, where the prizes were distributed by herself and her successor; and, finally, the King commanded that an especial ballet for the of the Duke de Montpensier, to whose daughter he was about to affiance the infant Duke d'Orleans, should be executed by the Duke Wendôme, Marquis de Bassompierre, the Baron 🖮 Thermes, and M de Carmail, the four nobles of m court who were distinguished by the appellation of " Dangereux." The angust party accordingly proceeded to the hôtel of that Prince, who was then nearly at the point of death, having languished throughout years in a low decline which had gradually sapped his existence; but notwithstanding the same of debility which was reduced, the duke left his bed, and received his royal and noble guests in the hall wherein the was performed.* may be doubted, however, whether M. de Montpensier did not make supreme effort in consequence of the proposed alliance, and his anxiety to evince to their Majesties his sense of the honour which was about to be conferred upon himself and is family, rather than from any amusement which could hope to derive from such an exhibition. that, however, as it may, Ill most magnificent preparations had been made for the reception of Henry and Queen, who are at the foot of the great staircase by the duchess, which by her women, and escorted by a score of pages bearing lighted tapers, and thus conducted to the canopied dais beneath which their ponderous chairs, covered with cloth of gold, had been placed, with low stools behind and meither side of throne, for the use of such of the other guests as were privileged to seat themselves in the presence of the sovereign.

* Mercure Français, 1607, p. 228. L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 487,

† wol. vii, p. 7. L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 417, 418.

The ballet, are regarded the dying condition of the ducal host, are executed under the happiest pices. The King, to whom the proposed marriage of the children are agreeable under every aspect, was in one of his most condescending and complacent moods; while Marie de Medicis, whose affection for all her offspring amounted to passion, was radiant with delight as she remembered that by the will of the duke all his property and estates devolved upon Prince, even should his betrothed bride* not to become wife.†

* Bestompierre, Mém., p. 51.

On following day the affiancing, of which entertainment will been the prelude, took place with great solemnity. The costly presents exchanged, and only by the betrothed children, but also by their royal noble relatives. This ceremony, owing failing health of the duke, also performed the Hôtel Montpensier; and was succeeded by ments of every description; among which those prepared for the occasion at the Arsenal by Sully most marked gratification to their Majesties. The minister had caused a spacious theatre to be constructed, in which the Italian actors who had been summoned France by the Queen, gave their representations. This pit or salle de spectacle - himself informs us, arranged amphitheatrically, while above man galleries divided into separate boxes, each approached by a differstaircase, and entered by a different door. Two of these galleries were reserved entirely for the ladies who were admitted has the performance, had no many upon any pretext whatever, was permitted to enter them;

the decease of the Duke d'Orleans, married (in 1626) Gaston Baptiste France.

† Bessompierre, Mém., p. 51.

an arrangement which appears to be strikingly at variance with the lax morality of the time. So resolved, nevertheless, was Sully to enforce this regulation, and the law gravity curious enough upon such a subject: "This was a point of my police which I would not suffer to be violated, and of which I mot consider it beneath me personally a compel the observance."

To impress, moreover, upon his readers the strength of this determination, he relates an aneodote of which we cannot resist the transcription:

"One day," he says; "when a very fine ballet was represented in this hall, I perceived a man leading lady by the hand, with whom he was about to enter the women's gallery. He was a foreigner, and I moreover easily recognised by sallow complexion to what country he belonged. 'Monsieur,' I said to him, 'you will be good enough to look for another door; for I do not think that with your skin you can hope to pass for a lady.' 'My Lord,' replied he in very bad French; 'when you ascertain who I am, you will not, I can assure you, refuse to have the politeness of permitting me to enter with these fair and lovely ladies, however dark I may be. My name is Pimentelio; I am well received by Majesty, and have frequently honour of playing with him.' This was true, and too true. This foreigner, of whom I im frequently heard, had won immense sums from the King. 'How, ..... ma vie!' I exclaimed, affecting extreme anger; 'you are then. I perceive, who great glutton of Portuguese who daily win the money of L King. Pardicu, you and by no means welcome here, as I neither affect nor will receive such guests.' III was about to reply, but I thrust him back, saying at the same time, 'Go, go; find another entrance, for your jargon will fail to make any impression upon me.' The King having subsequently inquired of him if he had not thought the ballet magnificent and admirably executed, Pimentello replied that he was anxious to have witnessed it, but that he had been encountered at the door by his financeminister who im met him me a negative, and shut him out; adventure which a much amused the monarch that he not only laughed heartily himself, but made the whole court participators in his amusement."#

Sully, Móm., vol. vii, p. 8.

Banquets, running at the ring, and in which the Queen occasionally condescended in join, varied in entertainments; which were, however, suddenly terminated by in the occurred on the 28th of the month; and so much was the King affected by his demise, that he forbade all the customary diversions during the ensuing carnival.

Nothing could exceed, save in the case of a sovereign, the splendour of the funeral ceremonies observed after his decease. He had no sooner expired than his body was carried into a hall richly hung with tapestry, and surrounded by seats and benches covered with cloth of gold, elaborately embroidered with flours-de-lis, intended for accommodation of the prelates, nobles, knights, and gentlemen of the duke's household who appointed to watch beside the corpse. The body lay upon a covered with cloth of gold which swept the floor, and was bordered with ermine. He were his ducal robes, with a coronet, and the great collar of St. Michael; and had his white-gloved hands crossed upon his breast. At the foot of the bier stood a small table upon which lay a massive silver crucifix; and second supporting a vase of holy water. In this state mediate deceased duke remained during eight days; the officers of his household waiting upon him in the same manner, and with the ceremonies when he was alive. A prelate said the grace; the water was presented to the vacant chair of the Prince, in which while in existence he had been accustomed to lave his hands previously to commencing a meal; the courses were placed upon the table by the proper officers; a silver goblet was prepared in the same moment in which he had formerly been in the habit of taking his draught; and, finally, the prelate uttered a thanksgiving, to which he added a III profundis, and the prayer for the dead; when the food that had been served was distributed to the poor.

* Sully, λlém., vol. vii, pp. 8, 9.

...

At the termination of the eight days the funeral service was performed at Notre-Dame, in the presence of the knights of the Holy Ghost, all wearing their collars. The chief mourners were the Princes of Condé and the Count de Soissons, the cousins of the deceased duke; and his funeral oration was delivered by M. de Fenouillet, Bishop of Montpellier. The body was then conveyed to Champigny in Poitou, where was laid to rest with his ancestors.*

Having strictly forbidden I public festivities, Henry removed the court to Fontainebleau; and Marguerite, whose unblushing libertinism formed the proverb of Paris, seized the moment to erect an almshouse and convent upon a portion of the grounds of her hotel. It was stated the ex-Queen during her residence at Usson, where, as we have already seen, her career was one of the most degrading profligacy, had made a that should she ever be permitted revisit Paris, she would support a certain number of monks who should daily sing the praises of the Deity; and she accordingly gave to the chapel attached to the the name of the Chapel of Praise, while the house itself was designated the Monastery of the Holy Trinity. It was no built than it was given by the foundress to the reformed and bare-footed fathers of . Augustime | but after having solicited in their favour various privileges accorded by Sovereign-Pontiff, she disposessed them in the year 1613, and established in their place the Augustine fathers of the congregation of Bourges.

Français, 1608, L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 444,

THE DE THE

Meanwhile the influence of Concini and his wife over the mind of the Queen unhappily increased with time, until the arrogance of the former became so great that he had the insolence to enter the lists a great tilting the ring which was publicly held in the Rue St. Antoine in the presence of the monarch and his court; a piece of presumption which was rendered still more unpalatable to Henry by the fact that Italian, who was well skilled in such exercises, bore away the prize for which whole of his mobility had contended.

So arrogant, indeed, had he become, and so inflated with the consciousness of wealth, Marie — Medicis having been lavish even beyond her means both to his wife and himself, that he entered into a negociation for the purchase of La Ferté, a property estimated at between two and three hundred thousand crowns; and he no sooner ascertained that the Duchess de Sully had waited upon the Queen to entreat of her Majesty to forbid the transfer, as such an acquisition made by an individual who was generally known to be penniless only a few years previously, would necessarily excite the public disaffection towards herself, than he had the audacity to proceed to the Arsensi, and to upbraid that lady for her interference in the most unmeasured — insulting terms, declaring was independent both of the King of France and of his subjects, whatever might be their and rank and that whoever thwarted him in his projects might live to rue the day in which they braved his anger.

This intemperance having come the ears of the King, his indignation was excessive; but, as an previous occasions, he lacked the moral courage to assert his dignity; and satisfied himself by bitter complaints. Sully of the fatal hold that her the Italian attendance had secured upon the affections of the Queen; and by replying to the reproaches of Marie upon the subject of his an attachment for Charlotte des Essarts, and the continued insolence of Madame de Verneuil, with vehement upbraidings of the vassalage in which to the indecent caprices and shameless extortions of a waiting-woman and her husband.

Marie de Medicis, who had hoped that the rank in her household which had been conceded to Leonora, would protect her for the future against allusions to the obscurity of her origin, was greatly incensed by the tone of contempt — maintained by the King, whenever he made any allusion either to herself or Concini; — eventually — recriminations attained — such — height, — Henry abruptly quitted the Louvre (where the delicate situation of his royal consort bad induced him — his temporary residence), — pro— to Chantilly, without taking leave of her. On his way, however, he alighted at the Arsenal, where he informed Sully of the reason of his sudden departure and the minister became so much alarmed at this unequivocal demonstration of displeasure - the part of the monarch, that he resolved not to lose a moment in advising the Queen concession might cause the King to return to the capital. After the mid-day meal he accordingly repaired to the Louvre, accompanied only by a secretary who was to await him in an ante-chamber, and made his way to the apartments of Marie. On reaching will saloon adjoining the private closet of the Queen, he found Madame Concini the door with her head buried in her hands, evidently absorbed in thought. She started up, however, when he addressed her; and in reply to his request that she would thim to her royal mistress, she replied that she would do so willingly, although she apprehended in her Majesty would not receive him, as she had refused entrance to herself. had, however, no sooner raised tapestry, and scratched upon the door, than Marie, on learning who was without, desired me M. de Sully should be instantly admitted. When the duke entered he found the Queen seated at a table, busily engaged in writing; and as he approached her with the customary cheisance, she hastily motioned to him to place himself upon a stool immediately in front of her.

"You are right welcome, M. le Ministre;" she said in a tone was not altogether steady, although she struggled to suppress all outward emotion. "You are doubtlessly already apprised that the King has withdrawn from the capital in anger, but you have yet to learn that III has left me no whit more satisfied than himself. I was unprepared for so abrupt a departure; and as I had still much to say to him on the subject of our disagreement, I find myself compelled to the exercise of my clerkly skill, and am now occupied in telling him in writing all that I had left unsaid. There is the letter;" she continued with a bitter smile, as she threw the ample scroll across the table; "read it, and tell me if I have not more than sufficient cause to consider myself both aggrieved and outraged."

"Madam," said the incorruptible minister, when he had perused the document thus submitted to him | " you must pardon me if I venture to declare that you must never suffer that letter to meet the eye of your royal consort: it contains matter to induce your eternal separation."

"Can you deny one assertion which I have made?" demanded the Queen impatiently.

"I sympathise in all the trials and troubles of your Majesty;" was the evasive reply; "I would leave no effort untried to terminate them; a fact of which you have long, I trust, Madam, felt convinced; and thus I cannot see you about wilfully to destroy every chance of happiness, without imploring of you to reflect deeply and calmly before you take so extreme a measure as that which you now contemplate. The King is already incensed against you; and II spoken words have thus angered him, I dare not contemplate the consequences of such as these before me, written hours after your contention. I therefore beseech you to suppress this letter; and both for your own sake, and for that of the French nation, rather to seek a reconciliation with his grace your husband than to increase the ill-feeling which so unhappily exists."

"You will no allowance for Monsieur, www.woman and a wife: you only argue with the Queen."

"Madam;" persisted Sully; "in the little is rather to the woman and the wife that I address myself, than to the Queen. As a woman the bitterness and invective of this missive;" and he laid his spread hand emphatically upon the paper; "would suffice to you with blame, and to deprive you of sympathy; while as mother it would suthorise your separation from your children. Let me entreat of you therefore to forego your purpose."

Marie de Medicis sat silent for a few moments, and then, making a violent effort over herself, she said slowly: "I will in an far follow your counsel, M. le Duc, that I will destroy and letter, although, the Saints bear witness! that it has cost me both time and care to prepare it; but I will yield no further. I am weary of being made the puppet of an unfaithful husband, and his band of unblushing favourites, who receive, each in succession, some high-sounding title by which they are enabled to thrust themselves and their shame upon me in the very halls of the palace. I must and will tell the King this."

"Then, Madam, winfortunately your decision;" her listener; "at least, let me urge you to do it in gentler terms."

"I am in humour to temporise."
Sully made no reply.

"Do not wrap yourself up in silence, Monsieur;" exclaimed the Queen waiting in vain III reply; "I believe that you wish to serve me; and you cannot better than by putting these unpalatable truths into a less repulsive form. Here are III means at hand; but, mark me, I will not suffer one particular to be omitted."

Under this somewhat difficult restriction the minister proceeded to obey her command; but she argued upon every sentence, and cavilled at every paragraph, which tended to soften the harsher features of the letter. At length, however, at task completed, and nothing remained to be effected save its transcription by the Queen. The letter was long and elaborate, as Sully had skilfully contrived to terminate every reproach by some reasoning which could not fail to touch the feelings of the King. Thus, after upbraiding her husband with his perpetual infidelities, Marie was made to say that if she complained, it was less for herself, than because, in addition to her anxiety to be the sole possessor of his heart, she could not coldly contemplate the injury which he inflicted upon his person and dignity by becoming the rival of his own subjects, and thus compromising his kingly character; will will if she insisted with vehemence upon the exile of Madame Verneuil, her excuse must be found in the fact that in no other way could her peace and honour be secured, or the welfare of her children be rendered sure: those children of whom he was the father as well as sovereign, and whom she would cause to fall at his feet to implore compassion mother. She then reminded him of mumerous promises which he had made to her that he would cease to give her most of complaint; and terminated the missive by calling God to witness that should he still be willing to fulfil them, she would, on her side, renounce all desire for vengennee upon those by whom she had been so deeply wronged.

Certain, however, it is that, even with modifications, the letter gave serious offence to Henry, who, shortly after its receipt, wrote to apprise Sully of what he denominated the impertinence of his wife; but declared that he was less incensed against her than against the individual by whom the epistle had been dictated; as the style was not here, and that he had consequently discovered the agency of a third person, whose identity he left it to Sully to ascertain, as he had resolved never again either to serve, or even to see him, be he whom he might, so long as he had life.

With a truth and frankness which did him honour, the finance-minister, despite this threat, did not hesitate when subsequently urged upon the subject by the King, to admit the authorship of the obnoxious document; and in support of his assertion to place in the hands of

VOL L

...

Henry the original draught which he had retained. On comparing this with the autograph letter of the Queen, however, Sully at once perceived that she had been unable to repress her anger sufficiently to adhere to his advice, and that the interpolations were by no means calculated to advance her interests.* | was evident. nevertheless, that much of the King's indignation had subsided, and that the delicate health of his royal consort was not without its influence over his mind. Sully adroitly profited by this circumstance to impress upon Henry the danger of any agitation to the Queen, whose impressionable asture occasioned constant solicitude to her physicians; and reminded him that her late violence had been principally induced by rumours which had reached her of a kigison between the Duke de Guise; an indignity to his own person which she had declared herself unable to brook with patience. In short, so zealously and so successfully did Sully immediately, that im at length induced the monarch to return to the Louvre, and the Queen to disclaim all intention of exciting his displeasure; in which latter attempt he was greatly aided by being enabled to confide to her that instant measures were to be taken for the disgrace of the marquise, could it be proved that her friendship with the Duke de Guise had exceeded the limits of propriety.

In the beginning of March the court removed to Sully, Mém., vol. vii, pp.

Fontainehleau, where, while awaiting the accouchement of the Queen, Henry indulged in the most reckless gaming; nor did he pursue this vice in a kingly spirit, for even his devoted panegyrist Péréfixe informs us that this period he knew not how to answer those who reproached his royal pupil with too great a love for cards and dice, of itself a taste little suited to a great and powerful sovereign; and that, moreover, he was an unpleasant player, eager for gain, timid when the stake was a high one, and ill-tempered when he was a loser. Il support II is reluctant testimony, Bessompierre relates, that being anxious to assist at the opening of the States of Lorraine in compliance with the invitation of the duke, he solicited the permission of Henry to that effect on two or three different occasions, but as he always played on the side of the King, and universally with great success, he was constantly refused.

...

Resolved to carry his point, however, the spoiled courtier at length set forth without any leave-taking; a fact which was no sooner ascertained by the monarch than he dispatched two of the exempts of his guard to arrest him, and bring him back. This they did without difficulty, as Bassompierre did not travel at night; but as the gallant marquis had no ambition to be conveyed to Fontainebleau in the guise of a prisoner, he dispatched a letter to M. In Villeroy, requesting to be liberated from the presence of his captors, and pledging himself to return instantly to On his arrival the King laughed heartily at the idea of his disappointment, which he, however, lightened by pledging himself that in ten days he should be left at liberty to depart.*

* Péréfine, vol. ii, pp. 463, 464.

On the 25th of April Marie de Medicis became mother of a third son; upon whom, after some contestation between his illustrious parents, was bestowed the title of Duke d'Anjou. The Queen was desirous that he should be called Prince of Navarre, but Henry preferred the former designation, from the fact that a had been that of many of the French princes who had been sovereigns of Jerusalem and Sicily.† The birth of another Prince to their beloved sovereign filled up the measure of joy in France; the citizens of Paris made costly gifts to the Queen; and the circumstance of the infant having come into the world on the anniversary of St. Louis increased the general enthusiasm. T As the convalescence of the royal invalid was less rapid upon this than on previous occasions, the court remained during the spring and a portion of the summer Fontainebleau, where every species of Bassompierre, Mém., pp. 50, 51.

† Gaston Jean Baptiste de France, originally named Duke d'Anjon, and subsequently Duke d'Origana, died in Landhis birth, Henry IV. declared his intention of making him a churchman, and causing him to be entitled Cardinal of France.

Mercure Français, 1608, p. 231. Sully, Mém., vol. vii, p. 37. L'Etoile, vol. iii, p. 471.

exhausted by the courtiers. Once only, at the beginning of May, the King resided for a few days in the capital; and a his return Marie manifested such undisquised satisfaction, he accorded to her the sum of twelve thousand crowns for the embellishment of her château at

So early as the year 1598, during the journey of the sovereign to Brittany, a marriage had been arranged between his son the Duke de Vendôme, and MademoiMeroceur; but the mother and grandmother of the young lady had succeeded in inspiring her with such a hatred of the legitimated Prince, that she would not allow his name to be mentioned in her presence; and when she ascertained that the monarch had resolved upon fulfilment of the contract, she withdrew to the Capuchin Convent, declaring that sooner than become the wife of M. de Vendôme, she would take the veil. The Duchess de Merceeur and her mother had been anxious to marry the young heiress to the Prince de Condé, or failing in this project, to some relative of their own, in order to retain her large possessions in the family; but the King had resolved upon securing them to his son by enforcing the promise made by the deceased duke. He accordingly adopted conciliatory measures by which he succeeded in effecting his object; and before the conclusion of the rejoicings on the birth of the infant Prince, the marriage was finally celebrated in the chapel of Fontainebleau with all the pomp and magnificence of which the ceremony was susceptible; while the King appeared beside his son at the altar blazing with jewels of inestimable price, and joined in the festivities consequent upon the alliance with a zest and enjoyment which were the theme of general comment.

* Mademoiselle de Merceur was the only daughter and Philippe Emmanuel Lerraine, Merceur, the brother of Louise de Lorraine, Queen of Henry III. By that monarch he was appointed Governor of Brittany; in 1 1 he revolted against him, and persisted in his rebellion until 1598, when he entered into a treaty with Henry IV., by which he bound himself to bestow the hand of his daughter, and the reversion of his government, upon César de Vendéane; a by which he subsequently felt himself so much diagraced, that he withdrew from the court, and engaged in the war of Hungary. Pining, however, to see once more his wife and daughter, he was on his way to France for that purpose, when he was attacked by fever at Nuremberg, where he expired in March, 1602, at the age of forty-three years.

The arrival of Don Pedro de Toledo,* the ambassador of Philip III. of Spain at this precise juncture, gave further occasion for that display of splendour in which Henry had latterly delighted; and after his public reception at Fontainebleau the court removed to Paris, where the ambassador had been sumptuously lodged at the * Don Pedro de Toledo, Constable of Castile, and general of the galleys of Naples, was a relative of Marie de Medicia, whose grandfather, the Count de Medicia, had married Eleonora de Toledo, the daughter of the Viceroy of Naples. He was, moreover, a grandee of Spain, and one of the most confidential friends of Marie III.

Hôtel de Gordy. His arrogance, however, soon disgusted the French king; nor did he hesitate to exhibit the same unbecoming hauteur towards his kinswoman the Queen, who having dispatched a nobleman of her household to welcome him to France in that character, was informed by her envoy that the only answer which he returned to the compliment was conveyed in the remark, that crowned heads had no relatives; they had only subjects.

The sole occasion upon which he laid aside his morgue, and then to all appearance involuntarily, was while driving through the streets of the capital in the carriage of the King. He had previously visited Paris, and as he contrasted its present magnificence with the squalor, filth, and disorder which it had formerly exhibited, he could not suppress an exclamation of astonishment. "Why should you be surprised, Monsieur?" demanded Henry; "when you last saw my good city of Paris, the father of the family did not inhabit it; and now that he is here to watch over his children, they prosper as you see."

The object of this embessy was kept a profound secret; some historians assert that it was undertaken with a view to effect a marriage between the Dauphin and the Infanta of Spain, while others lean to the belief that Philip had instructed Don Pedro to endeavour to prevail upon Henry to abandon his alliance with the Dutch. Whatever were its motive, the ambassador, who had reached Paris on 7th July, quitted capital on 1 of a same month, having only succeeded in irritating the King by his overbearing and supercilious demeanour.*

* Bonnechose, vol. i, p. 445. Péréfixe, vol. ii, p. 564.

It during present Henry IV, indulged his passion for field sports to such an excess as tended seriously to slarm those who were anxious for his preservation; and it indeed seems as though, period, leisure hours meanly divided between his favourite diversions of hunting and high-play. Sully informs us, however, that the King busied himself with the embellishments of Fontaineblean, and in erecting the Place Dauphine at Paris; but that great works, which were necessary to the convenience of the people, might have been carried much further if the monarch would have followed his advice, and been less profuse in his personal expenditure, particularly as regarded his gambling transactions. He advances, as a proof of this assertion, that he was called upon an are occasion to deliver to Edouardo Fernandes, a Portuguese banker (who, according to Bassompierre, had made a visit of speculation to the French court, and who unhesitatingly provided the nobles with large sums, either on security, or immense interest,) the enormous and if thirtyfour thousand pistoles, for which the reckless monarch had become his debtor. "I frequently received similar orders; "he proceeds to say; "for two or three thousand pistoles, and a great many others for less considerable same."*

* L'Etoile, vol. iii, pp. 474—477. Français, IIII.
Daniel, vol. vii, p. 488.

the waning passion of Henry IV. for Madame at Verneuil, at the period at the him, and more than formerly, to seek amusement and occupation at the gaming-table, where he was emulated by his profuse and licentious nobles; while even his Queen and the ladies of the court entered with avidity into the exciting pastime. We have frequent record of the habitual high-play of Marie de Medicie, who found in it a solace for her sick-room, and a diversion from her domestic moyances; and thus the dangerous propensity of the monarch was heightened by the presence of the love-liest women of the land, and the charm and fascination of wit and intellect.

Madame de Verneuil was in despair: the coveted sceptre was aliding from within her grasp; and with the ill-judged hope of regaining the affections of her royal lover by exciting his jealousy, she encouraged attention of a Duke de Guise; who, undismayed by the previous attempt of his brother to divert the affections of another of the royal favourities and its unfortunate result, at length openly avowed himself the suitor of the brilliant marquise, and even promised to make her his wife; while the scandalous chroniclers of the time do not hesitate to affirm that the Prince de Joinville himself had previously done the same, but that his proverbial fickleness had protected him from so gross a mésalliance.

G G

■ Mémoires, vol. vii, pp. 72—74.

In the case of the duke, however, the affair wore a more serious aspect; and so earnest did he appear in his professions, that Madame de Verneuil, anxious at once to secure an illustrious alliance, and to revenge herself upon the monarch, caused the bans of marriage between the Prince and herself to be published with some alight alteration in their respective names, which did not, however, suffice to deceive those who had an interest in subverting her project; and the fact was accordingly communicated to the King, upon whom it produced an effect entirely opposite to that which had been contemplated by the vanity of the lady, who had been clever enough to procure from M. de Guise a written promise similar to that which she had formerly extorted from the monarch. Four years previously the knowledge of such a perfidy on her part would have overwhelmed Henry with anxiety, jealousy, and grief; but his passion for the marquise had, as we have seen, long been on the decline, and his only feeling was one of indignation and displeasure. To the marquise herself he simply expressed his determined and unalterable opposition to the alliance; but to the duke he was far less lenient, reminding him of the former offences of himself and his family, and forbidding him to pursue a purpose so distasteful to all those who had his honour at heart. This was a fatal blow to Madame de Verneuil, and one which she was never destined to overcome. Clever as she was, she had suffered herself to forget that youth is not eternal, and that passion is even more evanescent than time; and thus, by a last impotent effort to assert a supremacy to which she could no longer advance any claim, she only succeeded in extinguishing in the heart of the King the last embers of a latent and expiring attachment.*

* Dreux du Radier, vol. vi, p. 104.

END OF YOL I.

LOWDON:
Printed by Schulze and Co., 13, Poland Street.