

Clarendon Press Series

A

HISTORY OF FRANCE

BY

G W KITCHIN, M A

Formerly Censor of Christ Church

VOL I

(B.C. 58 — A.D. 1453)

SECOND EDITION

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

M DCCCLXXXI

[All rights reserved]

PREFACE TO VOL. I.

THIS volume attempts to avoid the dryness of a summary, while it professes to deal with a very long space of time. All the more important periods of the history have, as far as possible, been written directly from original sources, and are treated at considerable length. The parts between, connecting one stirring time with another, have been treated very briefly, so as simply to carry on the narration without a break: like a road in a dull country between a chain of ancient and historic cities.

The guiding-line throughout this volume is the growth of the French Monarchy and Kingdom: and this is here brought down to the time when, freed from foreign dangers, France was about to enter on the great struggle between royalty and the disintegrating forces of fifteenth-century feudalism. The history of that struggle, the almost dramatic rivalry between the House of Burgundy, the last great representative of the medieval world, and the House of Valois, the steadfast representative of the growing forces of European Monarchy, will form the introduction to the remainder of the work, which will attempt to follow the fortunes of France into more modern times.

I have divided the work by the natural epochs in the history, rather than by the accession of Kings for these latter are points of time of very uneven importance, which sometimes mark an epoch, and sometimes are hardly worthy of more than a passing notice. Thus too, though this volume, ending at the year 1453, breaks off in the middle of the reign of Charles VII, we know that it is a moment recognised as an epoch, both in general European history, and specially (from the final expulsion of the English, and the close of what is called the 'Hundred Years War'), in the history of France.

As to the spelling of Proper Names, in those of early times I have chiefly retained the early Germanic forms, because the men were Germans. When the chief actors become French men I have adopted the French spelling except in the case of names familiar to us in an English form. It would be mere affectation to write Henri or Philippe. In passing down the book it may be noticed that some names are gradually modified, that is because the persons who owned them changed. Thus the German Hlodowig of the sixth century becomes Hludwig in Austrasian days then Ludwig finally Louis. I have not used such intermediate forms as Loois, Lois, &c., because they do not appear to me to have been permanent enough for adoption, nor have I spelt the word in the older English fashion as Lewis for the modern French form is now equally common in England, and the form Lewis is a deviation from both the German and the French spelling.

The Maps and Tables of this volume are intended to indicate the actual progress of the French Monarchy. We are too apt to assume that what is now France was always France we forget, for example, that it was not till the fifteenth century that the French Monarchy found footing across the Rhone, and there thrust back the frontiers of the Empire.

My best wish for this book is that it should lead students to original authorities, and teach them to recognise the fact that history demands an honest and disciplined use of the evidence those sources supply, and that we can only grasp the inner truth of history by transporting ourselves into the scenes described by contemporary writers. The study of their works will at once sharpen our critical faculties and develop the healthy action of the imagination.

Lastly let me here record my warmest thanks to those friends who have so kindly brought their great and accurate knowledge and their literary skill to bear on the revision of this my first historical attempt. Any value it may have will be in very large part due to their patient kindness towards it, to their sound criticisms, corrections, and advice.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE . . . . .	xiii
INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.—The Geographical Characteristics of Modern France . . . . .	I

BOOK I

CHAP I	The Gaul . . . . .	8
„ II	Gaul before the time of Caesar	19
„ III	Caesar in Gaul B C 58-50	27
„ IV	Gaul under Roman Influences the final struggle against Rome. B C 50-A.D 70	35
„ V.	Gaul under the Empire to the accession of Diocletian A D 70-284	44
„ VI	The age of barbarian incursions, and the struggle against the Germans A D 284-406	48
„ VII	The age of German settlements, to the era of Hlodowig (Clovis). A D. 406-476	58

BOOK II

PART I — The Neustrian Franks

CHAP I	Of the Franks and Hlodowig (Clovis) A.D 476-511 . . . . .	67
„ II.	The Neustrian Kings A.D 511-687 . . . . .	79
	i. From the partition at Hlodowig's death to the formation of the three kingdoms, Austrasia, Neustria, Burgundy A.D 511-567	80
	ii The struggle between Austrasia and Neustria, under Brunhild and Fredegond A D 567-613	84
	iii Dagobert King of Neustria. A.D 613-638	92
	iv. The Royal Nonentities down to the Battle of Testry A.D 638-687 . . . . .	94

PART II.—The Austrasian Franks

		PAGE
CHAP I	The Family of Pippin, or the Carolings (Carolingians). A.D. 687-752	96
" II	Pippin the Short, the first Caroling King A.D. 752-768	111
" III	Charles the Great, otherwise called Charlemagne. A.D. 768-814	115
	i. The life of Charles	115
	ii. The administration of Gaul under Charles	134
	iii. The state of society in Gaul under Charles	143
" IV	Hludwig 'the Pious' and his sons. A.D. 814-843	150
" V	From the Peace of Verdun to Hugh Capet. A.D. 843-987	159
	i. The Origin of the French language	159
	ii. The later Carolings	162
	(1) From A.D. 843-888	163
	(2) From A.D. 888-911	167
	(3) From A.D. 911-987	175

BOOK III.

The Growth of the French MonarchyIts Rise. A.D. 987-1328

	Tables VII, VIII, IX	180-183
CHAP I	Introductory	184
	i. The aim of this Book	184
	ii. The condition of the country at Hugh Capet's accession	185
	iii. The limits of Hugh Capet's kingship	188
	Table X	189
" II	From the accession of Hugh Capet to the age of the First Crusade. A.D. 987-1066	190
" III	The age of the First Crusade. A.D. 1066-1100	210
" IV	Of Feudalism and Chivalry	235
" V	Louis VI, surnamed 'the Fat.' A.D. 1100-1137	249
" VI	Louis VII, 'the Young, and the growth of civic liberties. A.D. 1137-1180	261

	PAGE
CHAP VII. Philip II, surnamed Augustus, and Louis VIII	276
i. From A.D. 1180-1199 . . . . .	277
ii Philip Augustus adds Normandy to his domains. A.D. 1199-1206 . . . . .	284
iii The Provençal Crusade. A.D. 1207-1215	298
iv. The Day of Bouvines. A.D. 1214 . . . . .	306
v. To the death of Philip. A.D. 1214-1223	312
vi Louis VIII. A.D. 1223-1226 . . . . .	316
„ VIII. Louis IX, called Saint Louis . . . . .	318
i. The King's youth. A.D. 1226-1244 . . . . .	318
ii The King's First Crusade. A.D. 1245-1254	328
iii The King's later life. A.D. 1254-1270 . . . . .	337
„ IX Philip III. A.D. 1270-1285 . . . . .	346
„ X. Philip IV, 'the Fair' . . . . .	354
i From A.D. 1285-1296 . . . . .	356
ii. The quarrel with Pope Boniface VIII A.D. 1296-1304 . . . . .	359
iii. The epoch of the Templars. A.D. 1304- 1314 . . . . .	377
„ XI The three sons of Philip 'the Fair' . . . . .	382
i. Louis X, 'the Quarrelsome' A.D. 1314- 1316 . . . . .	362
ii. Philip V, 'the Tall.' A.D. 1316-1322 . . . . .	385
iii. Charles IV, 'the Fair' A.D. 1322-1328 . . . . .	387

BOOK IV.

Monarchy and FeudalismPeriod of the 'Hundred Years War.' A.D. 1328-1453

CHAP. I The forebodings of the 'Hundred Years War.'
A.D. 1328-1337 . . . . .	391
„ II. The 'Hundred Years War' Period I. A.D.
1337-1360 . . . . .	400
i A.D. 1337-1347 . . . . .	400
ii. From the Truce of 1347 to the Battle of Poitiers A.D. 1347-1356 . . . . .	420

		PAGE
CHAP II	iii. Étienne Marcel and the Bourgeoisie of Paris A.D 1356-1360	433
	iv The Treaty of Bretigny A.D 1356-1360	448
" III	The Deeds of Charles V, 'the Wise' A.D 1360-1380	452
	i. As Regent. A.D. 1360-1364	452
	ii. As King A.D 1364-1369	454
	iii. The 'Hundred Years War' Period II Charles V makes war on England. A.D 1369-1380	462
IV	Charles VI A.D. 1380-1422	474
	i. The Great Schism	474
	ii. The early years of the King A.D. 1380-1392	477
	iii. The King's madness. A.D 1392-1415	485
" V	The 'Hundred Years War' Period III A.D 1415-1422	500
" VI	The 'Hundred Years War' Period IV The age of Jeanne Darc. A.D 1422-1431	516
	i. Charles VII to the siege of Orleans. A.D. 1422-1429	516
	ii. Jeanne Darc. A.D 1429-1431	522
" VII	The 'Hundred Years War' Period V Expulsion of the English. A.D 1431-1453	540
INDEX		559

TABLES.

I	Pedigree of the Merwing or Merovingian Kings . . . . .	(to face) 67
II.	The Merwing Kings and their territories . . . . .	67
III	Pedigree of the Caroling Princes . . . . .	97
IV	The fragments of the Empire of Charles the Great . . . . .	159
V.	The origin of the French language . . . . .	159
VI.	The Feudal States of Southern France . . . . .	160
VII.	The Feudal States of Northern France . . . . .	(to face) 160
VIII	Absorption of the chief Feudal States into the Kingdom of France . . . . .	161
IX.	Successive additions to the French Monarchy . . . . .	162, 163
X	Pedigree of Hugh Capet . . . . .	169
XI.	The Kings of France . . . . .	(to face) 190
XII.	The Succession to the French throne . . . . .	387
XIII	The Breton Pedigree . . . . .	407
XIV.	The relationships of the French Princes . . . . .	424

MAPS AND PLANS

	PAGE
I Gaul about B.C. 60	( to face ) 27
II Gaul in Provinces, after Augustus	" 35
III Gaul under the Germans	" 67
IV Charles the Great's Empire. A.D. 800	" 129
V 'Francia Occidentalis,' and the Kingdom of Aquitaine	" 135
VI France at the accession of Hugh Capet	" 189
VII Plan of Château Gaillard and its neighbourhood	290
VIII Plan of Château Gaillard, enlarged	293
IX. France under the Valois. A.D. 1328	( to face ) 391
X. The Flemish country	, 401
XI Northern France at the time of the Hundred Years War	" 409
XII Plan of the Battle of Crécy	415
XIII Plan of the Battle of Poitiers	427
XIV Plan of Paris in the days of Étienne Marcel ; circ. A.D. 1350	439
XV Plan of the battle of Azincourt	505
XVI Plan of Orleans in the fifteenth century	519
XVII. France after the expulsion of the English	( to face ) 553

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

B C	A D
154	496
Marseilles calls in Roman help	Battle of Zulpich Hlodowig
122	(Clovis) a Christian
Aquæ Sextiæ (Aix in Pro-	507
vence) founded by Sextius	Battle of the Voeludensian
118	Plain (Vouglé), in which
Narbo Martius (Narbonne)	Hlodowig kills Alaric
founded.	510
102	Hlodowig sole King of Franks
Marius utterly defeats the	511
Teutons at Aix.	Death of Hlodowig First Parti-
100	tion of the Frankish Empire
Birth of Caesar.	567
58	Division of Frankish Gaul
Caesar in Gaul	into three Kingdoms Aus-
51	trasia, Neustria, Burgundy
Caesar 'pacified'	613
A.D.	Death of Brunhild
41	628
Claudius Emperor.	Dagobert King. sole King in 70	632
Fall of Civilis	638
160 (?)	Death of Dagobert.
Christians settle at Lyons	687
251 (?)	Battle of Testry won by Pippin
Dionysius founds the Church	of Heristal over the Neus-of Northern France 'at Lu-	trians Austrasian period
tetia Parisiorum (Paris)	begins
274	715
Gaul again joined to Rome by	Charles Martel, Duke of Aus-
Aurelian.	trasia
284	752
Diocletian becomes Emperor,	Pippin the Short becomes the German incursions begin	King
312	768
Constantine, supported by	Death of Pippin Charles and
Gallic Christians, enters	Carloman succeed
Rome	771
355	CHARLES THE GREAT
Julian commands the Gallic	(Charlemagne), King of army	France and Lombardy
357	800
He makes Paris the seat of	Charles the Great, Em-
Roman government.	peror
497	814
The German settlements begin	He dies Succeeded by Lud-
451	wig I ('Louis le Debonaire')
Attila (Etzel) defeated in the	as Emperor.
Campi Catalaunici
476
Fall of the Roman Empire
486
Battle of Soissons

- 840 Charles II (the Bald) becomes King of Neustria and Burgundy
- 875 Becomes Emperor
- 877 Ludwig II (the Stammerer), King of France.
- 879 Ludwig III, King of Northern France.
- 882 Charles (the Fat) Emperor
- 884 " King of France.
- 892 Charles III (the Simple), King of France.
- 923 Rodolph of Burgundy created King
- 929 Death of Charles III, his rival.
- 936 Ludwig IV (d'Outremer).
- 954 Lothar
- 986 Ludwig V (the Do-nothing)
- 987 HUGH CAPET
- 996 Robert.
- 1031 Henry I.
- 1060 Philip I.
- 1066 Conquest of England by William the Bastard.
- 1095 Council of Clermont. First Crusade preached.
- 1099 Godfrey of Bouillon made King of Jerusalem.
- 1108 Louis VII (the Fat).
- 1122 (Close of the Investiture struggle.)
- 1137 Louis VII (the Young)
- 1147 Second Crusade, joined by Louis VII.
- 1152 Eleanor divorced from Louis, marries Henry of Anjou, afterwards Henry II of England.
- 1154 (Henry II, King of England.)
- 1180 Philip II (Augustus).
- 1189 (The Third Crusade, headed by Frederick Barbarossa.)
- 1202 (The Fourth Crusade.)
- 1203 Philip reduces Normandy
- 1204 (The Latins take Constantinople)
- 1206 Albigensian Crusade.
- " University of Paris founded.
- 1212 Innocent's Bull gives the kingdom of England to Philip Augustus.
- 1213 (King John submits, and does homage for his crown to the Papal Legate Pandolph.)
- 1214 Battle of Bouvines.
- 1215 (King John signs Magna Charta. Frederick II crowned King at Aix la Chapelle; Emperor at Rome 1220.)
- 1216 Louis (son of Philip) lands in England.
- 1223 Louis VIII.
- 1226 Louis IX (Saint Louis), under regency and tutelage of Blanche.
- 1228 (Fifth Crusade, under Frederick II)
- 1243 St. Louis defeats Henry III of England at Taillebourg and Salines.
- 1248 Fifth Crusade, headed by St. Louis, to Egypt.
- 1254 St. Louis returns to Paris.
- 1261 (Latin Empire of Constantinople ends.)
- 1270 Sixth and last Crusade, headed by St. Louis, to Tunis.
- " Philip III (the Bold).
- 1273 (Rudolf of Habsburg elected King of the Romans.)
- 1282 The Sicilian Vespers.
- 1285 Philip IV (the Fair).
- 1296 Philip resists the Papacy War in Guienne against Edward I.
- 1301 Philip's quarrel with Boniface
- 1302 Battle of Courtrai.
- 1303 Boniface taken prisoner by Nogaret.
- 1304 Philip defeats the Flemings at Mons-en-Puelle.

- 1307-9 Trial of the Templars
- 1312 Abolition of the Order
- 1314 Louis X ('le Hutin,' the Turbulent)
- 1316 Philip V (the Tall)
- 1322 Charles V (the Handsome)
- 1328 PHILIP VI (House of Valois)
- 1337 Beginning of the 'Hundred Years War'
- 1340 Sea-fight off Sluys
- 1346 Battle of Crécy.
- 1347 Edward III takes Calais
- 1349 Charles, eldest son of John, son of Philip VI, takes the title of Dauphin
- 1350 John II (the Goodnatured)
- 1356 Battle of Poitiers.
- 1358 The Jacquerie Murder of Étienne Marcel
- 1359 Open war between the Regent and the King of Navarre, Charles the Bad
- „ Du Guesclin appears
- 1360 Treaty of Bretigny
- 1361 Burgundy, on death of Philip de Rouvre, the last Duke of the first House, falls to the Crown
- 1363 It is ceded as an apanage by John to Philip (the Bold), his fourth son
- 1364 Charles V (the Wise) War with Charles the Bad, of Navarre Battle of Auray.
- 1366 Du Guesclin in Spain
- 1369 War with Edward III renewed
- 1376 Death of Edward the Black Prince
- 1377 Death of Edward III Charles conquers all Guenne except Bordeaux
- 1379 The Great Schism begins
- 1380 Death of Du Guesclin
- 1380 Charles VI
- 1382 Battle of Roosebek Death of Philip van Arteveld
- 1387 Death of Charles the Bad, King of Navarre
- 1392 Madness of Charles VI
- „ Disputes begin between the Houses of Burgundy and Orleans
- 1399 (Revolution in England Henry IV of the House of Lancaster proclaimed King)
- 1404 Death of Philip the Bold of Burgundy, succeeded by John the Fearless
- 1407 Assassination of the Duke of Orleans with approval of John of Burgundy
- 1410 Burgundians and Armagnacs The Cabochians appear at Paris
- 1413 (Henry V of England.)
- 1415 Battle of Azincourt
- 1418 Henry V occupies Normandy
- 1419 Takes Rouen Duke of Burgundy assassinated by the Dauphin's friends
- 1420 Treaty of Troyes Henry V heir to the throne of France, and Regent of France
- 1421 Battle of Baugé, in which Scottish and French troops defeat the Duke of Clarence
- 1422 Henry V returns, occupies Paris, dies at Vincennes
- „ His brother, the Duke of Bedford, Regent in France for Henry VI
- „ Charles VII (the Well-served, the Victorious)
- 1424 Battle of Verneuil
- 1427 Dunois, 'the Bastard of Orleans,' appears
- 1428 Siege of Orleans by Bedford and Burgundy

- |  |  |
|--|--|
| 1429 Day of the Herrings. The Maid of Orleans, Jeanne Darc, appears. Siege raised 8th May " Battle of Patay " Charles VII crowned at Rheims. 1430 The Maid of Orleans taken by the Burgundians at Compiègne. 1431 Trial and martyrdom of Jeanne Darc. " Council of Basel begins its sittings. 1435 Peace of Arras, between Charles VII and Phillip (the Good) of Burgundy " Death of the Regent Bedford. 1436 Paris retaken by the French. | 1438 Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges. 1440 The Praguerie, under the Dauphin Louis. 1441 Pontoise taken from the English. 1444 Charles VII helps René against Metz. Louis takes an army into Switzerland. 1445 Institution of a standing army and of fixed taxation. 1448 War renewed with England. 1450 Battle of Formigny. Normandy finally taken from the English. 1453 (Taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II) " Final submission of Guienne to the French crown: end of the Hundred Years War. |
|--|--|
-

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

The Geographical Characteristics of Modern France

ABOUT three miles beyond the little town of Mentone the highway from Nice to Genoa, the famous Corniche road, crosses a torrent, which dashes down from the Alps into the Mediterranean. And here begins the arbitrary border-line between France and Italy, as the frontiers are now adjusted<sup>1</sup>. The line runs northward to the ridge of the Alps, and when it has reached the watershed, turns north-west, dividing the territory of Nice from Piedmont. Following the summit-ridge of the Alps, it skirts Dauphiné, going northwards as far as the Pass of Mont Cenis. Then it bends suddenly to the east, so as to embrace the new French territory of Savoy. Still rising and falling with the Alps, it climbs at last to the summit of Mont Blanc, where France now shares with Italy the possession of the highest spot in Europe. Thence northwards again, till it gradually drops down towards the shores of the Lake of Geneva, a short distance west of the point at which the muddy Rhone falls into that lovely inland sea. The lake lies between Savoyard France and Switzerland, except just at its foot, where the territory of the Swiss Canton of Geneva drives the line of the French frontier southward, and makes it fetch a circuit round that ancient home of liberty. Then falling with the old boundary of France (as it was before the cession of Savoy),

<sup>1</sup> That is, since Nice and Savoy were ceded by Italy to France in 1859

it climbs the Jura, and passes along its ridge, north-eastward to within a few miles of that other Swiss frontier-city, Basel. Here it no longer meets the Rhine as it did before the war with Germany in 1870, but turns reluctantly from that river so passionately desired by both Gaul and Teuton, seeing it, but no longer permitted to touch its banks. Hence, the border keeps to the hills running across the Trouée de Belfort, that all-important pass and gateway from France into Germany or from Germany into France, according as the one or the other people holds the key—the famous stronghold of Belfort. Thence it seeks the ridge of the Vosges mountains follows that line northwards to a point nearly opposite Strasburg where it abandons the hills, crossing the plain land to the north-west, so as to cut Lorraine in half and leaving the great fortress of Metz to the Germans, together with Thionville (Dietrichshofen) and some other frontier places. Then along the Luxemburg and Belgian frontiers, by an arbitrary line, through the Ardennes forest, across the more level lands of Hamault and Flanders, till it meets the sea near Dunkirk, the most northerly town of France. If a straight line be drawn from Strasburg to London, it will almost coincide with this west north-west portion of the frontier. Thence the sea bounds France along the west. The British Channel, then the open Atlantic, lastly the Bay of Biscay wash first the shores of Picardy and the rocky coasts of Normandy and Brittany, then the plains of La Vendée and the Landes, till the peaks of the Pyrenees come in sight, stretching due east and west. A little below Bayonne the frontier which here divides France from Spain, leaves the coast, and mounts the Pyrenean ridge. Along it runs the line till it drops down on the Mediterranean south of Perpignan. Then comes again coast line, past Narbonne and Montpellier along the unhabitable swamps formed by the Rhone, past Marseilles, the great southern port of France, along the sunny coast of Provence to the river Var, the old limit between France and Italy. Thence by Nice, under the bold mountains of western Liguria, till it is suddenly arrested by the rock of Monaco, where an independent Prince, the smallest in Europe, rules over a single promontory, crowned with a little city, which boasts an unrivalled site, a palace, and a gambling-house. Here for a mile or two the line runs away from the Mediterranean, it soon comes down again to the water, and, passing Mentone, ends at the little stream and humble custom-house from which we started.

This line, which bounds the France of to-day, makes of her an irregular hexagon, three of whose sides are sea, and three are land. From the Mediterranean to the point where the line leaves the Vosges is the first side, from the Vosges to the North Sea, the second; from Dunkirk to Ushant the third, from Ushant to Bayonne, the fourth, the Pyrenees, the fifth, and lastly, the Mediterranean coast.

It is a land blessed with innumerable advantages and opportunities. To its ambition and commerce lie open both the Mediterranean and the Atlantic; it is compact and central, it has a delightful variety of climate, all within the temperate zone, its productions answer to the richness of the soil and the friendly temperature, it is watered by many fine rivers, helpful alike for traffic and cultivation, inhabited sufficiently, not too densely, by an intelligent, industrious, thrifty and yet vivacious race. The faults and virtues of the nation have joined to make its annals splendid. Seated in the heart of Europe, touching, or nearly touching on one side or other, England, Germany, Italy, Spain, influencing them by the force of her cleverness, taste, love of approbation, and ambition, France boasts with some show of truth that she leads the ideas of Europe. She has influenced our politics, philosophy, mathematical sciences, literature, habits, and dress. In a century she passed from one absolutism, through many successive stages, to another. Other nations, beginning centuries earlier, have not yet travelled so far. The France of the Franks, of Feudalism, of the Crusades, the France which raised the Papacy to its highest, and then curbed its towering ambition for power, and held it captive at Avignon, the France which was the centre of scholasticism, which first built up a great absolute monarchy as a pattern for Europe first turned the Reformation into a purely political movement first led the Continent along the perilous path of revolution and re-construction and helped to destroy that idol of Europe the Balance of Power —the nation that could do and be all this surely has a right to claim a place among the foremost. But in the deeper movements of mankind, France has not been so prominent. Paris was the Schoolmen's School but the dim gigantic figures we discern therein were Italian German, English, rarely French. The Reformation, in its deeper aspects, took little hold on the French mind. France has often shown herself careless of individual freedom. Her movements, moral, mental, or theological (like the onslaughts of her armies in old times) are rapid fearless, overwhelming but perhaps deficient in endurance. Consequently she is little fitted to achieve the slow work of colonisation. Her people are not venturesome on the high seas, it is at home only that the Frenchman is at home. His race increases slowly and away from France does not increase at all. His influence out of Europe, is not great. There are forces daily growing up outside the European circle, which will one day change the whole balance of the world's politics these feel little or nothing of French influences, and care little for French ideas. But it is not our task to forecast the future, but to chronicle the past and as we look along the pages of French history we may readily grant that the great nation as she loves to style herself, has played a very brilliant part in the drama of national life. We cannot concede all the admiration she vainly claims, or re-echo the words of a French historian<sup>1</sup> who calls his fatherland the Centre of life, heart of Europe, France of Charlemagne, St. Louis, Napoleon! Still, even deducting the great Corsican and greater German from this trio of her heroes, we gladly grant to France high place among the nations and will try to trace her history not from an English point of view but as we might conceive it told by those who live in some neutral city across the sea, far from the disturbing influences which we feel, who can trace the onward course of affairs without prejudice, and with no desire to write on every page the self-conscious comment 'quorum pars magna fui'

<sup>1</sup> La Vallée, Histoire des Français.

France is in the main a level land, save to east and south. The Alps, and, north of them, part of the Jura chain, and, farther north, the Vosges, form the eastern frontier. On the west of the Rhone run the Cevennes, from the sources of the Garonne to near Lyons, whence they stretch in lower ridges in an almost continuous chain, parallel to the Alps and Jura. Detached from them, on the west, rise the volcanic mountains of Auvergne.<sup>1</sup> Far the largest part of France lies to the west of these ranges, and lesser lines of hills, running out nearly at right angles to the westward, divide the great plain of France into three parts, the districts of the Seine, the Loire, and the Garonne. The northernmost of these offshoots looks over the beginnings of that vast plain of Northern Europe, which stretches hence to the Baltic.

Four great streams drain the surface of France. Of these, the first, unlike the others, runs from north to south, and falls into the Mediterranean. Between the Alps and the Cevennes, the Rhone rolls its rapid stream through a land of vines and olives, under the walls of many ancient towns, chief of which is Lyons, second city of France, with her silk manufacture and busy trade, then come Vienne, Orange, Avignon, Arles, with Nîmes and Marseilles in the valley, though not on the river,—all cities of the past, rich in relics of Roman power and dominion. The other rivers run from east to west, and fall into the ocean. The districts drained by them lie parallel to each other, separated by the above-mentioned lower lines of hills. Of these, the southernmost is the Garonne, which drains Gascony and Guyenne, passes by Bordeaux through the Landes and widens to a broad estuary, opening into the Bay of Biscay.

<sup>1</sup> Brittany, a land by itself, lying out of the general system of river valleys and of French characteristics, is hilly and wild, but can scarcely be called a mountain district.

Next comes the Loire, which waters the central plain of France, and runs from the Cevennes past Nevers, Orleans, Blois, Tours, and Nantes, to the south of the Breton coast. North again lies the basin of the Seine which flows through a level country from the Vosges past Troyes, Paris, Rouen till it meets the sea at Havre

The Rhone valley may be divided into two districts, that above and that below Lyons—the valley of the Saone, and that of the Rhone. The former is famous for its wines and its population is in the main Gallic, with a certain fusion of Burgundian or Teutonic blood. The latter is the ancient Roman Province a land of sub-tropical products, the olive, the fig the prickly pear its inhabitants have strongly marked peculiarities of speech, habits, and appearance. They are mostly Iberian, with some Greek and more Roman blood in them. Ethnologically speaking they have little or nothing to do with the French race. On the western slope of France we have to the south, another marked variety of man it is the Euskalian<sup>1</sup> land, peopled by an Iberian race unmingled with other blood untouched by Roman or other civilization. This race dwells in the south-western corner of France, in the angle between the Pyrenees and the sea. Beyond the Garonne northward the true Gallic race begins. The basin of the Loire and Brittany contain the purest Celtic blood in France. This is specially the case with Brittany where Celtic race speech, customs, remain almost unchanged to this day. The rest of France, the France of Paris the corn-growing district, has also a large proportion of Celtic blood but of the Belgic not the Gallic stock<sup>2</sup> modified by a great influx of Germans and Northmen as may specially be seen in Normandy

Thus it is clear that the French are mainly Celtic in origin. If we would appreciate French history aright, we must begin with this branch of mankind. The qualities which so strongly marked that race still mark the Frenchman. Two thousand years ago a Gallic chief stood as victor on the Roman Capitol. From that day to this, whether conqueror or conquered, the Gaul has been the same man; his history is one history. Therefore it is not enough to begin French history with the Capets and the Dukedom of Paris: we must go back to the first picture of the French people, drawn for us by Caesar. In the pages of that maker and narrator of history, we may read passages which might have been written of the Frenchman of to-day<sup>1</sup>. His graphic picture of his Gallic foes and friends—the earliest trustworthy record that we have—is as fresh and as true now as it was when it was first written.

<sup>1</sup> Eusk— Vasc— Gasc— Basque

<sup>2</sup> For the difference between Belgic and Gallic, see below p. 9

<sup>1</sup> Thus in the De Bello Gallico, 6 20, we read, 'Magistratus quae visa sunt occultant, quaeque esse ex usu iudicaverint, multitudinē produnt. De re publica nisi per concilium loqui non conceditur.' Might not this have been penned at Brussels of Imperial France?

BOOK I

CHAPTER I

The Gaul.

GADHEL, or Gael, says an old Irish tradition<sup>1</sup>, was the son of Nem-heidh, whose name appears in such names of places as Nîmes (Nem-ausus), Nantes (Nam netes). But tradition knows nothing of this parent of a race which has written its name on many shores, nor is Gadhel himself more than the shadowy hero the naming father of a widespread family of men.

At the opening of history this race is found dwelling in many lands. The British Isles, Jutland, part of the Baltic shores, Northern Greece, Italy Spain parts of Germany and lastly Gaul, are filled with different branches of the race, under many names,—Belgians, Gauls, or Celts.

There is uncertainty as to the name by which those who dwell in Gaul should be called. Are they Celts or Gauls? Or are these names two forms of one word, and Celt only the Greek way of spelling Gallus<sup>2</sup>. Perhaps we shall do well to use the word Gaul for the race, so far as the inhabitants of ancient Gaul are concerned for the words Celt, Celtic, are more commonly used of the race generally

<sup>1</sup> See Martin, Histoire de France, 1 1 note 1

<sup>2</sup> Κελ-ωελ, Gal-η (cp. Galat-ae Ammianus Marc. 15 9, 3), Gael. Martin derives it from Gallic boliv a forest. It appears also in the Spanish Celt Iberia. Caes. Bell. Gall. 1 1 says, qui ipsorum lingua Celtes nostra Gall appellantur

By the side of these names we find another, whose place must be assigned—that of the Belgæ<sup>1</sup> It is almost certain that long after the Gaul had settled in France, even within historic range, he was attacked by vast hordes of savages, also of Gallic blood, who were thrust westward by some cause or other Passing into Gaul over the Rhine, they filled all the valley of the Seine, and part at least of that of the Loire<sup>2</sup>. In the very South of France, along the Mediterranean, there were two tribes, the Volcæ Tectosages and the Volcæ Arecomici, whose first name is held to indicate that they were of the Belgic stock<sup>3</sup>. These later comers seem to have been a finer race than the Gauls, taller, longer in the head, fiercer in war, but still blood-relations, and no more unlike the Gauls than the Teutonic German is unlike the Swede It is thought by some that the name Belgæ is rather the title of a confederation of warriors than the name of a race of men.

These later comers seem to have thrust the older settlers into the eastern and southern hill-countries. Though many stayed—as is always the case after an invasion of men who need both wives and slaves—and though no marked line can be drawn at which the Belgæ end and Gauls begin, still it is certain that in Auvergne and the Cevennes, in Savoy and in Switzerland, the Gallic type is common, while the longer-headed Belgæ may to this day<sup>4</sup> be distinctly traced as dominant in the rest of France, except in the district below the Garonne, in which dwell a totally different race, shorter, darker, lovers of sober clothing, with less of dash, but more of resisting power, kinsfolk in blood, appearance, and character to the Spaniard across the moun-

<sup>1</sup> The name Armorican (Ar=on, mor=the sea) is local, and peculiar to the Western Celts who peopled Brittany and its neighbourhood It is true that Pliny (Nat Hist 4 17) uses the name Armorica for Aquitaine, but he is probably in error in this statement, as it stands quite alone

<sup>2</sup> The districts in Map II marked Belgæ and Galli show how far they spread

<sup>3</sup> Volc may be the Latin form of Bolg=Belg Caesar says that a part of this tribe was left behind and settled in the Hartz—Bell Gall 6 24.

<sup>4</sup> See M W F Edwards' valuable monograph, Des caracteres physiologiques des races humaines, pp 48, 62

tains. These southerners, Aquitanians,—whose name still lives in Gascony and the word Basque,—clinging to their mountains, and showing something of a fondness for guerilla warfare, carried the principle of clanship to its utmost in the custom of devotions, in which warriors, sometimes by hundreds, attached themselves to a chief, to fight for him, and lay their lives at his feet.

The points of distinction between the Gauls and the Belgæ are worthy of study. For the Gaul we should visit Dauphinè, Burgundy, and Savoy, for the Belgæ, Rheims, or any part of France north of the Seine. The Gaul's head, we shall see, is round, almost bullet-shaped, his forehead of average size rounded receding at the temples. His eyes large and open, nose nearly straight, not very long, rounded at the tip, chin not strong, also rounded at the end—a face blunted like a well worn river pebble. He was spare of habit, counting fatness a disgrace. Of average height, taller than the Latin, shorter than the German, his colouring fair with blue eyes and long yellow hair which, like some later tribes, he coloured red, to add to his attractions.

The Belgæ were taller and generally more like the German. Head longer forehead high and square at the temples nose long slightly curved, pointed, with a rather distended nostril chin sharp and well-defined. In colouring he was like the Gaul. In character more staid, less vivacious and active, more confident in his own powers, less easily disheartened, more thoughtful, less the victim of impressions. Merchants and their luxuries so welcome to the Gaul, found no footing among the Belgæ<sup>1</sup> they retained much of their old savageness. It is not unlikely that they had in them a good deal of Teutonic blood, though this is uncertain.<sup>2</sup>

Again the Gaul seems to have been content with a gross

<sup>1</sup> Minime ad eos mercatores sæpe comment atque ea, quæ ad effeminandos animos pertinent, important.—Caesar Bell. Gall. 1. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Caesar Bell. Gall. 3. 4 says, Reperiebat plerumque Belgas esse ortos a Germanis, Rhennisque antiquitus traductos, &c. But this may only mean that they came originally from the other side of the Rhine, without indicating that they were Germans.

worship of the powers of nature, but the Belgæ apparently introduced the more refined worship of Druidism, with its awful ceremonies and tendencies towards a centralised, almost a national, system of religion. The former was the rudimentary worship of savages, the latter shewed some reflection, which marked the superiority of the incoming over the yielding race.

These differences having been noted, we may now go on to sketch the general characteristics common to both branches of the race, so far as we can make them out across the ages, or read them reflected in the modern Frenchman.

An eminently intelligent race—open to every impression, touched by heroism and greatness, by intellect and genius, a people of rare sensibility, who readily received the civilisation imposed on them by their masters. There was a frank and open disposition, scorning subterfuge: if they lied, it was through vivacity and heedlessness, rather than of set purpose. They knew nothing of strategy and despised it: a fierce onslaught, straightforward, summed up their tactics. They could easily be circumvented. Caesar knew this, and acted on it. They had a vigorous imagination; their poetry was full of feeling, and dealt with nature and man, love, war, and the world unseen, in strange proportions. Ossian's poems may not be what they profess to be, but they have the true Gallic spirit. Merlin, Arthur, Guinevere, and the like, with whom we are now familiar, though retouched by the fashions of a later chivalry, are yet true Celtic figures, embodying the real characteristics of the race. There is too the sense of honour, taking the form of passionate bravery, bitter feuds; they were fearless even against the powers of nature<sup>1</sup>, despised death in battle, even slew themselves, if their chieftain perished, on his funeral cairn. To them, rather than to the Germans, belongs the sense of chivalry. There were the Gawains and the Lancelots, and theirs the 'Round Table,' at which all were equal, and none could quarrel for the higher or lower seat. But with these splendid qualities were weaknesses which undermined their strength. They were fickle, knew when they were beaten their very intelligence working them evil, they could make no long efforts or patient combinations, were ostentatious and vain, greedy of glory apt to boast, very self-conscious and sensitive as to praise and blame, 'unbearable, says Strabo as victors, hopelessly dejected if vanquished. Added to this their genius led them to group themselves in clans, each round its family chieftain and endless were the feuds handed down for generations. This clannish feeling made any true national effort impossible. To this Caesar owed his triumph over Gaul. There was indeed one element of unity Druidism, but the eastern Gaul cared little for it. It hid itself in deep forests, it dealt too little with the realities of life, its powers failed before tribe-differences and by Caesar's time the Druid was less powerful in Gaul than the knight, as the Roman calls him the representative of aristocratic soldier life. We should naturally expect such a race to be eloquent and in fact we find that Gaul provided even Rome herself with teachers of rhetoric. The love of speech is innate in the Celtic race. Their sensibility imaginativeness, quickness, all joined to give them the true genius of France, the genius for oratory<sup>1</sup>. As in speech, so in appearance the Gaul loved a light and picturesque costume. His was the genius for display in every sense. Splendid apparel<sup>2</sup> fine horses and arms were dear to him. His usual dress was a sleeved shirt, with a rich embroidered overcoat of colours, and underneath this were breeches or trows (the words are Celtic) reaching to the foot. The wealthier sort wore collars, bracelets, rings, of gold silver also and coral were set much store by, altogether a Gallic gentleman was a splendid sight. Such an one was Luern, described by Poseidonius who drove full-dress through the crowd of his Arvernian subjects, scattering gold and silver as he went; a brilliant specimen of the ostentatious, praise-loving Gallic character. But when he went forth to war, the hero was still more splendidly barbaric. In earlier times he fought stripped, but finding this neither convenient nor brilliant, he devised for himself a splendid fighting-dress. He adopted the Latin body-armour, and combined with it his own peculiar notions as to costume. A metal helmet crowned with horns of ox or stag, or bearing, as a crest, some dragon or monster, above which waved tall plumes, raised his stature to superhuman dimensions. On his buckler was emblazoned some figure or symbol, origin of the coat of arms (just as his head-gear was the origin of the more modern crest), beneath it, a Roman cuirass, girt at his side was a long two-handed sword, a great 'cavalbur,' of which the chain of copper or iron clanked on his breast: a rich embroidered belt and golden bracelets completed his costume<sup>1</sup>. But the short thrusting sword of the Roman, in the iron hand of that strong-willed race, proved too much for all this bravery. The Latin soldier knew that, if he could but hold out against the first onset, the day was won, and in this faith he fought and conquered.

<sup>1</sup> The Celts fear not even the ocean-waves.—Aelian, Var. Hist. 12 23, and Aristot. Eth. Eud. 3 1.

<sup>1</sup> The more singular, as we know that the Gaul prided himself on an abrupt address and harsh guttural speech. Diod. Sic. 5 31 (p. 213).

<sup>2</sup> Witness the brilliant tartans, used as distinctive dresses by the clans of northern Scotland.

Another figure must be dressed up by us—that of the warrior's rival, the mysterious Druid. We all know the circles of stone, silent memorials of the faith of those who dwelt here and in Western France. They are open-air temples, centres of Druid-worship. No image or work of art or beauty is there. The circle may mean eternity, the open heavens immensity, the two together may symbolise the unlimited in time and space. Here dwelt Hesus, 'the Terrible,' 'the Unknown'. In its early purity, Druidism knew no bodily form or qualities attributed to this mysterious being. To him the oak was sacred, his the deep forests, in whose recesses the mistletoe was cut with awful ceremony. The territory of the Carnutes<sup>2</sup>, nearly the very centre of Gallic France, was also the centre of Gallic worship.

<sup>1</sup> Diod Sic 5 30 (p 213)

<sup>2</sup> Who gave its later name to Autricum, the modern Chartres

Thither the Druids went yearly, and under primeval forests performed their most sacred rights. It is probable that, before the historic age each different confederation of Gaul, perhaps even each tribe, had its own centre of worship. Alesia, afterwards the scene of the last struggle of Vercingetorix against Caesar, was the centre-point for the older Gauls and it seems probable that all those ancient towns, which were named Medio-lann<sup>1</sup> were centres of Druid worship. But at an early time the Druids had concentrated all on a point near Chartres (Antricum). Here they held solemn assemblies, at which the great confederations of Gallic blood were represented. Justice was done, and religious rites performed. Excommunication was launched against any turbulent chief who disregarded the decrees of the assembly. At their highest point of power the Druids seemed to have ruled over all Gauls—the chiefs for all their fierceness and bravery, bowed for a time before these mysterious possessors of unearthly powers.

These Druids, whose religion and philosophy have perhaps been overrated of late years were certainly far above the rest of the race in intelligence and knowledge. They were sole depositories of such religion and learning as existed—they were the poets also and the teachers of a warlike and imaginative race, who sang the prowess of their ancestors, and roused their sons to like deeds. Thus they were not only the clergy, but the clerks. They were not a class marked off for sacred life and religious functions—not an hereditary caste, like the priest-hoods of India, Egypt, or of the Jews, nor again mixed up with civil life like the priests and augurs of Greece or Rome who merged the priestly office in the general duties of society. They held a position peculiar to themselves, though not altogether unlike that of the clergy in the earlier middle ages. They trained the Gallic youth in colleges by teaching them to learn by heart the verses which contained their philosophy

<sup>1</sup> Medio-lann is middle-town, —mead = middle, and lann = enclosure walled place, city. There was one among the Santones, one among the Eborovices, near the Seine, a third in the Aeduan territory as well as the great Milan of Lombardy

This exclusive possession of education may be reckoned among their chief sources of power. They paid no tribute, nor service of war, they administered justice, they communed with another world, without withdrawing themselves from this. Their dreadful excommunications struck terror into every heart, and enabled them to cope with the fierce warriors among whom they moved. They had also power to offer up, on great occasions, even human sacrifices.

In their later time at least the Druids were divided into a graduated hierarchy, consisting of three orders—the Ouadd, or Ovate<sup>1</sup>, the Bard; and the Druid, rightly so called.

Of these, the Ouadd held the lowest grade, that of the sacrificing priest. He studied the facts of nature, and acted as augur and medicine-man. But his work was all practical and in detail. He might slay the victim, and note its last agonies, but he could not rise to heights of inspiration, or study the causes of things.

The next grade is that of the Bard, the inspired and sacred prophet of his race. The divine power entered into him, though he was not permitted to hold communion with it. Herein lay his superiority over the Ouadd, his inferiority to the Druid. For the Ouadd had no inspiration, while the Druid held converse with the Divine. The Bard with his harp sat in chieftains' halls, pouring forth God-inspired strains, singing of heroes, or the wisdom of great men of old. His it was to rouse to war, or still the passions of the people. He was the historian, the poet, the teacher of a people greedy of glory. He was the link between Druid and chieftain. It was an evil day for Druidism, and a convincing proof of degeneracy in Gaul, when the Bard became the mere flatterer and parasite of the great.

But the crown of the edifice was the Druid<sup>2</sup> himself; awful, seldom seen, a religious mystic and a philosopher, he dispensed wisdom from the depth of some sacred wood, under the oaks, or from some grotto where darkness added solemnity to his person and his words. When he appeared in the outer world, it must be on some occasion worthy of him. Without his awful sanction no sacrifice could be done. The Ovadd or sacrificing priest did not dare to lift his hand till he vouchsafed his presence. At times, when the spirit was on him he sang like the Bard, of things mystical, and thus his order embraced within itself both the others. He came forth to cut, at due time and with much solemnity, the golden bough, the sacred mistletoe of the oak. But the chief part of his life passed in strict seclusion. He was supposed to commune with the unseen world, to learn the will of God, and to act as mediator. He contemplated the mysteries of nature and uttered dark sayings as to the destinies of man the life to come, the Deity himself.

<sup>1</sup> A name probably connected with 'vates'. Ammianus Marcellinus (159 8) writes the word Euhages, perhaps connecting it with εὐαγής, holy.

<sup>2</sup> Druid is the Gallic form, meaning the oak. Zeuss, in his Grammatica Celtica, gives us the Welsh derwy, the oak, whence derwydd, a Druid.

Over the whole presided the Arch-Druid, as he is sometimes called, whose authority was supreme over all the grades. He was elected by the votes of the Druids alone<sup>1</sup>

The Druid lore was not committed to writing till a later date and consequently whoever aspired to join the priestly ranks was obliged to learn the sacred verses off by heart, spending sometimes as long as twenty years at the task. These poems seem to have shadowed forth the doctrines of God as a First Cause, and of the immortality of the soul and its transmigration according to that fine verse of the Latin poet<sup>2</sup> who tells us they regarded death as the middle point of a long life. To this they added speculations as to nature, its origin and powers. This was their inner philosophy. All outward nature they held to be symbolical of this inner world, and they appear to have given special honour to the qualities of the circle. All this, no doubt, was a later development of the religious sense among them. The early Druidism cannot lay claim to more philosophy than is contained in that sense of wonder and curiosity which the Gauls certainly had in common with other wild races of men.

<sup>1</sup> Caesar Bell. Gall. 6 13.

<sup>2</sup> Lucan, Phars. 1 457. The whole passage deserves study

And, indeed, the cruel human sacrifices, the butcheries of men, which characterised Druidism in its full power, destroy any illusion as to the ennobling character of the religion. It was, at best, barbaric, in spite of all its striking features

These were the main elements of Gallic society:—the Chieftain,—an elected not hereditary head over his clan,—with his followers, the ‘Knights’ and freemen, and, at his side, the Priest-Philosopher. beneath these lay the usual herd of slaves. There seems to have been a time when the whole nation was subject to the Druids, who formed a kind of aristocracy of priests, with a lay-democracy, headed by its strongest and most popular members. In time this national unity (if indeed it ever really was such) perished, the chieftains became almost independent sovereigns, each with his own aims and feuds, an easy prey for the Roman aggressor.

But we must not regard the Gaul of this time as a civilised member of a fixed body politic. The warrior-chief was almost a savage, the Druid-philosopher very like an impostor. Warrior and priest had few arts of peace, and had made little approach towards civilisation. Nor can we describe the steps by which they passed out of barbarism<sup>1</sup>. It must suffice us to have drawn the Gaul as he was long before his real history begins. We may imagine him living in open villages, in clearings of his forests, or beside the rivers, in circular wattled huts, each hut sheltered by a large roof, each family apart. Sometimes the Gauls built themselves fortified towns, surrounded with rough earthworks, traces of which still remain<sup>2</sup>; sometimes they hid themselves in retreats of wood or marsh, protected by palisades and ditches, or in strong natural positions, hill-tops, like Alesia or Gergovia. There they dwelt, by their clans, a social, community-loving race for while the German was the man of independent life, and the Italian the man of cities, the Gaul was the man of tribal life, in clans whose bond was supposed to be that of blood.

<sup>1</sup> See M. Edwards' admirable pamphlet, quoted above

<sup>2</sup> There is one not far from Dieppe

or from some grotto, where dimness added solemnity to his person and his words. When he appeared in the outer world, it must be on some occasion worthy of him. Without his awful sanction no sacrifice could be done. The Ouadd or sacrificing priest did not dare to lift his hand till he vouchsafed his presence. At times, when the spirit was on him, he sang like the Bard, of things mystical and thus his order embraced within itself both the others. He came forth to cut, at due time and with much solemnity the golden bough, the sacred mistletoe of the oak. But the chief part of his life passed in strict seclusion. He was supposed to commune with the unseen world, to learn the will of God, and to act as mediator. He contemplated the mysteries of nature, and uttered dark sayings as to the destinies of man, the life to come, the Deity himself.

Over the whole presided the Arch Druid, as he is sometimes called, whose authority was supreme over all the grades. He was elected by the votes of the Druids alone<sup>1</sup>.

The Druid lore was not committed to writing till a later date and consequently whoever aspired to join the priestly ranks was obliged to learn the sacred verses off by heart, spending sometimes as long as twenty years at the task. These poems seem to have shadowed forth the doctrines of God as a First Cause and of the immortality of the soul and its transmigration, according to that fine verse of the Latin poet<sup>2</sup> who tells us they regarded death as 'the middle point of a long life. To this they added speculations as to nature its origin and powers. This was their inner philosophy. All outward nature they held to be symbolical of this inner world and they appear to have given special honour to the qualities of the circle. All this, no doubt, was a later development of the religious sense among them. The early Druidism cannot lay claim to more philosophy than is contained in that sense of wonder and curiosity which the Gauls certainly had in common with other wild races of men.

<sup>1</sup> Caesar Bell. Gall. 6. 13.

<sup>2</sup> Lucan, Phars. 1. 457. The whole passage deserves study.

And, indeed, the cruel human sacrifices, the butcheries of men, which characterised Druidism in its full power, destroy any illusion as to the ennobling character of the religion. It was, at best, barbaric, in spite of all its striking features.

These were the main elements of Gallic society:—the Chieftain,—an elected not hereditary head over his clan,—with his followers, the ‘Knights’ and freemen, and, at his side, the Priest-Philosopher beneath these lay the usual herd of slaves. There seems to have been a time when the whole nation was subject to the Druids, who formed a kind of aristocracy of priests, with a lay-democracy, headed by its strongest and most popular members. In time this national unity (if indeed it ever really was such) perished, the chieftains became almost independent sovereigns, each with his own aims and feuds, an easy prey for the Roman aggressor.

But we must not regard the Gaul of this time as a civilised member of a fixed body politic. The warrior-chief was almost a savage, the Druid-philosopher very like an impostor. Warrior and priest had few arts of peace, and had made little approach towards civilisation. Nor can we describe the steps by which they passed out of barbarism<sup>1</sup>. It must suffice us to have drawn the Gaul as he was long before his real history begins. We may imagine him living in open villages, in clearings of his forests, or beside the rivers, in circular wattled huts, each hut sheltered by a large roof, each family apart. Sometimes the Gauls built themselves fortified towns, surrounded with rough earthworks, traces of which still remain<sup>2</sup>, sometimes they hid themselves in retreats of wood or marsh, protected by palisades and ditches, or in strong natural positions, hill-tops, like Alesia or Gergovia. There they dwelt, by their clans; a social, community-loving race for while the German was the man of independent life, and the Italian the man of cities, the Gaul was the man of tribal life, in clans whose bond was supposed to be that of blood.

<sup>1</sup> See M. Edwards' admirable pamphlet, quoted above

<sup>2</sup> There is one not far from Dieppe

The family usages of the Gaul are obscure. The marriage tie does not seem to have been much honoured by the men the women were remarkable for high virtues writers who blame the men most yet praise the women. They had little or no polygamy, nor is it clear that Caesar was right in saying that the wife became the husband's chattel. The clan, thus composed of rather indistinct families, was under one chieftain, selected by them. He was not absolute, but must listen to the ancients, and obey the armed council of his tribe. There appear to have been two classes of men enjoying freedom the 'high man, or horseman, and the simple freeman. One discerns, at least at first, no barrier between them the high men' were a pure aristocracy of merit, that is, of prowess. Under these were first, degraded members of the tribe, and then, at the bottom of the social scale, the slaves of the sword.

There exist vivid descriptions of their splendour and squalor, of excess of revelry, and want but these belong to a later time the period of decay, which must next occupy our attention.

CHAPTER II.

Gaul before the time of Caesar.

'It would seem,' says Martin, 'as though the Gauls could neither live apart nor together<sup>1</sup>.' They clung to one another in clans, while each clan was in ceaseless commotion, personal quarrels within, clan-rivalries without. Even Druidism could not cure this evil, which at last laid Gaul prostrate at the conqueror's feet. Druidism, in course of time, fell from its pre-eminence. The chieftains wrested the power from the Druids' hands<sup>2</sup>, and established a despotic rule over the clans, with (for a time at least) hereditary succession. The Druids proper, not being of this world, hermits who neither lived the village life, nor attached themselves to the tribe, were powerless against these representatives of a more active existence. The other sacred orders, the Bard and the Ouadd, sank into contempt. The Ouadd became his chief's domestic chaplain; the Bard the humble ornament of his feast. The Ouadd did sacrifice, as it were, in his master's interest, he went with him to war, or gave religious sanction to his despotism at home. such was his clerical life and duty. The Bard, at the chief's table, struck his harp and sang his master's deeds of war, his open hand, his ancestry. He was repaid in cash or in victuals<sup>3</sup>. Poseidonius, a philosopher of Caesar's day, tells us the following tale of

<sup>1</sup> Martin, Histoire des Français, tom 1 p 34

<sup>2</sup> See Amédée Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois, tom 4. ch. 1.

<sup>3</sup> Athenaeus, Deipnos, Bk 6 p 246 D (ed Casaubon)

Luern, a Gallic 'king'. He gave a feast, and bade his bard be there. By some mishap, he did not come in time, when he arrived, Luern was mounting his chariot to go forth in state. The bard, to do the best he could, girt up his robe, struck on his harp a sad chord, and as he ran sang his master's praises, and bewailed his own ill-luck in being too late for the feast. The chief flung to the dusty breathless singer a purse of gold. He picked it up, struck a joyful note, and now in jubilant strains sang that the honoured ground over which his master passed blossomed with flowers of gold. So they moved on Luern in his glory the bard in the heat and dust by his side<sup>1</sup>.

Meanwhile wealth increased villages grew into towns, and the despot chiefs had to give way. Thus in 121 B.C. the Arvernians had a king but in 60 B.C. they were ruled by a magistracy, who actually condemned a man to death for grasping at kingly power. This change, though in itself probably a change for the better, lessened the power of resistance. Caesar's best opponents were not councils of magistrates, but single heroes, who rose above the tribal feuds, and held a sort of dictatorial power.

From the time of the decline of the Druids foreign expeditions had ceased the Gaul was either struggling against his brethren or lapped in peaceful even luxurious ease. Wealth and poverty increased the passion for display grew and with it the love of pleasure and self-indulgence the low toned moral sense of the Gaul and his great vivacity laid him open to many degrading influences. He lost barbaric virtues, and took up the vices of civilised life. No high ideal of duty or national existence came in to save him. He began to traffic, sent his goods through Massilia to Rome his woollen robes, Sequanian hams, and the like, and bartered them for casks of wine and other luxuries. Merchants passed through the land corrupting all they touched. They were set down at the feast, and bidden to tell their traveller's tales to the Gaul, who was never weary of hearing some new thing. They taught the natives to look up with awe to the splendour and vices of Rome. The Gaul was a ready scholar. He began at once to assimilate himself to the Imperial race, borrowed their ideas and habits, and at last their speech. Thus the process began; nor has it ever ceased since. The influence of Latin institutions and ideas has ever been supreme in France

<sup>1</sup> Told by Athenæus, Deipnos. Bk. 4. p. 157 E (ed. Casson).

At first the Gaul caught only the love of outward splendour. He must be moulded by the great conqueror's hammer before he could accept that Law and Order which it was the mission of Rome to preach in all the Western world.

Thus then, at this early time, Gaul began her education in the world. She began it in the eager seeking for national splendour and enjoyment. She invented 'German silver,' to make a greater show at less expense, she found out bright dyes, forged armour for parade, not for battle, she cured unrivalled hams, her cheeses, prepared in her highlands, sold well in Italy, her beer was good, she invented yeast, employed sometimes to make bread, and sometimes to improve the complexion, she grew fine wines, and invented wooden casks to keep them in. The old honourable equality of neither wealth nor poverty departed. Debt and slavery and wealth, squalid and splendid vices came in. Property was insecure, but all tended to strengthen the strong, to enrich the rich. Strongholds were built, to defend not the nation, but its property. In Caesar's day the state of Gallic society was very bad. 'In all Gaul,' says he, 'there are but two classes of men who are of honour and account, for the common folk are reckoned as but little better than slaves, dare nothing of themselves, have no voice in council. Most of them' (the old freemen of Gaul) 'when overwhelmed with debt or taxation, or with gross injustice done them by the stronger, make themselves slaves to the nobles. The two classes left are Druids and Knights<sup>1</sup>' Of these the 'Knights,' sole remnant of the original chivalry of Gaul, were still powerful. The Druids were a picturesque relic of the past.

This was the enfeebled and degraded society

<sup>1</sup> Caesar, Bell

summoned to resist the solid practical Roman, led by the chief captain of ancient history

It is time for us to trace the early relations between the two races. About 388 B.C. a Gallic host under its 'Brenos, or Chief took and sacked Rome, in spite of Camillus. For half a century the Senonian Gauls threatened the feeble little republic, and Rome could barely make head against them. In 349 B.C. there is a Gallic war going on in the Pomptine district. Early in the next century the Senonians support the Etruscans against Rome in 283 B.C. they meet with their first great check from the Consul Dolabella. In the subjugation of Gallia Senonensis (Singaglia and Rimini) we find proof that the tide has turned. After a half century of quiet, the struggle recommenced. Rome ever advanced, added post to post, stretching towards the white barriers of the Alps. But in 218 B.C. came a new enemy Hannibal, as he passed through Gaul, found the natives generally eager to count him their champion, they helped him forwards, they swelled his ranks. Through Gallic help alone could his grand schemes succeed, their inability to follow up and sustain a great movement was one chief cause of his failure in the end.

While Hannibal was ascending the Rhone valley a Roman army under Scipio landed at Massilia. For the first time a Roman soldier set foot in Gaul. Massilia, rival of Carthage, favoured the Roman side and through her interested action the Romans gained their first foothold. Massilia had been founded by Phocæan settlers about six hundred years before Christ. It was the first foreign settlement on Gallic soil, and for four hundred years we cannot trace its influence on Gallic history. The traveller, when he visits the southern doorway of France looks with interest at a city which has now stood nearly 2500 years, and at the critical moment opened its gates to the Roman invader who came to lay the foundations of Modern France.

Hannibal failed but Rome did not fully subdue North Italy till 191 B.C. Then the Cisalpine Gaul, with national docility soon took Roman dress and habits, and his land became the 'Gallia Togata' of Roman history. Massilia became the second seaport city of the Mediterranean, Alexandria alone surpassing her. In 154 B C, much vexed by her old Ligurian neighbours and foes, she called in the Romans to help her. They came gladly. Opimius penetrated into Celto-Liguria, subdued the Oxybi and Deceates, who dwelt near the Var, just above Antipolis (Antibes), and handed them over to Massilia. Thirty years later the Salves were conquered, and the whole seaboard from Var to Rhone was given to the Massiliots, while Rome took the interior, and Caius Sextius, proconsul, founded the first Roman city in Gaul, (122 B C.) and called it by his name, the Aquae Sextiae (Aix in Provence), a city standing in a lovely valley, blest with hot and cold springs, and girt in with tree-clad mountains. Thus began the Roman occupation, which soon spread northwards. The Cavares, a race dwelling round Arausio (Orange), and the Vocontii submitted. The Romans touched the Isara. Here they met a brave and powerful tribe, the Allobrogi, who dwelt in the land between Vienne and Geneva. But here too were those feuds which were ever so helpful to them. The Arverni and Aedui led the two parties of eastern Gaul. The latter were at war with the Allobrogi, who accordingly were in alliance with the Arverni. Massilia stepped in and arranged terms between the Aedui and Rome. They became 'the friends of Rome,' and the storm of war burst on their Gallic rivals. Bituit<sup>1</sup>, head of the Arvernian league, was beaten in battle by Domitius and Quintus Fabius Maximus. It is said that he lost 120,000 men. Bituit himself, decoyed by Domitius to a conference, learnt as a captive the 'more than Punic perfidy' of Rome. He was sent to Rome, where his painted armour, silver chariot, and strange looks made a show for the sovereign people. The Romans treated the Arverni well, but, finding it convenient, confiscated the lands of the Allobrogi. The whole Rhone-valley, on its eastern side, from Geneva to the mouth, except the Massiliot territory, became a province, Gallia Braccata, that is, the Gaul whose people wore the native 'brecks as opposed to Gallia Togata, in which they had donned the Roman toga. The God Terminus moved forward along the western coast, as far as to the Pyrenees, and inland to the Cevennes. In 118 B.C. a new capital was founded for the province, indicating its changed dimensions, at Narbo Martius (Narbonne), famous as the first Gallic municipium or city enjoying all rights of Roman citizenship except the suffrage. Thus there arose on the seaboard a proud and famous city with a station for the fleet, good harbourage, and proconsular residence. From that day the political splendour of Marseilles waned.

<sup>1</sup> Son of that Luern who has been already .

The same Domitius<sup>1</sup> also built the great highway the via Domitia, along the Ligurian Alps it was the first great Corniche road. Colonies multiplied throughout the Province cities sprang up with Roman forms and different degrees of Roman citizenship destined to bear fruit long afterwards in the influence of town life over the southern districts of France.

Not long after this time a terrible earthquake in Northern Europe is said to have set the Cimbrians of Jutland and the Teutons of North Germany moving southwards. They streamed on till they reached Gaul they overthrew the legions sent to resist them. In 107 B.C. they reached the west bank of the Rhone. The Volcae Tectosages, impatient of their Roman neighbours, seized Tolosa (Toulouse) and joined the Gallo-Teutonic alliance. Caepio retook Tolosa, and carried off all the vast treasures he found in the temple of Belen and elsewhere among which were said to be the spoils of the temple of Delphi sacked long before by the Gauls. But as Caepio withdrew he was overtaken on the Rhone his army utterly destroyed, his treasure lost<sup>2</sup>.

Marinus remained to make head against the Gallo Teutons

<sup>1</sup> Surnamed Ahenobarbus, bronze-bearded.

<sup>2</sup> A Latin proverb as to accursed gains long commemorated this mishap. Habet aurum Tolosanum was said of any one whose wealth—the wealth so often of rapine and extortion—seemed to carry a curse with it.—Aulus Gellius, 3. 9.

While they, careless of the worth of time, delayed, he drew his forces together, established himself near Arelatæ (Arles), cut a deep canal (the Fossa Mariana<sup>1</sup>) from Arles through the district of the Crau<sup>2</sup> to the sea. The barbarians crossed the Rhone, and offered battle, which Marius refused. As they passed on towards Aquæ Sextiæ they shouted into his camp 'What messages for your wives!' But the Romans held their peace. When, however, the great host was past, Marius broke up and followed. In the hills not far from Aix (102 B.C.) he forced them to fight one of the world's decisive battles. Had he failed, they would have penetrated into Italy, and joined the Cimbrians, descending from the Tyrol, and who knows what might have been the end? As it was, Marius defeated them with horrible carnage; and afterwards, on the other side of the Alps, fell on the Cimbrians and crushed them also.

Not long after this, in 100 B.C., Caesar, in more than one way the great successor of Marius, was born.

The social and civil wars of Rome brought great trouble on the Province. But another danger impended: about 62 B.C. a mixed horde of Germans, under Arminius, were called in by the Sequanians, for they wished to use them as a counterpoise to the Aeduans<sup>3</sup>, who, thanks to Roman friendship, lorded it over the other tribes, shutting off from the Sequanians the commerce of the Saone, and that of the Loire from the Arvernians. The combined Gauls and Germans fell on the Aeduans, defeated them, and drove them to submission. Divitiacus the Druid alone refused to yield. He hastened to Rome and prayed the Senate to help his people. Rome was ready enough, but for a time lacked the power, and meanwhile the Germans kept pouring in through this new opening into eastern Gaul.

<sup>1</sup> This canal has given its name to the village of Foz, situated at its mouth. The French government has proposed to reopen it, so as to avoid the dangerous navigation of the Rhone mouths.

<sup>2</sup> The Crau is a strange flat district below Arles, covered thickly with rounded pebbles. Its name is Celtic. Crau is the Celtic kraeg, whence our 'crag,' and the Alpes Craiæ or Graiæ.

<sup>3</sup> The Aeduans were much under Druid influences, and kept up the old elective headship, the Sequanians had a hereditary succession.

Through this same opening, where the land drops between the Jura and the Vosges, one of the most vulnerable portions of the frontier, poured in later days the Allemans, the Huns, the Burgundians, and in modern times the Allies on their way to Paris in 1814. By 58 B.C. Arlovistus could boast that Germany, like Rome, had her province in Gaul. Gaul at this time leant on three external powers. The older tribes of the south-east depended on Roman civilisation, the Gauls, all the central and western tribes, and especially the Armoricans, leant upon Britain while the purer Belgae of the north, proud of their more barbarous state, drew towards Germany. The Nervians and Trevirans, a little later, affected a German origin, though they were really Gallic. The Aquitanians, after their natural bent, stood aloof, on the defensive. Lastly the Helvetians, a Gallic race dwelling in Switzerland, retained their warlike habits and were straitened for room. Their chieftain Orgetorix, seeing that his country lay between Germans and Romans, and that if Gaul fell it must also fall, conceived the bold plan of a great Gallic confederation, headed by the Helvetians, who to be in a more central position, should emigrate to the shores of the ocean, in the territory of the Santones. There, under one chief, they should direct and reinspire the whole Gallic race. But Orgetorix fell a victim to his plan. The Helvetian chieftains, jealous of his genius, called him to judgment. He appeared, with all his clan, his friends, his debtors above ten thousand men in arms, behind him. The chiefs were fain to let him march away free. But the opposition to him was too strong, and the great Helvetian to withdraw from among them the cause of civil war slew himself in the year 59 B.C.

His emigration plan did not perish with him. The Helvetians made ready to move. Then Rome heard of it, and sent forth her greatest general to resist it. Caesar was made Proconsul of Gaul first for five years, from 58 to 54 B.C., and afterwards his command was prolonged for five years more, from 53 to 49 B.C.

GAUL,
 ABOUT THE YEAR 60 B C

CHAPTER III.

Caesar in Gaul B.C. 58-50.

THE social and civil wars did three things for Rome. They destroyed the old breed of citizens, they taught men to regard the army as the only remaining power; and they paved the way for Caesar

Caesar saw clearly the position he was in. He was the darling of the people, the deadly foe of the aristocracy. The people thought him the successor of Marius, his kinsman. But the Senatorial aristocracy was still strong, and there was only one power that could overcome it—the army. He therefore shaped his course towards the possession of that power. In 60 B.C. he formed a secret agreement with Pompey and Crassus, to divide equally the authority at Rome. The Triumvirate was hollow, but it sufficed for Caesar's aims. He had need to prove himself a great soldier, this could only be done at a distance from Rome, and it was necessary for him to leave his rear, as it were, defended, by putting Rome into friendly hands. Pompey and Crassus were, for the time, willing to remain at home, and Caesar, who already had fought with credit in Spain, got for himself the legions destined for the West. In B.C. 59 the people voted him Illyricum and Cisalpine Gaul as his provinces, with three legions, for five years, and the Senate, thinking to remove him farther from Rome, added Transalpine Gaul as well, with an additional legion.

In the spring of 58 B.C. he set forth. He knew of the movement going on in the high Alps, and went straight to meet it. Eight days after he left Rome he was at Geneva. The Helvetians had two lines of exit, one through the Sequanian land, the other by Geneva and the Rhone. They first tried the Sequanian line but Caesar when Consul in 59 B.C. had secured the Sequanians in the interest of Rome, and the Helvetians were refused a passage. They then turned towards Geneva, but here Caesar headed them, breaking down the Rhone bridge. Their ambassadors came, asking for peaceful passage through the province he replied that he must take a few days to reflect on their demand. His reflections took the shape of earthworks along the Rhone for he was specially great as a spade-soldier he gathered troops (for in his haste he had outrun his army) and when the Helvetians came for his reply he refused them passage and was able to enforce his refusal. Again they turned towards the other route by help of the Aeduan Dumnonx they got leave and safely crossed the Jura. But the Aeduan resisted them at the passage of the Arar (Saone), and though their opposition was but slight (for there were among them the usual factions), they wasted precious time, and enabled Caesar to hasten into Italy to gather five legions, and to return and catch the Helvetian rear in the act of crossing the Saone. These he fell on and defeated then passed the river and followed them. At Bibracte (Autun) they faced round and fought. After a tough struggle they were utterly routed, and driven northward into the Lingonian country where Caesar again came up with them and reduced them to submission. The Bolani were permitted to settle in Gaul, in consideration of their bravery the rest returned to their old homes, and are the ancestors of the French-speaking Swiss. Not a third of their numbers recrossed the Jura.

Arlovistus and his Germans, fairly settled in the northern Sequanian lands ought in prudence to have joined the Helvetians. But they stood by awaiting their time. It soon came Caesar who hitherto had flattered the German chieftain sent him a message that he must stop the flow of Teutons into Gaul, and give up the Aeduan he held as hostages. The proud German defied Caesar and Rome,—little knowing what he did. He thought he had all Germany at his back; it was rumoured that the hundred Suevian cantons were crossing the Rhine into the lands of the Trevirans to help him. But Caesar gave them no time. He marched on Vesontio (Besançon), the capital of the Sequanians, a strong position, key of the whole campaign, got there before Ariovistus, and made it his headquarters. His men began to show signs of fear. The enemy was new and fierce. all counted the Teuton as far more terrible than the Gaul. But Caesar could use words as well as spades or swords. He called his legions together, and said, ‘Abandon me, if you will, you others—but give me my tenth legion—the tenth does not desert; with it alone I will conquer’ He touched the right chord, the soldiers were his tools from that moment, and his way to Empire lay open. He at once attacked the Teuton camp, forced it after a savage fight, and massacred its defenders. The Germans were thrust back on the Rhine, and perished almost to a man. Ariovistus crossed the river and died in Germany. The Suevians, hearing of the disaster, withdrew with all speed, and with no small loss.

Thus Caesar crushed two formidable foes in one year. The Aeduans recovered their threatened supremacy, and Caesar was welcomed as a deliverer. Next year (57 BC) the Belgae of northern Gaul were in motion. Caesar, who had gone into Cisalpine Gaul<sup>1</sup>, returned promptly to his army, which lay in winter-quarters in Sequania. He had already secured the friendship of the Trevirans and Remi, thanks to the ceaseless tribal jealousies. The Trevirans had fallen under his influence when pressed by the Suevian Germans, and the Remi hoped, by the favour of Rome, to hold the first place in the northern confederacy, as the Aeduans did in the Eastern. They opened the gates of their capital Durocortorum (Rheims) to the Romans, and the Belgae, to punish them, marched into their country. But the Aeduans pushed on as far as to the borders of the Bellovaci (Beauvais), in the Roman interest, and the Belgae broke up to defend their threatened homes. Caesar followed them, took Noviodunum (Soissons) and reduced at once the Suessones and Bellovaci. The Nervians, a warlike tribe, proved themselves more worthy foes. They assaulted the Roman camp with so much fury that had not Caesar united the skill of a general with the daring of a common soldier, all had been lost. It was his day of greatest peril. The Nervians scorned to yield out of sixty thousand fighting men, scarcely five hundred remained unwounded. Caesar showed wisdom and generosity he guaranteed to the wreck of the tribe its lands and goods. Then he attacked the Aduatici in the Ardennes, and enslaved the whole tribe. In the spring of 56 B.C. Armorica was overrun, and Caesar destroyed the fleet of the Veneti, who had headed a new league against Rome, while Sabinus routed their land forces. The younger Crassus overcame the Aquitanians, and the whole circuit was complete. From Provence, by Helvetia, Sequania, the Belgic tribes, the Veneti in Armorica, the Loire, and Aquitania, and so round to Provence again;—this was the triumphant course of the legions. The Morini and Menapii, people of marsh and woodland, in the north-eastern corner of Gaul, hard by the Batavian island, alone stood out unsubdued.

<sup>1</sup> To watch over the rest of his province, and his interests at home — ἐνταῦθα καθήμενος ἐδημαγωγεί, says Plutarch, in his Life of Caesar, p 717.

In 55 B.C., after a raid into Germany he overcame the Morini. And lastly he determined to sever the connection between Gaul and Britain, the home of Gallic traditions and faith. Hence his British expeditions that year and the next. It is doubtful whether he gained much—some glory to himself, but little benefit to Rome. He brought back from his second expedition slaves and a few pearls, and the nominal submission of Cassivelaun. Britain remained as she was the tribute imposed on Cassivelaun was never paid and meanwhile the Gallic tribes had time to breathe and organise a great revolt against their stern master. And this time the Aeduians Rome's old allies, feeling that Caesar in attacking the sacred island was smiting Druidism to the heart, threw off their allegiance and joined the national movement. Caesar speaks of this rising in such a tone as conquerors are ever apt to use. The love of liberty, the spirit of patriotism, are branded as the fickleness of a race which ought to know itself beaten and be quiet. A subject race, when it tries to throw off the yoke, is always counted traitorous by its masters. The Gauls seemed to Caesar to be unreasonable and troublesome. The expedition into Britain, which should have been lucrative and dazzling, and the last act of a series of splendid campaigns, proved to be but the beginning of new dangers. The triumph was delayed, who could say how long? and the fortunes of war, proverbially fickle, might change. No new glory could be won, and all as yet gathered might be lost. Returning from Britain he had met the Gallic deputies at Samarobriua (Amiens), and finding all tranquil, had put his troops into winter-quarters along the north coast and the Meuse. He was starting for Italy, when the sound of an explosion in the territory of the Carnutes, the centre of Druid faith, fell on his ear. The Gaul, too impatient by nature to wait, had broken out too soon. The Eburones rose, and destroyed Sabinus' army. Ambiorix, their victorious chief, called on his countrymen. The Nervians and Aduaticans replied. All northern Gaul was moved. Cicero, the orator's brother, who was wintering in the Nervian country, was beleaguered by them; but Caesar, with incredible speed and boldness, saved him, and saved himself. Now all Gaul began to stir. Tidings of nightly meetings in desert spots reached him from every side. The Senones revolted, the Trevirans were in motion, but Indutiomar, chief of the anti-Roman party there, was surprised and slain. Thus, with this ominous swaying and writhing, closed the year 54.

Early in 53 Caesar had gathered together ten legions—his largest army. He ravaged the Nervian country, and held another assembly at Samarobriua. The Senones, Carnutes, and Trevirans did not appear. He moved the conference to a marshy islet on the Sequana (Seine), and there, in the poor little village of Lutetia, the site of pushed on as far as to the borders of the Bellovacæ (Beauvais), in the Roman interest, and the Belgæ broke up, to defend their threatened homes. Caesar followed them, took Noviodunum (Soissons), and reduced at once the Suessones and Bellovacæ. The Nervians, a warlike tribe, proved themselves more worthy foes. They assaulted the Roman camp with so much fury that had not Caesar united the skill of a general with the daring of a common soldier, all had been lost. It was his day of greatest peril. The Nervians scorned to yield out of sixty thousand fighting men, scarcely five hundred remained unwounded. Caesar showed wisdom and generosity he guaranteed to the wreck of the tribe its lands and goods. Then he attacked the Aduaticæ in the Ardennes, and enslaved the whole tribe. In the spring of 56 a.c. Armorica was overrun, and Caesar destroyed the fleet of the Veneti who had headed a new league against Rome, while Sabinus routed their land forces. The younger Crassus overcame the Aquitanians, and the whole circuit was complete. From Provence, by Helvetia, Sequania, the Belgic tribes, the Veneti in Armorica, the Loire, and Aquitania, and so round to Provence again;—this was the triumphant course of the legions. The Morini and Menapii, people of marsh and woodland in the north-eastern corner of Gaul, hard by the Batavian Island, alone stood out unsubdued.

In 55 a.c., after a raid into Germany, he overcame the Morini. And lastly he determined to sever the connection between Gaul and Britain, the home of Gallic traditions and faith. Hence his British expeditions that year and the next. It is doubtful whether he gained much—some glory to himself but little benefit to Rome. He brought back from his second expedition slaves and a few pearls, and the nominal submission of Cassivelaun. Britain remained as she was the tribute imposed on Cassivelaun was never paid and meanwhile the Gallic tribes had time to breathe, and organise a great revolt against their stern master. And this time the Aeduians, Rome's old allies, feeling that Caesar in attacking the sacred Island was smiting Druidism to the heart, threw off their allegiance and joined the national movement. Caesar speaks of this rising in such a tone as conquerors are ever apt to use. The love of liberty, the spirit of patriotism, are branded as the fickleness of a race which ought to know itself beaten and be quiet: a subject race, when it tries to throw off the yoke, is always counted traitorous by its masters. The Gauls seemed to Caesar to be unreasonable and troublesome. The expedition into Britain, which should have been lucrative and dazzling, and the last act of a series of splendid campaigns, proved to be but the beginning of new dangers. The triumph was delayed, who could say how long? The fortunes of war, proverbially fickle, might change. No new glory could be won, and all as yet gathered might be lost. Returning from Britain he had met the Gallic deputies at Samarobriua (Amiens), and finding all tranquil, had put his troops into winter-quarters along the north coast and the

He was starting for Italy, when the sound of an explosion in the territory of the Carnutes, the centre of Druid faith, reached his ear. The Gaul, too impatient by nature to wait, had moved out too soon. The Eburones rose, and destroyed the Roman army. Ambiorix, their victorious chief, called on his neighbours: the Nervians and Aduaticans replied. All northern Gaul was moved. Cicero, the orator's brother, who was wintering in the Nervian country, was beleaguered by them; but with incredible speed and boldness, saved him, and saved the

Now all Gaul began to stir. Tidings of nightly meetings and spots reached him from every side. The Senones and Trevirans were in motion; but Indutiomar, chief of the Senon man party there, was surprised and slain. Thus, as swaying and writhing, closed the year 54.

Caesar had gathered together ten legions—he had ravaged the Nervian country, and held a conference at Samarobriua. The Senones, Carnutes, and Trevirans did not appear. He moved the conference to Sequana (Seine), and there, in the poor suburb of the site of the 'cité' of Paris, he held pushed on as far as to the borders of the in the Roman interest, and the Belgæ their threatened homes. Caesar followed (Soussons), and reduced at once the

 The Nervians, a warlike tribe proved foes. They assaulted the Roman that had not Caesar united the daring of a common soldier, all day of greatest peril. The Nervians sixty thousand fighting men, so unwounded. Caesar showed guaranteed to the wreck of the he attacked the Aduatici in whole tribe. In the spring run, and Caesar destroyed headed a new league against their land forces. The you nians and the whole circle Helvetia, Sequania, the Br
 the Loire, and Aquitania this was the triumphant and Menapii, people of eastern corner of Gaul out unsubdued.

In 55 B.C. after a
 And lastly he determi and Britain, the home British expeditions whether he gained benefit to Rome.
 slaves and a few sivelan. Britain
 Cassivelaun was no time to breathe master. And th that Caesar in at

... quieted the
 ...
 ... rose again. They
 ... and other
 ... The Arverni
 ... at their head Young
 ... of Gaul, he con
 ... He inspired
 ... with a truly national
 ... Gaul he is ab
 ... It has been
 ... of
 ... Unke
 ... who
 ... towards, to
 ... while he
 ... Gaul
 ... from
 ... the
 ... the
 ... of
 ... the
 ... the
 ... the
 ... the

ample food and munitions of war Thus their sacrifices were rendered null, because they had not heart to carry them out completely. Four legions were now sent with Labienus to the north; with six Caesar marched on Gergovia in the land of the Arvernians But there Vercingetorix won a splendid victory over him, and he had to raise the siege and fall back on Labienus The Gallic hero was now strong enough to revert to his old plan He moved northward against Caesar, and sent a subsidiary army into the Province But Caesar gave him battle not far from Divio (Dijon), defeated him, and broke the Gallic spirit The heroism that would willingly have died, could not bear defeat Vercingetorix was compelled to withdraw his weakened forces into the fortress-town of Alesia in the Mandubian country, till the Gauls had time to recover spirit Alesia stood on the crown of an oval hill, in the midst of an amphitheatre of mountains, its feet washed by two rivers The town and its works covered the whole plateau of the hill, its sides were steep and unassailable Here was the theatre of the last struggle between independent Gaul and Rome, between Vercingetorix and Caesar The Gallic cavalry were sent forth to rouse the land, the infantry held the town. It was a last effort, and all heard the cry and came, except the Remi, the old and faithful friends of Rome Meanwhile the garrison suffered horribly, it became a question of starving or expelling the non-combatants They were driven forth to perish between the rocky walls of the fortress and the not less stony lines of the besiegers, like the wretched citizens under the walls of Château Gaillard in 1204 Caesar's skill as a spade-soldier again served him in good stead He drew great lines round the place, and rested in them, awaiting the supreme moment At last the relieving army came From within and without the Gauls threw themselves on the Roman works There was a hill so large that the Roman earthworks could not encircle it Two legions held it, it was the key of the position, and against it the chief efforts of the Gauls were in vain directed After a long and terrible struggle the Roman

CHAPTER IV.

Gaul under Roman Influences

B.C. 50—A.D. 476.

WE shall treat of this period only so far as it is needful to trace the education of the Gaul in Roman ideas, and the growth of a certain civilisation in the country. It is not an interesting period, for it is a time of ever-increasing wretchedness, first under the Roman heel, then under the equally crushing domination of the German. It would seem as though the light and impressible Gaul needed this severe discipline before he could take his right place in history; and the modification of his ideas under Roman influences gives us the clue to much of his later character. His conceptions of universal empire, whether intellectual or martial, come from Rome; so too his habit of living by strict law, and desire for 'logical sequence,' and his tendency to reduce all things to their principles and to codes, hence also comes his delight in centralised city-life, hence his deep belief in the equality of all mankind, which again is joined with indifference as to personal freedom; hence perhaps also comes what has seemed to be an inaptness for constitutional ways of government; hence come, finally, his nomenclature and his language.

We may divide this period into four parts

- I. The final struggle against Rome, B.C. 50—A.D. 70.
- II. Gaul under the Empire to the accession of Diocletian, A.D. 70—284.
- III. The age of barbarian incursions and the struggle against the Germans, A.D. 284—406.
- IV. The age of German settlements to the era of Hlodowig or Clovis, A.D. 406—476

I. The final struggle against Rome B.C. 50—A.D. 70

Plutarch tells us that Caesar fought in Gaul against three millions of men one million perished one was enslaved, one remained free<sup>1</sup> And thus was Gaul pacified ! She lay prostrate at her master's feet. But the race quickly recovered its numbers. They are fruitful says Strabo, and good at nurturing children. In spite of oppression and slavery the Gaul made some progress during the five centuries of Roman domination. At the beginning they were savages and their land a land of forests wild hills, and waste fertile valleys, inhabited by quarrelsome clans, scanty in numbers, subsisting on precarious hunting-spoils, on the banks of desolate rivers. They had scarcely a town or a road. But at the end of the period there were five cities, much of the land was under cultivation the inhabitants wore the Roman dress, lived in large part under Roman law, and had adopted Roman arts of life, language and letters.

It is obvious that Roman influences would naturally spread from the Province outwards and that the Province would be thoroughly Roman long before the rest of Gaul. There is a risk lest the observations of ancient travellers which really refer to the state of the Province should be taken to apply to the whole country. Light came from the east to Gaul. The Mediterranean cities, Tyre Carthage Athens Rome Alexandria, were centres of learning thought and commerce and from them, with the Mediterranean as a highway, came the early civilisation of Marseilles, Narbonne, and other cities of the Province. From them it passed inland to Toulouse, Arles, Nîmes, Vienne. And so the South took the lead, and kept it through the early Middle Ages, till its activity of thought brought it into collision with the Church and with France; then it fell by the hand of De Montfort<sup>1</sup>. The struggles of the thirteenth century may be traced back to the barbarian invasions, which changed the balance of Europe, the power of the North growing ever stronger. For the Northern and Southern influences met in France, which became the chief battlefield. At one time it might well have been a question whether Lyons or Paris should be the chief city of France; but the northern influences were too strong, and Paris, a city lying on the northernmost of her great rivers, became the capital

<sup>1</sup> Hist. Cæs. p. 715

In the North the German influences were strong in after-times; but the German never imprinted his mark on the Gallic character so deeply as did the Roman. The Roman was the first teacher, the pupil was fresh, and eager to learn.

The year after the close of the ten years' war (B C 49) Massilia fell. Her evil star led her, with the Province, to join Pompey's party; and Caesar attacked and vanquished her. To secure the unwilling allegiance of the Province and the humiliation of Massilia, he established military colonies filled with his partisans. Arles was recolonised; he founded Forum Julii (Fréjus)<sup>2</sup>, with a fine harbour which made it a formidable rival to Marseilles, Fréjus was as detrimental to the Eastern as Narbonne to the Western commerce of the Phocæan capital. But though Caesar was suspicious of the Provincials, and masterful towards them, he had no such feelings towards the rest of Gaul. He had already granted citizenship to the whole Legion of the Lark, and the imperial city was daily expecting some new violation of her sanctity, when the old Senatorial party, taking advantage of the jealousies of the moment, murdered Caesar on the Ides of March, 44 B.C. The foreigners at Rome made themselves conspicuous by the marked share they took in the public mourning. They knew that their friend was gone, and that old Rome had struck at them through him.

<sup>1</sup> The corresponding civilisation of Sicily culminated and began to wane at the same time, under the great Emperor Frederick II.

<sup>2</sup> Fréjus, which lies between Toulon and Antibes, is now a poor little town two or three miles from the sea.

Julius had left Gaul very much to herself. Augustus set himself to tutor her. His gift of organisation there found a fine field. The Julian towns had all been built in the interests of Caesar's party, the Augustan cities had all a political aim. He centralised authority by making Lyons, a new town, the capital. His policy was to build a new city wherever it might destroy the influence of some city already venerable in Gallic eyes. Thus Lyons overshadowed Vienne, Augustonemetum Gergovia. He also gave new names (often taken from the names of the old clans) to old cities<sup>1</sup>. Bibracte was renamed Augustodunum (Autun), Noviodunum, Augusta Sennionum (Soissons) and probably, Avaricum, Bitungue (Bourges). He favoured local jealousies and crushed local patriotism. He divided the country into four provinces, so arranged as to cut across all older distinctions of race<sup>2</sup>. These were the Belgica, which with a fringe of wild half-Germanised lands between its marches and the Rhine spread from the English Channel along the Seine, to the eastern limits of Helvetia (the Sequanian territory being reckoned in with it), and ran down to a point below Geneva; then the Lugdunensis stretching as a narrow strip from the Armorican coast to Lyons, between the Seine and the Loire; thirdly Aquitania, which lay in a solid mass from the Loire to the Spanish frontier, and ran from near Toulouse up to Lyons; and lastly the Narbonensis which touched both the Spanish and the Italian frontiers, and had also its northernmost point at Lyons. Thus Lyons became the manifest centre of the system, not belonging specially to any province but accessible to all. In fifteen years Augustus raised it from a village to a great city. It had a great market, a mint, a splendid central temple. It teemed with rhetoricians, and had booksellers' shops. Strabo says it was next in size to Narbo. The central temple, built where the Arar (Saone) and the Rhone meet, was dedicated to Augustus and Rome. There stood the emperor's altar, surrounded by statues of the sixty Gallic 'cities<sup>1</sup>, symbolising the centralisation and subjection of the country<sup>2</sup>. Lyons was also the centre of the emperor's road-system. Besides the way into Helvetia through Geneva, and the still more important communication with Italy over the Cottian Alps, both of which ran from Lyons, there were four great Augustan roads, the main arteries of traffic throughout all Gaul. One, to the north, passed through Cabillonum (Châlons-sur-Saone), Divodurum (Metz), Augusta Trevirorum (Trier or Trèves), and ended at Confluentes (Coblentz). The second, to the north-west, ran through Augustodunum (Autun) and Agendincum (Sens), and ended at Gesoriacum (Boulogne). The third, due west, crossed the Arvernian hills, through Augustoritum (Limoges), and came down to the ocean. The fourth, to the south, dropped down the left bank of the Rhone to Tarasco, where it split asunder; one branch to Massilia, the other to Narbo.

<sup>1</sup> The reverse process to that of the radem magistratum novitas.

<sup>2</sup> As may be seen by comparing Maps II (p. 25) and III (p. 67).

Under the eye of Augustus, Roman influences spread, specially among the young nobles. Provence became more Italian than Italy herself, as Pliny said; and in the 'Imperial Province,' as the rest of Gaul was called<sup>3</sup>, civic life began to supplant the old clan feeling. Centralised organisation prevailed: schools were established, for Greek learning, Massilia, for Latin, Augustodunum. and the Gaul was before long found teaching Latin to the Latins at Rome. Rhetoric, that Celtic gift, flourished. Druidism was discouraged, and the polytheism of eastern Gaul was wrought into one system with the polytheism of Rome. The rights of Imperial citizenship dazzled the ambition of the younger chiefs. Roman law was introduced, and took root in the south though the breeks lingered on, the young chief tain donned the toga proudly, and deemed himself a Roman. His quick imagination was touched by the glory, and fascinated by the impure civilisation of the Eternal City. The altar of Rome was at Lyons she was looked on as divine as well as eternal, personal as well as omnipotent. Grand buildings, on Roman lines, sprang up. And though this foreign splendour was laden with heavy taxes, yet it spread till by the time of Tiberius a great transformation had been accomplished in the race.

<sup>1</sup> They were rather cantons, or small states.

<sup>2</sup> The temple was on the Athenaeum, a name still surviving in the church of Aisnay, two sides of whose central dome are supported by one of the huge columns of the temple, cut in two.

<sup>3</sup> Augustus divided the Roman world into Provinces, Senatorial and Imperial. The Senatorial were those quiet countries which needed no special watchfulness, the Imperial were all border-lands, mostly newly conquered territories. Consequently, the Narbonensis was Senatorial, the rest of Gaul Imperial.

This burden of taxation, and a certain clinging to down-trodden Druidism led to an uprising headed by the Trevirans under Florus, and the Aeduans under Sacrovir<sup>1</sup> in A.D. 31. It was soon subdued, and the reign of Tiberius is only marked by the increased severity of the government. Caligula (A.D. 37) returned to a milder policy and by his acts in Gaul poured a half-crazy contempt on Rome. At Lyons, before the very altar of Augustus, he held forced competitions in eloquence. Each victor won a prize and a panegyric, composed by the defeated competitors. The author of a condemned piece was made to wipe it off the waxed tablets with his tongue or perhaps was beaten, or chance times, thrown into the Rhone. The emperor also played the auctioneer and sold to the highest bidder the heir looms of the Empire, giving the history of each piece. This vase is Egyptian it belonged once to Antony. Augustus took it at Actum or This piece was my father's and so on till he had dragged the greatest names of old Rome in the mire. There is nothing more curious than the alienation of the Caesars from Rome. Claudius (emperor in 41 A.D.) was born at Lyons all his sympathies were Provincial. He spoke Latin with an accent, and openly preferred Greek and boasted of his Sabine origin and Gallic birthplace—he was proud of anything except Rome. A speech he made in the Senate, advocating the throwing open of that august assembly to the Gallic chiefs, has been preserved in a short form by Tacitus. Part of it, engraved on a metal tablet, is still to be seen among the archives of Lyons. He visited all parts of Gaul, examining and regulating everything, he prohibited human sacrifices, and the Druid worship. In his time the sense of the equality of all men under the law grew stronger. He raised, as far as he could, the more degraded classes, and established schools. The provinces were governed by procurators, mostly freedmen; slaves were emancipated, the old Romans were taught to regard the Gauls as their equals, even their brethren, under the law.

<sup>1</sup> Was Sacrovir the translation of the name of a Druidical office?

Nero, with his Greek sympathies, cared little for 'Imperial' Gaul, but to the Province, so full of Greek elements, he was friendly enough. He rebuilt Lyons after a great fire, at his death no city mourned more sincerely for him. Gaul bore her full share of the troubles which his death entailed, and at last broke out into revolt. In 69 A D the old Druid party rose, under one Maric, who said he had come down from heaven, but a few cohorts scattered the loose levy of peasants, and took their leader. A greater trouble was at hand—a last Gallic war, in which the northern tribes, led by a German, gallantly resisted all the power of Rome.

Augustus had marked off a narrow strip along the left bank of the Rhine, from Basel to the Batavian island. This district being chiefly peopled with Germans, received the high-sounding names of the Upper and Lower Germanies. Here, too, the eight frontier-legions lay in a chain of strong military towns<sup>1</sup>. These troops were largely recruited from the natives of the district, they seldom changed quarters. They looked forward to permanent settlement on the soil at the end of their service, they identified themselves with the district and its people. The officers even wore the Gallic dress. We read that Vitellius himself marched as consul before the eagles in the Gallic treads.

<sup>1</sup> This is why almost all the Rhine cities are on the left bank, Cologne, Bonn, Andernach, Coblenz, Bingen, Mainz, Spiers, Worms, &c

Caecina, who commanded a legion in the Upper Germany, wore his light plaid cloak and trousers even in Italy<sup>1</sup>. But this tendency towards combination between Gaul and Rome was ever thwarted by the stream of German immigrants from over the Rhine and the Batavian insurrection was a protest against the influence of the legions. These declared for Vitellius the national party for Vespasian hoping thereby to win independence, or at least to damage the legions. The Batavian<sup>2</sup> island had been peopled by a wild tribe of Gauls. But a little before the Christian era a horde of Catti<sup>3</sup> a German tribe entered the island, and being men of large stature and fierce bravery, soon became interesting to Roman eyes. Tacitus calls them bravest of Germans. They formed the imperial body guard till Vespasian's time. Their valour turned the tide of battle at Pharsalia they were exempt from taxes, being allies not subjects of Rome. Rome treated them as so many living weapons<sup>4</sup>. These men Germans not Gauls, headed the last revolt. As the one race died, the other awoke the Roman power indeed prevailed, but Civilis foreshadowed at the same moment the coming pre-eminence of the German race. All Gaul was moved except the old Province. The eastern cities sought an independent government of the Roman type—indicating to what extent Roman ideas had taken root. western and central Gaul rose in behalf of Druidism. lastly the Belgae desired freedom and a military chief after the instincts of their half German nature. But the eastern cities and the Remi yielded without a struggle. the central rising was easily put down. the western tribes and the Belgae would not fight away from home and so the whole hunt fell on Civilis and his Batavians. He who had won a Roman name and Roman skill in war by service with the legions made a glorious resistance. He is fortunate

<sup>1</sup> Tac. Hist. 3. 20.

<sup>2</sup> According to their peculiarities, writers derive this word from the Teutonic Berwa, good meadow or from the Gallic Barav deep-water. the latter is probably right.

<sup>3</sup> Their home was on the Weser in the Cassel country.

<sup>4</sup> Velut tela atque arma, bellis severantur says Tacitus, Germ. 29.

in his historian, Tacitus, whose Histories, as we have them, break off abruptly at the very moment when Civilis, abandoned by his followers, stands on the broken bridge treating for terms of surrender with the Roman Cereals. There the darkness suddenly closes in on his noble figure, grand even in defeat, and the independent life of ancient Gaul is ended.

CHAPTER V

II Gaul under the Empire A.D. 70-284.

It is not always true that happy is the land which has no annals. Gaul after the fall of Civilis has no history for a century yet it is a time of growing misery. Tacitus had been struck, at the beginning of this period, with the listlessness and sloth of the race moral degradation speedily followed. The Romanised chiefs lost their vigour becoming rich, idle, and dissolute the common folk sank into despair the citizens fell gradually with a growing outward display of civilisation, into a wretched state. Trajan Adrian, the Antonines were friendly towards Gaul public buildings rose on every side, Gallic artists, sophists, and rhetoricians were welcome at their courts. But these outward splendours did but cloak over the inner corruption. And though these emperors broke down all barriers, and gave Gaul full rights of citizenship, still the gates were only opened that the Gaul might share in decay and moral downfall. The degradation of Rome and Gaul went on with equal paces slavery cause and consequence ever increased. Throughout the second century the barbarians left Gaul untouched she was ripening for destruction. They gave her time to accept the Roman law and the Roman dogma of the equality of all men, the basis of Roman law and philosophy. As the old political distinctions faded away with the old polytheism, this better faith gradually asserted itself. It could not arrest the downfall but it sowed seed which bore fruit it cleared the way for Christianity—the one prominent historical fact of this period. Druids had taught the immortality of the soul and monotheism, so far they had helped: Rome had preached order and law, and the first rights of mankind; and she also helped: then came the Gospel, in which a new freedom and a broader equality were preached, an equality of man and woman, of bond and free. One of the first Christian martyrs of Gaul was Blandina, a woman, and a slave.

At Lyons there were representatives of many races among them Asiatics, and doubtless Christians. In the year 160 or 161 A D, an Asiatic priest, one Pothinus<sup>1</sup>, settled there, and became first bishop of Lyons. With him came Irenaeus. They ministered to their countrymen, there and at Vienne. Thus Christianity first found footing in Gaul, coming not from Rome, but from the East. The Church at Lyons long bore the stamp of Greek origin, her ritual was Greek, she still retains a certain independence of worship. The Church in Rome (at that time also Greek) was struggling for life, and had no spare energies for missionary work. At first the few Christians whose names we know in Lyons are Greek; but Gallo-Roman names soon appear. Persecution followed, for Montanist opinions vexed the infant Church. Irenaeus, second bishop of Lyons, with one hand spread the faith, with the other repressed Gnostic and other misbeliefs. The orthodoxy of the Gallican Church, thus early tested, was destined to have considerable political results when Orthodox Frank and Arian Goth struggled for the mastery.

From Lyons the Gospel spread, at Augustodunum (Autun), Divio (Dijon), Vesontio (Besançon), and elsewhere, small communities formed themselves. But the progress was slow, except in the Province. Not till the reign of the Emperor Philip (244 A D) can any decided movement be remarked. Rome at that time sent forth a new mission. The Latin Christians had far greater success than the Greek had had. Fabian, bishop of Rome, sent seven bishops into Gaul. They would not touch at Marseilles, 'that most zealous worshipper of Roman devils,' as the Acts of St. Victor call it, from its obstinate adherence to the old pagan worship. They landed at Narbo and pushed inland. Augustonitum (Limoges) and Caesarodunum (Tours), became new centres of the Gospel. Dionysius (251 A.D.) pushed on farther and with eleven brethren settled at Lutetia (Paris) and there founded the church of Northern France. To him the church of St. Denis was afterwards dedicated. From this time Christianity spread swiftly so swiftly that in three generations almost all Gaul had embraced the faith the final struggle between Christendom and Paganism was, in reality fought out on Gallic soil.

<sup>1</sup> Pothinus, ποθεινός, or perhaps Photinus, which

This is also the time of what is sometimes called the Gallo-Roman Empire. The provincial emperors or tyrants, who tried to sever West from East, belong to Roman not Gallic history. Though Gaul was the centre of their operations, they neither affected her progress nor arrested her decay. The barbarians begin to move. Allemans make themselves felt in 214 A.D., Franks in 241. A little after the latter date, hordes of Franks pass through the whole length of Gaul, and ravage Spain—they even take ship and make a raid on the African coast. Gaul, for the first time is severed from Italy.

In 273-274 A.D. Gaul was again joined to Rome by Aurelian under Probus his successor, the barbarians were driven back beyond the Rhine. With Frankish captives Probus recolonised the two Germanies, and let Germans settle in Toxandria (Flanders) and even in Nervian and Treviran lands. These German colonists, who thus permanently thrust back the Gallic frontier are called by Latin writers Lati a name which probably expressed the German Leute the medieval Leude, or men at arms. These men held their lands by military service, and thus foreshadowed. If they did not introduce one of the most characteristic elements of feudalism.<sup>1</sup>

By this time the ancient names of places in Gaul had mostly perished. The towns were modelled on the municipal form, and governed by a curia or senate, sometimes (in the south) under consuls. These municipal senates found the duty of government burdensome. Like the earliest holders of a seat in Parliament in England, they would gladly have escaped from a perilous and expensive honour. Unwillingly they laid the foundations of the civic liberties of their country, just as the English towns unwillingly began the political liberties we now enjoy.

<sup>1</sup> This system of granting lands to Germans on military tenure had been begun by Alexander Severus who called such gifts beneficia. Those on the Rhine were called ripuarian; a name with which we shall presently become familiar.

The state of things was transitional. While Rome withered and the moral state of Gaul grew worse, Christianity and barbarism pushed forward from opposite points. Presently they meet, having conquered the Gaul, and their alliance begins a new era.

CHAPTER VI

III The age of barbarian incursions and the struggle against the Germans, A.D. 284-406

It is time we turned our attention to the German—the chief figure for centuries in our history. He is described to us as a bigger man than the Gaul, gigantic in comparison with the Roman. His bright blue eyes and shaggy red hair are well known to us. The description of the Gaul by Roman writers goes far to show that at some distant time he had been a cousin of the German and philology also proves the claim of kin. But the likeness is almost all on the surface. In habits, character, and manners, he was very different. He wore a rough skin round his body fastened by a coarse pin or skewer and had none of the Gallic love of colour—a difference which distinguishes German from French dress to our own day. He had none of the Gaul's vivacity or fickleness; his tendencies were simple, constant, some will say rather commonplace. He felt the dark mysteries of the forest, but had little or none of the bright and playful imagination of the Gaul. He hated the restraints of town life. To live by hunting seemed to him to be the only true life. He was no great talker, being rather heavy than not; the Gaul, we know, could talk and boast for ever. His domestic relations were simple and pure. His tendencies were towards personal freedom and independent life—the opposites of Gallic devotion and clan feeling. Connected with this was his disposition to seek God in the solitude of the forest in an independent way, each man standing in direct relation to his Maker.

whereas the Gaul had an organised hierarchy between him and the Almighty, and wished to serve Him as a member of his clan, rather than as an individual. Here is one germ of that difference of character which afterwards made the North German a Protestant, while the Frenchman clung to the more social and hierarchical system of Rome. Finally, while the slave is a prominent object in a Gallic household, the German's hearth was girt with trusty and free companions. He had his 'leudes,' his 'trusty fellows' ('antrustions'), his 'comrades' ('gesellen' or 'gesithas'), all free, and attached to him not by clanship but by a personal tie. This strong individuality was needed to penetrate the level mass of Roman society, to develop the qualities called out by Christianity, and to give to modern civilisation its many-sided character.

Such was the race, which now began to pour over the ill-defended frontiers into corrupt and unwarlike Gaul. There were great differences between the tribes: the less barbarous, coming into the more civilised districts, fell in readily with Roman ways; others retained their first simplicity and fierceness. The Franks especially affected the history of Gaul through their long retention of the German characteristics, and also from the fact that they overran Gaul at two different times, the work begun by the Neustrians being carried out by the Austrasians under the house of Pippin.

The following are the chief federations of Teutonic and kindred nations which entered Gaul.

1 The Goths, two of whose subdivisions, Visigoths (or West-Goths) and Ostrogoths (East-Goths) interest us most. They dwelt first in Scandinavia (whence Gothland, &c), and afterwards spread across Europe to the Black Sea, and southwards even into Spain. The Ostrogoths settled in Italy; the Visigoths in Southern France and Spain.

2 The Vandals, among whom the Burgundians, Herulians, and Langobards are important to us. Their home lay between the Elbe, the Vistula, and the Baltic. They spread through Spain into Africa. The Burgundians established themselves in Eastern Gaul the Langobards and Herulians in Northern Italy

3. The Allemans and Suabians (Suevi), who lay between the Main, Rhine, and Danube threatening the very vitals of the Roman Empire. These have left but slight traces of themselves in Gaul.

4. The Franks, a confederation of Northern tribes. Their chief divisions were the Salians, dwelling on the river Sala (or Yssel) and the Ripuarians, on the banks of the Rhine. These were the chief conquerors of Gaul, and have given her her modern name.

Such were the main divisions of the barbarians who at the beginning of Diocletian's reign, threatened the frontiers of the Empire

It must not be forgotten that these Teutonic tribes came in as conquerors, rather than destroyers. They had learnt to respect the great name of Rome before they seized her fairest provinces. They were not at all like the Huns, whose incursions meant simple ruin. They prided themselves on Roman titles, their more ambitious chiefs entered the imperial service. The Goths especially wished to imitate Rome, and modelled their government on Roman forms

The reign of Diocletian (A.D. 384) is important to us, because of the change of system begun by him and carried out by Constantine. Hitherto the Empire had been, in theory a nation of equal citizens under the Emperor as their head hence forward it began to sink into a nation of slaves, absolutely dependent on that Emperor's will. The army was no longer omnipotent. 'The reign of the legions ends the power of the palace-domestics begins' The old names of offices disappear dukes and counts appear The Empire seemed to be under an Oriental despotism Diocletian had his palace at Nicomedia, and held court in Persian fashion. The Empire was divided into tetrarchies, the provinces parcelled out into dioceses, or circles of administration each with its chief town.

<sup>1</sup> La Vallée Histoire des Français, 2 5

Gaul was in two vicariates • one in the south, the Narbonensis and Aquitania, the other north of the Loire, stretching to the Rhine. The Gauls sank into great misery; and a peasant war broke out. This early Jacquerie followed the usual course—the people slew and ate the cattle, pillaged the houses of the rich, sacked the towns. They destroyed Augustodunum with her Latin schools. In some way the outbreak was mixed up with the ferment caused by the preaching of Christianity. It was easily suppressed.

The work begun by Diocletian in the east was continued by Constantine on the western side of the Empire. Born in the west, preferring it to the east, indeed to Rome herself, he was the man who, had the evils of the time been curable, would have cured them. But the curse of slavery crushed society, and Gaul went on sinking ever deeper. Yet she arouses a fresh interest, as being the field on which the battle between Christianity and Paganism was finally fought out. It was the strength which Christianity had won in Gaul that made Constantine declare himself Christian. no sooner had he done so, than he found himself, like Henry IV of France long after, able to march straight to supreme power. The Gauls flocked to him, eager to fight under the Labarum<sup>1</sup>, and in A.D. 312 Constantine and Christianity entered Rome in triumph. He sanctioned public Christian worship—the Church modelled her dioceses on those of the civil power—they were similar in government, continuous in extent. The Christian religion passed through a change answering closely to that of the state. The chief clergy, hitherto only private persons, became important magistrates—the Church, instinctively and unconsciously, adopted that form which best prepared it to cope afterwards with the barbarians. The bishop of each city, with his clergy, now took charge of it.

<sup>1</sup> It was a lance near whose head a cross-bar was fixed, from which fell a purple veil interwoven with gold threads and starred with precious stones. Above it rose the sacred monogram of our Lord, encircled with a golden crown. Its motto was 'Sub hoc signo vinces'. It was always carried by the emperor, defended by the flower of his army, the origin of the feelings of reverence.

and laid the foundations of that grandeur of position which we find the bishops of the eighth and ninth century enjoying. The curials (or members of the civil municipality) lost their authority and the clergy the aristocracy of the fourth and fifth centuries took their place. What was before a simple ministry of the Gospel under chief pastors or bishops, now became a grand hierarchical system. In many places in which the Christian religion was dominant, the curials handed over to the Church the temples, and even the law courts or basilicas. Where the Roman law had once been dispensed, the law and worship of Christ now alone were heard. Figures of Christ and the Apostles replaced the images of the Caesars. Thus the new power was strengthened to work not only on the hearts of men, but on the outer world. Public buildings were transferred and adapted to Christian uses. The outward symbols of the older faith abolished. Pagan idols, tombs, sculptures, all fell before the zeal of the Christians. It is interesting to notice that this epoch in which the Church entered into new and close relations with the State is the moment at which there came a great severance of the old relations between Church and State. In Pagan times the emperor had been Supreme Pontiff and head of the Church. Henceforth he ceased to have any such claim or office. He was no longer supreme head over the religion of mankind. And this separation prepared the way for the claims of the Papacy at a later date. The Pope inherited the great name of Supreme Pontiff thus abandoned by the State and rose to an imperial height in Rome deserted by her emperors.

Thus, then the Church prepared herself for her part in the future. She also did this by facing the theological questions which arose and which especially affected the progress of Christianity in Gaul. This was the day of Arianism, which seemed likely to become the faith of Western Christendom. It was adopted by the Goths and most of the Christianised barbarians, it filled Italy it was accepted by emperors. But it was thrust back by the Gallican Church. Athanasius in his banishment, settled at Treves and was the teacher of Hilary of Arles.

Ambrose, the great Bishop of Milan, was a Gaul. The Gallic Church, during the Frankish era, smote down Arianism in a coarse and practical way, and settled the main question as to the dominant faith of Western Europe.

The state of Gallic society in the time of Constantine deserves some notice. At the head of it stood the Senatorial families, wealthy owners of at least half the soil of Gaul, sprung from the chiefs of the old clans, free from taxation. Brilliant as their condition seemed to be, it was precarious and sad. They had no power, no influence, no independence: the emperor could seize their wealth and destroy them at will. Next to them came the curials, the municipal senators, responsible for the collection of the taxes in their cities, which responsibility crushed them. In this century we hear much of their desperate struggles to escape from these ruinous honours. The Empire forbade them to change their condition, neither as soldiers nor as churchmen could they find relief. They tried to become slaves, and even that consolation was forbidden them. They could do nothing but perish, as indeed they did. The government had to step in and appoint prefects in each city, called 'defenders'. In their turn these officers disappeared, and gave place to the bishops. Next came the small proprietors, a scanty body, then the merchants, then free labourers in cities, who, almost all freedmen, were of no account or influence. Last came the slaves, closing the dreary procession: these formed the vast majority of the people: slaves of the house and field, the germ of death in the constitution of the Empire.

Standing in an independent condition, the clergy alone offered promise of the future. They were powerless to stay the downfall, but would be very powerful in building up again with new materials. This is probably the time in which the Gallic tongue perished, except in Armorica, the 'Lugdunensis tertia'. Among the upper classes it had long gone: the towns had abandoned it, the clergy discouraged it, even the slaves lost it rapidly. For as they perished in crowds, they were replaced by others from a distance, to whom the tongue was unknown. Thus a by the activity and joy with which he has persecuted he has the credit of having begun the system for Christianity. An universal horror seized on Christendom. Ambrose of Milan and Martin of Tours protested against the sentence, and refused to communicate with the Spanish bishops. Martin especially denounced with eloquent and Christian warmth this new heresy of Ithacius that blood should be shed by Christians. Thus the great evangelist of Gaul, the pitiless destroyer of temples the firm foe of Arianism, shewed that he drew a line between false opinions and the men who held them. Yet, though he was the most powerful man of his time, canonised by public acclaim before his death he could not avert the shedding of blood. Priscillian and his followers were beheaded at Trèves. Martin had prophesied that he should 'be slain by Antichrist. If it is true that his latter days were embattered and his end hastened by this misfortune that had befallen Christendom, his prophecy was to a certain extent fulfilled. The demon of Christian persecution, which tasted its first blood in 385, has been an Antichrist throughout the after history of the Church opposed to Christ, in being opposed to that love for man which is the highest quality of the Gospel.

We have already mentioned Arbogast as shewing how the Frank had penetrated into Gaul. He has another side he was the last upholder of Pagan reaction in Gaul. But Christianity thanks chiefly to St. Martin was too strong for him. The cry of the Christians reached the ears of Theodosius, who hastened to the rescue. Arbogast advanced to meet him under the walls of Aquileia Christian and Pagan met (A.D. 394). There for two days the struggle raged. The first day the Frank held his own it is said that ten thousand Goths, fighting under Theodosius perished. But next day the western army was utterly defeated. Eugenius the schoolmaster-emperor was given up by his guards and killed. Arbogast fell on his sword, and died. So ended this Pagan reaction hopeless from the beginning. Never again could the faith of old Rome lift its head and Gaul itself was more and more felt to be the heart of Western Christendom.

The Roman had taught the nation equity under the Empire and the law, Christianity had taught it the equality of all men before God, yet neither had as yet lessened the evils of slavery. The Frank was to follow. His sense of personal independence was next to be infused into the Gaul he, too, would leave slavery unmitigated. Yet the three influences were each really opposed in principle to the radical characteristics of slavery and from their joint action, after ages of suffering, modern civilisation,—a civilisation free in the main from the curse of slavery,—has worked itself out.

It is now time to trace out the introduction of this third element,—the Frank

CHAPTER VII

IV — The German Settlements in Gaul down to Clovis

A.D. 406—476

'WHERE the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together. Roman civilisation and slavery acting on the Gallic character had by this time rendered the land defenceless and rich enough to be tempting. The German noble and keen as the eagle<sup>1</sup> his favourite bird, swooped down on Gaul. It is no longer some restless chieftain or a roving band of plunderers. Settlements are made. The Goth in Aquitaine the Burgundian in the Saone valley the Frank in the northern borderland, sit down solidly, with no fickleness of purpose and make the land their own.

On the night of the last day of the year 406 a great horde crossed the Rhine on the ice and entered Gaul. Alans Vandals, Goths, and Huns were there. They fell on Moguntiacum (Mainz), took it, and slaughtered thousands of its citizens in the cathedral. All northern Gaul fell at once. City after city was taken and plundered. The great horde pressed on across the land they passed the Loire and entered even Novempopulania<sup>2</sup>. The inhabitants suffered terribly along their devastating line of march. The old rising of peasants, called Bagaudes<sup>3</sup> again took place in the West, and spread across almost all Gaul. It embraced now not only runaway-slaves, but wretched cities and the wrecks of society. Hence the obscure Armanian Republic

Adel, eitel, Adler

<sup>1</sup> The land of the nine peoples lay in the extreme south west of Gaul from Bordeaux to the Pyrenees.

<sup>2</sup> The Bagaudes (a name derived from Celtic bagad a company troop) revolted against Rome first about A.D. 370 and now again under pressure of the invasions.

if such ever did exist<sup>1</sup>. In 409 the mixed crowd of barbarians streamed over into Spain. But Gaul had no rest. In 412 the Visigoths left North Italy, and under Ataulf (whose name is Latinized into Adolphus) came down on the Rhone, to settle, not to plunder. It seemed well to him to make in Southern Gaul a kingdom and a home. He had married Placidia, sister of the Emperor Honorius, so binding himself to the social life and conditions of Rome. He dreamed of restoring the Empire, reorganising it and welding into it the new elements, joining the civilised to the barbarian, the old polish to the new vigour. He thought that nothing but the wild madness of his Goths hindered the fulfilment of the scheme<sup>2</sup>. But the decay of the Empire was at least as much in fault as the rudeness of the Goths. The old government could bear no such mending as that. This dream of the Gothic king is worthy of notice, as shewing us the influence that Roman ideas had over the German, and as a forecast of that transfer of Empire, under very changed conditions, from the Latin to the German which is so prominent a feature of the Middle Ages. It slumbered till the days of Charles the Great; after him it became for centuries one of the central ideas of European politics.

At this time the Burgundians<sup>3</sup> took the district between the Rhone and the Jura, the old Sequanian land. They were a friendly, thrifty race, not very eager to seize the houses and goods of others, large of stature, good-natured, easy-going. They treated the Gallo-Romans like brethren, as Orosius says<sup>4</sup>. They were Christians, mostly Arians, the Gallo-Romans were orthodox.

At this time the Franks also made raids on the northern frontier, sacking Trèves and other cities, but not settling. They are of small account during this half century.

<sup>1</sup> The Armorican Republic lives only in the pages of Zosimus, 6 5. If it did exist it was but a 'republic of despair,' formed of a few cities, and troops retaining some shadow of Roman discipline, in the wild parts of Brittany.

<sup>2</sup> Orosius, 7 43.

<sup>3</sup> The Burgundians are said to derive their names from the burgs they built. If so, it indicates their more peaceful and settled habits.

<sup>4</sup> Orosius, 7 32. Blande, mansuete, innocenter cum subjectis Gallis, sed vere cum fratribus

In 419 Honorius ceded by treaty the second Aquitania, the second Narbonensis, and part of Novempopulania, to the Visigoths. Poitiers, Saintes, Angoulême, Bordeaux, Périgueux, Toulouse became theirs by this cession as well as by occupation. It is the first example of a distinct alienation of part of Gaul from the Empire. The inhabitants were the gainers—the Visigoths did not interfere with their faith—for the Western Arian was no persecutor—they kept their laws and customs, and lived in peace and equality. Population increased, and the soil, ever fruitful, bore plentifully. The Visigoths were nominally under the Empire, both Ataulf and Wallia, his successor were Roman generals. Both Visigoth and Burgundian aimed at a peaceable settlement. They shared lands and goods with the older owners—the Roman possessor was styled 'the host, the German shared his lot', his forcible taking of it was glossed over by the term hospitality. He took half of all forests and gardens, two-thirds of all cultivated lands, one-third of all slaves—and so settled down in peace. And all would have been well, but for Aëtius, a Scythian and a Roman general, who, under pretext of defence, ravaged the whole of Gaul. His army was largely composed of Huns—and from them tidings of the good land spread to their brethren in the East.

In the year 450 all Gaul was filled with terror for the dreaded Attila (Etzel<sup>1</sup>) with a host of strange figures, Huns, Tartars, Slaves, Tentons, head of an empire of true barbarians, drew near her borders. Barbarism—not the milder incursion of Goth or Vandal or even Frank—but the barbarism which lived only to destroy—now threatened the world. It had levied a shameful tribute on Constantinople—it now threatened the farthest West. If Gaul fell Spain would fall, and Italy and Rome—and Etzel would reign supreme, with an empire of desolation over all the earth. Theoderic the Goth and Aëtius tried to combine all Gaul against him. Etzel reached Ambracum (Orléans) but at the critical moment, just as the sacred city was about to be given up to destruction Theoderic appeared.

<sup>1</sup> He is the dark figure in the great German epic the Nibelungen Lied.

and Etzel, having the nomadic horror of towns and of being cooped up in them, dreading also a hill country, in which his cavalry would suffer, fell back into the Champagne district to the plain of Châlons-sur-Marne (the Campi Catalaunici) where there was room enough for his gigantic host to spread out its strength. There was fought out the supreme battle. Goth against Goth, Frank against Frank, Burgundian against Burgundian, there were even Huns in both armies. The Gallo-Romans seized the key of the position, a hill above the plain. There Aëtius and Thorismund, son of Theoderic, established themselves securely. The battle began towards afternoon, and raged with a wild fury. There were no tactics, it was a simple murderous hand-to-hand struggle. At last the Visigoths decided the day. They repelled their kinsmen, the Ostrogoths, and then attacked the main army of the Huns in flank. Theoderic was killed, but the attack succeeded the Huns were broken, and took refuge behind their wall of chariots. Night fell, after a horrible carnage, of which the numbers given are incredible, still they attest the tremendous nature of the struggle. Not till next morning did men know that Theoderic had perished. With cries and wild clashing of shields the Goths made Thorismund their king. Etzel, it is said, made ready for death, he piled up a huge funeral-pyre of saddles, and was ready to mount it, if the Romans assaulted his camp. But Aëtius was too much exhausted to attempt it. He now took up a policy of inaction. He sent Thorismund home to the south, and Merowig, the Frankish chief, to the north, and lay watching Etzel. The Hun, after a time, suddenly broke up his camp and withdrew, still attended by the vigilant Aëtius. He moved northwards, recrossing the Rhine, and Gaul was freed, and with her all the West, from the scourge of a Tartar supremacy.

But though the Empire was saved for a time it could not be for long. The evils of the age culminated in assassination. Stilicho, the great Vandal, who had so well defended the Empire, was murdered in 408. The young Thorismund, fresh from his laurels at Châlons, perished by the hand of his brothers and Aëtius himself the Atlas of this tottering world, was foully murdered by Valentinian's own hand<sup>1</sup>. These, and a crowd of others weltering in their life-blood, testify to the evil of the times, and the imminent downfall of the Empire.

Aegidius was the last defender of the Empire in Gaul he made a gallant stand at Arelate (Arles), the southern capital. But in A.D. 464 he too had his reward he was assassinated Syagrius his son, 'King of the Romans, as Gregory of Tours calls him was half independent in the North the hilly Arvernian district, the very citadel of Gaul, afforded the Roman party a last standing ground Armorica, always peculiar and dwelling apart, did not fall into the hands of the Germans. Ewarik, greatest and most ambitious of Visigothic kings, undertook to reduce the Arvernians, who shut up in rocky Clermont defended themselves with daily 'rogations, or penitential processions, headed by Sidonius their bishop<sup>2</sup> and also by the stubborn wills of the hardy inhabitants. Though Rome left them to their fate, they forced the Goths to raise the siege. But finding themselves alone they were presently obliged to cede to negotiation the liberty they had so well protected against force. In 474 the shadowy Emperor of the West, Julius Nepos, granted all Gaul west of the Rhone to the Visigoths it was the last act of imperial disgrace. All the provinces of the dying Empire lay desolate cities were abandoned to beasts of prey domestic animals perished cultivation ceased. Gaul had been devastated the ocean sweeping over it could not have added to the desolation. Britain was in flames<sup>3</sup> Greece a mere wreck Spain and Italy fared little better Twice had Rome herself felt the hand of the barbarian The nominal emperor who had long abandoned Rome was now about to vanish. In 475 Romulus was proclaimed the people nick named him Augustulus the Greeks altered his name in jest.

Martin Histoire des Français, t. 3<sup>o</sup>

He was shut up with them, and has left us an account of this war

<sup>1</sup> I quote from Salvian and Jerome. It is known that the Roman cities in Britain perished in flames.—Salchester Worcester &c.

and called him Momyllus. Rome began and ended with a Romulus, the last almost as shadowy as the first. Odoacer, a Herulian or Goth, seized on Rome, deposed the puppet emperor, the secretary's son<sup>1</sup>, and sent the imperial emblems to Constantinople in 476<sup>2</sup>. The Eastern Caesar received the gift, and in return repaid Odoacer with the vague title of Patrician the Herulian took to himself the more distinct name of King The obsequious senate decreed that one emperor was enough in the world—perhaps not so far wrong in that and that the seat of the Empire should henceforth be on the Bosphorus Thus fell the Imperial mistress of the West For twelve centuries she had moved a queen among the nations, and her death had left all Europe in ruins Yet even so her influences survived That strange mixture of docility and strength, the German, was destined to carry on her traditions, deeply modified by his own character, leading in due time to the 'Holy Roman Empire,' of which the foundations were laid by Charles the Great in the year 800 On the other hand, the Church in her due time would build up her empire also, a spiritual 'Holy Roman Empire,' imbued with imperial ideas, parallel to and rival of the great lay-empire the seat of which was on the Rhine Roman law, language, municipal institutions, magistrates, forms of procedure, survived, affecting the career and institutions of the German chiefs, who drew the consular robe over their national furs, and thought to combine the old civilisation with the bolder qualities of barbarians

Before Rome had perished, Gaul had been granted by her to Ewarik (or Euric), the sagacious Visigothic king, and it seemed likely that, in the general confusion, he would succeed in securing the grant to himself Odoacer, in 478, gave up to Ewarik all his authority over the Empire west of the Alps, and contented himself with a humane and prudent rule in Italy Ewarik made Toulouse the centre of his system he tried to combine the civilisation of Rome or Constantinople with the vigour of Germany. At this same moment Theoderic (Dietrich) the Ostrogoth who had been brought up at Constantinople, fell on Italy and defeated Odoacer. The two branches of the Gothic family seemed likely to divide between them the Western Empire. But this did not take place in Gaul for the Goths were too polished for the work,—a conqueror of a coarser fibre was wanted, and they were also hindered by their Arianism which made it impossible for them to be in harmony with Gallic Christianity. Add to these reasons the untimely death in 485 of Evarik, who left behind him only a feeble boy Alarik II. At this moment Hlodowig<sup>1</sup> (Clovis) a Pagan, a youth of nineteen, was already the acknowledged head of a petty Frankish tribe. He was destined to give permanent form to the German occupation of Gaul, and to begin a new period of European history.

<sup>1</sup> Orestes, father of Romulus, had been Etzel's secretary

<sup>2</sup> Gibbon, ch 36 (vol III pp 334, 335), doubts whether the date should not be 479 I have followed the usual chronology The very year of the

In most parts of Gaul the whole vigour of the Gallo-Romans appears to have perished: there was no notable resistance to the invader, no public spirit, no combination. The whole of what we call the middle classes had disappeared. On the one side was despotism, all-devouring with its administration of horse-leeches, its legions to pay its foes to buy off, its pleasures to provide, its idleness to amuse with games: on the other side a spiritless crowd of slaves, who were the only inhabitants of the country districts, and formed also a large part of the town populations. The Gallo-Roman could have no patriotism: what enthusiasts could he feel for Rome? and at home the excessive weight of taxation had crushed the citizens. One independent body of men alone remained,—the clergy. The Church had grown in esteem and wealth. She protected the fallen: she bettered the state of the slave. The clergy gathering round the imposing figure of their bishop, rose in importance: until at last when the curials had perished, and the cities were like to perish with them.

<sup>1</sup> Hlodowig or Hlodewig: the first letter of whose name was a guttural, now lost (cp. A → Af = loss): it is usually called Clovis; the guttural being hardened into a c gives the Latinised form Chlodovechus, whence Ludovicus. It is the same name as the German Ludwig, and the French Louis; of which the English Lewis is an old form.

the bishops assumed the command, and became both spiritual and temporal lords. Thus the medieval municipal system began to take the place of the Roman municipia, and at the same time the Church gained solidity when she most needed it for her struggle against her Pagan invaders. As head of a community the Bishop now constantly mediated between the old and the new. Invested by the simple barbarians with a strange sanctity, he was listened to with awe. His confidence in his mission, his high bearing, his dress, his education, the spiritual powers he asserted,—all deeply touched his conqueror. It is said that even Etzel, wild pagan as he was, carried Lupus, bishop of Troyes, with him to the Rhine, that he might get the benefit of his sanctity, as a kind of charm. Remigius won great influence over Hlodowig. Christianity alone seemed to retain vigour and power over men, and even her spirit was being modified. The belief in the supernatural sank into credulity, fays, spells, all kinds of intermediate powers sprang up, and grouped a fantastic and picturesque spirit-world round the simple forms of the gospel. Thus Christianity was prepared to bridge over the gulf between Roman and German, and to create the magnificent medieval Church of Germany, and the somewhat less princely, but scarcely less powerful, Church of France.

The Church also at this time developed another grand thought—that of the Monastic community. Even before the fifth century religious houses had become centres of light to Gaul. From the Isle of Lérins came forth the greatest saints and scholars of the time. The wisest bishops fostered the growing institution. Martin, Ambrose, Augustine, all helped to plant the monastic life in the West. While in Eastern Christendom monasticism had meant solitude, contemplation, and speculation, in the West it meant active life, physical and intellectual; the life of vigorous communities, which, in all respects, stood out in contrast with the decrepitude of the age, and were a protest against ignorance, against slavery, against the prevailing want of a true sense of religion in Gaul.

Lastly, this period of the decline of Rome is marked by the growth of systematic law. It is the age of the Theodosian Code (A.D. 438) that great authority on Roman Law, which was followed, after a time, by the promulgation of the different German systems. The Visigoths code was deeply tinged with Roman ideas, and shews throughout the hand of the clergy. The most distinct characteristics of Evarik's laws are, perhaps, the Trust or grouping of warriors round their chief, and the granting of lands in commendation, one of the early rudiments of feudalism. The Burgundians also aimed at an orderly code, though they fell short of the Visigothic distinctness. The chief characteristic of their law is the anxiety shewn to place Roman and German on the same footing. The Franks also issued their law the rudest of all, and the simplest for it was a bare recital of their customs, and foreshadowed the later distinction between the written and the customary law.

The age was one of a certain movement of mind. There was a considerable literature, varied though debased in style and language. When the German invasion flowed over this superficial vigour it froze it to death. A century later there was no literature in Gaul and all desire of mental life was at an end. Between the old world of Rome and the new life of Europe there is a dead silence. men suffered, but ceased to complain.

'Leves curae loquuntur. Ingentes stupent.'

TABLE I. TH

BOOK II.

PART I—THE NEUSTRIAN FRANKS.

CHAPTER I.

Of the Franks and Hlodowig (Clovis).

A. D. 481—511.

AT Ewarik's death, the Franks were the smallest branch of the Teutonic stock. Visigoth and Burgundian had founded compact kingdoms in Gaul, while the Franks were still wild tribes, with no unity, barbarous, fierce, and pagan. A century earlier the career of Arbogast, Mellibald, and other Franks, had seemed likely to bridge over the chasm between Gaul and Germany, and to make the Franks the most influential of Teutons. The Roman power, defending the north frontier, came into contact with them. But they had no taste for emigration, they clung to the right bank of the Rhine, and though single chieftains had dealings with Rome, the tribes themselves remained uninfluenced. A mere loose confederation<sup>1</sup>, they were disunited down to the end of the fifth century.

Among their tribes, the Salians, who spread down into the marshy lands near the Rhine-mouths, became known for bravery and ceaseless raids on Northern Gaul. They became the most considerable of the Franks; and their chiefs, Mere-wings or Merwings (Merovingians) the most considerable among the noble families of the Confederation. They had gradually learnt to consider the left bank of the Rhine their own, as well as the right bank. 'Friends and allies of the Roman people, the Franks had long shed their blood on behalf of that frontier land. Slowly as the Romans faded away, they inherited the district, and settled in it. Chlodion, a Salian chief defeated the Romans at Cambrai, and occupied the country as far as the Somme (A.D. 428). The other main branch of the Franks—the Ripuarians—lay on the Rhine, about Cologne, and did not move as yet. The tribes shewed signs of drawing nearer to one another. About the middle of the fifth century Childeric, the Salian king and Sigebert the Ripuarian were both Merwings. In 481 Childeric died leaving a boy of fifteen to succeed him—if he could. This son was Hlodowig or Clovis. His tribe was small but renowned counting some four thousand fighting men, sprung from those Germans who had made the Batavian island known for the bravery of its inhabitants. In the fluctuating state of the tribes any chieftain of vigour was sure of a following. We do not know how Hlodowig won his reputation, but by the time he was twenty he headed a formidable army ready to face the only power left in Northern Gaul. This was Syagrius who kept up at Soissons the shadow of the Roman name. He ruled as an independent prince over the district east of the Armorican Republic, between the Meuse and Loire these two districts being the only ones not occupied by barbarian settlers. Here he administered justice mediated between Gauls and Germans, and had a plan for gathering all the North under his rule and governing as if by Roman law. On him broke in the young Frank in 486 the spiritless legions fled before the lusty barbarians, and Syagrius had to escape for his life to Toulouse. There he claimed the protection of Alaric the young Visigothic king and he not discerning the storm-cloud, delivered him up to Hlodowig who slew him. Thus ended the last shadow of Roman power in Gaul. Hlodowig now occupied the only open space left; and there was nothing between the Gallo-Romans and the barbarians

<sup>1</sup> This confederation is known to have existed in A. D. 242, when Aurelian defeated them near Mainz, and his soldiers made a song there, beginning—'Mille Francos, mille Sarmatas semel Occidimus, &c'. They occupied much of Lower Germany, between the Weser, Main, and Rhine. The district which bears their name, Franconia, was of their later conquests.

Rome having perished, to whom should the Church now turn? Visigoths and Burgundians, though Christians, were Arians The Frank was pagan; but then the Church had hope of the wild uncivilised tribes Her instincts guided her rightly The Frank became 'the sword of the Church', the Church made the fortune of the Frank<sup>1</sup> Remigius, bishop of Rheims, became close friend to Hlodowig long before he turned Christian To his counsel, probably, it is owing that Hlotchild (Clotilde), daughter of a Burgundian chief, niece of the Burgundian king, an orthodox maiden, became the Frank's wife The result proved the bishop's sagacity, it led to the conversion of the Franks 'Women,' says La Vallée<sup>2</sup>, 'were the most ardent missionaries of that faith to which they owed their own new life,' and this the bishop knew

Hlodowig was yet but a petty prince. the turning-point of his fortunes was at hand In 496 came this great trial The Allemans, whose home was on the Upper Rhine<sup>3</sup>, became restless, and made for Gaul They had two ways by which they might enter—that between the Vosges and the Jura, and that through the territory of the Ripuarian Franks They chose the latter The Franks called for the help of their Salian kinsmen. and Hlodowig came The united Franks fell on the invaders at Tolbiac (Zulpich), about four-and-twenty miles south-west of Cologne The battle went at first against the Franks Then Hlodowig, remembering his pious queen, vowed that if the God of Hlotchild would grant him victory, he would become a Christian. The battle changed, the Allemans were utterly routed, and the Franks proved that they would allow no fresh settlers in Gaul Hlodowig was regarded as the first of Frankish captains After some hesitation, followed by three thousand of his warriors, he was baptized in Rheims cathedral by Remigius. The Church historian who says that St. Remi was great in rhetoric, tells us that he used a theatrical phrase 'Sicambrian, bow the head! burn that thou hast adored, and adore that thou hast burnt'<sup>1</sup> With all possible splendour the ceremony was performed. It seemed to the barbarians that they were entering heaven itself. Thus did 'the Church take possession of her eldest son', and thus began that form of warlike Christianity which marks these centuries. A vow on the battlefield—the answer, victory—the result the baptism of an army—Such Christianity brought no softness or thought of peace to Hlodowig, but it brought him unscrupulous panegyrists and powerful friends. The clergy grouped themselves round him—under their influence the relics of the old Roman legions passed over, with their standards and their country to the victorious and orthodox barbarian. The peninsula of Brittany and part of Western Normandy still stood aloof.

<sup>1</sup> 'L'église fit la fortune des Francs,' says Michelet, I 188.

<sup>2</sup> La Vallée, Histoire des Français, Liv 1 chap 2

<sup>3</sup> In modern Franconia and Baden, and hence upper Rhine, from its source to its junction

Thus Hlodowig became lord of Northern Gaul. His Franks ceased to cast longing looks on the Rhine—they settled down in the lands they had won. Historians date from this moment the beginning of French history although true French history does not begin till the Capets were established on the throne and even then it is the history of a part rather than of the whole. Still we must go through these times, in which the foundations of French history were laid, and shew how the dominant Germans affected the subject Gauls—how the Germans were at last absorbed and the race became French.

The Franks were ready to follow their chief whether he would—their chief was eager to lead. First they attacked the Burgundians who were ruled by two kings, Condebald and Gondegesil,—the latter secretly allied with Hlodowig. The clergy were more than suspected of a like treason they turned willingly from their Arian lords to the orthodox chieftain Against these influences within, and the fierce Frank without, Gondebald could not struggle he was defeated in A D 500 Hlodowig pushed on into Provence, ravaged it, and gave it to Theoderic the Ostrogoth, who was then his friend. He next levied a tribute on the Burgundians, made Gondebald confess himself his 'man,' and so withdrew to the North Gondebald, free from him, resumed his reign, and seems to have governed wisely The Gallo-Romans had seen enough of their orthodox friend, they returned peaceably to their old king, who treated them well, as equals with his Burgundians. Thirty-four years later, after Hlodowig's death, Burgundy became subject to the Franks

<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours, 2, 31. We have no contemporary life of Hlodowig. Gregory of Tours, our best authority dealt with it in the spirit of a scalawag—hurchman and lived full half a century after the time on which we are engaged. Gregory was born in 540, and died 594 or 595. He calls Hlodowig a Sicambrian, because that tribe (which lay between the Lige and the Weser) was thought to have become part of the Frankish confederacy.

The Visigoths dwelt in a rich land 'It much displeases me,' said Hlodowig, in the year 507, 'that the Goths, being Arians, should own a part of Gaul Let us go, and God helping, seize their land<sup>1</sup>' And so the orthodox Franks, snuffing at the rich booty from afar, swooped down on the Visigoths The two kings met in single combat Alaric was slain, his army routed This was the battle on the 'Vocladensian plain' (Vouglé or Voulon)<sup>2</sup>, south of Poitiers Then the Frank divided his army Part, under his son Theoderic, overran Auvergne, and went eastward to Arles, part went southward, with himself, through Bordeaux, through Toulouse, to Carcassonne. Here, as he lay before the town, Theoderic the Ostrogoth came down on the Franks at Arles and routed them, and Hlodowig broke up from before Carcassonne, and withdrew to the north The Ostrogoth thus saved a little remnant of the Visigothic kingdom, a portion of the old Narbonnaise, afterwards called Septimania, which remained under them for three centuries longer

The Franks treated their new conquest with barbarity, and retired, when weary of it, with rich spoil and countless captives. The Gallo-Roman natives, amazed at their orthodox friends, conceived against them a hatred stronger far than any ill-will they had ever borne to the Goth, an ill-will which can be traced throughout the Middle Ages.

<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours, 2. 37

<sup>2</sup> Gibbon, chap 38.

Soon after his return to Tours, Hlodowig received an embassy from Anastasius, Emperor of the East, bringing him the dress and title of Consul Romanus<sup>1</sup>. With the love of splendour natural to the barbarian, he celebrated his investiture with much pomp in the Church of St. Martin his excellent but expensive<sup>2</sup> patron, he was invested with a purple tunic and mantle, and wore a diadem. Thus habited he rode through the streets to the cathedral<sup>3</sup>. The Gallo-Romans were much affected by the show seeing in it an acknowledgment that the sword of the conqueror conferred a good title the Teutons regarded it as a distinction which raised their chief by the recognition of the Empire above all other German chiefs while, on the other hand by wearing the purple Hlodowig bound himself to respect the Romans under his rule, and gave a pledge that his reign should not be one of mere desolation.

He had now done with distant expeditions. It only remained for him to secure his position as sole head of the Franks. He took the simplest steps,—murdering any head of a tribe who fell into his hands. He induced the son of Sigebert, king of the Ripuarians, by whose side he had fought at Zulpich, to murder his father. Soon after he assassinated the son. Then he came to the Ripuarians and advised them to take him as their chief which they did, raising him on a shield after their custom. Ragnachar king of Cambrai, the chiefs of Arras and Le Mans, all Meroving princes, also perished. So Hlodowig became sole head of the Franks among whom the Salians whom we may now begin to call Neustrians<sup>4</sup> were for more than two centuries the dominant tribe.

Gibbon thinks it probable the real title was that of Patrius and not Consul as Hlodowig's name does not appear in any Consular Fasti, not even in those compiled by Marus, Bishop of Avenches, in Switzerland (— Gibbon ch. 38 and note 67).

Hoc in auxilio curis in negotio, sibi Hlodowig of the Saint, when the clergy of Tours exacted a double ransom for his war-borne

<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours, 2. 34.

<sup>4</sup> In opposition to the name Austrasian (Ost-riik, or Eastern King's land)

Then, says Gregory of Tours, who relates these bloody details without a word of blame, Hlodowig called together his people, and said, 'Woe is me! for I am left as a sojourner in the midst of strangers! I have now no kinsmen to help me, if misfortune comes.' But this he said in guile, not in sorrow for he wished to see whether there were any surviving, that he might kill them also, if there were. But having said this—and finding no more to kill—he died<sup>1</sup> (A D 511) Though in all ways a barbarian, Hlodowig has won himself a place in history Restless, ambitious, a man of living force, he still was not a great man; for he shewed no constructive power, although, as conquering head of the Franks, he is not unjustly reckoned as the founder of a great nation He had certain strong qualities patience under provocation, which quietly waited for the moment of revenge, as we see in the well-known tale of the soldier and the vase of Soissons; a sense of humour, grim and German, as is seen in his speech to his men before the Gothic war, and in his reflection on his patron-saint, St Martin of Tours, an indifference as to what means he used to gain his ends,—he would not pause from murder, if that were the road He had the savage's love of blood, of fraud and falsehood Nor did his becoming a Christian modify his ferocity, he certainly modified the character of the Christianity of his and after ages God became more distinctly 'the God of Battles' As Gibbon says, 'The Romans communicated to their conqueror the use of the Christian religion and Latin language, but their language and their religion had alike degenerated from the simple purity of the Augustan and Apostolic age<sup>2</sup>' Nothing was farther from their thoughts than that 'Peace on Earth,' which was sung by the angels at our Saviour's birth, When they told Hlodowig the sad story of the Crucifixion, his exclamation was, 'Had I and my Franks been there, we would have avenged the wrong'—and the fierce thought, the thought of the Teuton triumphant by which name the Ripuarians were now designated the word Neustria is said to be either the Neueste-rik, the latest kingdom, or Ne-oster-rik.

<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours, 2 42, 43

<sup>2</sup> Gibbon, chap 38 (p 418, Milman's edition).

over the Roman, is a fair illustration of the conqueror's view of his Christian duty. This Christianity of the sword, which now entered in, ruled religion for centuries. It was the life-blood of the Crusades, it impressed its character on even the wars of the sixteenth century. Well had Ulfilas the Anan bishop of the Dacian Goths, read long before the risk to Christianity from his unruly proselytes. In translating the Bible into the Gothic speech<sup>1</sup> he entirely omitted the Books of Kings lest his fierce converts should draw thence lessons opposed to the gentle spirit of the Gospel, and but too congenial to their own character. The orthodox Gallo-Roman bishops who crowded round Hlodowig's throne had no such scruples. For him, a ferocious robber and murderer, they found sufficient precedents in the Old Testament. God's name was used as part of the Frankish title, to their conquests. I hold my land of God and my good sword, was said often enough before Hugh Capet or William the Bastard. In return Hlodowig loaded the Church with gifts of land till it was said that the Gallo-Romans recovered through their clergy what they had lost in war. The Church grew much stronger and richer during this period she gained perhaps almost as much as Christianity lost. The Franks, bringing into Gaul their sense of the mysterious, transplanting thither those religious feelings which they had formerly felt for their sacred groves and forest priests, paid to the clergy of their new home an almost unlimited respect. The bishops became the advisers and, in some sense the educators of the chieftains. No Frank dreamed of taking orders, they left that to the Gallo-Romans, unless, chance-time they wished to disable some long haired prince. Then they cut off his flowing locks, and tonsured him and he was thrust, as into exile into the ranks of the clergy. Otherwise, the Franks held the sword, not the cross, of Christianity and despised the life while they venerated the sanctity of the priesthood. Moreover as they brought into Gaul their old dislike of town-life, they left the bishops with sole authority in the cities and the clergy consequently continued to be the special representatives of the old Roman municipal life.

<sup>1</sup> Few relics of antiquity are more interesting to the Christian, the historian, and the philologist than the fragment of this great work which have come down to us for they are almost the sole remnants of the old Gothic speech.

The Church gained most of all by the change from a Roman Caesar to a Frankish king. Before the emperors she had been submissive, dependent, towards the Franks, she assumed the air of a benefactor, of a superior she had 'made their fortune', she guided their policy, blessed their arms, partially tempered their fierceness, standing between them and the conquered inhabitants of Gaul she lived under and administered the Roman law, not the rude Custom-law of the Franks. How highly the clergy were valued appears from the barbarian codes. The weregild or fine for the murder of a priest was the same as that for an 'antrustion,' or trusty companion of the king, that for a bishop was far above all other sums mentioned<sup>1</sup>. Guizot has remarked that the clergy of this period had a share in all the elements of power. The bishops were sole rulers, magistrates, protectors, of the towns, they were the counsellors of kings, they were also great landed proprietors, preparing to take rank among the territorial aristocracy of the future, the clergy were the defenders and comforters of the vanquished, as well as the friends of the conquerors. Thus in every way the Church was ready to take advantage of each movement that might take place come what might, she was prepared to rise<sup>2</sup>.

Such were the relations of the Franks with the Church. Let us touch briefly on their relations to the land on which they settled, as lords and oppressors of the older inhabitants.

Their settlement was slow and irregular. They shunned the cities, and let much of the country fall out of cultivation. They forgot neither their old homes nor their old habits. The northern line of distinction between Gaul and Germany disappeared. The Franks long deemed the Rhine their home, and hence they affected, in the end, the development of France far more than either Burgundian or Visigoth did. For their settlement was not once for all, as in the case of the others, in their case fresh Germanic blood kept on pouring into Northern France. This abolition of the northern frontier must be borne in mind in studying French history before Capetian times for it explains the true position of the Austrasian princes, who were entirely German, and stood towards France in a very different relation from that of the Merwing kings who settled down in Neustria. Hlodowig was far more a French king than was Charles the Great.

<sup>1</sup> At least this was so in the Burgundian code, in which a bishop's life was valued at 900 solidi, an antrustion's only at 600.

<sup>2</sup> Guizot, Civilisation en France, Leçon 8.

When the Franks did settle in Gaul, it was under conditions which insured anarchy. Their older system, such as it was, perished. Neither did the German village-life, as Tacitus describes it, nor their camp-life remain. They were broken up into little knots, almost independent of each other. The kings surrounded by their courtiers, passed from house to house, their palaces being simply large farms, or hunting grounds with houses on them. Here they lived, consuming the stuff and rejoicing in their idleness, hunting or carousing till their food was spent then on to another manor. His large territories were also in another way useful to the king he granted fiefs or benefices out of them to his friends gifts which he it seems intended to resume at pleasure but which gradually became first life holdings then hereditary possessions. This was the earliest and simplest form of feudal tenure. But the greater chiefs, who had followed the king with independent service who were often more powerful than he and eventually reduced him to nothing were not likely in the partition of lands, to submit themselves to the vague claims and authority of the king. As he took his share of conquered lands, so they took theirs took it as their right, with full and independent power over it. There was the alodial<sup>1</sup> tenure tenure of God and their good swords, as has before been said. Each of these chiefs had his followers; to them he granted benefices, as the king did, and on similar terms. In all this it must be remembered that, according to the German way of thinking, the man is everything, the land nothing. The condition of the holder determines that of the land. Lords of territories, kings of countries, are things unknown in this period, and for long after. 'King of Franks,' not 'King of Gaul,' was the title. Territorial designations came later, it was long ere men felt that they drew their nobility from their lands, not from themselves. The commoner sort of Franks took what they could get—their lot in the spoil,—their captives, share of cattle, dresses, vessels, ornaments, money. With these they sheltered themselves under some powerful chieftain, formed part of his followers, perhaps got a benefice from him, or perhaps sank to a lowly condition in his household. A considerable part of the land remained with its old possessors, and became tributary, under very various conditions. These lands were also granted to chieftains, who took tribute for them. The cultivators of these lands were on the high road to serfdom.

<sup>1</sup> Alodium is probably the Latinised form of the old Teutonic aldal or del noble by metathesis see Vigfusson's Ícelandic s. v. ald. The Latin sortes, by which the Gallo-Franses rendered the word aldal, seem to countenance the notion that it is connected with German. Loh, a bit. Fried is probably for ald, i. e. good in payment for valor rendered, or for personal services rendered.

Such was the state of the land. Part of it held as alod, independent of all service or duty, part as benefice, by favour of the king or chief who had granted it, part as tributary farms, cultivated by Gallo-Roman rustics.

The conquerors, being thus scattered over the face of the land, soon lost their interest in the old assemblies, the 'Fields of March,' and the 'Malls,' so characteristic of the old Frankish life. They were no longer a compact aggressive body of warriors, with common interests and passions. The annual Fields of March<sup>1</sup>, at which they used to debate their affairs of state, plan their expeditions, pass their fighting power under review, fell into disuse. These parliaments of free men languished on the soil of France. The Malls too, in which justice used to be done in the heart of the tribe's life, were greatly modified, and were at last held in every district in the kingdom. Counts, bishops, abbots, sat in the greater assizes (the Placita majora as they are called), and in the lower courts sat official judges named by the king. Here, too the old centre-point of Frankish life was lost. In fact, they bartered their old wild freedom and tribal unity for a rich and broad territory, broken up into many half-independent districts. Instead of a simple state of society, chiefs, followers, and captives, they now had the rudiments of monarchy and aristocracy with a town life and a church-life beside them—the rudiments of modern Europe. But in its first stage it was little but a dreary chaos of all anarchic vices and crimes.

<sup>1</sup> These great assemblies were held about the beginning of each year (as the year was then reckoned) in the month of March.

It is difficult to get at the state of the Gallo-Romans at this time. What records have we? Probably their condition was somewhat bettered. Domestic slavery was almost unknown among the Germans, at least at first. But before long slavery grew frightfully, until we can see that there remained hardly any middle class at all except perhaps in a few cities. But at first the Gallo-Romans, though conquered, were freed from the rapacities of the Roman Court. The Franks in the matter of fiscal exactions, were not severe masters. The clergy too being exclusively Gallo-Romans doubtless protected their kinsfolk and we know also that in some parts of Gaul the older inhabitants were on an equality with the incomers. They were also, to a large extent ruled by the Roman law in itself no slight boon. But their condition, though at first it rather improved ere long fell from bad to worse during the anarchy which followed the conquest.

CHAPTER II

The Neustrian Kings

A D. 511—687

WE come now to two centuries and a half of incessant and uninteresting struggles. History there can be none. A few essays on the time, a few biographical sketches, would give the best conception of the dreary waste<sup>1</sup>. Even the very terms we use require a caution: they have not their present significance. We are easily misled, when we talk of monarchy, aristocracy, the people, for the words do not bear their modern sense. The same is true of bishop, monk, churchman: the Gallo-Roman bishop, and the monk, the protestant of his age, must not be dressed up in the clothes of modern life.

The guiding lines through this historical desert are (1) the struggle of the Merwing kings with their chieftains, (2) the struggle between Neustria and Austrasia, (3) the movements of the Church.

It must also be remembered that towards the end of the time, the struggle between monarchy and the chieftains changed in character, and became a trial of strength between the Merwing kings and their Mayors of the Palace, represented by the great house of Pippin of Landen, absorbing into itself the struggle of Neustria against Austrasia, for Neustria went with the Merwings, while Austrasia supported the family of Pippin. Early in the period there are often independent kings on their uncultivated lands, finding in war the excitement for which they craved, or if war was unfortunately slack, following the mimic warfare of the chase caring for no man recognising no social ties or moral obligations, laying the foundations of that feudal lordship which was afterwards so splendidly bad in France, so brutally bad (though not so cruel) in Germany.

<sup>1</sup> Such essays are to be found in Guizot's Essais sur l'histoire de France, 3 4. The biographies of Brunhild, Bishop Eligus, Dagobert I, Ebroin, St Leger, Pippin of Landen, would do for the other part, were there materials enough to make them.

The partition did not lessen the vigour of the Franks. They attacked their neighbours right and left. The Austrasians defeated the Thuringians<sup>1</sup> and some Saxon tribes<sup>2</sup> wild pagans all then the Allemans<sup>3</sup> and Bavarians. The other kings attacked Burgundy in 524 and subdued it in 534. The Austrasians also went as freebooters into Italy but their expeditions thither have no special interest for us.

In the first war against Burgundy (A.D. 524) Hlodimir king of Orleans, was slain. He left three boys under the care of their grandmother Hlotchild, who had incited her sons to make this raid on her Burgundian kinsfolk. The kings of Paris and Soissons, Hildebert and Hlotair seized the three children and sent a messenger to Hlotchild, offering her a pair of scissors and a sword, with these words: Thy sons await thy wishes as to the three children shall they be shorn or slain? In her anguish she cried out, Slain rather than shorn!—for like a true Frank, though she revered the clergy she would rather see her descendants dead than disgraced by the tonsure. So the messenger returned and told the kings that the queen approved, and they might finish their work. Whereon Hlotair seized the eldest boy by the arm dashed him to the ground, and killed him. The second, hearing the cry of his brother fled to Hildebert's knees, who moved with pity begged for the child's life. But Hlotair replied Give him up or die for him and the boy was given up and also

Who lay in what is now the Thuringer Wald, between the Main and Elbe eastward of the Austrasian lands.

The Saxons lay north of the Austrasians, nearly from the Elbe to the Baltic across Hanover Brunswick, &c. They were not really conquered till Charles the Great's days.

The Allemans inhabited Lorraine and part of modern Swabia.
Gregory of Tours 3. 13.

murdered. But among the crowd was one that had a heart he snatched up the youngest child, fled out, and escaped. The child's life was saved; but it was thought well that he should—as the chronicler<sup>1</sup> has it—'despise a worldly throne'. So 'he passed to the Lord and died a priest<sup>2</sup>,' shorn, not slain. His name was Hlodoald, and he afterwards became a saint, and gave his name to St Cloud, a pretty village on the Seine, hard by Paris. Then Hildebert and Hlotair divided the lands of their brother Hlodomir, and after Hildebert's death, Hlotair succeeded to the whole.

This tale of Hlotair contains many characteristics of the race and time. We see the children with their long hair, denoting Merwing blood<sup>3</sup>, the Frankish dread of Orders, as closing the career of war and enjoyment so dear to them; the ferocity of the chiefs, the stuff of which the saints of the age were made.

In Austrasia Theodorik had died in 534, and was succeeded by his son Theodebert, who in happier times would have left his mark. He tried to govern wisely, with the help of Gallo-Roman ideas. He also kept alive the Frankish war-spirit by constant expeditions. This the Franks liked, but Gallo-Roman ideas and taxes they could not abide. So when Theodebert died, the Franks pursued his Gallo-Roman friend and adviser, Parthemus, into Trèves cathedral, bound him to a pillar, and then and there stoned him to death. Thus the Austrasian independence avenged itself on Gallo-Roman civilisation. But no one in Neustria murmured against taxation, except the clergy, they resisted, and warned Hlotair against 'spoiling the goods of the Lord, who might possibly spoil him of his kingdom', and he, joining prudence to penitence, desisted.

Neustria was settling down into a monarchy. Round Hlotair were reeves (grafen) or counts, royal officers, the clergy made court to him, as usual; the name of 'leudes,' which had originally belonged to all Frankish freemen, was given to the 'fideles' or 'antrustions,' the king's trusty men, who filled various offices and functions in the state. The Gallo-Romans also struggled for position as the 'king's men'. Out of the huge royal domain benefices were granted to these court followers. The Gallo-Romans, who knew of old the arts of courts, the uses of flattery sapped the foundations of the old Frankish spirit, and taught kings and subjects their respective places. Still, even in Neustria there were remains of the old spirit. Thus, at one time there was trouble with the Saxons, and Hlotair weary of the difficulty of dealing with them was for making terms of peace but his chiefs arose and said No they would again go into the Saxon land. Hlotair declared he would not go. They burst out into the old lawless Frankish fury and went nigh to kill him. Whereon he gave way marched at their head, and got for himself and them a bloody defeat after which the chiefs were glad to make peace as best they might and go home again. In 555 Hlotair seized the kingdom of Austrasia and in 558 on the death of Hildebert, Orleans fell to him and he became sole king of Franks. The career of war and murder answered so well for him that he continued it to the end. Then says Gregory of Tours, he fell ill of a fever and in his torment he cried out, Oh! how great must be the King of Heaven if he can thus kill so mighty a king as I! and so he died (A.D. 561)<sup>1</sup>. In his death we see once more the Frankish conception of God—a half-pagan belief in a Deity strong and terrible, who can and will torment the great ones of the earth.

<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours, 3 18

<sup>2</sup> Ibid

<sup>3</sup> Θεμιστόν γὰρ τοῖς βασιλεῦσι τῶν Φράγγων οὐ πάποτε κείρεσθαι — Agathias, p 14, A 524

II A.D. 567-613. At Hlotair's death the Frankish kingdom was again divided into four parts. Sigebert took Austrasia, Haribert had Paris, Hilperik Soissons, and Gontran Burgundy. When Haribert died in 567 Hilperik seized his domains, and made himself king of Neustria. This year 567 is the date of the definite division of Northern Gaul into the three real Frankish kingdoms of Austrasia, Neustria<sup>2</sup> and Burgundy. Of these

<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours, 4. 31.

<sup>2</sup> The boundaries of these divisions are always uncertain. Neustria, roughly speaking, lay between the Loire and Meuse. Austrasia lay between the Meuse and the Rhine. But Austrasia went beyond the upper Meuse so as to include part of modern Champagne and beyond the upper Rhine including the Palatinate and even part of Switzerland.

Austrasia and Neustria were ever at variance, usually at war while Burgundy, quietest and weakest of the three, sided now with the one, now with the other. The kingdoms became more territorial, less personal: everything points to a more fixed royalty in the Frankish world.

This is also the period of the struggle between Brunhild, daughter of Athanagild, king of the Visigoths, wife of Sigebert, king of Austrasia, and Fredegond, the low-born mistress, and afterwards queen, of Hilperik, king of Neustria. The plots, rivalries, crimes, wars, murders, of these two queens fill up the latter part of this century. About the same time we hear of the Mayor of the Palace. This officer was elected by the chiefs, acting independently, and was a check on the royal power, under the form of a kind of regency. The first Austrasian Mayor of the Palace was appointed at the time when Sigebert was but a boy. The administration of justice was placed in his hands. The office is found established, before long, in both Neustria and Burgundy. But in Neustria the Mayor of the Palace usually sided with the King, in Burgundy he was insignificant, being overshadowed by an officer styled the Patrician, a relic of the Roman tendencies of that kingdom. On the other hand, in Austrasia the power of the Mayors soon began to overshadow that of the Kings.

From this time we may date the beginning of a double rivalry—that of Austrasia and Neustria, and that of royalty and aristocracy. The clergy, to come to the other notable class, were already paying the penalty for their subservience to the Frankish chiefs. The kings soon learnt how to use the wealth of the Church, and the clergy sank to the position of worldly courtiers. They flocked round the throne, and kissed the hand stained with fraternal blood. The upper clergy became landed lords, vieing with the Frankish chiefs. They meddled in politics, and in the next period are found mixing in all the bloodshed and intrigue of the age. On the other hand, rude Franks, seeing the wealth of certain bishoprics, got themselves ordained for the sake of the domains.—sometimes they even got the sub-

various offices and functions in the state. The Gallo-Romans also struggled for position as the 'kings men'. Out of the huge royal domain benefices were granted to these court followers. The Gallo-Romans, who knew of old the arts of courts, the uses of flattery sapped the foundations of the old Frankish spirit, and taught kings and subjects their respective places. Still, even in Neustria there were remains of the old spirit. Thus, at one time there was trouble with the Saxons, and Hlotair weary of the difficulty of dealing with them was for making terms of peace but his chiefs arose and said, No they would again go into the Saxon land. Hlotair declared he would not go. They burst out into the old lawless Frankish fury and went nigh to kill him. Whereon he gave way marched at their head and got for himself and them a bloody defeat after which the chiefs were glad to make peace as best they might, and go home again. In 555 Hlotair seized the kingdom of Austrasia and in 558 on the death of Hildebert, Orleans fell to him and he became sole king of Franks. The career of war and murder answered so well for him that he continued it to the end. Then, says Gregory of Tours, he fell ill of a fever and in his torment he cried out, 'Oh! how great must be the King of Heaven if he can thus kill so mighty a king as I! and so he died (A.D. 561)<sup>1</sup>. In his death we see once more the Frankish conception of God a half pagan belief in a Deity strong and terrible, who can and will torment the great ones of the earth.

II A.D. 567-613. At Hlotair's death the Frankish kingdom was again divided into four parts. Sigebert took Austrasia, Haribert had Paris, Hilperik Solsons, and Gontran Burgundy. When Haribert died in 567 Hilperik seized his domains, and made himself king of Neustria. This year 567 is the date of the definite division of Northern Gaul into the three real Frankish kingdoms of Austrasia, Neustria<sup>2</sup> and Burgundy. Of these

<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours, 4. 21.

<sup>2</sup> The boundaries of these divisions are always uncertain. Neustria roughly speaking lay between the Loire and Meuse. Austrasia between the Meuse and the Rhine. But Austrasia went beyond the upper Meuse so as to include part of modern Champagne and beyond the upper Rhine is to include the Palatinate and even part of Switzerland.

Austrasia and Neustria were ever at variance, usually at war while Burgundy, quietest and weakest of the three, sided now with the one, now with the other. The kingdoms became more territorial, less personal. everything points to a more fixed royalty in the Frankish world.

This is also the period of the struggle between Brunhild, daughter of Athanagild, king of the Visigoths, wife of Sigebert, king of Austrasia, and Fredegond, the low-born mistress, and afterwards queen, of Hilperik, king of Neustria. The plots, rivalries, crimes, wars, murders, of these two queens fill up the latter part of this century. About the same time we hear of the Mayor of the Palace. This officer was elected by the chiefs, acting independently, and was a check on the royal power, under the form of a kind of regency. The first Austrasian Mayor of the Palace was appointed at the time when Sigebert was but a boy. The administration of justice was placed in his hands. The office is found established, before long, in both Neustria and Burgundy. But in Neustria the Mayor of the Palace usually sided with the King, in Burgundy he was insignificant, being overshadowed by an officer styled the Patrician, a relic of the Roman tendencies of that kingdom. On the other hand, in Austrasia the power of the Mayors soon began to overshadow that of the Kings.

From this time we may date the beginning of a double rivalry—that of Austrasia and Neustria, and that of royalty and aristocracy. The clergy, to come to the other notable class, were already paying the penalty for their subservience to the Frankish chiefs. The kings soon learnt how to use the wealth of the Church; and the clergy sank to the position of worldly courtiers. They flocked round the throne, and kissed the hand stained with fraternal blood. The upper clergy became landed lords, vieing with the Frankish chiefs. They meddled in politics, and in the next period are found mixing in all the bloodshed and intrigue of the age. On the other hand, rude Franks, seeing the wealth of certain bishoprics, got themselves ordained for the sake of the domains.—sometimes they even got the substance without the shadow, the domains without the tonsure. The kings interfered in episcopal elections, thrusting in whom they would, and violating the old right of popular, or at least clerical, election. At the end of this period we shall find the monks, the new religious element, chastising this worldliness allying themselves with the new dynasty (while the bishops clung to the Merwings) and sharing in its good fortune. Still, the clergy were not all like this even in the king's chambers they helped to tone down the roughness of Frankish habits, and in an age of universal turbulence the greater churches became refuges for the oppressed. The bishops grew into great alodial lords, under whose protection the weak sheltered themselves. With their spiritual powers they defended, on the whole successfully those who sat as suppliants at their altars. Yet, in the main, the spiritual life had lost much of its true character and it was time that Christianity should once more assert her living power. This she did when Benedict of Nursia founded his monasteries on the Italian hills, and set before the world a new view of man's destiny. The Benedictine Rule spread swiftly over France and for six centuries it was the only Rule in the land. The convents of the Order rose up to rebuke the worldliness of the Church. They preached simplicity and the dignity of labour they restored the respect due to toil. No longer should it be servile to work with one's hands. laborare est orare was one of the axioms of their rule and society needed to be reminded of this truth. For a harsh line had been drawn between the idle Frank who hunted and drank, and the wretched Gallo-Roman peasant who tilled the soil. The Frank in fact held that God had cursed the ground the Benedictine arose to teach man once more how to win a blessing from it. Throughout Gaul the monastic lands became examples of happy industry telling their own tale by force of contrast. The inequalities of race grew less before these missionaries and pioneers of modern industry liberty seemed to raise her fainting head within their walls to labour to sing to build, to write—these were their four great tasks. The world has few such worthy histories as that of the Benedictine Order few societies have left behind such monuments of ennobled toil.

The feud between Brunhild and Fredegond sprang out of a foul murder, done at Fredegond's bidding on Galswith, Hilperik's queen, Brunhild's sister. When she was dead, Fredegond was promoted, and became Hilperik's wife. Brunhild then induced the Austrasian leudes to force Sigebert, their peace-loving king, into the fray. They did not know that they were taking up the quarrel of a woman, beautiful and ambitious, full of Roman ideas, who would one day be their bitterest foe. The onslaught on Hilperik was sudden and irresistible. The unwilling Sigebert saw his victory with tears, and begged the chiefs to use their triumph modestly, they replied with reproaches, and went on to destroy all they found in Neustria. Hilperik was so thoroughly defeated that, next year, he yielded his crown to Sigebert. The Neustrian chiefs hoisted him on a shield, and proclaimed him King of Franks. At that moment two of Fredegond's pages drew near, and smote him on either side with poisoned daggers. He cried out, fell down, and died. Brunhild fell into the hands of her triumphant rival, who sent her, a prisoner, to Rouen, and Hildebert, a child of five years, was made king of Austrasia under tutelage of a Mayor. The Austrasian chiefs now consolidated their power, allied themselves with Gontran of Burgundy, and persuaded him to adopt Hildebert as his heir. Meanwhile, true to the strange mixture of romance and tragedy in her history, Brunhild was seen by Merow, a son of Hilperik, who fell deeply in love with her, rescued her from prison, and married her. Fredegond, furious at her escape, pursued the fugitives; but Brunhild escaped into Austrasia, while Merow, less fortunate, took refuge in the church at Tours. It is a pleasure in these gloomy times to come across a worthy deed, still more so when we know the actor well. Gregory the historian was at that time bishop of Tours, and he boldly refused to give the refugee up to Hilperik's men; and, fearing violence, which he could not have resisted, found convey him away. He made for Austrasia but Fredegond the implacable was on his track near the border her emissaries caught and slew him.

The whole life of Fredegond is a calendar of crimes, ending as was believed, in the assassination of her husband in 584. She murdered Praetextatus, archbishop of Ronen, at the altar, unfaithful to her husband, she murdered him and his children, she oppressed the Parisians she moved through devious blood stained tracks to an unworthy end. Between 584 and 587 she struggled against Austrasia, for a time detaching Gontran from the northern alliance. But the treaty of Andelot in 587 drew Gontran and Hilperik together again by it they guaranteed the integrity of each other's territories exchanged those lands who had passed from one kingdom to the other, secured the gifts made to the Church, and set the benefices granted to their chiefs on a better footing. This treaty is appealed to as showing the existence at this early time of the so-called Salic law of inheritance that is succession by the male line only. The good Gontran died in 593 and then Hildebert ruled over Austrasia and Burgundy. He too died in 595 leaving his two boys, Theodebert II, king of Austrasia, and Theodorik II king of Burgundy under their grandmother's tutelage. Thus the whole Frankish Empire was under the kingship of three children (for Hlotair II king of Neustria, was but eleven years old) governed by two old queens. Each child had also his Mayor of the Palace,—a dark shadow dogging his tottering footsteps. The two queens met for yet one more struggle but Fredegond held her own and at last we have the spectacle of these two fierce and wicked women ruling peaceably even gloriously over their children's shares of Gaul. In 597 Fredegond died in peace her crimes met with no punishment no reprobation here she left her son established firmly on the throne she had fulfilled all her ambition. For Brunhild remained yet sixteen years of life in which she struggled vainly against the ever growing strength and spirit of the Austrasian leaders and perished at last by a revolting death. After Fredegond's death she roused her Austrasians and Burgundians, and wrested almost all Neustria from the weak hands of Hlotar II<sup>1</sup>.

It is at this period of her career that the admirers of this queen, who, says Hallam, 'has had partisans almost as enthusiastic as those of Mary, Queen of Scots<sup>2</sup>,' ought to draw her picture. Victorious over the Neustrians, she held her own chiefs at bay with a stout heart and clear eye. She became the patroness of art, the builder of churches, the maker of roads, her greatness was felt by kings, by emperors; she helped Augustin in his mission to the English, she reformed her clergy, she received a letter of praise from Gregory the Great himself. Meanwhile she smote and murdered the great leudes, till they rose against her and drove her into Burgundy. There she continued the struggle. The Church, hitherto her friend, now abandoned her side and made cause with St Columbanus, who had been insulted by her for daring to tell her the truth. She still triumphed over and slew her grandson Theodebert, with his children. Theodorik II died, leaving her regent to four babes, her great-grandchildren. She still strove to carry out the design of her life, the erection of a firm monarchy in Austrasia. But now the leudes placed at their head two men, of a race destined to impress the world's history with a lasting mark, Pippin of Landen<sup>3</sup>, and Arnulf, bishop of Metz. Here in the dreary waste we meet with the beginning of a line which will lead us out of disorder into the ordered tracts of real history. So wandering across a pathless moorland, we light at last on a little stream, we trace it downwards till it becomes a great river, a power and blessing to the cultivated world. And thus Pippin of Landen carries us on in thought to Charles the Great, and the days in which modern society was founded, when order once more began to reign on the earth. In Pippin and Arnulf the lay and spiritual aristo-

<sup>1</sup> All, in fact, except some twelve districts between the Seine and the sea

<sup>2</sup> Hallam, Middle Ages, I 111

<sup>3</sup> Landen is not far from Liège. Pippin Heristal, who was grandfather of Pippin Great's father

<sup>4</sup> Pippin of
as the

cracies combined against the aged queen. They roused the leudes of Burgundy and Neustria to make common cause and agreed that they would slay Brunhild with all Theodorik's children, and make Hlotair II sole king of Franks, overshadowed by a Mayor of the Palace for each of the three divisions of the kingdom. It is from this time that the real importance of the office begins. Originally the Mayor of the Palace seems to have been a somewhat unimportant person in the king's household. Petitions and requests had to pass through his hands and he superintended the internal affairs of the court, as a kind of chamberlain. The office was Teutonic in origin and can be traced back, in its earlier form, a long way thus Badeguil was Mayor to Hlotair I, fourth son of Hlodowig. Nothing can be learnt as to the office from the name of it<sup>1</sup>. The Mayor was at first named by the king, then, elected by the chiefs—a change more marked in Austrasia than in Neustria, where the Mayors side with the kings against the chiefs. Presently in Austrasia, the office became fixed in one family that of Pippin of Landen it was held for life, it carried with it the chief command in war, and involved certain duties of rude justice. From Chamberlain to Regent, from Regent to Duke from Duke to king from king to Emperor of the West so rose the fortunes of the office with the great aristocratic family which held it, until it reached its highest in the person of the great Charles inheritor of the imperial name and of almost more than imperial power.

<sup>1</sup> Here are some of the derivations suggested. (1) The obvious Major domus seems to have been a real title; but not among the Franks. (2) Magister (O Fr magistr) domus; answering to one title found in the Latin histories, Magister palatii. (3) The Scandinavian Maer—mayr maer; but this does not suit an office which was at first not maer, but of low repute. (4) Celtic maer maer a magistrate. Not a Celtic origin; the name is most unlikely. (5) Mord-um, judge of murder, which is Sommelet's suggestion, but this was not the original part of the office and is like an ans heronim. (6) Maer maer O Germ as in its maer a maer maer villan a derivation which has much in its favour. The Latin chroniclers render the office by the names Maer in a la, Maer maer palatii custos, dux gubernator magister Intelectus as in Maer maer palatii, &c. But nothing can be concluded from these names. See the Meril, sur la langue françoise p. 6, 7 & notes.

The undaunted queen gathered an army and met the confederate chiefs near Neufchatel. But her army melted away, and left her to fall, with the four children, into Hlotar's hands, who carried out the plan without flinching. The four children were murdered at once; but the aged queen was tortured for three days, and at last they tied her to the heels of a wild horse, which, more merciful than men, soon put an end to her misery. Thus shamefully perished (A D 613) one who for more than fifty years had been the greatest personage in the Frankish realm. The horrors of her death add one more touch to the picture of this wretched and terrible age, of which Gibbon has truly said that 'it would be difficult to find anywhere more vice or less virtue'<sup>1</sup>. Brunhild engaged in two struggles, in both of which she was at a great disadvantage. Had she been Queen of Neustria she might easily have subdued her leudes—for in that part of the Frankish Empire they were already failing, and with her great abilities, she might have made such use of the still preponderant strength of Neustria, as would have put the Austrasians beneath her feet. For Austrasia, though its leudes were the better fighting-men, was still the weaker state. In Neustria she would have met with less opposition to her favourite scheme of a monarchy, based on the recollection of the Roman Empire. But as Queen of Austrasia she had throughout to fight against unequal chances. This she did with wonderful skill and success till her grandson's death in 613. Then the whole fabric of her building suddenly crumbled away and buried her in its ruins. The time would come when monarchy would successfully resist aristocracy, and when Austrasia would subdue Neustria but not by her hands, or as she would have wished. For the successful royalty would be the Neustrian, and the Austrasian conqueror, the head of the aristocracy. Dagobert, at the Neustrian court, was soon to show how high royalty could rise under a Merwing prince; and then, after half a century, Austrasia, led by the house of Pippin, would reduce the rest of the Frankish power under it.

<sup>1</sup> Gibbon, chap 38, and see Hallam, Middle Ages, I 1 1

Sigebert, who was but three years old, to be their king, and five years later he died. The splendour of his royal estate had been far more apparent than real he had no hold over Austrasia, and though the rest of Frankish Gaul lay at his feet, there was no stability in his position. On his death in 638 his Merwing monarchy fell of itself to dust.

IV A.D. 638-687 Sigebert is king of Austrasia. Hlodowig II Dagobert's second son, a child of four years, is king of Neustria. These two infants are the first of the so-called Rois sainéants—do-naught kings, royal nouentities. The two Frankish kingdoms diverged more and more, royalty in Austrasia became a mere shadow though the time for the change of dynasty was not come. Shadows and names of things long haunt the world after their substance is gone and when Grimoald the Austrasian Mayor Pippin of Landen's son, banished the son of Sigebert to an Irish monastery and proclaimed his own son as king the leudes all rose against him, took him and his son, and sent them to Hlodowig II who, naturally enough put them both to death.

On Hlodowig's death in 656 Hlotair III succeeded he was ruled by Ebroin, a man of some mark. His policy was to restore the Merwing monarchy and to curb the Austrasian chiefs. But he could only delay for a while the inevitable result. The rivalry and friendship of Ebroin and Leger bishop of Autun leaders of two opposite factions, form a curious episode. St. Leger at the head of the aristocratic party overthrew Ebroin tonsured him and banished him to the monastery of Luxeuil but soon, by the turn of fortune's wheel St. Leger also followed to the same place there the two statesmen became friends, and on Hilderic's death they once more plunged into the waves of the world's strife. Their friendship ended with their retirement they resumed their old places as heads of rival parties. But now Ebroin was too strong for St. Leger besieged him in his episcopal city of Autun and took him, put out his eyes, imprisoned him, tried him before a council, condemned him as an accomplice in Hilderic's murder and had him beheaded a not unmerited end But after his death he became a saint; and the name of St Leger is not unknown, even in northern England Ebroin now recognised Theodoric III as king, and ruled over the Neustrians and Burgundians with absolute power But in 678 the Austrasians chose as Mayors, Martin and Pippin, grandsons of Pippin of Landen, and resolved to pull down the champion of royalty. Ebroin succeeded in having Martin murdered, while he failed to slay the stronger man He was himself soon after slain by a Neustrian, and with him perished the last hope of the Merwings 'Teutonic France,' as historians sometimes call Austrasia, prepared to occupy 'Roman France,'—the German-speaking tribe the Latin-speaking tribe. The last of these invasions of Gaul by German was about to take place—an invasion the consequences of which were different from all before, for it led to that new form of the imperial conception of rule and order which produced the Holy Roman Empire, the grandest institution of the Middle Ages We are now at the beginning of the power destined to cope with the growing strength of the Papacy, and to beat back the onslaughts of Heathenism and Mahometanism in Western Europe The battle of Testry, fought in 687, between Pippin of Heristal and the Neustrians, closes the old chaotic period, and begins the new order of things The Neustrians were headed by Berthar, Mayor of the Palace to Theodorik III, the Austrasians by Pippin. Testry is in the Vermandois, near St Quentin there the long struggle of Frank with Frank came to an end From that day Merwing royalty faded away, and Pippin's house became almost absolute. Under that house the wild anarchy of the chiefs will be stayed, the elements of order will have time to gain strength, the aristocratic German Empire of Charles the Great will spread across Western Europe, law and justice will emerge, feudalism take shape for good and evil, the Church begin to shake herself from the dust, the see of Rome assert her proud position side by side with the Empire All this begins with the battle of Testry: we hail it as the first sign of our release from the shadow of death, in which we have been wandering

Pippin of Heristal,
Austrian Mayor of the Palace
687 Duke of Franks
(after Testry), 687; + 714

Grimoald, Neustrian Mayor of the Palace + 714.

Charles
Duke of Au
the Pal

Carloman,
Duke and Prince of Franks,
742-747 (resigned).

CHARLES THE

(Charlemagne)
King of Neustria, 768; of King of Franks and Lo
Emperor, 800

Charles + 811

Pippin,
King of Ita
781-810.

Darnard
King of Ital 810-818

Pippin,
Count of Vermandois.

Herrbert
of Vermandois.

P
of

oxen, guided by a cowherd thus went he to the palace or assembly, thus returned he home again. But the whole administration of the realm, all things to be done at home or abroad, fell to the care of the Prefect of the Court<sup>1</sup>. Thus the period between the battle of Testry and the crowning of Pippin the Short belongs in substance to the Carolings, in name to the older dynasty. But though the name of King only was left, it had a real weight for it carried a certain power over men's minds. Otherwise, how could nearly a century pass with the inconvenient and contemptible series of Merwing kings still dragging its miserable line—a very chain—across the age!

What then is the guiding track through this chapter? It is the establishment of a new Roman Empire, a German Empire in fact, of which one limb was Romanized Neustria, another Southern Gaul or Aquitaine, while the actual seat of power lay on or near the Rhine. It is Gaul ruled from and by Germany. The Austrasian princes became more and more German; the Roman influences, which had so changed the Neustrians, hardly touched them, they held court at Heristal on the Meuse, or at Cologne, or at Worms, or at Aix la Chapelle,—never in Gaul. The Rhine is the main artery of their national life; they spoke German, not Latin, nor the 'lingua Romana' or earliest French, which now first comes into being; their Empire spreads eastward<sup>2</sup> as well as over Italy and Gaul. The Austrasian princes were never French kings. The phrase 'Teutonic France' means Western Germany. Charles the Great was no French sovereign; he ruled over France as Augustus ruled over Gaul; it was a conquered district under the general imperial government. The Empire which looms so large under Charles the Great is what it was under Pippin of Heristal the first Charles, it is German, not French.

From the very beginning of this period the German elements revive; the 'Field of March' reappears, the annual council of the warriors again is held, German conceptions of law and justice come again to light. Even the clergy grow less distinctly and exclusively Gallo-Roman, many German names appear among the greater bishops they become more territorial, more like lay-chiefs. We do not hear so much of men like Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers, who could pen a neat copy of verses at table, describing his happiness as a bon vivant in elegiac verses addressed to St. Radegund, once Hlodher's queen now abbess of a nunnery at Poitiers. Rather we find them donning arms, coming to the Fields of March as lords of broad lands, taking up the ground they were to occupy throughout the feudal period. Above all, the army once more became the dominant feature of society. We shall see how Charles Martel created this strong power and bound it to himself. Its war spirit becomes all powerful, but far more organised and orderly than in the Neustrian days. No longer will it dictate its own movements, and rush where the plunder is richest, the excitement most keen. It becomes an Imperial army doing the bidding of one man. It raises its chief Captain to supreme power, secures the Empire's limits, consolidates for a time the floating atoms of society.

<sup>1</sup> One of the many names of the Mayor of the Palace—Eginhard, Vita Karoli Magni, 1

<sup>2</sup> From this time the very name Austrasia seems to move eastwards, until at last it settles down on the Danube

One more question. Why did Pippin's family rise to this height? We have already noticed the general causes which led to this result,—the decay of Neustrian vigour when kings, leudes, bishops, sank alike into sloth, unable to rule or to resist. There was no justice nor judgment the popular assemblies had perished the Church held no councils. Against the ruder and stronger Austrasians they were powerless. And Pippin's house led the Austrasians for the following reasons. The struggle lay between the landed chieftains and the kings with their courts. He who had great territories would be sure to stand high among the chiefs if also he had ability vigour keenness in war then he might easily be their head. Now Pippin of Landen had these gifts, and, what is more bequeathed them to his descendants. They steadily gathered lands, chiefly on the Rhine till by the time of Pippin of Heristal they were the wealthiest house in Austrasia. There was also a remarkable succession of great men. Four generations, from Pippin of Herstal to Charles the Great, pass without a sign of weakness. They understood the materials with which to work, the needs of the age. In war they smote back all races which threatened to overwhelm and destroy the Frankish Empire: at home they used all the instruments they found ready to their hand. The monks, that new force in Europe, became their most valued helpers, so long as the construction of the Empire was going on: when the Empire had to be organised and settled, then the bishops were used. Pippin of Herstal and Charles Martel made much use of the monks, but Pippin the Short and Charles the Great gathered the bishops round them, and found their help invaluable in bringing order to the Empire. But they especially showed sagacity in their alliance with the Papacy. From the time of Brunhild to the death of Pippin of Herstal there was little communication between the Pope and the Franks. But the monks were then, as ever, the Pope's militia, and connected the two powers. There were no other real powers in Western Europe, and these were not yet far enough advanced to stand in each other's way. Each therefore helped to secure the ground for the other, each drew on the other towards his goal—the Papacy to a spiritual Empire and headship over souls, the Frankish chiefs towards the revival, in part at least, of the fallen Empire of the West.

From the battle of Testry in 687 to the year 714, Pippin of Herstal ruled unquestioned over the whole Frankish race. His chief troubles lay on the German border, whither he often betook himself to wage desultory and defensive warfare against the wild pagans. He had two weapons: the sword, and then the monkish missionaries. It may be remembered that Gregory the Great, when sending monks to convert pagan England, had bidden them pass through Austrasia, and that Brunhild gave them welcome and God speed. This act of friendship was repaid a hundredfold when English and Scottish monks came as missionaries to Austrasia, and went out th to convert the German savages. They were the first of a long series of English heroes of the faith, chief among whom was Winfrith also named St. Boniface, the Apostle of Germany<sup>1</sup>. Their labours began under Pippin, and went on in successive reigns. Pippin died in 714 leaving his authority as Duke of the Franks so well established that he thought to bequeath it to his grandson, a child of six years, under the tutelage of his widow Plectrude. But here he was wrong. Things threatened to fall back into chaos. Neustria rose and defeated the German Franks, and seemed likely to crush their late masters.

Pippin however had left behind him a natural son, Charles, a man already known for bravery and vigour. But at this time he was in prison, thanks to Plectrude's foresight. Thence he escaped, rallied the Austrasian chiefs, and attacked the Neustrians on one side and Plectrude on the other. Though at first unsuccessful, he chanced to fall in with the Neustrians returning from the North, laden with the ransom they had extorted from Plectrude under Cologne walls. He met them near Cambrai, and utterly broke their power (717). Thence to the Rhine, where he repelled the Saxons. Then he sent forth a strong force of monks to convert them, and returned to Cologne, took it, took Plectrude whose little grandson was just dead and became supreme head of all Franks. The Neustrians made one more attempt to shake off the Germans, appealing for aid to Odo (Eudes) king of Aquitaine. But Charles met them near Solsons, and down they also went. So were the Neustrians finally quieted while on the other hand, the Aquitanians were left alone, ruled by Odo as independent king. He was a man of ability and vigour and bore the first brunt of Saracenic invasion. Septimania<sup>1</sup> went with the Spanish Visigoths. The Rhone valley was under the leudes who had domains on its banks and owed allegiance to no man. Brittany was still independent. The rest was under the Teutonic Frank.

<sup>1</sup> Septimania, a district of Southern France received this name either from its seven chief cities, or from the Septimanii, soldiers of the Seventh Legion, supposed to have been quartered there. It lay along the Mediterranean, from the Pyrenees to the Rhone bounded northwards by the Cevennes.

Charles was soon to be called on to face the external foes of the Frankish power, and it was first necessary for him to secure a devoted army. He must do for his chiefs what the earlier Merwings had done for theirs—attach them by land-gifts. But how could this be? He was not like Hlodowig, who had entered on an almost unoccupied land, to settle in it as a conqueror. He found the Frankish leudes in possession, he could not dispossess them nor could he touch the tributary lands, which were also in the hands of the great chiefs. For on those chiefs his power rested; he dared not offend them. There remained only the vast Church-lands, to a great extent held by Gallo-Romans. Now the bishops had sunk low in men's esteem, and could not appeal to such public opinion as then was. Charles contrasted their ease with the self-denial displayed by the monks, who went forth as missionaries without lands or purse into the wild lands of the heathen. So he took the Church-lands, and distributed them among his warriors. The cry of the dispossessed Churchmen rings through the old annals. Charles Martel, a saint at Rome, is a demon in the eyes of the Gallic bishops. Their impotent wrath might vent itself, but the strong Frank was dear to his lay-lords, and they, the monks, and Rome were more than a match for the worldly bishops of the age, who had to solace themselves, as best they could, with a legend. When men opened the tomb of Charles in after days, out flew a horrid griffin, and the grave was empty, its sides blackened. So, said the bishops, their order was avenged<sup>1</sup>. But his policy succeeded, and created a strong army devoted to him. It is the first instance of Church property used to consolidate the civil power<sup>2</sup>. This division of lands showed an advance in the fact that it was not a partition by lot or right; all flowed from the duke's will and this indicated an important change, showing the advance made towards a stronger form of government, and a new sense of allegiance and duty on the part of the Germans. These grants were not unlike the lands held by military tenure so common in feudal times.

<sup>1</sup> See below, p. 113, note 2

<sup>2</sup> It is quite analogous to the grants of Church-lands at first to the aristocracy in England and Germany

These Church-lands saved Europe. For twenty years the warriors they had bought kept up an unwearied contest with the pagan Saxons, who had now risen to be the representatives of Teutonic barbarism<sup>1</sup>. With these warriors Charles also met and thrust back the new power Mahometanism.

In less than a century after the Hegira<sup>2</sup>, the Arab Empire had spread across all the southern portion of the civilised world. From India to Spain the simple doctrines of Islam were enforced by the simple argument of the sword. They shamed Christendom by displaying a rigid monotheism in strong contrast with the half-concealed polytheism which had corrupted the purity of the Gospel. It was the high fortune of Charles to be called to meet the career of Mahometanism at its highest point of vigour and success, and to arrest it. Fighting against the followers of the Prophet he won for himself a place as one of the foremost champions of Christendom.

In 718 the Arabs, holding already almost all Spain poured over the Pyrenees into the Narbonnese district. In 721 they attacked Toulouse, but Odo drove them back again into Spain. Again he smote them in Provence in 725 but he was not strong enough, and in spite of their defeat they held their own in Southern Gaul. That year the Arabs reached and sacked Autun, on the southern slopes of the Vosges. Odo then allied himself with one branch of the Arabs whereon Charles marched into Aquitaine and punished him in 731. But in 732 Abd-el Rahman commander of the Khalif's army in Spain crushed Munuz, Odo's ally, crossed the Pyrenees and fell on Bordeaux. Odo was powerless to resist, and fled to Charles for help. The Arabs sacked Bordeaux, crossed the Garonne, ravaged Aquitaine, and, learning how wealthy was the Church of St Martin at Tours, pushed northwards for so goodly a prize. But Charles gathered up all his strength and met them 'between Tours and Poitiers<sup>1</sup>.' There 'the young civilisations of Europe and Asia<sup>2</sup>' stood face to face. There the horsemen of the East met the footmen of the West, the Semitic race made trial of strength with the Germanic. The battle was worthy of the cause, it was long and bloody. The chroniclers are not sparing of their numbers. Three hundred thousand Arab corpses, say they, marked the point at which the flood-tide turned. Of the battle itself we have no details. The scimitar proved vain against the 'Franciska<sup>3</sup>' in the muscular grasp of the brave German. Abd-el-Rahman perished, and his Arabs fell back slowly, relinquishing all they held in Aquitaine, though not in Provence and Septimania. From this day Charles became known by his name of Martel, 'the Hammer,' so mightily had he smitten and pounded the unbeliever<sup>4</sup>. The battle of Poitiers or Tours (for it is called by either name) has ever been counted as one of the world's decisive battles. But Charles did not rest on it. In a few years he had driven the Saracens from their last strongholds in the South of France.

<sup>1</sup> They became the champions of the lesser German tribes, the Allemans, Thuringians, &c., and were filled with a deadly hatred for the Franks. They lay between the Rhine and the Elbe, and had formed a vast confederacy of the still pagan Teutons.

<sup>2</sup> The Hegira, or flight of Mahomet with his disciples from Mecca to Medina, took place A.D. 622

The rest of his life is a dreary record of ceaseless activity, and as ceaseless resistance. Southern France and the Saxons alternately occupied him. No sooner had he passed the Rhine, than Aquitaine or Provence was in flame. When he was well over the Loire, the Saxons sprang again to arms. These two

<sup>1</sup> These cities are seventy miles apart but we have no better clue to the battlefield

<sup>2</sup> La Vallée, Histoire des Français, 2 1, § 7

<sup>3</sup> The 'Franciska' was the Frankish battle-axe, with a handle some three feet long, and a small axehead with a spur behind, like a Lochaber axe

<sup>4</sup> Hallam, Middle Ages, vol 1, ch 1, p 5 (note), though he allows that 'a contrary event would have essentially varied the drama of the world in all its subsequent scenes,' yet, with his usual judicial spirit, points out how rash it was to risk all on a battle, for, while defeat would have ruined the Franks, a policy of delay might far more safely have checked and foiled the invaders rivers limited his real power. Worn out with such endless toil he divided his dukedom between his two sons, and died in 741, leaving the final settlement and consolidation of the Austrasian Empire to his great son Pippin, and his yet greater grandson Charles.

Carloman and Pippin the Short, his sons, divided the Frankish power. To Carloman, as the elder fell the German part—Anstrasia, Thuringia, Swabia, to Pippin, the Gallic share—Neustria, Burgundy, Provence to Carloman the wars of the Saxon Mark, to Pippin the ill-will of Southern Gaul and the threatening Saracen. But the dangers of such a partition were averted by the character of Carloman. Pupil of the monks, he was worthy of their best teachings. During the six years that he ruled over the Eastern Franks, he showed the virtues of a good man with none of the proverbial weakness. No jealousies or differences came between him and his brother. The two seemed to have one aim, that of repelling all invaders and securing the Frankish power. For a time Carloman's vigour and success in war were as marked as Pippin's. He dealt firmly and well with the Church, reforming abuses with help of Winfrith (or Boniface), the English monk and missionary whom he had made archbishop of Mainz. Boniface was the link between monks and bishops, and indicated the beginning of the change of Frankish policy towards the Church. But the monk was still strong in him, a few years later he threw up his archbishopric, and, dressed as a simple missionary once more went forth to the wild pagans, at whose hands he courted and won the crown of martyrdom. He was the most illustrious of all the Englishmen who in that age devoted themselves for Germany. By his help, Carloman dealt with the bishops, forbade them the use of arms, restored them part of their goods. But in the midst of all this good work his heart yearned for rest. The monkish spirit then so strong had entered into him also, and in 747 he laid down the sword. His ducal rights and duties he placed in his brother's hands. He went to Rome there changed garb and became a monk.

Then, with brethren who had followed him to this intent, he built a cloister on Soracte, hard by St. Silvester's Church, and dwelt there for some years in the peace for which he had longed. Afterwards, when it became the fashion for Frankish chiefs to make pilgrimage to Rome, it seemed to them their duty, as they passed by, to visit their former lord and prince. But by thus paying him their respects in great numbers they destroyed the leisure and the contemplative life he so loved, and forced him to change his dwelling-place. Doubtless the rough talk of the Austrasians jarred on his pious ears, and possibly some stirring of his Frankish blood, more martial than saintly, came as he heard tell of Pippin and his goodly deeds of war. So 'he left his mountain and withdrew to the monastery of St. Benedict, on the Monte Casino' (which lies far beyond the goal of the Frankish pilgrims), 'and there spent in a holy life the years that still remained to him<sup>1</sup>.'

Thus Pippin the Short became sole duke of Franks, anon to be not only duke but king but we must not forget that all this while a poor creature has been existing, the Merwing king for the time being. Between Pippin and royalty lay but two obstacles—the last of these phantom-kings, Hilderik III, whom he had not long before placed on the throne, and the old feeling in favour of the Merwing name and family. Hilderik was no real difficulty, that he knew, but the feelings of the leudes must be considered. So he looked round for help, and found it in the Church. Not long before this the papacy had greeted the rising greatness of these new leaders of the orthodox and powerful Franks. In 741, Gregory III, being sore bested by the Lombards, had written to Charles Martel seeking help, offering in return the old title of 'Patrician of the Romans,' and hinting at a revived Western Empire. But Charles and Gregory died that same year<sup>2</sup>, and the matter stood over. But the thought had sprung into life, and the Church was preparing to cast in her lot with the new power.

<sup>1</sup> Eginhard, Vita Karoli Magni, § 2

<sup>2</sup> As did also Leo the Isaurian, the Greek emperor, the final promoter of the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches

Let us look for a moment at the progress of this power to which Charles appealed. The primitive Church in Rome was Greek, not Latin, a foreign 'religion, strange to the Romans, and chiefly embraced by strangers. Its life was in every sense underground, it was a struggle for existence. It was far less notable and flourishing than many other churches at the same time. But as time passed it gained strength and power, the bishop of Imperial Rome began to be looked on as the chief bishop of the Western Churches. He was listened to with respect by the African Church, and ere long the see of Rome rose to the level of the great patriarchal sees of the East. As their importance decreased it was clear that that of the Roman bishops would advance. Presently when the Church became strong enough in Rome, it began to identify itself with the Eternal City and to assume some of its attributes. And so we see that when Christianity was recognised by the State, and the chief seat of the Empire transferred to the new capital on the Bosphorus the Roman bishop was able at once to take up a very commanding position in the West, though the Eastern Churches regarded him with disfavour and certainly did not acknowledge his supremacy.

When the imperial authority in Italy was established at Ravenna, and the Western Empire fell away from Rome, the same result followed in the capital as in all the large municipia.—when the central authorities failed, the bishops stepped into their place and men regarded them as their true heads, the fountains of justice and truth, each ruling over his city wisely and benignly. So they combined with their work as pastors of men's souls the protection of their earthly life. As best they could they upheld what was good in a world of evil. In the forefront was the Roman bishop, who played his part bravely: men saw that he was worthy to be their chief. To him they looked for defence against the barbarian and the protection of their rights as well as for the comforts of religion, and the solace of looking to another life, in which the miseries they knew so well here would exist no more. So the bishop presently was regarded as the sole head of the Eternal City. He became, in some way, the object of that belief in Rome herself, a half-pagan worship, which is a curious characteristic of the half-barbarous subjects of the later Empire. The quasi-divinity of the city was visibly expressed in the person of the holy bishop. There grew up in ambitious and vigorous minds a great dream of domination; of a Spiritual Empire answering to that Temporal Empire, of which the memory never died out of Western Europe. The dream of one age became the claim of the next, the fact of the third, a historical sequence which the Roman bishops knew well and have often skilfully used.

At the beginning of the eighth century the Papacy saw before it either a great future or a great fall. Many things contributed to make it a very critical time: the old bonds were loosened, and society might either fall to pieces, or become newly knit by fresh bonds—if the former, then Rome, her bishopric, her name, might sink to nothing, as that of Antioch and others had done, if the latter, then the bishop of Rome might grow to be the central figure of a new Empire.

The Mahometan conquests, which hindered the Byzantine emperors, and made it impossible for them to watch over their interests in Rome, helped to free the Roman bishop from their control. Meanwhile the great Iconoclastic controversy<sup>1</sup>, rising to large proportions, widened still more the breach between East and West. The influence of Mahometanism may be seen reflected in the endeavour made by the Eastern emperors to remove that phase of the Christianity of the age,—the worship of images,—which threw Western Christendom into direct antagonism with the dominant ideas of the East. The more the Emperor insisted, the more the West clung to its images, the more the Pope stood out as its champion, and rose in public esteem. The ability and courage of the Lombards, who had now abandoned Arianism, were thrown into the same scale sequel to the image-controversy, Liutprand, the Lombard king took Ravenna in 727 thereby breaking the little thread which connected East and West. In 729 he went further, and did some kind of homage to the Pope, who now seemed to have found a lay arm on which to rest. But this was not to be. The Lombard was the instrument with which to sunder East and West but the Papacy remembered that he had been an heretic for generations, was too near a neighbour and would, if he grew strong become formidable to the Roman see. So though the popes were sometimes uncertain in policy on the whole they drew away from the Lombards. They also came to see that the Franks alone could really free them from the remnants of their subjection to the Empire<sup>1</sup>. The Franks were already firm friends, they helped and honoured the monks, they had given the Papacy a footing in Germany they were the strongest power in Europe, or at least gave promise of becoming so, they were far enough from Rome to be clear of clashing interests<sup>2</sup>. We have seen that the first overtures were made in 741 but failed through the death of pope and duke<sup>3</sup>. Now the moment was more favourable for each needed the other. The Papacy saw that the Church required for its independence a basis of temporal possessions she was suspicious of the Lombards, and was pressed by the Saracens in South Italy while the Frankish duke wanted a sanction for his usurpation of the kingly title which had for three centuries belonged unchallenged to the Merwings. He also had heard the whisper in which Pope Gregory III had suggested a future Empire of the West, as the blessing reserved for the most faithful defenders of the faith. Again, Pippin saw before him a congenial work the conquest of North Italy

<sup>1</sup> Of which Gibbon says well of the temporal power of the Pope, and the West.—Gibbon, chap. 49

<sup>1</sup> The popes were still obliged to pay a sum down for the imperial confirmation of their election. Early in the eighth century the emperor without ostensible reason, had summoned Pope Constantine to his court.

<sup>2</sup> The Papacy at this time needed, to secure itself, (1) a territorial status; (2) strong lay friends; (3) those friends not too near; (4) nor representatives of too high pretensions (like the emperors); (5) nor too friendly to the claims of independence raised by the bishops. It is clear that the Franks alone fulfilled these conditions.

<sup>3</sup> See above p. 105.

would extend his name and power, would reward his followers, and satisfy their craving for adventure : while on the other side the Pope knew that if the Frank assumed the name of King at his bidding, the world would see that the Scripture phrase 'by me kings reign, and princes decree justice' was receiving a solemn fulfilment

Lastly, there was not wanting, as the connecting link, the zeal of monks, eager to go between and to unite their spiritual chief, the Pope, with their temporal defender, the Austrasian duke. How could such a negotiation fail? In 752 Pippin's envoys, Burkhard bishop of Würzburg, and Fulrad abbot of St Denis, his chaplain (an Austrasian and a Neustrian, a bishop and a monk), returned from Rome, bringing Pope Zachary's reply to his question as to that embarrassing shadow, the long-haired king. That reply was, 'He who has the power, ought also to have the name, of king' And then another clause, not so clearly expressed, but in substance this — 'If you will smite the Lombard, we will transfer to you the signorial rights once belonging to the emperors, now in abeyance' Thereon Pippin, with consent and counsel of all Franks, laymen and churchmen, with the papal sanction, with all possible concord of 'de facto' reasons, took Hilderik III and deposed him. No bloodshed followed. The knife that might have slain a more formidable rival did but shear the flowing locks of the phantom-king. As those long tresses fell, the royal name fell with it from the Meroving race. They disappear from history, uncared for, unwept. Hilderik was put into the convent of St Omer, there he languished for two years, and then died.

And Pippin the Short,—we fancy him a stiff, sturdy little man, well-knit, and direct of purpose,—was at last made king of Franks in his stead, being crowned with high pomp in Soissons cathedral by the great Boniface, the English monk, evangelist and archbishop. It was the last act of Zachary's pontificate, the final seal put to the supremacy of the German Franks. We shall presently see how completely the centre of power has changed, and how 'France,' as the name was at first used, was a very much larger territory than that Roman France which answers in its turn to a part of our modern France. The Frankish land of Pippin's day composed of Franca Orientalis and Franca Occidentalis, on the one hand stretched far beyond the Rhine to the eastward, and on the other did not occupy all modern France, for some of the southern provinces were quite independent of it.

There now stand up two powers in the western world. The light of modern days begins to break, and on the horizon are dimly seen two huge figures, side by side, on whom the first rays fall. The Empire and the Papacy begin their great work of moulding the world: they are the founders of Modern Europe.

CHAPTER II.

Pippin the Short, the first Caroling King.

A D. 752-768.

IT is clear that there was uneasiness in Pippin's mind, even after he had thus, with every sanction, taken to himself the name of King. The Franks still seemed to feel that none but the Merwings had a right to that name. There was an indefinite awe about the title, which lingered long after every shadow of power had passed from the long-haired kings. At the same time, the kings had played so mean a part, that Pippin's warriors probably thought that their master had lowered himself by taking the royal name. This accounts for two facts: one, the obvious eagerness of Pippin to give dignity to the title by the new and striking circumstances of his coronations, the other, the constant tendency of the Carolings to desire an imperial rather than a royal name. Though Pippin and Charles were kings for half a century, they were always looking upwards. Their kingship itself was half-imperial; that is, it had qualities which foreshadowed an imperial future. It spread over far wider ground than the original Frankish kingdom, it held a different position towards the popes. 'Patrician of Rome' was the connecting title, the link between them and the Empire. We find that both the kings valued this title highly. They felt that the name 'King of Franks' was in no sense territorial, and yet they had to some extent, formed for themselves a territorial Empire<sup>1</sup>

In 753 Pope Stephen, second or third of that name<sup>2</sup>, finding that Hlaltulf, or Ataulf (Adolphus) king of the Lombards, after seizing Ravenna had marched on Rome, fled to Gaul for help. He was there received with the utmost fervour and reverence. Pippin caught the fortunate moment, and though already crowned, he prevailed on the Pope to recrown him with additional solemnity in Rheims Cathedral in 754. The religious element thus introduced into the coronation ceremony was in time transferred to the Holy Roman Empire. The thought remained in germ throughout the feudal times, and grew and took new shape as royalty became stronger. The Pope at the same time conferred on Pippin the name of Patrician of Rome an office which made him the representative of the imperial power in the West. It was the first step towards concentrating the attention of Europe on the Carolings as inheritors of the imperial idea for the idea had never died out, though the emperors themselves were gone.

In 755 died Boniface. His martyrdom marks the highest point of monkish ascendancy over the Carolings. He had converted the wild Germans in the interest of the Pope and the Franks. But from this time forward Pippin held out a friendly hand to the bishops. They were needed to organise his kingdom they formed a counterpoise to the great leudes they held in their hands such elements of civilisation as still existed. Litera ture, schools, mental activity, survived almost among them alone. They alone had a sense of law and tried to enforce it. The monks had brought Pope and King together, but the bishops were needed to give a practical form to that alliance. Pippin sought to rouse the clergy to a purer and nobler life. He gave them high place in the young state, he revived councils, improved the Church laws, brought the wilder clergy within bounds, restored part of the old endowments to the Church.<sup>1</sup> The king then bade the bishops take their place in the Field of March, which once more sprang into life. They turned these martial meetings into orderly assemblies, in which the Latin tongue supplanted the German, Roman ideas prevailed again, and the clergy once more took the lead.

<sup>1</sup> Sir H. Maine, speaking of the late growth of the conception of territorial kingship points out that the Carolings were inevitably thrust into the imperial position. There were but two conceptions of sovereignty: that of Kings of men, and that of Emperors. The former he holds, was set apart for the Merwings, the latter was vacant. Therefore the Caroling princes became emperors. Though this remark is acute and suggestive, it leaves unnoticed the fact, that for forty-eight years Pippin and Charles were, both in name and power Kings of the Franks.

<sup>2</sup> On Zachary's death in 752 a Stephen was elected Pope. He wore the triple crown three days, and died. Another Stephen followed, that is to say the one mentioned above. Historians are equally divided, some calling them Stephen II and Stephen III; others altogether omitting the short-lived Pontiff.

Meanwhile, Pippin was not forgetful of his pledge to the Roman see. He crossed the Alps, fell on the Lombards, and shut up Ataulf in Pavia. There he dictated peace. The Lombard paid a heavy ransom and abandoned all his conquests, and thus the Exarchate of Ravenna fell into Pippin's hands. The Eastern Emperor made his claim heard. The Exarchate, he said, had been wrongfully wrested from him by the Lombard, and ought to be restored. The Frank advised him to settle that with the Lombard, but the imperial arm was not long enough to seize the distant province. Pippin then gave the Exarchate 'to the Pope and the Republic of Rome (A.D. 755). This is the world-famous Donation of Pippin,' on which rests the whole fabric of the temporal power of the popes. Hitherto they had had a vague claim on the Roman territory, but no more, henceforth the Pope became a territorial prince and his whole future career was modified by the fact.

<sup>1</sup> Part was restored, part retained by the leudes to whom it had been granted, under the title of 'Precaria', i.e. the ownership of the Church was recognised by the payment of one golden 'solidus' annually for each farm. The lay holders took care that 'possession should be nine points of the law,' and these lands never returned to the Church. Still the boon granted was very great, and restored goodwill between the king and the bishops. This act of Pippin, reversing the policy of Charles Martel, has received the following mythical explanation, propounded when the bishops were in the ascendent — 'St. Eucherius being at prayer was rapt up into heaven. There he was shown the prince Charles suffering torments in hell's lowest depth. The saint asked the angel why this was so? He learnt that he had been condemned to this by the judgment of the saints whose goods he had taken. Eucherius, on his return to this life, sent for Boniface and Fulrad, told his vision, and begged them to visit the duke's tomb, that if his body were not found there, they might believe that he spoke the truth. Thereon they went to St. Denis, opened the tomb, and lo! there issued forth a dragon, and the tomb was found blackened within, as with fire. Whereon Pippin called a Synod, and at once restored to the Church all he could where he could not, he begged the bishops to grant the lands to him, under title of 'Precaria,' ordering that rent should be paid for them to the churches, until such time as the lands themselves could be restored.' Ex epistola Patrum Syn. Carisiacensis, A 858. In Dom Bouquet, Tom 3 p 659.

Next year (A.D. 756) Atanlf took heart, and again attacked Rome. Then the Pope called loudly for his Frankish champion, and Pippin once more descended on Italy defeated the Lombard, and gave into the Pope's hands the Pentapolis<sup>1</sup> and the Exarchate.

Thus began the interference of Germany in the affairs of North Italy, she henceforth became mixed up with every European struggle.

The rest of his days Pippin spent in the task of consolidating his Frankish Empire. Against the Saxon he made small progress but in southern Gaul he did good work. He recovered, after a seven years' siege Narbonne, the Arab capital, and freed Gaul from the Mahometan (A.D. 759). He then warred against the Aquitanians, who under their Duke Walffer and with help of the Gascons, held out against him eight years. In 768 Walffer was betrayed to the Franks and slain, and Pippin at last triumphed over southern Gaul. But he did not occupy it, always withdrawing with his army to the Rhine and Aquitaine, full of hatred towards those who had worked her so much woe, never became a true part of his Empire.

<sup>1</sup> A district on the Adriatic comprising the five cities of Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, and Ancona. It nearly answered to the sea-coast of ancient Umbria, while the sea-coast of the Exarchate nearly coincided with that of Gallia Cisalpana.

CHAPTER III

Charles the Great, otherwise called Charlemagne.

I THE LIFE OF CHARLES

THAT same year (A D 768) Pippin fell ill, divided the Empire between his two sons Charles and Carloman, and died at Paris. He was buried at St Denis, hard by his father's bones. For more than three years the two brothers divided the kingship over the Franks, and showed no very friendly disposition for one another. But their mother, Bertrada (or Bertha), a woman of capacity and sense, stood as mediator between them, and kept their jealousies from bursting into flame. Feeling that she needed external help in her anxious task, she made alliance with the Lombards. She negotiated marriages between her two sons and the two daughters of Desiderius<sup>1</sup>, the Lombard king, and also between her daughter Gisla and the Lombard's son. Charles married Desiderata, repented, and divorced her, —the first of a long series of wives, some reckon nine. The other marriages were frustrated, chiefly by the Pope, who looked with alarm at so threatening a combination.

In 771 Carloman died, and Charles was elected sole king of all the Franks. In 800 he was proclaimed Emperor at Rome. In 814 he died. The long reign of this great German lord of Gaul has always been regarded as the most important epoch of early European history.

But it is of European much more than of French history

<sup>1</sup> The French call him Didier

for he was in all respects Teutonic, not French. In birth, bringing up, dress, speech, dwelling places, habits, tone of mind, he was entirely German—the Rhine was his home. France was but one part of his Empire, however important it might be. Every touch given to his portrait by Eginhard<sup>1</sup> shows this. 'In person he was large and stout, of commanding stature yet not too tall<sup>2</sup> his forehead and upper part of his head were round eyes very large and bright, nose rather above the usual size<sup>3</sup> and he had beautiful hair his was a bright and cheerful expression of countenance. Though his neck was thick and short, and his person rather too fat<sup>4</sup> still whether standing or sitting his appearance was dignified and princely. His step was firm, his whole bearing manly his voice clear but rather shrill—too shrill for so noble a body<sup>5</sup> his health excellent, till the last four years of his life and even then he paid but small heed to his doctors, whom he almost hated, because they prescribed boiled meat instead of his favourite roasts. After the manner of his race he loved horseback and hunting<sup>6</sup>. He (like the German to this day) delighted in spas and natural hot springs. In them he often swam for he was an unrivalled swimmer. This is why he built a palace at Aquæ Grani (Aachen or Aix la Chapelle), and lived there during the latter years of his life. 'He would invite not only his sons to bathe with him, but his nobles and friends, nay even his satellites and

<sup>1</sup> Eginhard was Charles's friend and secretary.

Eginhard (Vita Karoli M. c. 22) says he was seven times as tall as his own foot—but as we do not know how long his foot was, we can only guess that he was probably rather over six feet of our measure. The Pseudo-Turpin says he was eight times the length of his foot, and that his foot was a very long one, showing the tendency of the legends towards the marvellous. The priests at Aachen still show a thigh bone among his relics—it is that of a tall man.

<sup>2</sup> Naso paululum mediocritatem excedenti. Students in physiognomy will look at it with satisfaction. It is what is called the conqueror's nose, when seen in profile, and is certainly the prominent feature of the face.

<sup>3</sup> Venterque projectior videretur. Eginhard is describing him when from forty-five to fifty years of age, not when he first became king of the Franks.

<sup>4</sup> Voce clara quidem, sed quæ minus corporis formæ convalescet.

<sup>5</sup> True of all Franks and Normans too.

body-guards, so that sometimes a hundred or more were in the water at once.

‘ He wore the dress of his country, that is, the Frankish dress—a linen shirt and drawers next his skin<sup>1</sup>, above these a tunic with a silken hem, and breeches of the same, then he wrapped his knees and legs down to the ankles with strips of linen, he wore boots on his feet, his shoulders and breast he guarded in winter with an overcoat of fur (of ermine or otter), over that a Frankish cloak, and, slung across him by a gold or silver belt, a scabbarded sword. Foreign dress, how rich soever it might be, he hated. He never wore it, save twice at Rome, once at the suit of Adrian, and once at the request of Leo, when he condescended to put on the Roman tunic, chlamys, and sandals. At ordinary times he dressed almost like any of the common folk around him<sup>2</sup>.

‘ He was moderate in eating and drinking, especially in the latter, for he detested drunkenness in any man. He could not well endure abstinence, and often complained that fasting was bad for his health. He very rarely gave a feast, if he did, it was on high feast days, and to a very large company. His usual dinner was of four dishes, besides his favourite roast meat, which his huntsmen served up on spits, hot from the fire.’ Conversation not having yet been invented among the Franks, ‘ he listened during his meal to some reading or lecture, histories and ancient deeds of war. He also took delight in St Augustine’s books, especially in the De Civitate Dei’.

After his mid-day meal he ate some fruit, took one draught of wine, and then lay down to sleep for two or three hours. He was easy of access to all friends, delighted in receiving strangers, would often call in suitors and hear their case, and give judgment, if the Count of the Palace asked him so to do. In his time, among the Franks and elsewhere, the marriage-tie was very weak, and men broke it or set it aside much as they liked. Charles was far from blameless in this respect, and, as we have already said, he had in succession, no less than nine wives. One of them Fastrada, was probably the chief cause of the few acts of cruelty which disfigure his reign. Still his domestic life was cheerful. He lived ever surrounded by his children. From whatever cause from policy or affection, he never let his handsome daughters marry neighbouring princes, but, as far as he could, retained his whole family around him throughout his life. He brought them up in Frankish fashion the sons learnt to hunt and ride and use their weapons manfully the daughters spun, and were brought up in all honourable knowledge. He lived chiefly at Engelenheim (Ingelheim, on the Rhine, not far from Mainz) or at Nimwegen (on the Waal) or later in life, at Aix la Chapelle.

<sup>1</sup> ‘ Ad corpus camisam lineam et feminalibus lineis induebatur ’

<sup>2</sup> ‘ Habitus ejus parum a communi et plebeo abhorrebat ’

In all these details his Teutonic character appears. We see it too in the colouring of his court. Of all the learned men he gathered round him, Churchmen though they were, only six of note came from Gallic districts (even counting Septimania as part of Gaul), while more than double that number were drawn from other parts of the Empire<sup>1</sup>. Again looking at the places at which he held councils, we find among them only one Gallic city Boulogne, in an enumeration of thirty five Malls<sup>2</sup>. It is true that he draws nearer to the Gallic mind in the intellectual bent of his character but that was partly caused by the Church men whom he encouraged, and partly by his marked ambition to be the head of the Roman world. To this is probably due his admiration for the De Civitate Dei, with its grand conception of the Church rising above the pagan and the barbarian worlds. He deemed himself fit chief for such a society.

Like all really great men, he is distinguished for the untiring vigour of his mind. It grasps at everything. From high dreams of universal empire, of civilisation centering in himself and effected by means of the Church, down to the regulation of the details of his crops and lands, he wearied of nothing, feared nothing as too great, despised nothing as too small. He was,

<sup>1</sup> I follow the table given in Guizot's Civilisation en France. Leçon 20.

<sup>2</sup> The nature of his Malls is explained on p. 77.

as Hallam says, 'born for universal innovation.' His Capitularies are of a most varied kind. Innovation with him was not destruction; patiently it built up society. His strong and manly sympathy with intellectual greatness led him to surround himself with the learned of every country. Alcuin was an Englishman, Leutrad a Norman, Peter a Pisan, Agobard a Spaniard, Theodulph an Italian Goth. He was warm in his friendships, always choosing capable men, and clinging to them, sometimes (as in Alcuin's case) longer than they liked. He had the cheerfulness and sociability of a man of robust and even health. Nor was he a mere pattern of learning. He was reckoned to be, after Alcuin, the most learned man in his Empire. He found leisure to become master of Latin, which he spoke as fluently as his own German tongue. He knew enough Greek to understand it well, though he could not speak it with ease. Like many great kings he took a minute interest in theological questions. He studied grammar under Peter of Pisa, and is said to have composed a treatise on the subject, he worked at rhetoric and logic, was a good speaker, and, for the age, a passable poet. He reformed the Calendar, and took much delight in astronomy, following with the utmost curiosity the course of the stars. He collected all the ballads current in his time, and did what in him lay for art and music. He recast the services of the Church, the Roman Missal was, in large part, substituted for the previous Gallican use, the Gregorian chant for the Ambrosian. 'only,' says one of the chroniclers, 'the Franks with their naturally harsh voices could not render the trills, the cadences, the varied movements of the Romans. They broke, rather than expressed, them in their rough throats<sup>1</sup>' He was attentive to questions of law, and made some attempt to reconcile the different codes in use—the Roman, the Salic, the Ripuarian. He also tried to learn to write, and to this end had tablets and writing materials under his pillow, so that in spare moments he might practise himself in forming the letters. But this alone seems to have been too hard for him, and he gave it up<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Vita S. Gregorii Magni, auct. Johanne Diacono, 2 9 10, and the Monk of St. Gall, 1 10

The encouragement he gave to the learned the care he took in importing men from the more fortunate British Isles, the eagerness with which he tried to push on his Franks in the ways of learning, his own studies,—all bear the impress of the same greatness of character. He gave to literature a real impulse—it is one of the definite results of his reign over the western world, and one which may be always be fairly cited against those who declare that nothing followed from his life, and that his Empire crumbled to pieces. But the Frankish nobles had no heart for learning. His son Louis was, in this respect, worthy of his father—he however was quite an exception. The Franks had many practical gifts, but not that of book learning. We read in the Chronicle of the Monk of St. Gall<sup>2</sup> that one day two Irishmen or Scots came to court, and gave out, to those who asked their business, that they were come to offer wisdom for sale. For they saw that folk think nothing of what they can have for nothing, but prize what they must buy. When this was reported to the king he as ever eager to welcome foreigners, and attracted by their reply had them into his presence, and asked them if what he had heard of them was true. They made reply that it was true and that they had brought wisdom for sale. He then asked them their price. They said they asked but a suitable school, and souls well disposed, and food and raiment. The king well pleased, kept them at his court. But after a while having to go forth to war he bade one of them remain behind, and placed under his charge a number of youths, some of noble race some of the middle rank of life, others sons of the poor and provided for them, according to their needs, a home and sustenance. On his return from war Charles bade the Scot bring before him all his pupils, with their work. The sons of the two lower classes of men laid before him work filled with all that was beautiful and learned, but the young nobles had nothing to show but incomplete work, the sure witness of their idleness. Then the wise king, imitating the justice of the King of kings, placed those who had been industrious on his right hand, and said to them, 'I thank you, my children, for you have done my bidding and your duty, so far as in you lay, I now bid you go on unto perfection. I will give you bishoprics and rich monasteries, and you shall ever be honoured in my eyes.' Then, turning to those on his left hand, he startled them with his look of fire, and spoke to them bitterly, as with a voice of thunder. 'You, young noblemen, you, sons of the great, you, who are trim and nice, you have trusted in your birth and wealth, have neglected my orders and your own sanctification, you have given yourselves to riotous living, to gambling, to idleness, or to vain exercise.' Then, with his usual oath, lifting his noble head and hand heavenwards, he added, 'By the King of Heaven, I think small things of your nobility and your trimness, though others may admire you and know of a surety that, if you do not make up for your idleness by hard work, you will never get any good from Charles.' A tale which shows the king's zeal for learning, and the idle resistance of his Franks, it incidentally illustrates his love for the inhabitants of the British Isles, and also his undoubted power over Church appointments. The tale is not without significance even now, though a thousand years have passed since the monk made or transcribed it<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Parum successit labor praeceptoris et sero inchoatus. Eginhard, Vita Karoli M. c. 24. We must remember that writing probably meant the ornamental style then in use, perhaps something more like illuminated. We know that Charles could sign his name.

<sup>2</sup> Monachi S. Gall. Chron. de Gestis Karoli M. 1. 1-3.

Another sign of his greatness was his love of building, and that on a grand scale. All great men have something of the engineer in them, and are aroused by the resistance of nature, the difficulties of construction are a pleasure to them. We find him constantly engaged on great works, he gave a strong impulse to architecture. The churches throughout the Empire were his especial care. The men he placed in important bishops reported to him what they had done in rebuilding or restoring God's houses in their dioceses. He himself superintended the building of the great Church at Aix-la-Chapelle destined to be the shrine wherein his body should be laid to rest. He also built palaces there, at Engelenheim, and at Nimwegen. But perhaps the most remarkable of his works, as combining the greatest engineering difficulties with the highest practical usefulness was his great bridge over the Rhine near Mainz. All the Empire seems to have contributed towards it. Ten years it was in building, and, when finished, was a huge mass of woodwork, half a mile in length, founded upon wooden piles driven into the river bed. It was intended to connect more closely the two halves of his Empire, the Rhine being the central stream and artery of the whole. But it was burnt to the water's edge a short time before the emperor's death a mishap which Eginhard places among the portents preceding his decease<sup>1</sup>. The emperor undismayed by the misfortune or by the labour, was planning the substitution of a stone bridge in its stead when death overtook him. His design has remained unfulfilled to our own times not till a few years ago was another solid bridge thrown across the Rhine near the same place.

<sup>1</sup> The Monk of St Gall wrote towards the end of the 9th

Now that we have touched on the personal qualities of this greatest of Teutons, we may, having caught a glimpse at his bearing and look, go on to a brief account of his doings in war and peace. Fortunately most of his wars lie away from our borders and need not be mentioned. But as to his great attempts to organise the nascent Empire we shall find it less easy to distinguish what part of his instructions and legislation is Teutonic, and what part belongs to Gaul. Still, even here we will endeavour to confine ourselves as far as may be, to the Gallic side of his labours. /

His wars were all offensive and defensive at once. His work as a warrior was to thrust all threatening neighbours back from the frontiers, and to secure independence and a time of quiet growth for the field that he had sown with the new seed of modern life. His long reign, his many campaigns, fulfilled this end. The end did not answer to his expectations, nor could his genius secure his Empire from falling asunder. But the great characteristic result of his time was a distinct consolidation of western society. His Empire perishes, but the kingdoms in a way remain, his imperial policy gives place to the growth of a strong feudalism, in which independent chieftains subdivide each kingdom into smaller states, ruled from the lord's castle, and subject to such central government as was then possible,—a number of small political bodies, each with its own laws and interests, and with some amount of organised life. These have replaced the shapeless chaos of previous times, and are the elements of the future in Europe.

<sup>1</sup> Eginhard, Vita Karoli M. § 37

During his reign of forty-six years, Charles went out with, or sent out, no less than fifty-three notable expeditions, and doubtless many more of less importance. This unwearied industry of war was directed against twelve different nations, and smote every race which seemed to threaten the borders of the Empire. These expeditions have little or no history. In all the eighteen campaigns against the Saxons, only two great battles seem to have been fought. The rest were 'military promenades,'—forts built, wild natives captured and Christianised at the sword's point, forests traversed, rivers crossed, submission exacted, and then back to the West, till another uneasy movement showed the need of another expedition. Rough measures were occasionally resorted to. for Charles could grow impatient with the stiff-necked race of heathens. Once he transplanted ten thousand Saxons from the Elbe to the thinly-peopled parts of his Gallic and German dominions, once he gave the order, and 4500 Saxons were slain in cold blood in a single day. His legislation breathed the same spirit of savagery towards them. Death was the penalty for the least infringement of Church order. The open profession of Christianity was bound up with their allegiance, if they failed in the one, they were failing in the other. But Charles's wars were not all of this ferocious kind

In the case of the Saxons, their stubborn resistance, which lasted three and thirty years (A.D. 772-804) tried his patience, impeded his power, and hindered the organisation of his Empire and at last betrayed him into the only acts of cruelty and barbarism which stain his history.

We have mentioned the Saxon wars out of course, both because they run through the chief part of this reign, and because as they lie away from our subject, it was well to dispose of them at once.

Of the other wars, which we will take in their order as they come on, those against the Aquitanians, the Lombards, the Bretons, and the Spanish Arabs, alone call for a detailed notice. The rest we need only mention.

1 While Carloman was still lord of half the Frankish Empire in 769 the Aquitanian war broke out. The south of Gaul had been subdued, and Waiffer slain, at the end of Pippin's reign. Subdued but not satisfied, the southerners thought they saw their opportunity in the death of the vigorous little thickset king. Two youths divided the Empire, the elder some seven and twenty years old, the younger still a boy. So the war began again. The old Duke Hunold, Waiffer's father after having worn the monkish frock for five-and-twenty years, took sword to deliver his country. But the Aquitanians were no gainers by the change of Frankish king. Charles beat the old man in the field, and built himself a stronghold 'Castellum Francicum'<sup>1</sup> on the Dordogne as a *centrepoin*t for his soldiers. Hunold fled to the Wascons, but they dared not harbour him. They gave him up to the Franks. He escaped out of their hands, took refuge with Desiderius the Lombard, where he had rest, till he again saw the Frankish king from the walls of Verona, and fell defending the last stronghold of the Lombards against his and their hereditary foe. The Aquitanians then made his grandson Lupus their duke and continued the struggle as best they might. Some years later (A.D. 778) Charles took Lupus and put him to death, divided Gascony among his sons and certain powerful lords, and in like manner partitioned Aquitania into fifteen counties, over which he set officers who were either Germans or Gallo-Romans whom he could trust, and granted much of the territory in the form of benefices to his soldiers. But as the imperial system unfolded itself before his eyes, and he felt himself strong enough to be head over vassal kingdoms, he resolved to yield to the strong wish of the southerners, and established a state under the name of the Kingdom of Aquitania, which by the end of the century stretched from the Ebro to the Loire. Over it he set his third son, Hludwig (or Louis), who was then but three years old, under the tutelage of Wilhelm 'Courtnez,' 'the Snubnosed'.<sup>1</sup> The baby-king was established at Toulouse, and educated after the manner of the Aquitanians. From that moment both Charles, sure of the honest allegiance of his son, and the Aquitanians, delivered from immediate Frankish rule, went on their way rejoicing, Charles to his other labours, the Aquitanians to the restoration of their ancient and wealthy cities. Thus they retained their distinctive character through another period. They were still, in the cities at least, thoroughly Roman, and in arts of life and general well-being far advanced beyond the northern parts of Gaul. This pre-eminence they kept up till it was destroyed by the religious wars of the thirteenth century.

<sup>1</sup> Perhaps Châtillon on the Dordogne.

<sup>2</sup> Five years before this work was accomplished (A D 773), Charles had been called to interfere in the affairs of Lombardy by Adrian the Pope, who desired his aid against Desiderius the Lombard king. They were already foes, for Charles had ignominiously divorced his first queen, the daughter of Desiderius. The war was short and simple. Charles crossed the Alps, beat the Lombards in open field, shut them up in Pavia and Verona, and then, traversing North Italy as a conqueror, entered Rome, and confirmed to Adrian the donation of his father Pippin.

<sup>1</sup> 'Dont les romanciers ont fait un chevalier errant, et les agiographes un saint, tandis que l'histoire n'en a conservé que le nom.'—Sismondi, Hist. des Français, 2 4

In 774 Pavia and Verona were forced to capitulate the Lombard king was thrust into a monastery, his son took refuge at Constantinople, and doubtless fanned the growing jealousy which the Eastern emperors felt towards the ambitious and powerful Frank, who was beginning to overshadow all the West. All Italy excepting the Duchy of Beneventum and Calabria, became part of the Frankish Empire.

At first Charles left Italy much as he found her, and contented himself with the additional title of King of Lombardy. But the Lombards leagued themselves with the Southern Italians, and revolted. Adrian again appealed to Charles, who came (in 776), removed the Lombard chiefs placed Franks in all high places, and created Italy into a separate kingdom, the crown of which he conferred on his second son Pippin. Thus he destroyed the only power which lay between him and supremacy in the West—the only nation which could possibly stand between him and the popes. Here, and presently afterwards (as we have seen) in Aquitaine, he began the imperial policy of creating dependent kingdoms, closely subordinated to himself—a federal union of states bound not to make peace or war or even to give reply to ambassadors, without his consent.

3 The Saxon wars began in 773 and lasted till 804, ending with the deportation of whole tribes into Gaul and Italy

4 The Saracens of Spain were suffering from those schisms and internal troubles, which first checked the onward movement of Islam, and gave Christendom time to breathe and form in front of the danger. Charles, mindful of his task of securing his frontiers, readily listened to the call of certain Emirs on the Pyrenees, who remaining faithful to Bagdad, were pressed by Abd-el-Rahman, lieutenant of the Khalif of Cordova. Charles raised two armies the one, composed of Aquitanians and Italians, entered Spain near the Mediterranean and marched straight towards Saragossa, the other composed of Franks and other Germans, commanded by himself entered by the passes of the western extremity of the Pyrenees, took Pampeluna, and joined the rest of his forces at Saragossa. But beyond this nothing seems to have been done. For some reason—either the ill-will of the Saracens and natives, or a consciousness that his base of operations was insecure, or tidings of a Saxon rising—Charles thought it well to retreat, and made his way back to the pass of Roncesvalles. He himself, with the main part of his army came through in safety, but his rear-guard and baggage were attacked by the wild Asturians and the men of Navarre, guided by Lupus, who hoped to catch his great enemy like a lion in toils. The surprise was complete. Of the rear-guard not a man escaped, and all the baggage fell to the mountaineers. In this sore disaster fell Egghard, steward of the royal table, Anselm, Count of the Palace, who probably were in charge of the baggage, and ‘Hruodland, Prefect of the Breton Mark<sup>1</sup>’ This short notice is all that history has to say of Roland, or Orlando, the famous paladin of romance.

Charles was unable to avenge this disaster. ‘For,’ says Eginhard, ‘the enemy, when they had done the deed, dispersed so completely that there was no possibility of telling where to fall in with them.’ Probably, also, the prudent king did not care again to entangle himself in Pyrenean defiles. The war in northern Spain went on independently, under Hludwig and his tutor Wilhelm, until, by the end of the century, the kingdom of Aquitania had firmly secured to itself the frontier of the Ebro.

The sixteen years from 785 to the end of the century were spent in incessant wars on every frontier. Thuringians, Bretons, Lombards of Beneventum, Bavarians, Huns or Alans, Slavonian Weltzes or Welatabes, Saxons, and Arabs, all felt the power of the Franks. But the campaigns are all of the same colourless character, resulting in a slow but steady beating down of all opposition, and a growing sense of security throughout the Empire. We need only notice the Breton war, which broke out in 786 or 787, when the Armoricans refused to pay their tribute to the Frankish king, and were attacked by one of his lieutenants. There was the stubborn resistance characteristic of the district.

<sup>1</sup> Eginhard, Vita K. M. 9

The war began in 786 or 787, and did not end till 811. At its close, Brittany became for the first time a part of the Frankish Empire. The effects of this subjugation were probably very slight, and the Bretons were but little touched by Frankish manners or ideas: they have never ceased to be a race distinct and characteristic.

On the death of Adrian I, Leo III was raised to the Papal throne. He made oath of fidelity to Charles as Patrician of Rome and showed himself submissive to the Frankish king. He probably knew that his position was insecure. In 799 the Romans rose against him, accused him of many crimes, and would have thrust out his eyes, but for either the fears or the soft hearts of the persons entrusted with the task<sup>1</sup>. He fled to Charles who was at Paderborn. The king received him with gladness, and had long consultations with him in which, probably the two agreed to confer each a boon upon the other. Charles should restore the Pope to Rome: the Pope should crown Charles Emperor of the West. Then was the Pontiff escorted back to Italy by a strong band of Frankish lords, charged to see that all due respect was shown to him, and that his enemies remained silent till Charles himself could come and judge of their complaints. Meanwhile the king for about a year pursued his own course: watched over his frontiers: visited northern Gaul, already suffering <sup>1</sup> Eginhard, Vita K. M. 28 says distinctly Leodem pontificem, multis affectum injuriis, erutis scilicet oculis linguaque amputata, &c. Now as Eginhard was at the court of Charles when Leo came thither and was not only a contemporary but an eye-witness, one might have believed that the Pope really lost both eyes and tongue. Yet it seems clear that he lost neither. Eginhard himself, in his Annals, while telling the same story with more detail, adds the significant words ut aliquibus visum est. (Annales sub anno 799) Theophanes, the Greek historian, a contemporary says that they wished to blind him, but that his executioners' hearts failed, and they did it not. Even the Monk of St. Gall says they only cut his eyes with a razor but did not blind him. (Mon. S. Gall. 1 26) I believe that the solution of the matter lies in the desire of both Charles and the Pope to raise the affair to its highest point of marvel; and that they favoured the tales of miraculous restoration to sight which sprang up instantly. Eginhard's Life of Charles was written for the court. Angibert, the court poet, who wrote an epic for the emperor first gives us this version of the tale and Eginhard has followed him.—See Paris, Histoire Poétique de Charlemagne p. 421 (1861).

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27 28
29 30 31 32
33 34 35
36 37
38
39 40
41 42
43
44
45 46
47 48
49
50
51 52
53
54
55
56 57
58
59 60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72 73
74
75
76
77
78
79 80
81
82
83
84
85
86
87
88 89
90
91 92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99
100

from Danish piracies, stationed men and ships at the mouths of the greater rivers, visited the chief cities, Rouen, Orleans, Tours, Paris, held the national assembly at Mainz, and finally passed over the Brenner<sup>1</sup> with a powerful army, more as a matter of state than for fear of any opposition, and reached Rome. The trial of the Pope began forthwith, but the assembled bishops confessed that they had no power to try one who sat in the apostolic seat. Then Leo declared his innocence by an oath, and Charles, satisfied, caused the Pope's enemies to be chastised.

On Christmas Day in this last year of the eighth century, Charles sat in the seat of state, hearing mass, which was celebrated by the Pope himself at the Vatican. All the greatest Franks and Romans were there. Suddenly the Pontiff stepped forward to the King, poured on his head the holy oil, and crowned him with a golden crown. The crowd, not untutored to be ready for the occasion, cried, 'To Charles Augustus crowned of God, great and peaceful Emperor of the Romans, life and victory!'

Thus was revived the Western Empire, in a very different age from that which saw its death. 'Thus Christian Rome,' says La Vallée<sup>2</sup>, 'found once more her ancient power, and once more created a Roman Emperor, but there was now nothing Roman left in the world—a Christian priest gave to a German soldier the title of that which had ceased to exist. It was then but a vain ceremony,—and yet it was the base of the political system of the Middle Ages, while Popes and Emperors disputed as to the government of the Christian world, and it was the origin of that great quarrel which disturbed the West for three centuries—the quarrel between the Empire and the Priesthood.' Charles gathered round himself all the floating traditions of the nations as to the lost imperial name. He ruled emperor-wise over a broad extent of Europe. Almost all the

<sup>1</sup> The low pass which connects Northern Tyrol and Innsbruck with Southern Tyrol and Italy

<sup>2</sup> La Vallée, Histoire des Français, 2 2 (p 179, ed 1865)

Germans, all the Latins obeyed him. His Empire embraced almost all Gaul, from the Rhine to the Pyrenees, together with the Spanish March, which stretched to the line of the Ebro all Italy, excepting the Greeks and the Duchy of Beneventum, all Central and Western Germany, and a large part of the Saxon territory, North Germany to the Vistula and across to the Danube eastward. Sundry Slavonic races acknowledged him as their head, Pannonia, Dacia, Istria, Liburnia, Dalmatia obeyed him saving that he left the sea-coast towns in the hands of the Eastern Emperors. He had, too allies and friends far and wide, Alfonso, King of Galicia and the Asturias, stooped to call himself the Emperor's man<sup>1</sup> the kings of the Scots styled him their lord and chief Aaron, King of Persia, (that is, the famous Haroun al Raschid,) lord of all the East, except India, was so much his friend that he sent him the keys of the Holy Sepulchre with splendid gifts, such as the East can give<sup>2</sup>. Lastly in spite of their natural jealousy the Byzantine Emperors thought it prudent to be on good terms with him<sup>3</sup> for as Eginhard well remarks, there is a Greek proverb, Have the Frank for your friend, but not for your neighbour<sup>4</sup>.

The rest of the reign of Charles the Great was passed in comparative tranquillity the expeditions were fewer and the Emperor himself went out to war only twice during the fourteen years once against the Northmen or Danes, in 810, and once against the Slavonian Wetztes, in 812. It is said that his stern

<sup>1</sup> Non aliter se apud filium quam proprium suum appellari juberet. — Eginhard, Vita h. M. c. 16.

At one time an elephant, at another tents, precious silks, unguents and perfumes, but especially a clock of gilt bronze, wherein a clepsydra marked out the twelve hours. As each hour ended, a little golden ball was released, and, falling on a bell, struck it, and made a sound. Moreover the clock had in it twelve horsemen, which issued forth from twelve windows, at the end of the hours, and by the shock of their issuing forth, closed up twelve other windows which before were open. Many other marvels were there also in the clock, too long to tell. — Eginhard, Annales, sub a. 807.

Eginhard (Vita h. M. c. 16) notices the fact that the Byzantine Emperors were exceedingly jealous of the assumption by Charles of the imperial name. Erat enim semper Romanis et Græcis Francorum suspecta potentia.

<sup>2</sup> Τὸν φραγκὸν φίλον ἔχει γυθίον σου ἔχει — Eginhard, Vita h. M. c. 16.

repression of the Northmen from the German frontier, and his line of forts on the Elbe, caused the Danes to take to their ships, and so led to that remarkable phenomenon of the ninth and tenth centuries, the settlements of the Northmen in England, France, Sicily, and elsewhere. There may be some truth in it, but the Northmen were always a sea-going folk. Did they not call the Baltic (which the Germans hardly knew at all<sup>1</sup>) the eastern highway, and the German Ocean, the western highway? Had not Danes in their ships attacked the English coasts as early as 787? and did not their ravages go on, without intermission, long before the war of Charles with them? Did not he find himself obliged to defend the Gallic coasts in 799? And, lastly, if these are not enough, the troubles of Harold Harfagr's reign had great influence in pushing the terrible Northmen to take their pastime on the high seas.

During these latter years of his reign, Charles claimed imperial honours, and endeavoured to consolidate that 'royalty by divine right' the foundations of which had been laid at the coronation of his father Pippin, in 752. He exacted from his leudes a new oath; not now as head proprietor of Frankish lands, or as Frankish king, the elect of his people<sup>2</sup>, but a sovereign by a higher title, elect of God, blessed by God's high priest. He stood as sovereign face to face with his free men, not as a lord with his vassals. The oath was analogous to that taken by a benefice-holder on accepting his gift of lands, but it differed essentially from it in being personal and not territorial. The Emperor carried his point, few of his men could dare to refuse, most of them, doubtless, failed to grasp the significance of the act. But his success was hollow, and rested on his own character. No sooner was the firm hand gone than it became plain that the imperial theory, as he had designed it, would not stand. The tendency of the age was towards territorial sovereignty that 'tardy offshoot of feudalism', as it has been called, which, though late in taking the form of royalty or rather in altering the conditions of royalty, was quick in asserting itself as the foundation of the power of the greater nobles. Charles, setting himself against this tendency and lifting his own personal authority so high, was fighting in vain against the inevitable course of things.

<sup>1</sup> 'Sinus ab occidentali oceano orientem versus porrigitur, longitudinis quidem incomptae, latitudinis vero quae nusquam e milia passuum excedat, cum in multis locis contractior inveniatur'—Eginhard, Vita K. M. c. 12

<sup>2</sup> Some lingering feeling about the right of the Merwings may possibly have survived the half century of Caroling kingship

In 806, at the assembly held at Thionville Charles carefully settled the succession of the Empire. His eldest son Charles was to have the imperial crown, and to hold the position he himself had held as supreme lord of all Franks, but ruling more immediately over Austrasia and Neustria. Pippin<sup>2</sup> and Hludwig were to retain the kingdoms of Italy and Aquitania. But death bereft him of both Charles<sup>3</sup> and Pippin<sup>4</sup>. Feeling that his life was drawing to its close, he held a diet at Aix-la-Chapelle in 813. There he presented to the Franks Louis, only surviving son of his second wife Hildegard, made him his colleague, crowned him and bade them salute him Emperor and Augustus. Then, sending him back to his kingdom, the aged Emperor in spite of his infirmities (he suffered much from fever and was lame of one leg) spent the rest of the autumn hunting in the forests round Aix-la-Chapelle, returning thither as to winter-quarters. In January 814 a fresh attack of fever seized him, followed by pleurisy which he soon felt to be fatal. He then devoutly received the Holy Communion, and died in peace, at the age of seventy-one. There was a question whether his body should be laid at St. Denis where his parents lay or at Aix-la-Chapelle. The Germans prevailed. The greatest of Germans lies in the great church that he himself had reared in the city he loved among those who spoke and speak his own tongue and belong to his own race<sup>5</sup>.

Maine's Ancient Law p. 107. It must be remembered that Sir H. Maine is speaking of the conception of royal power and authority.

Charles had an illegitimate son, handsome but humpbacked, whom he also called Pippin. He, for whatever cause conspired with some Frankish chiefs against his father was detected, and banished to a convent.

<sup>2</sup> In 811.

<sup>4</sup> In 810.

<sup>5</sup> Eginhard gives the inscription which was engraved upon his tomb:

‘In a life restlessly active, we see him reforming the coinage, and establishing the legal divisions of money, gathering about him the learned of every country; founding schools and collecting libraries; interfering, but with the tone of a king, in religious controversies, aiming, though prematurely, at the formation of a naval force, attempting, for the sake of commerce, the magnificent enterprise of uniting the Rhine and the Danube, and meditating to mould the discordant codes of Roman and barbarian laws into an uniform system<sup>1</sup>’ Thus has Hallam summed up his account of his labours. The summary, though brief and imperfect, gives us some conception of the many-sided activity of his long life. Guizot has also well stated the general results of the reign. ‘The huge Empire could not survive the powerful hand that had fashioned it, but none the less had a great work been accomplished. the invasion of the barbarians in the West was arrested, Germany herself ceased to be the theatre of incessant fluctuations of wandering tribes, the states there formed by the dismemberment of the great Emperor’s inheritance, grew solid by degrees, and became the dyke which stopped the human inundation that had desolated Europe for four centuries. Peoples and governments were more settled, and modern social order began to develop itself. This is the vast result of the reign of Charles, the dominant fact of the epoch<sup>2</sup>’

‘Sub hoc conditorio situm est corpus Karoli Magni atque orthodoxi Imperatoris, qui regnum Francorum nobiliter ampliavit, et per annos XLVII feliciter rexit. Decessit septuagenarius AD DCCCXIII indictione VII, v Kal Febr.’ But his reign can only be made to have lasted forty seven years by reckoning the years 768 and 814 as whole years, though he was crowned 9th Oct 768, and died 28th Jan 814. Consequently his reign really lasted forty-five years and (nearly) four months. Eginhard himself says he was in his seventy second year when he died, so that the ‘septuagenarius’ must be taken to refer to the decade.

<sup>1</sup> Hallam, Middle Ages, I 1 (p 11, ed 1846)

<sup>2</sup> Guizot, Essais sur l’Histoire de France, 3 (p 76, ed 1836)

II. THE ADMINISTRATION OF GAUL UNDER CHARLES THE GREAT

It must first be noted that Charles the Great divided what we now call France into two districts (1) Francia Occidentalis reaching to the Loire, and (2) Aquitania, from the Loire to the southward. Of these the former was again divided into Neustria and Burgundy the latter, into Aquitania proper Gascony Septimania, and the Spanish March. The northern part of Gaul was under the same general conditions as the rest of the Frankish part of the Empire, which was immediately under the Emperor, while the kingdom of Aquitania, under Louis and Count William his tutor was governed in accordance with Roman laws and usages.

The sketch of the political and social state of Gaul here attempted will refer only to that part of the country which was under the Emperor's own immediate government.

We have already seen that the land was divided into Alodial, Beneficiary and Tributary territories and that the inhabitants were either Frankish nobles, clergy free Franks, citizens, or slaves. It is also clear that the Frankish chieftains, who settled down in districts far from the centre of government, paid but small heed to the wishes of their nominal head. He was at Engelenheim or Aix, and they out of reach, in Burgundy or on the Seine. The aim of the Emperor was to bring them under his direct supervision their aim to be as unmolested and as independent as possible. He had a partial and transient success afterwards they became the lords of France, the great feudal seigneurs. It must also be borne in mind that even the clergy and monks had sunk to a very low moral and intellectual level. Charles had to preach the rudiments of morality to them to keep the bishops and abbots from becoming mere lay lords, who followed the army a field, or hunted and idled at home. He had also to watch over the ever increasing number of slaves while often he was powerless to save them from the horrors of

BRITANNIA

BRITANNIA

FRANCIA OCCIDENTALIS
AND
KINGDOM OF AQUITANIA
A.D. 800

N W

Pangloss

of the following spring; pressing questions they settled off-hand, but did not usually bring more difficult points to a conclusion. The lay and clerical bodies debated sometimes separately, sometimes together, according as the subjects under discussion required it.

There are signs in the Capitularies of Charles the Great that his leudes were often unwilling to appear, just as the burden of parliamentary attendance was regarded with ill-will by Englishmen at a later period. But his strong hand kept these assemblies from becoming slack, or from being converted into clerical synods. There seems sometimes to have been a difficulty in finding work for them: and they probably often discussed questions of a local character, by way of something to do. Their conclusions were sent abroad throughout the Empire, and formed that strangely mixed and multifarious collection which, under the title of Capitularies<sup>1</sup>, is the best source of information we possess as to the real condition of mankind at this period. No contemporary historian throws so much light on the social questions of the age. By these assemblies, far as they are from what we now understand by a legislative or deliberative body, the object Charles had in view was, partially at least, fulfilled. He brought his greater subjects into immediate contact with himself, they felt the weight of his personal character, and carried back into distant provinces those fresher and clearer conceptions as to justice and government, which were ever receiving practical illustration in the palace. Thus their isolation was partly counteracted, their territorial tendencies arrested. They remembered that they were Franks, under the chief whom they had, in name at least, elected to rule over them; and that this chief was, in reality as well as by position, the greatest man among them. To honour a man for his berless campaigns of his reign may astonish us<sup>1</sup> we cannot fail to see that these expeditions attached the Franks personally to him and were of great importance to him as tending to wean his greater chiefs from their territorial leanings. Internal policy as well as external need may have contributed to the warlike activity of the reign.

<sup>1</sup> Capitularies, or Collections of little Headings, is the name given to the decrees issued by the Emperors, after consultation with their assemblies. They were of the most varied description, not codes of law at all, but decrees, advices, opinions, upon particular questions as they arose. Those of his reign have been classified and briefly described by Guizot, Civilisation en France, Leçon 21

Still, without depreciating the importance—how great it was history shows on every page—of the position of Charles the Great as Head of the Army it is fair to say that he showed far more anxiety for the peaceful organisation of his realm the administration of justice the spread of learning and morality than for the development of the warlike vigour and more barbarous qualities of his people.

2 Twice a year the Emperor called together a general assembly composed nominally of all Franks really only of their chiefs. They met in May and in autumn. To the May meeting came all the grandees, lay or clerical, followed by their men at arms the higher chiefs to deliberate the lower to receive and confirm the conclusions come to by adherence and expression of opinion but no more. To Charles alone belonged the initiative. He laid matters before them, received their opinion and gained an insight into the views, the wishes, the grievances of the different parts of his Empire. At the autumnal assembly were present only the greater grandees and the royal counsellors they received the gifts of the kingdom, and discussed and prepared whatever was to be laid before the larger assembly

Perhaps nothing so clearly shows the great influence of his name, as the ease with which he collected sufficient forces for his many wars. He began life, it is true, with a nation behind him quite accustomed to war and fond of it. His father and grandfather had left him the inheritance of warlike success. He was himself at least their equal as a leader (though his wars have little of interest or generalship), and from the beginning he commanded the complete respect of his soldiers. His own lands probably provided the nucleus of every army (they were about a quarter of all Northern Gaul) The Frankish taste for adventure and fighting was unquenched: the wars brought sometimes an amazing share of booty to each chieftain—they were not all waged against wild Saxons. The plunder for instance, of the Avar ring must have made the Franks keen for any number of expeditions. A large part of his armies was composed of subjected tribes yet, allowing for all this, the supply of warriors was astonishing of the following spring, pressing questions they settled off-hand, but did not usually bring more difficult points to a conclusion. The lay and clerical bodies debated sometimes separately, sometimes together, according as the subjects under discussion required it

There are signs in the Capitularies of Charles the Great that his leudes were often unwilling to appear, just as the burden of parliamentary attendance was regarded with ill-will by Englishmen at a later period. But his strong hand kept these assemblies from becoming slack, or from being converted into clerical synods. There seems sometimes to have been a difficulty in finding work for them and they probably often discussed questions of a local character, by way of something to do. Their conclusions were sent abroad throughout the Empire, and formed that strangely mixed and multifarious collection which, under the title of Capitularies<sup>1</sup>, is the best source of information we possess as to the real condition of mankind at this period. No contemporary historian throws so much light on the social questions of the age. By these assemblies, far as they are from what we now understand by a legislative or deliberative body, the object Charles had in view was, partially at least, fulfilled. He brought his greater subjects into immediate contact with himself, they felt the weight of his personal character, and carried back into distant provinces those fresher and clearer conceptions as to justice and government, which were ever receiving practical illustration in the palace. Thus their isolation was partly counteracted, their territorial tendencies arrested. They remembered that they were Franks, under the chief whom they had, in name at least, elected to rule over them, and that this chief was, in reality as well as by position, the greatest man among them. To honour a man for his position, rather than for himself, is the common error of both ancient and modern society. Charles was the last man for centuries who held his own against the growing strength of localised powers. We may go farther and say that he was the only prince between Hludwig and Philip Augustus, that is, for nearly seven centuries who could make the great vassals feel the royal power and bend before it. This, far more than his wars, or his dubious saintship<sup>1</sup>, shows the true greatness of his character.

<sup>1</sup> Capitularies, or Collections of little Headings, is the name given to the decrees issued by the Emperors, after consultation with their assemblies. They were of the most varied description, not codes of law at all, but decrees, advices, opinions, upon particular questions as they arose. Those of his reign have been classified and briefly described by Guizot, Civilisation en France, Lefon 21

3 Setting aside the dukes and margraves, whose position depended on war rather than on peace,—the dukes as heads of great provinces, the margraves<sup>2</sup> as guardians of the wild frontier districts,—we find Gaul governed by an apparently complete system of officers, counts and their vicars, centeniers, and others, whose duties and position in the general system of administration we must now consider. But it must be remembered that this apparent completeness of order and administrative rule is only skin-deep. It was far better than what had gone before but it was usually quite inefficient, often very corrupt.

In every town of note there were two prominent officials, the count and the bishop. The former represented the Frankish element in the cities, the latter the Roman. The bishops had taken the place of the extinct Defensores. They had a jurisdiction of their own: they administered the Roman law: they were supposed at least to have influence of a peaceful and civilising kind over the cities. The count administered the Frankish law as well as its confusion admitted. He represented his master as Frankish king while perhaps the bishop shadowed forth his imperial and ecclesiastical character. It is needless to add that these authorities, side by side, often clashed, and not unfrequently were but two different forms of oppression.

Besides administering justice the counts were expected to help in levying troops for war and in collecting such taxes as might be imposed. They were, in fact, prefects settled in the chief towns of each district. In some sense the system was a shadow of the offices and arrangements of the later period of the Roman Empire. We may note in passing that these Gallic cities, seats of count and bishop, had not as yet fallen under the influence of the great lords, and were still able to maintain some slight vestiges of their old municipal character. They presently are overwhelmed by the high tide of feudalism, but they are never absolutely drowned, and emerge early into some part of independent life, and begin their important part as the buttresses of royalty against the great nobles. The counts had their 'vigueurs' or vicars<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> He was canonised, in spite of his personal irregularities, by Pascal III an Anti-pope, in 1163 or 1166 under pressure from Frederick Barbarossa.

<sup>2</sup> The title of Margrave, or Mark-graf Reeve of the March, properly belonged to those chiefs who guarded the frontiers.

Under the counts appear, somewhat indistinctly, certain local officers, holding local courts. Centeniers, or head men of hundreds, administer justice in small matters in bourgs and villages<sup>2</sup>, while there are traces here and there of a still lower organisation, that of decuries or tythings, under a 'decanus' or tything-man. These lower courts had but limited jurisdiction, and an appeal lay from them to the count. We see more clearly the officers called 'scabini' (schoffen) or local judges, appointed by the Missi Domini, or by the counts, and charged to hold those courts which a short time before had been held by the free Franks. These courts, the ghosts of ancient freedom, had become utterly corrupt, the free Franks either refused to appear at them, or did so to see what they might reap in bribes<sup>3</sup>

The administration of justice (or what bore its name) was not confined to these imperial officers and their courts. Each alodial chief, each great beneficiary, each great abbot, had his own powers over his own people; with what effects on wretched slaves and powerless free Franks, now just dropping into slavery, can easily be imagined.

<sup>1</sup> 'Vice-comites,' viscounts, afterwards

<sup>2</sup> The centeniers' court could not condemn to death or slavery

<sup>3</sup> These free Franks are called boni homines, or Rachinburgs, sometimes also Arimans. The term 'free Frank' was not properly opposed to leude or vassal, but rightly included all Franks, the tendency seems however to have been to use it specially of Franks who were neither lords nor v-

To retain his hold over all these half independent elements Charles the Great appointed certain high officers, the Missi Domini, 'Lords Commissioners, whose duty it was to travel through the provinces, and to see as with their master's eyes, the real state of things in the different districts over which the counts of the Empire usually presided.

The Missi Domini are among the most characteristic figures of the period. They were the Emperor's threads, by which he hoped to draw together isolated and half independent officers, to reform abuses, to encourage just judgment and fair dealing. He has left us, among his Capitularies, a tolerably clear account of three districts in Francia Occidentalis, assigned to three different pairs of Missi<sup>1</sup>. A layman and an ecclesiastic were usually sent forth together. Four times a year they traversed their districts, they held placita, or courts, whither the neighbouring counts were bound to come: they looked into the state of the administration, reformed what they could, reported to Charles upon all, they appointed 'scabini, advocates, notaries, and sent the Emperor lists of their appointments, they had authority to remove at once all bad functionaries, beneath the rank of count. The counts they could not remove they might report on an unfaithful one: and if any count were insubordinate and unjust, they might settle in his house, living at his charge, keeping daily watch over him till, in hopes of losing such unwelcome guests, he repented and did justice. Above all they were instructed to watch over and protect the poor to assuage their wants, to shield them from oppression. The Emperor's instructions to these commissioners figure largely in the Capitularies. If any one wishes to get a notion of the work of a commissioner let him turn to Guizot's History of Civilisation in France<sup>2</sup> in which is described the mission of

<sup>1</sup> (1) Starting from Orleans to Sens, then to Treves (Troyes), Lingoes (Langres), Besançon, and so back to the Loire and Orleans (this circuit went over the borders into Burgundy). (2) From Paris to Meicac (Meaux), Melun, Provins, Etampes, Poissy (a much narrower district than the first). (3) From Le Mans to Hoxoam, Lisieux, Bayeux, Coutances, Avranches, Evreux, thence to the Seine, ending at Rouen.

<sup>2</sup> Leçon 23.

Leitrad and Theodulf in Southern Gaul. He will find, in the report of the two Missi, a graphic account of their work, their difficulties, and the state of society with which they had to deal.

4 Lastly, we may reckon the church among the means of consolidation within the Emperor's reach. She alone had a sense of unity running throughout. While lay-folk were under many different national laws, each law being to some extent an element of disunion, which even Charles could not succeed in overcoming, the Church had but one code, applicable to all men everywhere. It was the 'omen of her future greatness'. The clergy were a centralised, organised body, in spite of the corruption and unfaithfulness festering within. They had united interests throughout Gaul. They rose into the new aristocracy by position, learning, wealth<sup>1</sup>, and yet they did not cease to be attached to, and to protect the old inhabitants. Their higher level of intelligence provided Charles with instruments for his reforms. They protected and cherished the few civic rights that still remained. Whatever had been the earlier use, by his time the nomination to high places, rich abbeys, powerful bishoprics, lay entirely in the Emperor's hand. The clergy therefore looked up to him as their powerful friend and patron. He was to them 'power at the beck of religion', the secular sword wielded in their behalf, and what can be dearer to the heart of proselytisers than a strong arm ready to carry their desires into effect? No wonder then that they drew close to him. Nor indeed is it strange that he should have allowed and encouraged the growth of their power. On the one hand, he conceded to them large powers of jurisdiction in civil causes, and, on the other hand, made them independent of the secular courts. This part of his policy Hallam regards as 'his greatest political error' The clergy doubtless seemed to him a counterpoise to the wild turbulence of the lay chieftains, he did not foresee that ere long they would so far secularise themselves as to join those chieftains in building up a strong aristocracy on the ruins of the royal power

<sup>1</sup> When the Franks settled in Gaul, the clergy were all Gallo-Romans, and sympathised only with the oppressed. But in course of time, as the Franks became Christians, endowed churches, and looked up to the bishops, the clergy naturally drew more and more to the upper class and identified themselves with lords, not with slaves. Still some even the higher clergy were Gallo-Romans, and their genealogy is described above.

These, then, are the elements by means of which Charles the Great sought to consolidate his huge Empire. We see him leading his Frankish warriors, himself tall of stature, unerring in war<sup>1</sup>, we see him presiding over originating regulating ratifying the deliberations of his assemblies, himself the source of law and order his royal commissioners, his local officers present him to us as the fountain head of justice, the preacher of righteousness, the redresser of wrong and, lastly his relations with the clergy show us this 'new Constantine' understanding as no other Frankish prince did his position as head of Church and State. From the beginning of the ninth century we must recognise him as the apex, the great crowned head, of the Western world. If we search history for parallels, we feel instinctively that we must look only in the highest rank. There alone shall we find a like restlessness of energy a like vigour and tenacity of mental grasp a like administrative skill and force, a like nobleness and breadth of character. Napoleon, in the days of his exile, was wont to compare himself with the great creators of society Alexander Caesar Charlemagne, I myself, have founded great Empires, said he on one occasion and his classification was obvious and just. We may perhaps think well to add two or three more names on this high level stand Solomon the great ruler of the Jewish Empire, and Akbar the contemporary of our Queen Elizabeth, the true founder of the Mogul Empire. In some respects we may also compare with Charles two very different persons,—the Czar Peter who recast the Muscovite Empire, and gave it its place in the European system and our own King Alfred, who in times and position, as well as in his anxiety for the bettering of his people was nearer to Charles than was any of the other great men mentioned, Alfred, whose mental and kingly qualities do not lose by comparison with the gigantic Frank, and whose nobler moral nature raises him, from one point of view, far above all the rest.

<sup>1</sup> If we except, perhaps, the surprise and tragedy of Roccavalles.

III. THE STATE OF SOCIETY IN GAUL UNDER CHARLES THE GREAT

IF we pass from the review of the great kingly qualities of the Emperor to his personal and moral life, we feel that we almost sink down into barbarism. In spite of the complaisance of Churchmen, we discern gross outrages on propriety and morality, which, though they may be called only a reflexion of the age, are none the less drawbacks to our estimate of his greatness. An analogous feeling passes over us, if we turn from viewing his administration and his attempts to organise the Empire to the consideration of the social state of men in Gaul during this period. Indistinct and dark it must ever appear as we look down into it. No historian deigned to touch upon the subject<sup>1</sup>, not till our own age did the passionate love of humanity lead writers to try and piece together the fragmentary indications to be met with in the Capitularies of the time, and in the chance and unintentional touches of the chroniclers. And, all done, we know scarcely anything.

We have no need to treat further of the Emperor and his Court; for both were thoroughly German; nor, indeed, would it help us in our inquiry, which is now confined to the condition of Gaul under the imperial system. Nor need we delay long in considering the Frankish chiefs. They lived coarse and brutal lives, hunting, warring, feasting and drinking, and all upon the produce of the soil, tilled by thousands of slaves. We note that the number of chieftains grew smaller, through war and other causes, also, that at this period holders of benefices were still striving to convert their tenure into alodial possession. A century later the tide ran the other way. We may note too that benefices, at first granted with no very distinct understanding as to their continuance, were now showing a tendency to become hereditary and permanent<sup>1</sup>, save when forfeited by treason. The Emperor's share of the soil of Gaul is said to have been about one quarter. Over this vast area he spread his beneficences, rewarding not only war service, but any kind of work done faithfully for him, by grants of land with all their inhabitants, houses, slaves, meadows, fields, fixtures, and furniture. Of the remaining three-fourths of the soil a large part belonged to the Church which had probably by this time recovered all it had lost through the policy of Charles Martel, the rest of the land was divided among the great proprietors.

<sup>1</sup> See the opening remarks in Sismondi's Histoire des Français, part 2
c 3

In the castles of these chieftains there had been large numbers of Free Franks, boni homines also throughout Gaul there were many free Franks cultivating the soil. But at this time they were being steadily driven downwards. The incessant wars lessened their numbers. Those who had attached themselves to the great houses sank into vassalage, being neither free nor slaves, those on the soil were despoiled of their little holdings by their stronger neighbours. Abbots and bishops, counts and centeniers, as well as the great proprietors, are accused of this injustice in the Capitularies<sup>2</sup>. At the same time many of these small Franks, aware of their weakness, gave themselves up voluntarily sometimes to the King often to privileged Churches. This marks the commencement of the tendency to convert alodial into beneficiary tenure which afterwards became so strong though, probably this surrender by free Franks of their small alodial possessions reduced their holdings rather to the state of tributary lands than to that of benefices. The tributary lands were under the protection of some powerful lord, who stood to them in something like the modern relation of landlord to his tenants They were not held by slaves but by freemen, or freedmen The tendency however was clearly downwards The old free Franks, so prominent before, independent, claiming equality with their chieftains, had long ago disappeared, their Austrasian successors were now likewise perishing through the operations of analogous causes

<sup>1</sup> The contrast between benefices and prebendæ, as seen in the attempt of Pippin the Short to restore Church-lands to the clergy is enough to show this. See above, p. 112.

<sup>2</sup> See Cap. Kar. Mag. A.D. 811 §§ 2, 3 Baluze, i. p. 483; cf. Baluze i. p. 42.

The free Gallo-Romans were in nearly the same plight A few of them, the wealthy ones, might be found at court, these were ambitious of ranking as equals with the Frankish chiefs, some of them were doubtless beneficiaries We see from the first attempt made by Charles the Great to govern Aquitania after its subjection, that they had not altogether lost position and influence. He appointed fifteen counts, many of whom were Romans, not Franks, the Roman element being naturally stronger in the south In the towns also they perhaps retained some security and independence, though not enough to leave any mark on the page of history, elsewhere they were fast disappearing, as they sank into slavery

If we look for anything brighter or more hopeful in the character and position of the higher clergy, very little light is visible The bishops, who are little but Frankish lords, mere secular dignities, take a full share in the oppression and extortion of the age, they lead their men and go to war, not disdaining the spoil, they take bribes, they drink freely, their morals are loose and reckless The Capitularies are full of instructions and exhortations to the upper clergy, proving their tendency, if nothing more, to be luxurious, idle, sensual, drunken, greedy of gain, or turbulent and wrathful, rude warriors and men of blood When the Emperor forbade them to take the field in person, he felt bound to declare that he did not intend to slight their authority or position The bishops were ever engaged in a threefold struggle—against the patriarchal position of the archbishops, against the lower clergy, and against the monks They triumphed in all, and the ninth century is, as Hallam calls it, the Age of the Bishops, just as the twelfth is that of the Popes But in the struggle and in the victory we have but little to satisfy us. It was a struggle for temporal power, for wealth, for immunities, not a struggle against evil, not even an attempt to introduce a higher civilisation, far less a struggle for truth. There was a constant scramble for good things. He who had the power ejected his weaker brother from his rich cure, and sat in it himself, when a bishop went on progress, his track was marked by exactions and greed.

The lower clergy during this time were tied down for life to the diocese in which they were ordained, never might rise to higher position, nor even change their home. Their one privilege was that they were not slaves—otherwise, their condition seems to have been utterly mean. The monasteries were sunk in apathy and wealth, except a very few in which the vigour of Charles the Great and Alcuin had succeeded in establishing thriving schools.

These were the free elements of the population of Gaul—Frankish lords, growing fewer in number and more powerful in territories every year—free Franks, who were scarcely able to hold up their heads above the level of the slaves—then the Gallo-Romans, far too weak to leave much mark on the times, and evidently with a few exceptions, also dropping into slavery, and lastly the clergy in their various ranks, not rising to the level of their vocation—the higher ecclesiastics assimilating themselves to the Frankish lords, the lower scarcely raised above the servile level.

Nine-tenths of the population of Gaul at this time were slaves<sup>1</sup>. Masses of human beings without hope or ambition, living only as the instruments and chattels of their lords, defenceless against violence, against the risks of bad seasons, against the desolations of war, with a horizon bounded by the neighbouring fields, and those not pastoral or beautiful, with no love of country or sense of personal responsibility, mere numbers, without even the poor comfort of feeling that the work of their hands was their own. Not that their condition was solely or entirely miserable. They probably, as a general rule, had enough to eat and drink, and the lower passions of our nature had tolerably free play; nor did they generally feel any aspiration after better things. On the Church estates their condition seems to have been comparatively fortunate; and in material possessions and advantages they were not so very far behind the poorer parts of the agricultural population of modern France<sup>1</sup>. Still, they were liable to fearful evils. Charles interfered, by one of his Capitularies, between his own slaves and their superintendents; giving the slave the right of access to himself, and ordering the 'judge' in no way to hinder that access. But it is easy to imagine how little such a privilege could be acted on. What chance had a friendless slave of breaking, save by some happy accident, through the barrier of contemptuous, or even hostile, officials who stood between him and the throne? Slaves belonging to Frankish lords do not seem to have even had the solace of this illusory privilege. They must have perished by thousands in any time of famine. The years of scarcity, 805 and 806, were terrible to them. Even the Emperor himself expresses a fear lest his slaves should perish of hunger, and if his were in this danger, then what hope was there for the rest? In their darkness they appear to have turned instinctively towards the religious houses, under whose more conscientious care they would be somewhat safer. One of the Capitularies, touching on this point with a delicate hand, enjoins that 'not too many slaves are to be allowed to flee to the monasteries, lest the country estates be left desolate. Charles, as a wise and just-dealing monarch, could not fail to see that they were justified in seeking such asylum, though the effects might be disastrous to the lands of the lay-lords.

<sup>1</sup> Charles made Alcuin a present of an estate, on which we learn that there were 20,000 head of slaves, though this was as nothing in comparison with the numbers on the lands of the greater lords. It is probable that in many parts, especially in Frankish Gaul, the proportion of slaves to freemen was far greater.

I do not know that there is much more to be gathered out of the materials we possess concerning the state of the ancestor of the present Frenchman. He was a spiritless slave. He seems to have been thought unworthy even to go to war together with his German masters. We read of no levies of Gallo-Roman armies, nor were the few men of note among them employed in warlike commands. Contemporary history does not deign to notice, even in the gross, the destinies of those who could take no part in the active life of the age and opinion doubtless agreed with history and despised and neglected the wretched slave. Charles the Great stands out honourably as an exception. The sense of justice so strong in him, and the unflagging activity of his character would not let him shut his eyes to any of those who, however lowly were still under his imperial care. We therefore find traces here and there of beneficent instructions and legislation for the Gallo-Romans. The clergy had not utterly forgotten the traditions and principles of their faith and their order. They too did something for their poor fellow-Christians—something if not much. The Frankish spirit had entered also into them, and they to a very large extent, looked on their slaves with the same eyes as their brethren the lay lords.

<sup>1</sup> See a note in La Vallée, Histoire des Français, tom. 1, p. 174 (ed. 1865), bearing on this point.

Among these poor creatures many strange superstitions flourished. Charlatans and vagabonds abounded. The Capitularies ordered them to be arrested and punished. They wandered about naked, dragging a chain, pretending they were doing penance, and levying alms. Akin to these ugly symptoms was the rage for pilgrimages, to which all flocked—priests, because they believed that a pilgrimage atoned for their scandalous lives; lords, because they raised money from their wretched slaves on the pretext that they needed it for the journey; the poor folk went, because they liked the beggar life and, because no doubt it was more pleasant to be a tramp than a slave. Magical usages were rife among all classes. The chrism was used as a charm as medicine. even the criminal who was happy enough to get a drop of it down his throat believed that it gave inward rights of sanctuary, and that he would escape punishment. And as (in common with the rest of his class) he probably did escape, his faith in the remedy was never shaken. Woods and trees were still regarded with superstitious reverence. All things combined to show that though many arts existed, practised too by slaves, and many forms of cultivation were known, still men's minds were in the rudest state, great crimes were rife, and every class of men corrupt.

These then were the elements of society; and thus the time in which, thanks to war, to differences of race, to the new position of the sovereign, the transition was slowly going on from the older system of chief and slaves with a considerable free population beside them, to the newer phase of lord and vassal and serf, with the free population extinguished. It was feudalism in all but the development of that independence in the greater lords, which was delayed by the strength of Charles the Great, though fostered, at the same time, by his wars and his policy towards the higher clergy. The chaos into which society presently fell gave these lords time and space to secure their position, and feudalism then sprang into full life.

CHAPTER IV

Hludwig (Louis) the Pious and his Sons, A.D. 814-843

THE latter days of Charles the Great had been sad enough. The peace of the Empire was preserved but there were ominous mutterings on many frontiers. The Saracens were busy on the Italian coast the Northmen uneasy and eager for booty, the Spanish Moors had held Hludwig in check the Greeks insulted the Frankish name in Venetia. Death came, and rent asunder the well planned imperial scheme which Charles had hoped should carry on the Frankish power after his death. But Charles, his eldest son, died in 811 Pippin, his second son, also died before him leaving a son Bernard, who became king of Italy. There remained only Hludwig. Charles, as we have seen, summoned him to Aachen, and made him Emperor then dismissed him to his kingdom, caring little to have a joint-emperor at his side perhaps not liking over well his clerky son.

When he died, Hludwig succeeded him with the goodwill of all. Had only a good prince been wanted, the Frankish Empire would have been happy in its new lord. But the days needed brute strength and sagacity combined not monastic virtues, gentleness, forgiveness, learning. And so it fell out that the days of Hludwig were evil and turbulent, and his life a trouble to him. From his father's death to his own in 840 things followed one course, ending in the disruption of the Empire in 843 by the treaty of Verdun.

Louis the First, as French histories call him—that is, Hludwig

the 'Pious,' or Debonair<sup>1</sup>—was thirty-five years old when he succeeded his father His life, almost from the cradle, had been spent in war and government, first under wise and prudent guardians, then under a wise and prudent wife. As a child he was sent to Aquitaine, when it was thoroughly hostile to the Northern Franks, and menaced with Saracen inroads along its Pyrenean frontier He,—or rather William Courtnez first, and he afterwards,—turned disaffection into content, dislike into love, thrust back the Moor, and added a fine territory to the kingdom, advancing the frontier-line from the Pyrenees to the Ebro He grew up surrounded by churchmen his quick and sound intelligence drank in the principles of Roman Law, which still formed the basis of Aquitanian justice. The churchmen, the representatives of all that was Roman, filled his mind with conceptions of rule and order; they made him half a monk, as men said, and there were times when he looked towards the quiet cloister with eager, weary eyes He ever leant on others in the world this had proved to be his snare, but in the cloister, as one of God's servants, he could rest on Him alone and be at peace. But this was not the thought with which he began his reign. High and conscientious aims guided him His father had been a conqueror, a queller of pagans, fierce of temper, a man of blood he would be a man of peace, building up instead of pulling down, and ruling over all men equally His father's court had been learned, but full of rudeness and iniquity, his court should be learned also, but refined and pure His father had crushed the great lords, he would raise them, and govern by them The clergy should have high authority The free Franks had sunk to serfdom, he would lift them out of the mire, and re-create a strong and faithful people, as a counterpoise to the lords In this way he hoped to lift all classes of men higher Thus did he begin his reign, with such noble intentions as these did he desire to rule. We shall see with what results.

<sup>1</sup> Ludovicus Pius, in German der Fromme, in French le Debonair, got his soubriquet from his character Pius in Late Latin means both religious and kindly or gentle Debonair is by no means 'de bon air,' 'genteel', but is a Low Latin form of 'bonus,' signifying one who is pious, gentle, kindly in disposition.

We may read in Thegan what manner of man he was for these old writers had a gift of minute drawing which we are apt to think peculiar to our day. He was of middle stature, with eyes large and clear face bright and intelligent, his nose long and straight, his lips fairly thick, perhaps not firm enough in their setting. He was strong-chested broad-shouldered, very powerful of arm, no man could better handle bow or lance he was large-handed straight fingered his legs long and shapely his feet long his voice manly<sup>1</sup>, wherein had his utterances answered to the volume, he had far surpassed his father. He was right learned in Latin and Greek, skilled in the Scriptures, expounding the same like a churchman after their moral, spiritual, and anagogical sense. As to the Frankish ballad poetry which he had learnt in youth, he cast it from him, and would neither read it, hear it, nor have it taught. Thus he was strong of limb quick, unwearied slow to anger swift of pity very exact in religious exercises, and strict in his life, very liberal in both giving and forgiving sober in meat and drink, moderate in dress, like his fathers. He was never known to laugh heartily never showed his teeth<sup>2</sup> he would smile a grave smile, some times. He had no liking for jesters and fools, and court shows. He hunted from August till bear time but not with much heart. He trusted his counsellors too much, though he was otherwise prudent was too fond of psalmody he also took of the lowest of the people<sup>3</sup> and made of them priests and bishops, and Thegan bewails, as one that had felt it their upstart pride, and the vices into which their elevation led them<sup>2</sup>.

Here then, we have the whole man. Not at all like his fathers, rude Frankish Christians of the sword, with fits of piety and fits of brutality and an under current of sensual vices but a clerkly southerner of the gentler type a pure unselfish devotee

<sup>1</sup> Thegan Opus de Gestis Lodovici Pil Imp. c. 19.

<sup>2</sup> Ille nunquam vel dentes candidos suos in risu ostendit.

<sup>3</sup> Thegan says they were iracundi, rixosi, maliloqui, obstinati, injuriosi.

a grave man, with large thoughtful eyes, which descried truth and the lie But his virtues were dangers Amiable and pliable, he forgave where a more prudent man would have crushed For in his day forgiveness was a perilous weakness He was too refined for his Frankish life That dislike of the stirring rough ballads marks the man He was not hearty, liked neither broad fun, nor the broad laugh, nor the rude verse in the mother tongue Above all, he was weak of will, and did not know how to make even those of his own household obey him A great part of his life was passed in a wretched struggle with his children

He married twice, first Hermingard and then Judith while the first lived, all went well with him, she bare him sons, Hlothar (Lothaire), Pippin, and Hludwig.

In 817 he called an assembly of all Franks, and created two kingdoms under the Empire—Aquitaine, over which he set Pippin his second son, and Bavaria, given to Hludwig his third son: Hlothar he seated by himself on the imperial throne. These lesser kings should not make either war or peace, or cede town or territory without his leave Like conditions were also imposed on his nephew Bernard in Italy, but Bernard would none of them, and set out to fight the Emperor His men deserted him, and he surrendered himself at Châlons-sur-Saône. The Emperor made him some assurances of safety, but these were passed by The Frankish assembly condemned him to death, he was slain, and his kingdom passed to Hlothar.

In 819 Hermingard died, and it is said that the sorrowing Emperor much desired to lay down the sceptre and become a monk Happy for him if he had! But his court overruled the wish, and he set himself, instead, to choose another wife. The fairest ladies of his realm were sought out, from among them he chose Judith, daughter of Welf, said to have been a Frank settled in Bavaria, a lady of exceeding beauty, clever and ambitious In 823 she bore him a son, Charles, called afterwards the Bald, fruitful source of many troubles to his father.

Jealousies sprang up ill-will against Judith and against the king's favourite and minister, Bernard, duke of Gothia, who was said to have as much power as one of the older Mayors of the Palace. Under their influence Hludwig in 829 called an assembly of Franks at Worms and, with the consent of Hlothar formed an arbitrary kingdom out of the country between the Jura, the Alps, the Rhine, and the Main he called it Alemannia, after the name of its old inhabitants, and gave it to his little son Charles. What more was needed to kindle into flame all the latent jealousies? The princes saw in it a proof that Judith's interests clashed with theirs the nobles seized it as a means of raising themselves the clergy for their own reasons, were ready enough to spurn their friend and benefactor all who loved war that is the whole Frankish race, saw with grim joy the coming troubles. The outbreak of a Breton rising in 830 gave the opportunity. The army revolted and the heads of the conspiracy, which had been brewing for some time called Pippin to be their leader. The other sons speedily joined. Hludwig bent before the storm. Bernard duke of Gothia, fled to Barcelona, Judith to Poitiers, Hludwig fell into his sons hands. It was agreed that the name of Emperor should be left him but that he should be shut up in a convent, Hlothar reigning in his name. The kingdom of Alemannia was taken from Charles the arrangement of 817 restored. But there sprang up again the old ill-will between German and Gallic Frank, the Teutonic branch returned to the Emperor's side. He called an assembly at Nimwegen refusing to hold it in France. The Germans crowded thither. Pippin and the younger Hludwig also came, and the Emperor was restored to power.

The rest of the weak Emperor's reign is monotonous and sad. Constant troubles from ambitious and jealous princes, from clashing interests of nobles and churchmen, based on the stem-differences of race and tongue fill up the remainder of his life. Bernard, the Emperor's favourite, gives place to Gundobald, the lay lord to a monk, and joins the insurgent sons The Pope, Gregory IV, blesses their unnatural warfare, —this often came to be part of the Papal duties. In 833 the Emperor met his sons at Rothfeld, not far from Basel. But his whole army slipped away from him, every promise, oath, protestation, was broken, and men for ages called the spot Lügenfeld, the ‘Field of Lies’

The bishops of Roman France, under Hlothar’s influence, had forced the deposed Emperor to submit to a humiliating penance at Compiègne. But though his meek spirit bore the churchman’s foot on his neck, Teutonic France did not. There was a violent reaction, and in a few months Hludwig found himself the head of an apparently unanimous people, again supported by his younger sons, Pippin (who died in 838) and Hludwig. One partition followed another; till at last, under Judith’s influence, the old Emperor in 839 made a treaty at Worms, dividing the Empire between Hlothar and the young Charles, leaving Bavaria only for his son Hludwig. He flamed out into open revolt. The Emperor drove him back into Bavaria. but returning from this dreary war against his own son, the old man, whose health was broken, rested on one of the Rhine islands, over against Engclenheim, and there, doing humble devotion, he passed the last few weeks of his life. Early in the summer of 840 he sent his rebel son Hludwig the assurance of his forgiveness, with a sad and dying remonstrance against his undutiful conduct, and so closed his eyes<sup>1</sup>

Then broke asunder the whole fabric of the Empire of Charles the Great. Hlothar took the imperial name, calling himself sole head of the Frankish race. Hludwig and Charles treated his pretensions with contempt. Hludwig (the Bavarian, or German, as he is called) was backed by the whole Frankish power beyond the Rhine, Charles by all Northern Gaul, Italy went with Hlothar. Pippin II of Aquitaine, eager to get clear of Roman-France, allied himself with Hlothar, as did also

<sup>1</sup> ‘He turned his face away, and with a kind of wrath, cried twice, as loud as he could, Huz! Huz! —that is, Out! Out!’ and so died —Vita Lud. Pii anonymo auct. Dom Bouquet, tom 6, p 125

Bernard, duke of Gothia, and war at once began (A.D. 841). Hlothar was not wanting in vigour and made ready to attack his brothers Charles and Hludwig. At first he amused them with offers of peace, till he had given the Aquitanians time to join him. He then thought himself strong enough to declare himself and challenged them to battle. On the very next day was fought, on the banks of the Cure not far from Troyes the pitched battle of Fontanet (25 June, 841), which decided the question whether there should be one Empire or separate nations. In it the griefs of a century were brought to an issue. This great battle marks the division of the three medieval nations of the continent, France, Germany Italy.

The whole Frankish Empire was represented there. Hlothar had Italy, Austrasia, and Aquitaine at his back; his brothers had the Germans, the Neustrians, and the Burgundians. The numbers were nearly equal, perhaps 150,000 on each side. The battle was fought out on an open plain, by sheer tug of war to see who could push the other off the field. The bloodshed was terrible. Forty thousand are said to have fallen on each side, and in the end the Northern French and Germans drove the Emperor's army off the field, and won the victory. The carnage fell most heavily on the Franks; it is hardly too much to say that Fontanet is the burial-ground of the Frankish name.

The free men and leudes almost entirely perished, and as they were the men-at-arms of the age, nothing was left to arrest the Normans. Such nobles as survived reformed themselves, and, joining with the remaining free Franks, began the second age of aristocracy which continued till the fourteenth century. Henceforth the Franks, as a class, disappear; there remain in Gaul nothing but lords and serfs; the field is ready for feudalism.<sup>1</sup>

Hlothar fled to Aix la Chapelle. Bernard of Gothia deserted him and took oath of allegiance to Charles. But though beaten Hlothar was not inclined to give in. He gathered fresh troops, and with Pippin of Aquitaine once more showed a menacing

<sup>1</sup> La Vallée Histoire des Français tom. 1 livre 2 chap. 3. § 7

front So Charles and Hludwig again joined forces, and made ready to defend their ground Then took place a memorable scene The two brothers, who had throughout acted as champions of national feeling, agreed that, to strengthen their confidence in one another, and that of their men, they would take each to other a solemn oath of fidelity before their two armies Hludwig first spoke to his men in the German speech, Charles addressed the Neustrians and Burgundians in the 'lingua Romana rustica,' the Roman tongue, now spoken in various dialects throughout all Gaul They told them why they were going to take the oath, they explained the justice of their cause, once already decided by the God of battles Then Charles, standing before the Germans, took oath in the Frankish tongue, and Hludwig, standing before the Roman-Franks, or, as we may now venture to call them, the Frenchmen, took the same oath in the Romance tongue The Oaths still remain<sup>1</sup>, and that taken by Hludwig is the oldest monument of the French language<sup>2</sup>, A D 842

Thus the national life of German and Frenchman appeared, distinctly marked Though we relapse again into shapeless chaos, still here is a marked advance, an epoch in history

The brothers immediately drove Hlothar before them to Aix, thence he fled to Lyons Then, finally, seeing that his battle-cry, imperial unity, roused no enthusiasm, and that no one would fight for it, he sent a message to his brothers, that he would be content with one-third of the Empire, if they would grant him a somewhat larger share than their own, by reason of the name of Emperor, which he held from his father the three brothers should then govern each his own states, and eternal peace be established The brothers agreed to this, and Hlothar's proposals formed the base of the famous treaty of Verdun, in 843

By that treaty the three kingdoms were clearly marked off. Speaking roughly, Charles had France, Hludwig the Bavarian had Germany, Hlothar Italy and a long narrow strip lying

<sup>1</sup> In Nithard, Hist lib 3

<sup>2</sup> See Brachet, Historical Grammar of the French Tongue, pp 14, 15

TABLE IV THE FRANG

A. D.	ITALY	GERMANY
	[Has the imperial crown at first.]
879
887		Arnulf, King election.
890
891	Guido, Emperor.
894	Lambert, son of Guido, Emperor.
895
896	Arnulf, King of Germany Emperor
898
899		Hindwig III Lotharingia, rolling in Ger
900
901	Hindwig of Pro- vence, Emperor
911		Conrad, D coia, elected
916	Berenger D of Friul,
918	last Caroling Emp	Henry I, D of King of Germ
922	[Anarchy for 50 years.]
925
928
936		Otto I, the G
937
954
961	Italy falls to Otto I
962		Otto I Em
973		Otto II, Em
983		Otto III, Em
986
987
993
1002		Henry II, F Conrad II,
1024

CHAPTER V.

From the Peace of Verdun to Hugh Capet.

A D 843-987

I THE ORIGIN OF THE FRENCH LANGUAGE

TABLE V THE PEDIGREE OF THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

THE Oath which Hludwig the German took before the Franks of France was spoken in a tongue which, though far from Modern French, was still in substance French. How did this new speech come into being? It is clear that it has the Latin for its foundation, and little else, spelling has changed, inflexions are degraded, and the whole language is more analytical<sup>1</sup> than Latin, but still it has come from the Latin. The Oath gives us an illustration of the way in which the Romance languages<sup>1</sup> sprang out of Latin for it stands midway between the two

<sup>1</sup> Languages are said to be 'synthetical' when they use many inflexions and few auxiliaries, 'analytical' when they use few inflexions and many auxiliaries—1 e habui is synthetical, but j'ai eu is analytical.

In the best days of Rome there were two kinds of Latin in use that of the study and that of the market place the learned and the vulgar We may catch a glimpse of these by comparing Cicero with Terence. And even in Cicero's days the distinction was clear between the patrician and the plebeian speech, the sermo mobilis and the sermo plebeius or rusticus<sup>2</sup> They differed in vocabulary but above all in accent. Speaking generally every Latin word has one syllable on which the voice lingers the tendency of the vulgar (as in all lands) was to exaggerate this tonic syllable at the cost of the rest of the word and so we find that such words as pōnere, stābulum, orāculum, soon became pōnre, stāb'lum orāc'lum, in common Latin. When Gaul fell into Latin hands, both dialects entered in with the new masters. In the cities the rhetoricians, poets, men of letters, and at a later time the upper clergy cultivated the refined upper class dialect while the common soldier the merchant, and presently the slave spread the common Latin far and wide. The whole of Gaul seems to have accepted the new speech without protest<sup>3</sup>, we have elsewhere tried to explain the remarkable fact that while the bulk of the people continued to be Celtic, their mother tongue perished leaving in its vocabulary and inflexions no trace, or only the very slightest, of the popular language<sup>4</sup>. The Merwing invasion crushed the literary Latin for the Gallo-Roman gentlefolk could not stand up against their German lords it survived in a low form among the clergy as the language of religion, based more on St. Augustine than on Cicero This was the Low

The chief Romance languages are French, Provençal, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Wallachian, as well as the Romansch of eastern Switzerland.

Cassiodorus gives us an instance of words in the two dialects. The common folk said batalia where the upper classes said pugna.

Strabo says there was so much Latin (especially of the high-class kind) in Gaul, that he could scarcely count it a land of barbarians.

See above, p. 83. This is the more remarkable when we see the opposite results in Brittany and Wales.

Latin of the Law Courts, a dialect which the Merwing Franks used when they amalgamated the new Roman law with their own institutions and customs. It is a barbarous Latin, full of German words. But they could not destroy the common Latin, the speech of the people.

By the end of the eighth century the 'Lingua Romana Rustica,' now no longer called Latin, was established. Even as early as the seventh century the life of St. Faro was sung in the rustic speech—'juxta rusticitatem'. About A D 800 Adalhard, a noble German, spoke it eloquently and elegantly.<sup>1</sup> By the time of Charles the Great the Austrasians despised in their hearts the new fine Latin brought in by the Church, though still, in their intercourse with the clergy, they tried to use it. The Merwings had destroyed the 'classical-fine' Latin; this may be called the 'Church-fine' Latin. Charles himself could speak it. But it was a mere court delicacy, the great lords in their Neustrian settlements soon dropped it—who was there to understand it, if they did use it? They also dropped their German speech. Even the clergy in country places knew nothing but the common Latin. The nobles followed, and soon men all had one speech, the 'Romana rustica'. As early as 813, at the Council of Tours, this speech was enjoined on the clergy; homilies were to be read in either Romance or 'Teutsch'.<sup>2</sup> And finally the Oaths of 842 shew that this Romance is the acknowledged speech of the whole French army, chiefs and men alike. It afterwards divided itself into dialects<sup>3</sup>, each with its own peculiarities and literature, and as Paris became more and more the heart of France, the dialect of the district round the capital, the Île de France, became the standard of speech and writing, and the other dialects fell before it. The southern dialect, the Langue d'Oc<sup>1</sup>, which reached a high state of literary excellence at a very early time, stands aloof from these northern varieties of the Langue d'Oïl. It is long before it bows the head before the dominant dialect of the Île de France.

<sup>1</sup> So says Paschatius Radbert in his life of him 'Quem si vulgo audisses, dulcissimus emanabat, si vero idem barbara, quam Teutiscam dicunt praeeminebat, quod si latine, jam ulterius prae aviditate dulcoris non erat spiritus'—Pertz, tom 2 p 532

<sup>2</sup> 'In lingua romana rustica aut Teotisca'

<sup>3</sup> Such were the Norman, the Picard, the Burgundian, that of the Île de France

II. THE LATER CAROLINGS.

In thirty years there had been five partitions of the Frankish Empire, ending with that well marked division which was carried out by the treaty of Verdun in 843. We have seen how Italy fell to Hlothar with the imperial name and the strip of land afterwards called Lotharingia, Germany to Hludwig, France to Charles the Bald.

Charles and his successors have some claim to be accounted French. They rule over a large part of France, and are cut away from their older connexion with Germany. Still, in reality they are Germans and Franks. They speak German, they yearn after the old imperial name they have no national feeling at all. On the other hand, the great lords of Neustria, as it used to be called are ready to move in that direction, and to take the first steps towards a new national life. They cease to look back to the Rhine, and occupy themselves in a continual struggle with their kings. Feudal power is founded, and with it the claims of the bishops rise to their highest point. But we have not yet come to a kingdom of France for (1) the kings were not French, (2) their kingdom was narrow at times it was little beyond the frontier fortress of Laon with its dependencies at best it had no hold on Brittany, Aquitaine, or Septimania. (3) the Norman ravages reached its very heart. (4) the feudal lords were in fact independent of the king. It was no proper French kingdom but a dying branch of the Empire of Charles the Great.

There was a twofold movement throughout the period first against Germany and the imperial idea ; secondly, towards the dismemberment of France herself Charles the Great had founded an Empire with vassal-kingdoms under it, but the tendencies of the age were opposed to it even the Church, to a great extent, shook off the Papal Empire, became feudal, anti-central No oecumenical Councils were held, there was no united action, each bishop tried to win an independent jurisdiction, the high pretensions of Hincmar of Rheims will be noticed presently

<sup>1</sup> Langue d'Oc and Langue d'Oïl are the names given to the southern and northern dialects of the Gallo-Romance speech. The names are taken from the word signifying yes in south and north. The Latin hoc was used alone in the south; in the north they said hoc-illud whence oi, oïl.

All tended to produce a local, territorial independence The Empire and the Papacy will strive in vain against this tendency, feudal nations headed by feudal kings will consolidate their power, Pope and Emperor will also turn their arms against each other, in a feud of centuries Meanwhile, France, lying off the line of this struggle, will have time to grow into a great monarchy

This dreary period may be divided into three parts :

- 1 From A D 843—888, to the deposition of Charles the Fat
- 2 From A D 888—911, to the settlement of the Northmen in Western France
- 3 From A D 911—987, to the accession of Hugh Capet

1 To the Deposition of Charles the Fat, 843-888

Charles the Bald, entering on his part of the Caroling Empire, found three large districts which refused to recognise him These were Aquitaine, whose King was Pippin II, Septimania, in the hands of Bernard, and Brittany under Nomenoë He attempted to reduce them, but Brittany and Septimania defied him, while over Aquitaine he was little more than a nominal suzerain. His home-territories were also in evil case Northern vikings<sup>1</sup> ravaged his coasts, and had to be bought off from Paris itself, on the Seine they were beginning to secure their footing, and to settle Ceaseless squabbles went on between King and nobles, he had granted them all he had, to buy their help against his brothers, and now he tried to repossess himself of his domains by force. The nobles rose against him, and, calling in Hludwig the German, compelled him to fly. But when the Germans came the old local jealousies revived, the French Franks once more rallied to their King, the German-Franks had to retire, and the party of the chiefs who had been headed by Wenillon, archbishop of Sens came to terms with Charles. He acknowledged himself to be King by episcopal consecration, and therefore liable to deposition by the same judgment. The Church accepted this position and Hincmar archbishop of Rheims and the King's chief minister laid down the principle that kings are subject to no man's government, while they rule by God's law and will but that if they transgress that law and will then they must be judged by the bishops without any reference to Papal authority<sup>1</sup>. A high-tide mark in the pretensions of the Episcopate, which, however soon ebbed again.

<sup>1</sup> A Viking is 'a man of a vik, or bay', he was a Scandinavian warrior-pirate—See Vigfússon's Icel Dict s v Vikingr

The reign of Charles the Bald is also notable for the dawn of a greater power destined to have its centre at Paris, though its chief men are not French. This is Scholasticism.

The Philosophy of the Schools is the first European mental effort. Though perhaps not marked by great originality it fills the whole intellectual life of five centuries and its influences were felt for centuries after its fall. Its first task may be said to have been the application of Aristotle's principles to the study of Theology. It had other and more fruitful results in the hands of those who inquired into Nature's doings and were the forefathers of modern experimental philosophy. At the King's court was an Irishman, last representative as he is called, of Greek philosophy. He was also the first representative of the philosophy of the Middle Ages. Joannes Scotus Erigena (i. e. John Scot, Erin-born) was at the head of the palace school. He set himself to introduce Platonism into Western Christianity his appeals to human reason against authority, his tendencies towards materialism and pantheism indicate more than one of the lines on which the modern mind was destined to travel. Hincmar resisted him, and had him condemned At a later period, though some followed Erigena, the main body of schoolmen turned to deductive logic, authority, and the words of Scripture, and saved themselves from the dangerous paths of inquiry which he had so hardily pursued

<sup>1</sup> Hincmar's Works, i. 693 B.

Hlothar, Emperor, King of Italy, brother of Charles the Bald, died in 835 Of his three sons, who divided his domains, the last survivor, Hludwig II, Emperor and King of Italy, died in 875, leaving two princes, Hludwig the German and Charles the Bald, in possession of all the old Empire of Charles the Great. The latter, restless and ambitious, thought to restore the Empire, and got himself crowned King of Italy by the Pope Hludwig died next year, and his three sons, as usual, divided his kingdom But Charles the Bald intrigued with the German nobles, and compelled the three brothers to take up arms Then the French king, needing help, held a diet at Chiersi in 877, and granted his leudes the hereditary possession of their benefices<sup>1</sup> Hereditary succession was already the custom, this diet made it a right It is therefore rightly regarded as an epoch in the history of feudalism Henceforward the political importance of the alodial tenure passes away, dukes and counts, hitherto (in name at least) the king's officers, become independent princes, the greatest alodial lords can be no more than this

With his nobles thus gratified, he set forth for Italy. But his concessions availed him nothing there; Karloman, son of Hludwig of Germany, defeated and drove him homewards On Mont Cenis death overtook him, as he rested in a poor hut, and cut the thread of his somewhat tattered web of life Hludwig his son<sup>2</sup> succeeded (A D 877) His father had been a man of some gifts, but this man, 'the Stammerer,' was feeble altogether The nobles forced him at the outset to ratify their old privileges, and to grant them new fiefs. He yielded, and was crowned. We draw towards a new series of puppet kings. This stammering Hludwig soon passed away dying in 879 and the nobles thought good to divide the kingship between his two sons, Hludwig III in the North, and Carloman in the South. Their kingship shrank to very narrow limits, Boson in Provence founded the kingdom of Arles in spite of their efforts the Northmen ravaged the Atlantic coasts with impunity. In 882 Hludwig died, Carloman two years later. There now remained but two to represent the Caroling family. Charles, a child of five a posthumous son of Hludwig the Stammerer and the Emperor Charles the Fat<sup>1</sup>. To the latter fell the nominal lordship over almost all the Empire.

<sup>1</sup> See the Capitularies in Baluze, 2 p 259

<sup>2</sup> Sometimes called 'Louis II, King of France'

The incessant partitions, squabbles, deaths, of the kings, their sons, their cousins, had sapped the strength of the race each noble sold his services to one or another buying therewith also his independence and the wretched Charles, in his bulky incapacity was a type of the huge and ill knit Empire over which he was the head. No sooner was he on the throne than he was met by a strong league, whose head-quarters are to the west, on the coast and rivers. The fierce Northmen under their great chief Hrolf (Rollo) joined Hugh of Lorraine and beleaguered Paris in 885. Paris had shrunk back into the Cité, which was built on an island in the Seine so terrible was the neighbourhood of the Northmen. But in that little island were three captains of good heart. Gozlin their bishop Hugh first of abbots, and Eudes or Odo count of Paris. Gozlin and Hugh perished in the siege but Odo held out. Meanwhile the unwieldy king was far off in Germany and heeded not the cries of Paris. For eighteen months the citizens held out the rude warfare of the Northmen, unskilled in sieges, made no impression on the fortified bridges. At last Charles came with a host of men, the forces of the Empire and from Montmartre saw the heroic defenders and their foes. The hollow-eyed citizens thought to see their pagan enemies scattered to the winds ; but the feeble king had no energy, and did but beg the Normans to name their price , they were willing to retire for seven hundred pounds of silver. The fierce citizens, with a cry of disgust, refused to be parties to such shame ; they rushed forth and drove the Northmen from the Seine, compelling them to drag their boats across a neck of land before they could embark The fat king had no wish to dwell in that land , he withdrew to Germany There he was abandoned by all, deposed, degraded He sought shelter at Reichenau, on the Lake of Constance, where under the roof of the monks he lingered a while, a mere wreck, and died in 888. In him the French Carolings seemed to reach their lowest point , cowardly, lazy, incapable, sickly, the degenerate grandson and namesake of Charles the Great was a lamentable contrast to his vigorous ancestor and to his great contemporary, Alfred of England Few sovereigns have attained to so great contempt as he , and the kindest view to take of him is that he was insane

<sup>1</sup> Charles III in French histories.

2 To the Settlement of the Northmen in Western France

A D 888-911

The great lords now set up six several states , Italy, Germany, Lorraine, Provence, Transjurane Burgundy, and France In the last there was a strong feeling against the Carolings , and the nobles chose Odo, the stout defender of Paris, the count of Paris and duke of France, to be their king It is too much to say that he was the first real French king , but he was more like one than the Carolings had been ; and he foreshadowed the race that was to come His authority extended over the lands between the Meuse and the Loire, and was not very well defined within those limits All France was a loose bundle of petty states, which multiplied through this period a century later, when Hugh Capet was made king, there were as many as eighty of these small princes between the Meuse and the Loire These were the feudal elements or units of a later time ; castles were built and garrisoned with tried men-at- . . .

justice was dispensed, towns began to grow round the strong holds the feudal lord found it well to have peace within his own borders, he defended his villains, agriculture began to lift up the head, thrift and handicrafts gained time and security, and sprang into life<sup>1</sup>

Let us sum up the causes which led to this victory of feudalism over the Caroling family, It answers to that struggle which raised the Austrasians above the Merwing princes, with the difference that society had made some slight advance since then.

These causes are (1) the severance of Germany from France (2) the independence of Burgundy Brittany and Aquitaine, and the weakness of the kings in their strife with these districts (3) the personal feebleness of the kings, (4) the Norman incursions which led to the fashion of castle-building which in its turn led to the independence of the builders (5) the influence of the great Churchmen, who used their power over weak princes in favour of the nobles, (6) the battles of the century and notably that of Fontanet, which destroyed the free Franks (7) the custom of Recommendation or Commendation, which led the smaller landowners to range themselves under the nearest lord to the neglect and permanent weakening of the nominal head of government and (8) lastly the gradual growth of privilege consolidation of the greater lordships, and the change of the old court offices (duke and count) into territorial and hereditary dignities. In all these ways feudal independence gained and royalty lost, until it fell.

But though the lords were strong enough to dethrone the Carolings, they did not care to abandon all the traditions of the past. Consequently they met, and chose Count Odo (or Eudes) as their king. A quarter of a century earlier an adventurer of low birth, a Saxon<sup>2</sup>, it was said, had been useful to different petty kings, eventually he attached himself to Charles the Bald, who set him in the front to defend the country between the Seine and the Loire. This adventurer was Robert the Strong, who perished fighting against the Normans. By his side fought Tertullus the Rustic, a peasant's son, whom the king made seneschal of Anjou. From Robert spring the Capets, from Tertullus, the Plantagenets. The two families of the Christian world, who have worn the greatest number of crowns<sup>1</sup>, stood side by side at their beginnings, conscious only of vigour and courage, ignorant of their high destiny. This Robert was the father of Eudes, whom the nobles elected king. Eudes struggled vainly for six years, then the Caroling party recovered heart, and in 893, at an assembly at Rheims, they called in Charles the Simple<sup>2</sup>, and chose him king. Arnulf, king of Germany and head of the Caroling family, now interfered, but Fulk, archbishop of Rheims, eventually persuaded him to take up a position as protector of the new king. But what could the weak prince do against the vigour and ability of Eudes? He was compelled to take refuge in Burgundy. Again he tried his fortune in war, and failing threw himself on his rival's generosity. Eudes, knowing that the Carolings, with their strong friends in Germany, and their plentiful means of stirring up strife in Southern France, might be held in check, but could not be crushed, behaved wisely and generously, after the manner of his family. He granted to Charles certain domains between the Meuse and Seine, acknowledged him as his lord, and agreed that, if he died, Charles should succeed him. In 898 he did die, and the nobles met, and elected Charles sole king of France, while Robert, brother of Eudes, became Duke of France; and things seemed to fall back into their old form: a Caroling king, and a feudal Duke, of France<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Guizot, Histoire des Français, tom. 2. p. 293.

<sup>2</sup> Afterwards men succeeded in tracing his descent from Childerand, brother of Charles Martel.

<sup>1</sup> La Vallée, Histoire des Français, I p 209

<sup>2</sup> This is Charles IV of the ordinary histories. The soubriquet is 'the Fool'.

<sup>3</sup> It must never be forgotten that these titles, king and duke, are of a very narrow significance—not reaching very far beyond the Meuse or the Loire.

The simple king, little more than a puppet, reigned long in peace. There are times in history when shades seem to have more solidity than realities. It seemed as though a puppet king was what France at the moment needed. A stronger man would have aroused passions, and led to war. His weakness was no offence to was even a cloak for the strength and ambition of the chiefs. The one fact of this feeble reign of four and twenty years is the disgraceful but fortunate cession of the Lower Seine and Brittany to the Northmen in 911.

The Northmen had gradually closed in upon France. All conquest of a somewhat settled country by a wilder race follows one law. We saw it with the Franks, we may see it in the Northmen. First came plundering raids, out and home again, with cattle lifting, savage work and bloodshed, everything carried off that could be, and the bleeding land left to recover as it might. Then gradually the land itself attracts. The invaders are not so keen to get home with their booty, or they think it well to have a secure place or two on the coast, and so they begin to settle. They winter in the land, the new climate becomes familiar, they end by sitting down firmly as owners of the soil, a fresh element of life in the land they adopt. The Northmen came and went by sea, their home was bleak in winter time, they made their new homes wherever their keels came to shore, all the world was theirs, so long as it could be reached by water. Hoisting sail, or plying their strong oars, they went hither and thither, it mattered not which way. England was perhaps their favourite hunting-ground, though their long ships struck terror on every coast. Sailing the 'Easternway' they founded the Russian Empire, the Russian was for a long time a Northman.<sup>1</sup> The same Northmen who ruled in Little Russia are found in the tenth century (strange prophecy!) attacking Constantinople.<sup>2</sup> Sailing the 'Westernway' they discovered <sup>1</sup> See Vigfússon's Icelandic Dict. v. Forz. He quotes Constantine Porphyrogenitus, showing that some Scandinavian words were in his day current in Russia. Constantine distinguishes between words used, þjóverti and skaldskerti, Russ and Slavonian; and his Russ words are clearly Scandinavian.

A.D. 904.

Iceland and Greenland, there are traces of still more distant expeditions and lodgments on the American coast. In France, the rivers were so many pathways leading to the rich booty of the inland. In Spain, in Italy, these 'Magiogs,' sons of Magog, as the Arabian historians style them, clashed with the Moslem power. The Mediterranean learned to know the heathen vikings, and the days were evil for all dwellers by the main. The more civilised world had little dealings with the sea, but it was the home of the Northmen, and helped them, in their conflict with the rest of Europe, just as armour served the Romans against half-naked tribes, or as, in later times, the gun overcame the arrow. The Norse ship with its fierce crew seemed to form one creature, the viking almost thought his ship had life. The sea-dragons, gliding silently over the main, struck terror into all who sighted them from the shore.

They began their ravages near the end of the eighth century. The English coasts felt them first in 787, the French coasts in 799. There is an old poem which relates how Charles Martel<sup>1</sup>, in his old age, wept when he saw their long ships at Aigues Mortes. Charles the Great knew what the danger was. He had built a fortress against them at Hamburg, one of his last important acts was an agreement by which the Dannewerk on the Eider became the border-line between Scandinavian and Teuton<sup>2</sup>. Harold the Dane took refuge with Hludwig the Pious, and after his baptism at Engelenheim, in 826, settled in Friesland. About the same time efforts were made, with some success, to convert the Northmen to Christianity. Ansgar took his life in his hands and preached Christ in Sweden, he was driven out, was made archbishop of the Christian outpost at Hamburg, then returned again, and in 853 baptized Olaf the converted Swedish king. At this time (A D 838) the Danes penetrated as far up the Loire as Tours and soon after (A D 841) under Hasting they laid siege to and took Rouen.

<sup>1</sup> But it must have been Charles the Great

<sup>2</sup> The Dannewerk was built in 808 by Godfrid, Danish frontier in 811

TABLE VI. FEUDAL STATES OF SOUTHERN FRANCE

A.D.	TOULOUSE (Count)	GOTHIA or NARBONNE (Duke or Marquis).	GUINNE or AQUITAINE (Duke)	GASCONY (Duke).
768				Lupus I, four Dukes to
819				Waifer
839		Bernard I, dies, five beneficiary		five beneficiary
851	Raymond I	dukes		to
872		to		Sancho
878	who has	Bernard III.		Bilharra.
880		William the Pious dies childless, 918; the duchy falls to Toulouse.	Rainulf (son of Bernard II, of Gothia),	seven hereditary dukes
1036	twelve successors,			to
	to		eleven hereditary dukes to	Herenger (who dies child- less, and Gas- cony falls to Aquitaine).
1052			William X (whose daughter Allepor m. Henry Ct. of Anjou, and K. of England).
1111	Raymond VII who cedes half to Louis IX, and half to his daughter who marries the brother of St. Louis, and he, dying childless, leaves the rest to Philip III (1271)
1412			The duchy finally ceded to France under Charles VII.

Date	District	King	Circumstances
1349	Dauphiné	Philip VI	Bought from the last Dauphin of Vienne
1370	Limousin	Charles V	Conquered from the English [Vice of Limoges secured finally under Henry IV]
1453	Guienne and Gascony	Charles VII	Conquered from the English
1479	Burgundy	Louis XI	Annexed on death of Charles the Rash, Duke of Burgundy
"	Marche	"	Confiscated from the House of Armagnac
1487	Provence	"	On death of the last Count
1523	Angoumois, Forez, Beaujolais	Francis I	Patrimony
1531	Bourbon and Dauphiné d'Auvergne	"	Confiscated from the Constable de Bourbon
1547	Brittany	Charles VIII and Louis XII and Francis I	By marriage with Anne of Brittany By marriage with the daughter of Anne of Brittany
1548	Comminges	"	On extinction of the Comminges family
1552	Trois-Evêchés [Metz, Verdun, Toul]	Henry II	Secured to France by the Treaty of Westphalia, 1648
1589	Béarn, Navarre, Bigorre, Foix, Armagnac	Henry IV	Patrimony
1601	Bresse and Bugey	"	Exchanged against Saluces with the Duke of Savoy
1648	Alsace	Louis XIII and Louis XIV	By conquest from Germany Secured to France by the Treaty of Westphalia, 1648
1659	Roussillon and Artois	" "	By conquest Secured by the Treaty of the Pyrenees, 1659
1665	Nivernois	Louis XIV	On extinction of the Nivernois family
1668	Flanders and Hainault	"	Secured by the Treaty of Ailla-Chapelle.
1678	Franche-Comté	"	Secured by the Treaty of Nimwegen
1681	Strasburg	"	Secured by Treaty of Ryswick, 1697
1684	Charolais	"	Confiscated from Spain
1766	Lorraine	Louis XV	Secured by Treaty of Vienna, 1815

TABLE IX.

SUCCESSIVE ADDITIONS TO THE FRENCH MONARCHY

Date	District.	King	Circumstances.
1068	Gâtinais	Philip I	Acquired from Falk of Anjou.
1082	French Vexin	"	Acquired from Simon of Valois.
1100	Bourges	"	Bought of Herpin his Count going on Crusade.
1183	Flemish, Amiens	Philip Augustus	Taken from Philip of Flanders, on his wife's death.
1185	Valois	" "	Ditto.
1203	Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Poitou	" "	Confiscated from King John of England. [Permanently acquired by St. Louis, 1258.]
"	Savoigne	" "	Confiscated from King John of England. [Ceded at Breigny 1360, to England; reconquered by Charles V and Charles VII.]
1205	Normandy	" "	Taken by conquest from King John of England.
1209	Auvergne	" "	Confiscated from Guy his Count. [Finally secured to the Crown by Louis XIII.]
1229	Béziers, Narbonne, Nîmes, Velay Albigeois	St. Louis (IX)	After Albigensian war
1233	Blots, Chartres	" "	Bought from Thibault of Champagne.
1245	Gévaudan	" "	Bought from Count of Barcelona. [Confirmed to Philip IV 1306]
125	Perche	" "	Fell in on extinction of the Perche family
1270	Languedoc, Vivarais, Rouergue	Philip III	On extinction of the House of St. Gilles.
1283	Champagne and Brie	Philip IV	By marriage with the heiress.
"	Lyonnais	"	By agreement with the Archbishop and Burglers.

Date	District	King	Circumstances
1349	Dauphiné	Philip VI	Bought from the last Dauphin of Vienne
1370	Limousin	Charles V	Conquered from the English [Vic of Limoges secured finally under Henry IV]
1453	Guienne and Gascony	Charles VII	Conquered from the English
1479	Burgundy	Louis XI	Annexed on death of Charles the Rash, Duke of Burgundy
"	Marche	"	Confiscated from the House of Armagnac
1487	Provence	"	On death of the last Count
1523	Angoumois, Forez, Beaujolais	Francis I	Patrimony
1531	Bourbon and Dauphine d'Auvergne	"	Confiscated from the Constable de Bourbon
1547	Brittany	Charles VIII and Louis XII and Francis I	By marriage with Anne of Brittany By marriage with the daughter of Anne of Brittany
1548	Comminges	"	On extinction of the Comminges family
1552	Trois-Evêchés [Metz, Verdun, Toul]	Henry II	Secured to France by the Treaty of Westphalia, 1648
1589	Béarn, Navarre, Bigorre, Foix, Armagnac	Henry IV	Patrimony
1601	Bresse and Bugey	"	Exchanged against Saluces with the Duke of Savoy
1648	Alsace	Louis XIII and Louis XIV	By conquest from Germany Secured to France by the Treaty of Westphalia, 1648
1659	Roussillon and Artois	" "	By conquest Secured by the Treaty of the Pyrenees, 1659
1665	Nivernois	Louis XIV	On extinction of the Nivernois family
1668	Flanders and Hainault	"	Secured by the Treaty of A-la-Chapelle
1678	Franche-Comté	"	Secured by the Treaty of Nimwegen
1681	Strasburg	"	Secured by Treaty of Ryswick, 1697
1684	Charolais	"	Confiscated from Spain
1766	Lorraine	Louis XV	Secured by Treaty of Vienna, 1815

CHAPTER I

Introductory

I THE AID OF THIS BOOK.

THE year 987 is the true starting point for the History of France. Hitherto the Caroling kings had in some respects been more German than French, they fled into Lorraine, and took shelter under the Emperor if their barons were too hard on them: they did not care to speak French, or to identify themselves with the bulk of the people of the land. But from the days of Hugh Capet all is changed. Hugh was a Neustrian baron, duke of France, with Paris as his capital: in reality he was the peer of those princes who made him king. We must always remember that the names France and Paris had not their modern significance. Paris was but the chief town of a petty dukedom. France the name of a narrow district, overshadowed by greater lordships, and almost unknown across the Loire.

The petty sovereign who reigned at Paris was in fact little more than a simple member of the feudal hierarchy of great lords. He had indeed a different title: he inherited certain traditions: but, as a king, he was a shadow. The custom of dividing history by arbitrary lines at the accessions of sovereigns has lifted these early Capetian kings into a false position: we must free ourselves from this delusion of monarchy. At a later time the greater kings often represent the age: and our chapters will follow their reigns. In these earlier days this ought not to be the case. Thus the epochs of the conquest of England, and of the first Crusade leave the feeble kings quite on one side.

The power and independence of the feudal barons reduced the kingship almost to nothing. by a rude kind of 'balance of power,' or rather of jealousy, the king managed to exist; and that was all. As however time went on, he neutralised much of the hostility of the barons—used first the Church, then the Communes, in his struggle with the landed interest—by war, by marriage, by management, he gradually absorbed the sovereign states, and rose to the full possession of the powers of that feudal monarchy, of which we propose to trace the growth in the following pages. The period is one of over three hundred years, from the election of Hugh Capet in 987, to the reign of Philip IV, the Fair, in whom feudal monarchy reached its highest point.

After him the kingly power recedes, and the period of the great English wars comes on, in which monarchy and feudalism seem to suffer equally. This period sees the beginning of the House of Valois, it sees the rise of the absolute (as distinguished from the feudal) monarchy, in the person of Charles V, the Wise, it attains its full height in Francis I at the Reformation time. Absolute monarchy continues till the end of the Valois, and through the reign of Henry IV, then it changes step by step, chiefly through Richelieu's influence, into a despotic monarchy, which towers up into the splendours of the reign of the 'grand monarque,' Louis XIV. After him an irresponsible monarchy, surrounded by an effete vassal noblesse, sinks rapidly in power and esteem, until the Revolution of 1789 sweeps away both, and creates a new epoch in the history of France.

II. THE CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY AT HUGH CAPET'S ACCESSION

Gaul was still, in reality, divided into three well-marked countries. (1) The remains of the old Austrasia, that is, the two Lorraines, Arles, and Burgundy, German-speaking, holding chiefly of the Empire, and contemptuous towards the French—the 'Walli' or 'Galli' (as the Loherains or Lorrainers called them), whom they despised for having abandoned the old Frankish tongue, and for having become somewhat more polished. (2) The old Neustria, French-speaking, made up of three distinct races, the Norman, the old Gallo-Romans, and the Franks, including the kingdom of France Champagne Anjou, Normandy (3) Aquitaine, south of the Loire speaking a distinct dialect, inheritor of the Roman law and civilisation, centuries in advance of its neighbours, regarded with horror by the bishops at the Capetian Court as effeminate and corrupt too delicate of dress and manners, and in all respects a foreign nation. This district embraced Aquitaine from the Loire, Gascony and Septimania. Brittany is still a land apart.

The relations of men in these districts were all based on feudal obligations and ideas. The free aristocracy lay and clerical, alone formed the nation the mass of the people, chiefly Gallo-Romans by origin, still wore the bonds of a conquered race. The serfs, the lowest portion of the population, who tilled the soil without any hold on it, were nearly what in former days the Roman slaves had been—above them were the villains, or small tenant farmers, who held their lands on condition of a certain payment to their lords above these again came the free and noble population, which has been reckoned, at the time of which we speak, at about a million of souls, living on and taking their names from about seventy thousand separate fiefs or properties of these fiefs about three thousand carried titles with them. Of these again no less than a hundred—some reckon as many as a hundred and fifty—were sovereign states, greater or smaller whose lords could coin money levy taxes, make laws, administer their own justice Long before this time the instinct of castle-building had turned every noble's house into a stronghold. The Gallo-Roman gentleman had lived in an open house spread out over some level and pleasant spot, quite undefended the Frankish chief tains, whose views were those not of civilised but of warlike life, and who dwelt in the land as strong handed and hated conquerors, naturally looked out for safe and strong positions.

They fortified the Gallo-Roman villa, or chose for themselves strong places, hill-tops, river-bends, spurs of highland jutting out into the plain; or availed themselves of existing buildings, as at Nîmes and Arles, where they fortified the Roman arenas: ancient gates, even churches, they used in the same way. To be strong and isolated, this was their desire and their necessity. Gloomy, massive, and safe, these keeps must be. Little or no light could enter, save from the inner court, the entrance was dark and low, and carefully defended: there were unglazed holes for windows, unclean, dark, unwholesome dens, they were well enough while the feudal lord saw from his walls the smoke of the burning huts below, for he knew that his foe would break his rude strength in vain against the rock on which the castle stood. Such dens were intolerable as dwelling-places, and as such were not only the natural results of a violent age, but also a direct incitement to their lords to find their amusements abroad, either on the highways as a robber, or in pilgrimage to far shrines, or in private war with some neighbour, or in following their liege-lord to war against some unruly vassal or neighbouring prince.

The state of the serfs, and often that of the villains, was inexpressibly wretched. For centuries they had been sinking, and it seemed as if the year 1000 would find mankind, at least in Gaul, sunk to the lowest depth. Agriculture was rude and uncertain: there was no skill to fight against adverse seasons, or to resist the ravages of man. Consequently, famine and pestilence, not rare before, became horribly frequent, with accessories of cannibalism and brutality which reveal the utter wretchedness of the age. Forty-eight famines, between A D 987 and 1059, are on record.

This was the state of society in the earlier stages of feudalism, and small hope there seemed to be: royalty was a mere name, the people were utterly depressed. Yet feudalism seemed needful to restore life and social energy to Europe — slowly and fitfully the noble classes rose to a certain sense of duty and honour; the condition of woman improved, art and refinement found some room for growth, the feudal castle became the home of some ideas of justice, such as they were, the royalty of the Capets, feudal in origin and character, gradually attracted more power feudalism organised the Crusades, and led to that expansion of ideas and that consciousness of shortcoming which sprang out of intercourse with the more refined East. Thus in spite of the many miseries arising from this unbridled form of aristocracy we may hail it as the first condition of society which made a national life possible. It neither corresponds to the brilliant dream of the romancer nor on the other hand, is it the utterly wicked and desolate wilderness it seems to be when one first gets a real view of it.

III. THE LIMITS OF HUGH CAPET'S KINGSHIP

Among the many sovereign states of Gaul or France as we may now begin to call it, eight were pre-eminent in power and extent, and their lords, the great peers, thought little of the supremacy given to that one of their number who held the name of king. The counts of Flanders, Champagne and Vermandois, and the dukes of Normandy Brittany Burgundy and Aquitaine, regarded themselves as the new king's peers or equals. He had just now been but count of Paris, and duke of France and they had no thought of giving him the Caroling sovereignty. Some resisted him and set up the claim of Charles, duke of Lower Lorraine uncle of the late king Ludwig V. Among the states which lie within modern France, Lorraine Arles and Franche-Comté held of the Emperor and were in fact German. The actual domain of the duke of France had been a long and narrow strip running southwards from near the mouth of the Somme, with Normandy on one side and Flanders Champagne, and Burgundy on the other. It reached down to the Loire. Thus the Seine, with Paris on it, crossed the domain, nearly cutting it in half. Hugh Capet, its lord, was also lay abbot of St. Denis, the most important church in France.

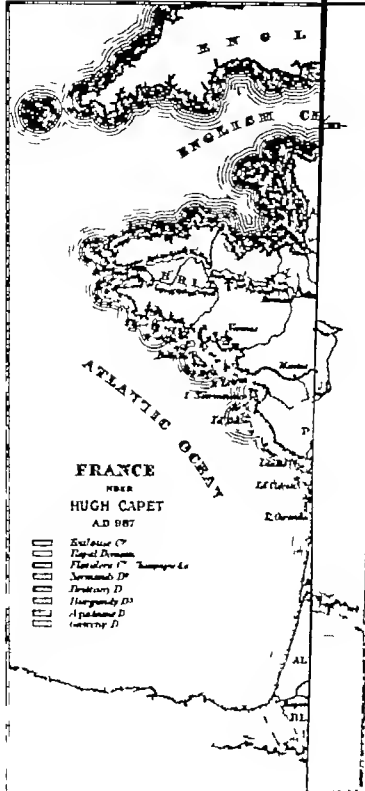

king was also the
 This however was
 's minds In fact were apt to think y becoming their

the Capetian line, to a kingdom, and us unity which did

UON CHAPETTE)

923

—
 mma m Rodolf
 of the Barons (923-936)

FRANCE
 987
HUGH CAPET
 AD 987

-  Exulsiac C
-  Royal Domain
-  Flanders C Tempore Lc
-  Normandy D
-  Brittany D
-  Burgundy D
-  Aquitaine D
-  Gascony D

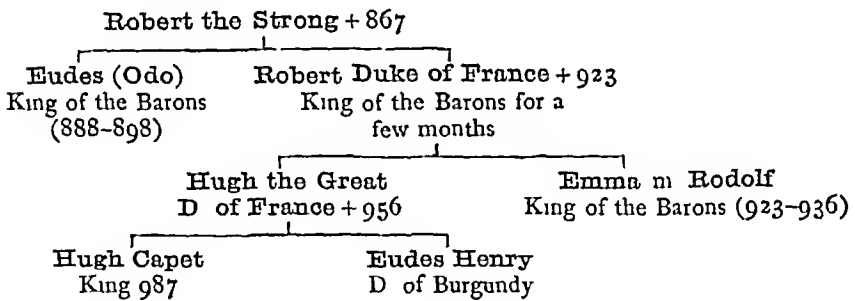

In addition to these narrow domains, the king was also the inheritor of the older Caroling sovereignty. This however was very little, and had but a slight hold on men's minds. In fact the Carolings had fallen so low that people were apt to think that the duke of France lost position by becoming their successor.

These, then, are the weak beginnings of the Capetian line,—the line which gradually welded France into a kingdom, and paved the way for that compact and vigorous unity which did so much to make its national life glorious.

---

TABLE X

THE PEDIGREE OF HUGH CAPET (HUON CHAPETTE)

CHAPTER II

From the Accession of Hugh Capet, to the age of the First Crusade, A.D. 987-1066

UNDER the influence of Gerbert, afterwards so famous as Pope Sylvester II, the French-speaking Franks proclaimed duke Hugh their king at Noyon, not far from Laon the election was confirmed and sanctioned at Rheims by Adalberon<sup>1</sup>, the archbishop who solemnly crowned him King of Franks. This act, for which the whole life of Hugh the Great had been a preparation, was the natural end of the long struggle between the feudal nobles and the Caroling kings. As the barons, with their French language and interests, grew stronger, the kings, who spoke German, and had German interests, had been losing strength. And when things were ripe for the change, whom could they have chosen better than the duke of France? Vermandois had ceased to be great, since the death of Herbert Normandy was but half French, and not central, Burgundy was too far to the east. The lords of the Ile de France were French in speech and interests had shown great vigour of character and Hugh the Great, had he wished it, might have deposed the Carolings of his day. Hugh was also on the whole, the strongest of the barons, he was feudal lord of all Picardy and had vast domains in Champagne the city and county of Paris, Orleans, Chartres, the counties of Blois, Perche Touraine, and Maine all held of him. On the other hand, as his was but a short pedigree<sup>1</sup>, he aroused no jealousy in the minds of those who regarded him as but their equal. His connexions secured him the goodwill of the most powerful of those peers, the dukes of Normandy and Burgundy. He had the support of the archbishop of Rheims, the highest Churchman in Neustrian France, and Gerbert, rightly counted the wisest and most learned man in Christendom, was also on his side. The Church was generally favourable to the duke of France, as such for he held in hand many rich abbeys and benefices, and was regarded, being abbot of St Martin at Tours<sup>2</sup> and of St Denis near Paris, as a kind of lay head of the Church. Lastly, the Normans burnt with desire to avenge themselves on the Caroling race, who had done them so much evil by oppressing their favourite duke, Richard the Fearless.

<sup>1</sup> There were at this time two Adalberons, one the archbishop of Rheims, the other the bishop of Laon, who was also called Ascelin.

And thus, as says the old French Chronicle<sup>3</sup>, 'in this time failed the lineage of "Challemaine" in France, and then by common assent was the kingship granted to "Huon Chapette," who was right prudent and valiant, bold and brave, so long as he lived.'

All these things could not secure Hugh in peaceful possession of the throne. Charles, Hludwig's uncle, resisted him, as being rightful heir to the Caroling throne. His pretensions were upheld by formidable chiefs. by the count of Flanders, the archbishop of Sens, the count of Vermandois, and others, and even by William Fier-à-Bras, the Aquitanian duke. Had Charles been as vigorous as Hugh, they had not been unequally matched. He took possession of Laon, and on the vacancy of the archiepiscopal see of Rheims, got it for his nephew, Arnulf the Clerk.

<sup>1</sup> No pedigree of any value traces him farther back than to Robert the Strong (see p 189). Radulf Glaber, our earliest authority (he wrote before the middle of the eleventh century), after naming Robert the king, Hugh's grandfather, the reputed son of Robert the Strong, says, 'Genus idcirco adnotare distulimus, quia valde inante reperitur obscurum'.

<sup>2</sup> The name Capet is thought to come from the 'cape,' 'chape,' or 'cap,' the hood of St Martin, which Hugh always wore, declining to wear a crown. 'Capetus, 1 q cappotus'. Others say he was so named from the size of his head.

<sup>3</sup> Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom 10, p 278.

The duke of Normandy undertook to hold in check the northern partisans of the Carolings, while Hugh attacked the Aquitanians, but William whom he had shut up in Poitiers turned fiercely on him, made him raise the siege, and draw back to the northern bank of the Loire. Then Hugh, feeling the need of help called his friends together at Orleans, and had his son Robert crowned as joint king by the archbishop of Rheims, on Christmas Day 987. Thus he seemed to give a hereditary character to his kingship, he also showed that the centre of his kingdom was not yet firmly fixed on the Seine. And indeed the Loire, which ran through the southernmost part of his domains might well have seemed to be chiefest river of France. The royal abbot of both St. Denis and St. Martin must have doubted whether indeed Paris or Tours was the true centre and had his Aquitanian expedition succeeded, it is possible he might have been tempted to leave the Seine to the Normans, who held its mouth and most of its navigable course, and to plant the capital of France upon the banks of the Loire.

Hugh got no respite for the Caroling party was not idle. He hastened to attack them in Laon, and came face to face with his rival the king of Laon, and the king of St. Denis, as they are sometimes called, came to close quarters. Charles sallied out with his Lorrainers, routed the besiegers destroyed their engines, pillaged their camp, burnt the villages in the plain and drove Hugh away in disorder. Troubles thickened his barons were shaken, his neighbours were cold. But he showed all the vigour and good sense of his race, by activity and reckless grants from the royal domain he secured his supporters. Another heavy blow came Rheims fell vacant, and thinking to make friends with a dangerous man Hugh gave it to Arnulf, the clerk of Laon. He even seems to have adopted him as a relation<sup>1</sup>. But the man was a traitor then as before.

<sup>1</sup> So says Hugh's letter to Pope John XV. Arnulfus, regis Lotharii, ut dicitur, filius, post graves iniurias ac scelera quae in nos sequuntur nostrum exercuit, hoc pariter adoptatus est a nobis ac Metropoli Remorum donatus. — Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 10, p. 521

and soon opened the city to Charles, giving the place over to pillage, the Brabant soldiery unwittingly punished his treachery by sacking the cathedral and his house. He also swore allegiance to Charles, who in his turn also became the victim of treachery. Adalberon of Laon pretended to join the Caroling party—he was reconciled with Charles and Arnulf, and restored to his bishopric. Once there, he let Hugh's troops into the place, the 'king of Laon,' his wife and nephew, fell with the town into Hugh's hands, who thus, without a blow, crushed his dangerous enemy. Charles was removed to Orleans, far from his sources of strength, and there died in prison. When Herbert, count of Meaux, died, and his son did homage to Hugh for his domains, there was no longer any prince north of the Loire who stood out against the new dynasty. Laon ceased to be a capital, and became a quiet country town, the castle, relic of those days, stood till 1832, when it was rased to the ground.

Hugh next (A D 991) persuaded the French prelates to depose archbishop Arnulf, and to set in his place the famous Gerbert, this brought on him the wrath of Pope John XV, and troubled the remainder of his life. It is noteworthy as an early example of strenuous resistance to the Papacy by the Gallican clergy and king.

Had Gerbert lived a century later, he would have led the crusading spirit, two centuries later he would have left a splendid name among the great Schoolmen—as it is, we know him chiefly as the Pope who had dealings with the devil, the magician who knew more than is good for man to know. He was brought up in Auvergne, where perhaps some savour of the old Roman learning lingered. But he heard that beyond the Pyrenees were those who could teach him yet better, and his eager spirit longed to learn, even from the Paynim. So he went to Spain, to the Moslem, who found him an apt pupil—thence he carried home a knowledge of mathematics and philosophy, and introduced the abacus, or calculating table, at which he could puzzle even the most skilful<sup>1</sup>. He also carried back that reputation for dealing with the black art, with which stupidity and ignorance have so often punished those who know more than themselves. He knew how to call shadowy forms from hell<sup>1</sup>. He called up the devil, and pledged himself to be his man thereon the fiend granted him all his will, even to the Papacy. He left at Rheims many specimens of his skill among them a clock, and a very remarkable organ played by steam. On his return from Spain he went to Italy where Otho the Great gave him the abbey of Bobbio then returned to France, and settled at Rheims as scholasticus, master of the Cathedral school. There the young Robert, future king of France was his pupil. Otho III also claimed him as his tutor and in his letters styles him most learned of philosophers, laureate in the branches of philosophy. Being much under the influence of archbishop Adalberon, he attached himself to Hugh Capet (not without also keeping up friendly relations with the German Emperor) and in course of time became archbishop of Rheims. Deserted by Hugh and driven out by the scruples of his old pupil King Robert, he fled to the Emperor who gave him the archbishopric of Ravenna, and on the next vacancy raised him to the Papal throne (A.D. 999) as Pope Sylvester II. He is, naturally enough one of the most favourite figures of early romance.

<sup>1</sup> William of Malmesbury, II, says, 'regulas dedit, quae a sudantibus abacistis vix intelliguntur'

Hugh Capet's reign was a constant struggle against his lay and clerical neighbours he purchased his kingly name by a life of toil, and by the loss of much of his domain, given to his barons as pay for their services. And at his death he was far from being the strongest man in the land. William of Aquitaine had consolidated the southern power and ruled over almost the whole of the two ancient Aquitanias the Norman duke was lord over a people of warriors far stronger and fresher than the French. In Burgundy Hugh's brother Eudes Henry was a weak creature whose barons were almost independent. The same is true of the kingdoms of Arles and Burgundy. The long reign of Conrad the Peaceful paved the way for the fall of Rudolf III, his son, who fell through sheer weakness, and retired into Switzerland, leaving the rest of his territories to be parcelled out as independent lordships. Savoy, Franche-Comté, Dauphiné, Provence (as they were afterwards called) became independent 'counties'. Everything seemed to point to a feudal subdivision of the country, with one strong state in Normandy, and another in Aquitaine.

<sup>1</sup> William of Malmesbury II (who, to say the truth, seemed to know that it was a mere idle story,) says, exire tenues ex inferno si uis.

The great historical distinctions marked by the dialects of the French tongue now began to appear. The South despised the rude speech of the North<sup>1</sup>, but even in the North the dialects were beginning to take a literary character: one for Normandy, that most independent and characteristic district, another for the Picards, the French of the Northern March towards Flanders, another for the Burgundians, whose separate existence lasted so long and was so distinct, and lastly, a fourth for the Île de France, the French of Paris, which finally absorbed the rest, just as the duchy in time became the kingdom of France.

Nor was the character of Robert, who succeeded to the sole kingship in 996, an omen of promise for the future. If Hugh had been the friend of the clergy, Robert, the devout king, was likely to be their slave and tool. His name, 'Pius' or 'Debonair,' tells the tale of his life. A kindly man, goodnatured to folly, even to a crime, religious, easy-going, he had no chance of raising the monarchy, the wonder is that it did not perish in his hands. He was 'a man of distinguished uprightness and great piety, the ornament of clerks, the supporter of monks, the father of the poor, constant in reverencing God and God's word, humble as David, king not only of his people but of himself<sup>2</sup>'. He was 'tall, with gentle eyes, and smooth well-dressed hair, broad open nostrils, a pleasant mouth, well-formed to give the kiss of peace<sup>1</sup> He had a beard of comely length, and high shoulders oft prayed he to God in the judgment hall he was modest, helpful to the accused. He read his Psalter daily, gentle, gracious, polished, he sincerely loved to do a kindness. He was right learned in letters he took delight in music, and would even join in at the singing of the mass. One day at Rome they saw him draw nigh the high altar at St. Peter's and place something on it very devoutly. The moment his back was turned the priests, eager for the prize, hurried up there was a rich silk purse, they opened it, and out fell a parchment scroll. Was it a gift of land? They looked, and saw that it was 'the Response called Cornelius the Centurion, written out and noted, the which he had newly made and invented'

<sup>1</sup> The well-known names Langue d'Oc and Langue d'Oil are of a later date.

<sup>2</sup> Chronicon Ademari Cabarrensium, in Dom Bouquet's Recueil, tom. 10, p. 146.

His whole character the delight of monkish chroniclers, in its piety and weakness, is displayed in a series of anecdotes by his biographer Helgald, who cannot enough praise his good nature his questionable almsgiving his forgiving spirit. One day he saw a priest steal a silver candlestick from the altar friend Ogger said he, run for your life to your home in Lorraine and, lest the candlestick might be hard to turn into ready money he gave him something for his journey. Another day out hunting with his bosom friend, Hugh of Beauvais the Mayor of the Palace, he was attacked by twelve men at arms, set on by his queen and Fulk Nerra of Anjou. They killed his favourite before his eyes. 'But the king though saddened for a time presently, as was right, was reconciled to the queen' and took no farther notice of the murder and insult. He usually had with him twelve poor men, who formed a sort of squalid procession before him on his journeys. One of these cut off and stole a rich gold pendant from his robe, and though the king saw it he only laughed and passed it by. He hated lying and therefore lest his vassals should swear falsely to him, he had made a splendid reliquary crystal in a setting of pure gold,—with nothing inside. On this his nobles took oath, thinking it a right holy relic and then, if they broke faith, he thought it was no perjury<sup>1</sup> His charity provided another reliquary for his lesser vassals and the rustics,—a silver case with a griffin's egg in it, and nothing else Thus he arranged matters so that lying and perjury might be harmless, thus, as they said of him, 'he showed his love of truth, and merited heaven.'

From his life by Helgald in Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 10, p. 99
Chronique de S. Denis, in Dom Bouquet, Recueil 10, p. 302.

<sup>1</sup> Radulphus Glaber 3 2

This King Robert began his sole reign in 996, and died in 1031, a long and inglorious period.

He began with trouble. The Church punished the weak and friendly, while she let the strong and hostile escape. In Robert she had a devout friend his father with the bishops had resisted Rome,—he, to appease the Pope, alienated the national Church party, and lost the wife he loved

Robert had married his fourth cousin, Bertha, widow of Count Odo I, to whose child he had also been godfather Thus she was in two ways within the forbidden degrees. Fondly attached to her, the king had vainly sought to appease the Pope by sacrificing archbishop Gerbert, whereby he estranged his old friend and helper, the acknowledged head of the Church in France, without gaining his point with the Pope For in 998 Gregory V laid the country under ban, and the bishops in council excommunicated the king and queen After feebly struggling a while, the king yielded, and set aside his wife Perhaps the belief in the approaching end of the world affected him, and made him willing to bear his cross for so short a time<sup>2</sup> Anyhow he soon consoled himself, and took to wife Constance of Aquitaine, beautiful and masterful, who made his life burdensome to him not undeservedly<sup>1</sup>. In her train came a crowd of Aquitanians to the Court at Paris, where Robert had built a new palace, and consecrated it with a miracle. The ruder Northerners, and especially the clergy were scandalised at the manners, appearance dress, and speech of the strangers. Their arms and dress were disordered, their hair cut short, and even shaven in front (a relic of Roman custom) their beards clipped like mountebanks, their high boots most discreditable to them<sup>2</sup>. Though the bishops interfered, the courtiers admired and imitated, and there seemed some fear lest they should become refined, and exchange their rude vices for the polished sins of the South. The bishops denounced these new ways of dress and conduct as snares from below. The soul of the man who had been dressed by an Aquitanian tailor was in danger. It is another proof of the complete and national difference between Northern and Southern France.

<sup>1</sup> Helgald, Ep Vitae Rotberti R 2 This was the opposite to the act of William the Bastard, who is said to have cheated Harold into swearing on the bones of saints which were hidden away in a covered box (see below, p 207), and so entangled him unawares in danger of sacrilege

<sup>2</sup> There is some doubt as to this Some think he clung to Bertha over the year 1000, whereas Labbe and Page say he married again before that date Mabillon says his second marriage took place in 1004, Vaisset, in 998 Gregory V seems to have written a letter to Constance, as Queen, in 998, which is in favour of the earlier date

The year 1000 drew near the end of the world approaching and all Northern France was moved by it<sup>3</sup>. Many were the portents. The Pope was a magician, famine and pestilence were rife, and signs appeared in the sky. Panic seized on all. Many went on pilgrimage, sinners gave or bequeathed their lands to the Church<sup>4</sup>, monasteries were reformed, the monks beginning to be more influential than the bishops<sup>5</sup>, there sprang up a religious revival the churches were filled men thought to find safety in monasteries, as did Duke William at Jumièges countless prodigies were seen, relics discovered and displayed a new and more mysterious meaning was given to the

<sup>1</sup> The Monkish chroniclers are never weary of their poor puns on her name. She is inconstans Constantia throughout. The king, when she bade him write her a love-song, lodged a sacred poem beginning O Constantia martyrum, and she, when she heard her name at the opening was perfectly satisfied.

Radulphus Glaber 3. 9 Calligis et ocreis turpissimi.

It was thought that the Millennium would begin, and our Lord return to judgment, in the thousandth year from his birth on earth.

Appropinquante mundi termino often occurs in the heading of these deeds of gift.

Of this the very curious poem by Bishop Adalbert of Laon, in which he and King Robert are the talkers, is a singular proof. It is a fierce attack on monasticism, and a protest of the bishops against the new order of things.

Eucharist, and generally accepted. It was the first wave of that national movement which a century later led to the Crusades<sup>1</sup>

Robert's reign was a ceaseless struggle with the barons, the influence of Fulk Nerra of Anjou overshadowed the royal power, Count Odo II of Chartres made head against the king though supported by the Normans, he struggled in vain against Burgundy, he could only burn and ravage the open villages and fields of the poor. Two movements took place, which, however wretched, were still indicative of the energies newly called into action. One was a rising of the servile population, which ended in a sad slaughter of peasants, with circumstances of extreme ferocity. Normandy, vigorous and oppressed, was the scene of this attempt, which embraced all the Gallo-Roman race, villains or serfs (A D 997). But the mail-clad Normans swooped down on their secret central assembly, seized the leaders, punished them horribly, and the people bowed their heads in terror, and submitted. They did but utter the first murmuring sounds of that voice so often heard throughout the Middle Ages, the voice of the many against the few, of the oppressed against the oppressor. The other movement was that of the Manichean heretics at Orleans, this also was quenched in blood. It marks the beginning of the religious persecutions of medieval and modern Europe.

Robert, following his father's example, had in 1017 crowned Hugh, his eldest son by Queen Constance, a youth of high promise, who combined what was good in both parents. Unfortunately, he died before his father, who then, against the will of Constance, raised his youngest son Henry<sup>2</sup> to the joint-kingship, while another son, Robert, was made Duke of Burgundy. Hence the latter years of the king's life were troubled by civil war, forced on him by his queen, and Henry and Robert, his sons. Burgundy and the Duchy of France suffered under the ills which then formed the sum of war. In Normandy, the strong duke Richard II, the king's faithful friend, died in 1027 leaving his sons Richard and Robert at war. They made peace after which Richard died suddenly as did some of his barons, after a banquet given by Robert to celebrate their reconciliation thereon Robert became Duke, and won the title of 'the Devil.'

<sup>1</sup> The great Pope Sylvester, here, as ever, before his age, sounded the first note of that trumpet-call which roused all the West against the East — Scriptores Rerum Franc 426 (Epist 107)

- Odo (Eudes) his eldest surviving son was an idiot.

The other great prince of the time, William of Aquitaine, died just before King Robert, who fell ill and breathed his last in 1031 sore wept by his p̄or and through all his domain, though almost unnoticed in the rest of Gaul. The Anjon chronicler giving tongue to the hatred raging between Anjon and France, both sums up the reign and indicates the character of the new king in a few words. Robert, whom we have ourselves seen reigning most slothfully, and his son, the present kinglet Henry who is not at all behind him in laziness<sup>1</sup>

King Henry whom his mother Constance hated, was at once attacked by her and by his brother Robert, duke of Burgundy Normandy took up the quarrel, vigorously supporting the young king and crushing Odo of Chartres and the revolted barons, until the name of Robert le Diable became terrible to the North of France. Fulk Nerra intervened, and brought about some sort of reconciliation<sup>2</sup>. Robert was confirmed in his dukedom of Burgundy, and Constance a few months later died and left the king in peace. Henceforward, the real power over the kingdom passed from Fulk of Anjou into the hands of the Normans. Robert le Diable delivered the weak king from his troubles, and took the French Vexin, on the Seine above Rouen<sup>3</sup>, as his recompense, bringing his frontiers within five and twenty miles of Paris.

The fear of the end of the world, which had died away when the millennial year was safely past, revived as the thousandth year from our Lord's crucifixion drew near. The miseries of mankind in Gaul were incredible: the seasons seemed to have wandered from their courses, there was such cold, such wind and rain, as had never been known. For three years (A.D. 1030—1032) there was neither seed-time nor harvest, and famine riled from Greece to England. Thousands died, and there was scarcely strength in the living to bury the dead. Horrible accounts of cannibalism were current. A peasant exposed human flesh for sale in Tournus market, he was detected, seized, and burnt. Men dug up the dead, and gnawed their bones. Near Macon, in the wood of Chatenay, stood a solitary church, hard by it a hut, wherein a man dwelt alone. One day a traveller and his wife came, and deeming it the lowly cell of some holy man, turned in and begged leave to rest awhile. As they were sitting, the wayfarer caught sight of a heap of skulls and bones in the dark corners of the hut. He leapt up, and ran to the door, followed by his wife. The solitary tried to stop them, but fear gave strength, and the travellers escaped. They fled to Macon, told the Count Otho, who went back with them to the hut, seized the monster, and reckoned up the skulls of forty-eight human beings, men, women, and children, whom he had devoured. He was led to the town and burnt<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Cum Roberto quem vidimus ipsi Ignavissime regnantem, a cujus ignavia neque precesens Henricus regulus filius ejus degenerat. — Chron. Ander. in Dom. Bouquet, tom. 10 p. 176

<sup>2</sup> Matrem redarguens cur hostilem humanam erga filios exsereret. — Radulphus Glaber c. 8

The Vexin, pagus Vaucassinois, was in two parts, the French reaching down the Seine from the Obe to below La Roche Guyon, and the Norman, from above Vernon to below Jumièges.

The poor folk, in their despair, ate roots and grass, they dug up white clay and devoured it. Paleness and dreadful leanness was on all faces, their stomachs were distended, their bones could be counted, their voices grew thin and piping, like the voices of birds, wolves came out in troops, and fed on human carcases. Then, after three years of this suffering came a sudden plenty, and mankind revived. Pilgrimages to Jerusalem grew more frequent. In 1036 the famous 'Peace of God' was proclaimed, and accepted in Southern and Eastern France, though Normans and Neustrians paid little heed to it. Synods of the clergy decreed an inviolable peace. The bishops of Burgundy, 'being now subject to no man,' had already bound themselves by oath to keep peace and do justice, and also had made their vassals swear the same. The bishops of France seeing that by the weakness of the king and the sins of the people the kingdom was falling into ruin soon followed their example. All old quarrels were to be forgotten no violence might take place on the highways against such as travelled with a priest or a monk, a clerk, or a woman. But the effect was only transitory the voice of peace soon lost its power, the barons returned to their fierce ways and private wars. Then the bishops met, five years later (A.D. 1041), and proclaimed the Truce of God, whereby fighting was forbidden from Thursday evening to Monday morning in every week on all feast days in Advent, in Lent so that the shield of religion sheltered all the year except about eighty days. This check on feudal passions was wonderfully successful for two centuries it influenced social life more however in the South than in the North, and did much to destroy the tyranny of private war and to develop the better qualities of feudal society. The family life grew more sacred the baron in his castle was surrounded by a little court, which had other interests and pleasures besides those of fighting courtesy grew into a system of honour literature lifted up her head and religion strengthened her hold on the growing life of the age.

<sup>1</sup> Rad Glaber, 4 4. Radulf says that he was present at the man's execution.

About this time (A.D. 1035) Robert of Normandy le Diable, summoned his vassals, told them he was going to the sacred places of Jerusalem, and presented to them William his only son. He prayed them to choose the child, son of a tanner's daughter of Falaise as their lord, that they might not be chiefless, were he to die over sea. The barons approved, took the base-born child, and swore fealty to him as their lord. Robert went, as he said and returning from Jerusalem fell ill, or was poisoned, at Nicaea there he died, leaving his little son to the rough mercies of the Norman lords, the little son who was afterwards King of England, William the Conqueror. Far more striking is his boyish life than that of the feeble King of France. The Normans and their neighbours thought to win advantage from the lad Guy of Burgundy, who had been brought up with him, and ought to have known of what stuff he was made, hoped to wrest Normandy out of his hands, but William borrowed three thousand men from King Henry, and beat Guy thoroughly at Val-es-Dunes, the Normans all submitted. In 1048 the boy-duke showed Geoffrey Martel of Anjou that he was not to be trifled with. Geoffrey had seized and garrisoned Domfront and Alençon. William blockaded Domfront, and leaving men enough before it, rode all night with the rest, and stormed the suburbs of Alençon at the dawn, whereon the garrison, making no more resistance, surrendered. Then William came swiftly back to Domfront; and the Anjou men, hearing how sharply he had smitten Alençon, yielded at once. He garrisoned the place, built a fort on the river at Ambrières to keep Geoffrey in check, and came home in triumph to Rouen. Later, when the fickle king turned against him, the crisis of his fortunes was past, and he held his own with ease.

In 1051, King Henry, having lost his wife Matilda, daughter of Conrad the Salic, and fearing lest, in choosing another, he might be entangled in some hidden snare of forbidden degrees, sent an embassy to the most distant prince of whom he could hear, Jaroslaf<sup>1</sup>, duke of Russia, whose capital was Kiev. His messengers came back, bringing Anne, the duke's daughter, who bore the king three sons, the eldest of whom, Philip, was so named because of a fancied genealogical relationship between his mother and Philip of Macedon. This child was consecrated king—his father still living, according to the precedent of his father and grandfather—in 1059, in the presence of the duke of Aquitaine, the counts of Flanders and Anjou. A full account of his coronation, worthy of notice as showing what form and consistency the hereditary kingship had gained, is still extant, written probably by Gervais of Rheims, who performed the chief part of the ceremony.

Mass was sung before the reading of the Epistle, the arch-

<sup>1</sup> The chroniclers write it Juriscloht, Georgius Sclavus, Geriscus

bishop turned to the child, expounded to him the Catholic Faith, and asked him if he believed and would defend it. The boy assented and a written declaration was placed in his hands and read by him, though he was but seven years old, whereby he promised to respect the privileges of the Church. Then the archbishop took the staff of St. Remigius in his hands, and discoursed quietly as to 'how the election and consecration of a king pertained specially to his sacred office, from the days when St. Remigius baptized and consecrated Hlodowig he showed, too how Hormisdas the Pope had given, through that staff, the power of consecration and the primacy over all Gaul to St. Remigius, and how Pope Victor had confirmed the same to the Church of Rheims. Then, with approval of King Henry he elected the boy to be king. After him came the Legates of Rome, who allowed that all this might be done lawfully without the Pope's sanction but that of their goodwill they had thought well to be present. Then came the archbishops, bishops, clergy then spoke Wido (Guido) duke of Aquitaine then the duke of Burgundy's son, acting for his father then twelve peers lastly the soldiers and people, great and small, all applauded, crying Laudamus, volumus, fiat! — We approve, we wish it, so be it! Philip then confirmed the privileges of the see of Rheims and lastly, the archbishop seated on his throne read the privileges granted him by Pope Victor in the ears of all the bishops. All which was done with the utmost devotion and readiness without any disturbance, or opposition, or damage to the state. And all these barons and high lords did archbishop Gervais freely entertain, and kept them at his own charge, to the honour of his Church and of his own hospitality for he owed it as a debt to none but the king<sup>1</sup>

Thus was King Philip crowned a child of seven years, with a long inglorious reign before him, and a life dark and dissolute.

From the Coronatio Philippo, seu Ordo qualiter is in regem coronatus est. — Dom Bouquet, tom. 11 p. 32

In these days lived one of the world's giants, Hildebrand, the monk of Cluny, son of a Tuscan carpenter, the great founder of the Papal Empire, who made Popes, and became Pope, and who, as Gregory VII, began the reform of the Roman Church and the struggles of the Middle Ages. In 1048 Henry III of Germany had named Bruno, bishop of Toul, pope. On his way to Rome, he lay at Cluny, and there this monk, the unconscious expounder of the antagonism between monasticism and episcopacy, showed the feudal bishop that his appointment was really void, that none but the faithful could confer the Papal chair, that the Church might not abandon her powers, or delegate them to princes, that the Papacy must be above even the Emperor, that in order to be so she must renounce the world, must sit in the dust, must throw in her lot with the faithful, even though they be slaves. Bruno was amazed and convinced, he set off bare-footed, with staff in hand, and with Hildebrand, his true staff, by his side, and reaching Rome, offered himself to the people for election. They chose him Pope, he took the name of Leo IX, and the great reform began. They attacked simony and the marriage of priests, the world might resist, but the monks heard the call, and recognised their true head in Hildebrand. The common people felt that a new life was dawning on them. Their new apostles preached purity, and denounced the fierceness and brutality of the clergy, smote with their thunderbolts turbulent bishops and barons, and the people everywhere carried out their preachings, not without violence. Hildebrand meanwhile sat at the helm, guided and led on the Papacy under four Popes for twenty years, until at last, in 1073, he deemed it time that he himself should succeed to the perilous seat.

Meanwhile, on another field, the Normans were also rising into strength, and preparing to be his best helpers. With their old traditions of conquest and adventure, their vigorous northern blood, not tamed but trained and disciplined by the earlier influences of feudalism, they were the first to set the example of enterprise to Europe. With them begins that series of expeditions, which were afterwards Crusades. The link between East and West was Sicily<sup>1</sup> thither the Saracen had already come his ships were known and dreaded along the shores of Italy where the Greek with his Eastern manners and civilisation still clung to the cities of his ancestors. It so fell out that forty Norman adventurers, on their way back from the Holy Land reached Salerno just as the trembling citizens were buying off a band of Saracen pirates. They fell at once on the unbelievers, and drove them panic-stricken to their ships. That was in 1016. The petty lords of Southern Italy, who were at that time trying to solve in small wars and intrigues the problems of their feudal anarchy heard of these brave strangers and sent eagerly for other such from the banks of the Seine. A steady stream of Normans flowed into Italy. The sons of Tancred of Hauteville led many into that land of promise defeated the Apulian Greeks and founded for themselves a feudal principality. The Greeks appealed to Henry III of Germany who bade the Pope chase these barbarians from Italy. When he tried to obey the Normans, instead, took him prisoner. Having him in their hands they demanded the investiture of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily. Hildebrand, who knew the strong from the weak, and was ever inclined to make the Normans his friends, counselled Leo to yield. Robert Guiscard<sup>2</sup> (the Wizard), became Duke of Apulia and Calabria, and one of his brothers ruled over Sicily (A.D. 1057). Thus the Normans were planted in another soil they were prepared to thrust back the Saracen and as the Pope's feudatories, to defend him against all comers. The influence of the Normans, who were not always the Pope's friends, on the later development of the Papacy and on its attempt to rule the world, in the struggle against the Holy Roman Empire is a chapter of European history which does not fall to us.

<sup>1</sup> As is remarkably seen in the time of the Emperor Frederic II whose sojourn in Sicily seemed to be the meeting-point of both worlds.

<sup>2</sup> Guiscard or Wizard, the names are the same. The name means prudent and crafty wise in its lower sense.

During these same years the relations between Normandy and England had been growing critical. Edward, a descendant of Alfred, who, while Danish kings sat on the English throne, had been brought up in Normandy, was called back to England by the advice of the great Earl Godwin, in 1042. He brought over a crowd of foreigners, banished Godwin, who represented the English party, and fell completely under Norman influences. It was said that when Duke William came to see him, Edward promised that, being childless, he would make him his heir. A little later, Harold, Earl Godwin's son, crossed into Normandy, and was seized by the crafty duke, who refused to let him go free unless he would swear to aid him in his pretensions on England. Harold, under this compulsion, swore it, with his hand on a covered box. William lifted the lid, and there lay the bones of saints, holy relics, by which, and to which, Harold had unwittingly pledged himself. When in 1066 Edward died, William at once summoned Harold to fulfil his oath. He refused, holding that it was an oath under compulsion and with deceit, and the English chose him king. But the religious feeling of the age was against him. William appealed to Pope Alexander II, who naturally turned towards the Norman. Gladly the Pope sent to William a ring and a flag, with his blessing and a command to reduce England into due obedience to the Papacy. The ring and flag were regarded as signs of investiture, expressing the claim of the Papacy to dispose of far-off islands of the sea. Harold was excommunicated.

The Duke made peace with Brittany, Anjou, and Flanders, his neighbours, and therefore his natural enemies; unfolded his intentions to his unwilling barons, whose help he won by lavish promises, went to King Philip, offering to do him homage for all his conquests, if he would give him aid. But the foolish young king listened to his counsellors, whose dilemma was, 'If the Normans win with your help, they will be stronger and more dangerous to you than ever, if they are beaten, you will share the loss and disgrace. On the other hand, if you do not

CHAPTER III

The Age of the First Crusade, A.D. 1066-1100.

THE annals of France again are silent for half a century, and again the people were not happy. For it was no true silence, but a din of jarring elements, in which the nobles did their rude will, under their madness take what form it might, the common folk bore all the blows. The dreary time drags on, full of petty private wars, royalty slumbers, the people perish in crowds. Sword, famine, and pestilence, God's three sore plagues, afflict them without mercy and without stay. Meanwhile the elements of a national life begin to stir: there is promise in the premature movement of the communes, in the revival of religion, in the building of noble churches, still more in the rise of great monasteries, in which the more popular form of Christianity begins to assert its independence and vigour<sup>1</sup>. All men are restless, ready to be guided into any general movement: the guide comes and the object, at the end of the century, the century is spent in preparing for it.

Meanwhile the Normans reduced Calabria, Campania, Sicily, and made them their own. One of their hereditary foes<sup>2</sup> regarding their character and works, says of them: 'God chose these Normans to exterminate the English, as he saw that they surpassed all men in singular energy. When they have no foe to oppress, they oppress one another and reduce their own lands to want and desolation, as is ever more and more clearly seen in the rich lands of Normandy, England, Apulia, Calabria, Sicily, which God has put under their feet,—a sufficient testimony to their vigour and success; and Henry of Huntingdon is forced to allow that their strong rule brought not desolation but security and plenty, for he adds that 'a maiden laden with gold might cross the whole breadth of England unmolested.'

<sup>1</sup> A like monastic revival took place at the same time in Germany.

<sup>2</sup> Henry of Huntingdon, l.c. 6.

In 1071 we find a rare thing—the French king in action Robert the Frisian had wrested Flanders from his brother's widow Richildis Philip set forth, attacked him boldly, was overthrown, and retired to Paris in disgrace Later on, the German Emperor and Godfrey of Lorraine espoused the widow's cause, and did what the French king had failed to do Philip had to look on and see his influence on his northern border destroyed, and the German power, already supreme in Lorraine, spreading to the ocean

In 1073 another danger threatened him William the Conqueror attacked and reduced Maine, thus moving first along the path so often trodden by the kings of England. Norman ambition looked towards the South; the Normans hoped, by means of the Aquitanian hatred of the northern French, to form a strong power which should stretch from the Seine to the Pyrenees This went on, till, in 1076, Philip once more roused himself, drove back the Normans, and made a fair peace with William

When the Conqueror died, Norman and English interests were somewhat sundered Rufus had England, Robert Normandy, and the Norman ascendancy, which was overshadowing France, was averted, though the dragon's teeth of future wars had been sown

About this time the feeble king was occupied in a strange series of dealings with the Pope He sent submissive letters, repenting, relapsing, professing much that was good, and performing all that was evil His vices demanded money money could be best got by sale of Church preferments, against which shameful blot on Christianity Rome had made a wise and a vigorous stand not long before And not content with this, Philip also divorced his wife, on some convenient plea of infringed degrees of relationship, and carried off by force

Bertrade wife of Fulk of Anjou. He was called to amend his ways, excommunicated in 1094 and summoned to appear at the Council of Piacenza. He temporised made excuses, did not appear promised to send Bertrade away kept her all the same—a man whose immorality ‘leavened the whole lump and made him false and dishonourable as well as feeble and self-indulgent. And yet, though the case against him was so clear the Papacy had no strength to take advantage of it. The reaction since Hildebrand’s death in 1085 had helped to restore the power to the Emperor’s hands. Germany opposed the Papal claims—there was an Antipope always floating about—what if the French king were to become contumacious and recognise that Antipope? The Papacy felt that the Normans were terribly independent in England afar and dangerous in Calabria at hand the Church’s claims on England had been slighted, the Paynim were threatening all Christendom, menacing not only the Greek Empire, but the Lahn shores of the Mediterranean, the Greek Church was still a powerful rival. In this alarming state of things the Papacy was driven to look around for some new force by which to recover her strength. It had long cherished a dream of heading Christian Europe against the Saracen. Sylvester the Pope-Magician, had seen the advantage of this, even at the very opening of the century Hildebrand had declared himself ready to head a crusade negotiations on the subject had passed between East and West. Again the Church had been much involved in the turbulent beginnings of feudalism the Truce and the Peace of God shewed that she desired to lessen the evils of private warfare. Lastly the sword of the strongest had an irresistible attraction for the Papacy. Thus both her necessities and her instincts led her into the path which saved her. If she could enlist the great fighting nation of the French, together with the younger valour of the Normans, in a common enterprise which Rome should bless and forward and seem to direct, then the Papacy might rise above her difficulties, and win the favour of all Christendom by driving back the Paynim, and making peace within her own borders. Again, the Papacy felt that feudalism was very willing to assert itself. William the Conqueror had shewn his independence; even Philip of France, had played with the Papacy, careless of its thunders—the centrifugal forces of feudalism tempted each chieftain to make himself independent, and even the higher ecclesiastics tried to do the same. Every year the barons grew worse to deal with, the barbarities of private war, the contempt for human life, the slackening of moral bonds, seemed to add daily to the perils of the august central power which sat at Rome. ‘Christianity,’ says Fulcher of Chartres<sup>1</sup>, ‘was growing fearfully worse in both clergy and people, war was preferred before peace by the princes of the earth, who quarrelled ceaselessly.’ At last the Pope determined to cross the Alps, and plunge into the very heart of this wild world, to see whether he could not turn into another and a safer channel these forces which were at once self-destructive and perilous to him. Other reasons as well doubtless influenced Pope Urban. He was himself a Frenchman, born in the diocese of Soissons<sup>2</sup>. Peter the Hermit, whose enthusiasm or frenzy he was accepting and using, was also French, a native of the district round Amiens. Both of them knew the French temper—the chivalrous Frank who thirsted for adventure, the hardy Norman great in conquest, the eager mobile Celt, loving all things new.

Therefore the Pope did wisely when he descended into France, and Clermont in Auvergne was well chosen for his appeal. It was central enough, yet not too far from the Alps, and easily reached from Lyons. The Pontiff’s voice would resound thence through Frankish and Aquitanian France, would reach Provence and Normandy, while at the same time the Pope would not commit himself by coming too near the excommunicated king at Paris.

<sup>1</sup> Fulcher of Chartres, in the Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 381. He was an eye-witness of these things, as we learn from the author of the Gesta Francorum Expugnantium Hierusalem, in the Gesta Dei, p. 562.

<sup>2</sup> Not far from Châtillon-sur-Marne. He had been archdeacon of Rheims before he was called, first to Cluny, next to Ostia, lastly to the Vatican.

And yet at first the success of the appeal seemed very doubtful. The Pope reached Clermont in November 1095, and was met by a goodly number of Churchmen. Over three hundred of them were there<sup>1</sup> and their proceedings were harmonious. The earlier business being done the Pope descended from the cathedral into a large open space or street, and delivered his famous harangue on the duty of taking the Cross. Two of the Churchmen then at Clermont, who doubtless heard it, have left us their impressions of this great sermon<sup>2</sup>. Their reports vary much and we can only say that the Pope depicted in lively colours the hard case of pilgrims, dwelt on the fierceness of the Turk, and the danger to Europe from him, spoke of the hereditary valour of the Franks, their love of glory, their taste for booty—drew a bright and very false picture of the wealth and fertility of Palestine—quoted those words in which our Lord bids men leave all and follow Him, and finally promised all the blessings of the Church, here and hereafter to such as gave themselves to this sacred cause. Then, after one account<sup>3</sup> arose the famous cry of Deus le volt!<sup>4</sup> God wills it! and the Pope skilfully seizing the moment, accepted the words as the motto and war-cry of the Cross.

Yet through all the accounts of this great movement, we can see signs of coldness and doubt. When the Pope turned to the bishops, begging them to preach the way to Jerusalem, they were sore disturbed. 'Some wept, some were agitated some doubted'<sup>5</sup>. There seems to have been no lay-lord of great name there<sup>6</sup>—no lay-captain could be had, and the

<sup>1</sup> Fulcher says (Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 382) that there were 310 bishops and abbots in all. Others reckon up 14 archbishops, 223 bishops, 90 abbots of high rank, or 329 in all.

<sup>2</sup> These are Robert the Monk and Archbishop Balderik.

<sup>3</sup> Robert the Monk says so; Archbishop Balderik does not.

<sup>4</sup> Or Deu le volt! which is the form given by Ducange in his second Dissertation on Joinville p. 206.

<sup>5</sup> So says Archbishop Balderik, an eye-witness (Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 88): Alii suffundebantur ora lacrimis, alii trepidabant, alii super hac re disceptabant.

<sup>6</sup> Robert the Monk says (Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 32) Noodum erat inter eos aliquis nominatorum principum. On the other hand, Balderik charge of this great enterprise fell to Adhemar, bishop of Puy, who undertook it reluctantly<sup>1</sup>, as one who felt the peril more than the excitement. Still, his appointment probably saved the movement from failure, thanks to his influence with Raymond of St. Gilles, Count of Toulouse, the greatest prince of the South. His adhesion to the cause was made known before the council broke up, and 'animated those who had before been downhearted'

As the prelates and others returned home, and began to preach the Cross in their dioceses, they found the minds of men prepared, the latent enthusiasm then sprang into life, chiefly however at first among the lower classes, except perhaps in the South, where the brilliant example of Raymond of Toulouse led many of the nobles to join the crowd. But the first-fruits of the movement were poor serfs and monks, the first army, led by Peter the Hermit, was a rabble, not an army, he preached chiefly to the common folk. In the crowd that gathered round him the foremost figure was a poor knight, Walter the Penniless, no man of higher rank was there. As Peter moved from place to place, he spoke straight home to the hearts of the people. He was short and mean of figure, bare-footed, riding on a sorry ass, dressed in a rough robe, with a crucifix in hand; so he went through all the land. When men looked at him, they saw a pinched and starved face, like a death's-head, in which rolled two wild gleaming eyes, full of enthusiasm and that half-madness which has so much power over excitable natures<sup>2</sup>. His appeals were fervid and turbulent in their eloquence, which carried men along with him. The patriarch of Jerusalem had been deeply impressed by him, Pope Urban fully believed in his sincerity and power. As he affirms that there were many men of note 'confluerant etiam ad consilium e multis regionibus viri potentes et honorati innumeri, quamvis cingulo laicalis militiae superbi' (Gesta Dei per F p 86) But it is significant that he mentions no names passed on men rose up and followed him<sup>1</sup>. Some sewed the red cross on their shoulders, others took a hot iron and branded themselves—even women did so—and loudly declared that they had received the sign on their persons from Heaven. Monks fled their cloisters some with leave, many without, and swelled the rabble. The poor farmer sold his land or his produce for such few pence as he could get, yoked to his oxen and set forth driving wife and children eastward. When they came in sight of the tall pinnacles and towers of any city the children would cry aloud and eagerly ask the bystanders if this was Jerusalem<sup>2</sup>. All manner of portents, as is usual in times of excitement, were visible notably a wonderful star shower, which portended the movement of Christendom<sup>3</sup>. Wives urged their husbands to go and shed tears of joy at their departing, some even had the boldness to set forth as well. Gradually the stir and excitement took form the preparations went on throughout the whole of the year 1096<sup>4</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> 'Licet invitatus,' says Robert the Monk of him

<sup>2</sup> He is thus described by Gregory of Terracina (given in Mabillon), who had actually seen him

While the forces are mustering let us review the many and various causes which had been preparing men for this first great movement of modern Europe, as France led the way our investigation will be chiefly confined to her shores.

At the opening of the century the belief in the near end of the world produced a kind of religious revival. The natural form it took was that of expectant gaze fixed on the Holy

Abbot Guibert says (1. 6) of the way in which the enthusiasm spread: Nec illud minus ridiculum, quod hi plerumque quos nulla adhuc emulsi voluntas attigerat, dum hodie super omnimoda aliorum venditione cachinant, dum eos misere ituros miserisque redituros affirmant, in crastinum repentino instinctu pro paucis nummulis sua tota tradentes, cum eis proficiacebantur quos riserunt.

Abbot Guibert says (1. 6) of the poor folk: Videres mirum quiddam et plane joco aptissimum (though in truth it was no matter for a churchman's laughter, seeing that scarcely one of these poor babes came home again) pauperes videlicet quosdam bobos biroto applicitis, eisdemque in modum equorum ferratis, emstantiolas cum parvulis in carroca convehere et ipsos infantulos, dum obviam haberent quælibet castella vel urbes, si hæc essent Jherusalem ad quam tenderent, rogitare.

<sup>1</sup> So says Archbishop Dalderik (Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 85).

The bright picture which historians make of the scene at Clermont seems to rest on a scanty foundation; but there is no doubt as to the enthusiasm which sprang up in 1096.

Land, whence Christ, men thought, would speedily come again to judgment. Pilgrimages multiplied: the more went, the more had a mind to go; and the more pilgrims were ill-used, the more their treatment became the common grievance of all men. The pilgrimage brought together all classes, all suffered and worshipped side by side. The growth of monasticism and feudalism gave the taste an impulse. The monk was free to move, and glad to move, and he won merit by the long journey. The feudal lord had done wild work at home, there were dark spots on his conscience which Jerusalem would wipe away. When he reached the Holy City, he became aware that the Paynim despised him, he returned to France, easy in conscience, but hot to avenge the slights put on him, and to free the sacred places from Pagan hands. Even the very misery of the age drove men to wander—it was better than the monotonous penury of life at home. We see in Pope Urban's sermon, false as it was, a telling allusion to the misery of daily life in France, when he contrasted it with life in the 'land flowing with milk and honey'

Nothing had so much turned men's eyes towards the Holy Land, as the news of the destruction of the church of the Sepulchre in 1010. It was felt to be a wrong done to all Christendom: it is, at the same time, a curious instance of the popular feeling against the Jews. A tale was invented to the effect that some wealthy Jews of Orleans, vexed at the respect paid to our Saviour's tomb, bribed a pilgrim to carry in a hollow staff a letter to Al Hakim, Khalif of Egypt. In the letter they told him that unless he destroyed the church at Jerusalem, the Christians of France would never acknowledge that he was a great prince. The Khalif was convinced, did what they asked, and destroyed the church. The real reason for the act may have been a suspicion felt by the Saracens as to his orthodoxy<sup>1</sup>, for he was related to Christians, his mother's uncle being

<sup>1</sup> The deed was done before Al Hakim proclaimed himself 'the visible image of God most high,' while he was still a fanatical Moslem.—See Gibbon, Decline and Fall, chap. 57, and Dean Milman's note

Orestes, patriarch of Jerusalem. To prove his faithfulness to Islam, he struck this great blow at Christian feeling through the church which was that patriarch's especial care. The Jews in France suffered horribly for Al Hakim's act. Some were slain with the sword, some were drowned, some perished by fire, some hanged themselves, to escape many were 'converted and despised. Thus did the excitement take natural refuge in cruelty. It was a savage time the murder of the Jews, the cruel persecutions of the Orleans heretics, the fierce repression of the Norman peasantry all fall within this quarter of a century.

The voice of the Greek Emperor was also heard. Islam had taken up its position face to face with Constantinople. At the beginning of the tenth century the Moslem were already divided into two sects of which one was that of the Sunnites, whose Khalif or spiritual head was at Bagdad, and who included the orthodox Mahometans of Arabia and part of Persia, while the other that of the Shiites or followers of Ali, Mahomet's son-in-law had their head-quarters at Cairo and commanded the obedience of Africa, Egypt, and Syria.<sup>1</sup> But it is said that before the end of the tenth century a horde of Tartars poured in on the Abbasides, seized Bagdad, became fanatically Moslem, and gave to the faith of Mahomet a fresh impulse. Not long after a great wave of Tartar or Turkish invasions under Togrulbeg, one of the Seljuk family, came westward, sweeping all before it. These were the beginnings of the Seljukian Turks. Their Sultan reduced the Khalif of Bagdad to nothingness, and passing on, conquered Cairo also. Alp Arslan, Togrulbeg's nephew, seized Iconium and made it the seat of his power. He even captured Romanus Diogenes, the Greek Emperor and threatened Constantinople. In 1073 Suleiman took the title of Prince (or Sultan) of Roum, and made Nicaea his capital, over against Constantinople herself.

The Sunnites hold that the succession of the Prophet was through his immediate successors, while the Shiites declare that all between Mahomet and Ali, his son-in-law are false prophets. There are also other points of difference, but this is the original one.

Then it was that Pope Gregory VII wrote his famous letter<sup>1</sup> to Henry IV of Germany, declaring that he would himself lead Christendom to the rescue. The Turks thus already shewed a tendency to split into three main branches, whose headquarters would be Iran, Kirman (in the south of Persia), and Nicaea. Of these the last, before crusading times, had been already broken up into the independent principalities of Alceppo, Damascus, Antioch, and Mosul. In 1086 Jerusalem was given to Orthok, chief of a horde of wild Turcomans.

To sum up these motives for the Crusade,—the Pope's necessities, the turbulence of Western Europe, the ignorance and misery of daily life, the desire to expiate a bad life by a new and holy adventure, the cry of distress from pilgrims, from the Christians of Jerusalem, and from the Eastern Emperor,—here were the chief causes which set all Europe aflame, and brought on what Gibbon calls 'the world's debate,' the Crusades.

In dealing with the history of France, we must not give too much space to these Eastern expeditions. We will note their effects on the growth of France herself, on the strength of the monarchy, the Church, the feudal chivalry, the cities, rather than chronicle events on the more distant scene.

The Council of Clermont had fixed the fifteenth of August, 1096, for the setting forth of the armies of the Cross. The eager crowd could not wait so long; and Peter the Hermit, their Moses, their Saint, whose very ass they revered<sup>2</sup>, was obliged to set out with them. So great was the throng, that they had to move in three separate armies, for fear of exhausting all the food on the way. The one soldier of name in the host, Walter the Penniless, led the vanguard, which was almost entirely made up of footmen, some fifteen thousand strong. Then came Peter with the main body of French pilgrims—monks frocked or unfrocked, debtors who had escaped from their creditors, robbers and rascals, mixed up with harmless serfs and villains, their wives and babes. Behind these came Godescalc, a monk, leading a rabble of German peasants, and lastly moving independently a considerable body of horsemen, who hung upon their skirts. It is said that the movements of this great host were directed by a goose and a goat, which strayed whither they would, and were patiently followed by the senseless crowd.

<sup>1</sup> In Labbe, tom 10

<sup>2</sup> They treasured up the hairs that fell from his t

We need not recount their doings. They crossed Germany and Hungary, rested a while under the walls of Constantinople, became unendurable to the Greek Emperor were put across the Bosphorus, and fell an easy prey to the Turks, who were directed by the fanatic ability of Kildj Aralan, Sultan of Nicaea. A pyramid of whitened bones showed to the next host that passed that way where their misguided brethren had found their rest<sup>1</sup>. The bravery of a small body of Norman knights alone showed the Turks that there was something formidable behind all this froth and scum of the ferment in the West.

One thing they did, they aroused the Greek Emperor Alexus, to a sense of the risk he was running from his new allies. He had asked for a few thousand warriors from the West, and here was the whole population, without order or discipline pouring in upon him. He saw his danger and met it, Greek fashion, with subtlety and weakness. A century later the patriarch Alexus, disputing with the Emperor Manuel Comnenus, as to the alternative of Saracenic conquest or alliance with the West, deliberately declared that, of these two evils, subjection to the Moslem would be better than a humiliating alliance with Rome—so bitterly did the Greek Church resent the treatment she had met with from the Latin Christians<sup>2</sup>.

While the hasty crowd was thus rushing to destruction, the more solid elements of the movement gathered in France into three great armies, separated partly by anxiety about supplies, but still more by the then defined divisions of the country. The

<sup>1</sup> The next army of Crusaders used these bones to build themselves a wall with for defence.

<sup>2</sup> This fact comes from a MS. dialogue between the Emperor and the Patriarch, preserved in the Library of Christ Church, Oxford.

Northern army was not French at all it was made up of Lorrainers, men of Flanders and of the Rhineland, led by Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of Lower Lorraine, a descendant of Charles the Great. This army was entirely composed of feudal subjects of the German Emperor, and had no proper French elements in it. It followed the Danube, appeased the just anger of the King of Hungary, who had suffered grievously from the lawless hordes which had already passed through his land, and reached the Bosphorus in safety. There the Greek Emperor first tried guile with Godfrey, then force, then sent his son into the Crusaders' camp, inviting Godfrey to make peace, and lastly, adopted him as his son, and lavished gifts on him. He aimed at passing on his visitors in such a way that no two armies of the Crusaders should be under his walls at the same time. And so, as soon as he heard that Bohemond was drawing near with the second host, he persuaded Godfrey to cross the 'Arm of St George' into Asia. He crossed, and encamped at Chalcedon.

This second army was composed of French, rightly so called, as well as of Normans and Burgundians, it was headed by Hugh 'the Great,' Count of Vermandois, King Philip's brother, by Robert, Duke of Normandy, who was followed by Englishmen as well as Normans, by Alan, Duke of Brittany, and by Stephen of Blois, who was said to be lord over as many castles as there were days in the year. This central host, with a countless swarm of hangers-on, crossed the Alps into Italy. They drove out the army of Henry IV of Germany (the tedious War of Investitures was going on there), and entered Lucca, where they found the Pope, who blessed them. Thence on to Rome, where many pilgrims, weary already of the way, turned back and went home. Thence through South Italy to Bari, but, the season being far advanced, the shipmen would not take them across, and they must needs winter in Calabria. Here, too, a great number 'of the poor and cowardly' sold their bows, took up their staves, and wended their way homewards. The rest, next April, took ship at Brindisi, crossed to Durazzo and thence at last to Constantinople by land. Bohemond son of Robert Guiscard, and with him Tancred, famed in song had preceded them with the Italian Normans.

The third army, composed of Gascons, Aquitanians, men of Provence and Toulouse was led by Raymond, Count of Toulouse, who has left a splendid name in the literature of the Crusades. His was the best-appointed of all the armies the wealth and civilised manners of the south enabling them to face all the difficulties of the expedition this force never suffered as the others did. Raymond was helped by the counsel of the Pope's legate, Adhemar of Puy who did not live to see his cause triumphant for he died soon after the taking of Antioch. This army set forth last. They crossed the Alps, as the French had done, but kept straight on through Lombardy passed the Julian Alps, and made for Constantinople across the wild regions of Slavonia and Servia. After a harassed and exhausting march they eventually reached Constantinople before the French host.

Alexius succeeded in persuading most of the leaders to swear homage to him, and to promise to give up to him such cities as they might capture, if they had been formerly under the Greek Empire. To this promise they paid small heed. He got them over the Strait, and breathed freely again. Cleverly as he had managed, there remained in the minds of the chiefs an unpleasant sense of humiliation. They felt they had been outwitted by one far weaker than themselves.

And now the whole forces of Western Christendom were for the first time gathered together and William of Tyre says that, at the great review of their troops, there were numbered six hundred thousand footmen and a hundred thousand horse figures which though they must be doubtful may be taken as indicating the greatness of the force. They besieged and took Nicaea. Kilidj Arslan, who fought them bravely found them much tougher stuff than Peter's rabble had been. The Crusaders then marched southward. Again Kilidj attacked them at Dorylaeum and was repulsed with great loss, after this he could only annoy their march. With loss and suffering, with adventure and triumph, the host dragged its huge body through Asia Minor and reached Antioch. After a long siege the city was taken, but not till famine and disease had smitten the victors. The sufferings were so great, that William of Melun, 'the Carpenter,' and even Peter the Hermit, who had joined the main army, fled away, and were scarcely brought back by Tancred. The common folk plunged into debauch, they drank and quarrelled. It was said that they ate the corpses of the Saracens. Though they took the city of Antioch, the citadel still held out, and Kerboga, Sultan of Mosul, appeared under the walls three days after the town had fallen with a great army of Turks. Then began the critical struggle on it depended the possession of the coast-line, the key of the situation. The Christians again fell into fearful want, except, perhaps, the Provençals, whose stores seemed never entirely to fail. Robert, Count of Flanders, begged his bread in the streets. At last the princes determined to risk all on one great stroke. Raymond of Toulouse caused the head of the spear of Calvary to be discovered, buried before the high altar of one of the churches<sup>1</sup>. The crowd, full of excitable feelings, was roused to the highest fervour, and the whole army, in twelve columns, after the twelve apostles, sallied forth and fell on the Turks. With the spear in their midst, and their minds aglow, they were irresistible: they saw a troop of heavenly warriors descending to their help. The vast host of Turks at last fled, leaving their camps, which contained the whole wealth of the Khalifate, in the hands of the Christians<sup>2</sup>. This battle broke the power of the Seljukian Turks in Syria; they offered no farther resistance to the Crusaders. The Egyptian Fatimites<sup>3</sup> now held undivided sway over Jerusalem and Syria.

<sup>1</sup> This relic was long a point of faith with all the Languedoc, but of doubt and unbelief with the Languedoc.

<sup>2</sup> Wilken, Bk. I c 8, shews that there was also much dissension and insubordination in the Turkish camp.

<sup>3</sup> The followers of Ali, or the Shutes, but soon to fall under the orthodox Sunnites.

After six months of rest—if that was rest which was spent in the death-grip of pestilence and famine—the Crusaders marched out of Antioch, leaving Bohemond, the Norman, as its prince. Baldwin, Godfrey's brother had previously been called to help the tyrant of Edessa, who adopted him as his son, Baldwin soon wrested the throne from his new father and established the Frankish county of Edessa, which subsisted for forty nine years (A.D. 1097–1146)

At last from the heights of Emmaus (Nicopolis) the Crusaders saw with transport the Holy City. There were scarcely forty thousand of them left, survivors of so many myriads and Jerusalem was held by a large Turkish army. But the prize was too near and too dear to be lost and after five weeks, in which Gaston of Bearn with his engines of attack made the assault possible, the Christian army at last stormed the city and in their triumph broke out into the wildest excesses of bloodshed and devotion (July 15, 1099). Eight days later the Latin princes elected Godfrey of Bouillon King of Jerusalem but his pious heart refused that title in the city in which the Christ had been crowned with thorns, and he became Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre. Well he did his work, for the short time that was left him. Soon after his election he was called on to face the Vizir of the Fatimite Khahf, who had hastened up from the South to support his deputy at Jerusalem. Here, as before, differences among the Moslem greatly helped the Christians, as did also the distance at which Syria lay away from the centres of the Turkish power. Godfrey met the Vizir at Ascalon, and won an easy victory over the effeminate Egyptians. As the battle of Antioch had crushed the Seljuks, so the victory of Ascalon overthrew the Fatimite power in Syria, and left Godfrey safe at Jerusalem a few Moslem strongholds had to be reduced, and then the Latin kingdom became coextensive with the ancient kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Godfrey died within the year first his brother Baldwin of Edessa, then his cousin Baldwin succeeded him. They reduced the seaport cities and ruled over the whole coast from beyond Tyre to the borders of Egypt Raymond of Toulouse established himself at Tripolis, and thus sprang up four Latin principalities,—Jerusalem, Tripolis, Antioch, Edessa, results of the first Crusade

The great conquest had now to be organised, and this was done on the strictest feudal principles. Nowhere can we trace the mechanism of feudalism so clearly as here, for here it is not the slow growth of centuries, crossed by all the accidents of history, but a deliberate setting out of a feudal kingdom, after the principles of political life then received, with no prior rights or claims to interfere with the symmetry of the institution, no kings to resist from above, no cities to rise up at its side, nor private feuds to disturb the ground-plan of the scheme<sup>1</sup>

Meanwhile the stillness which had settled down on France, and was one of the best results of the Crusades, was rudely broken by the harsh war-cry of Red William of England. His brother Robert Courthose had pledged his duchy of Normandy to him when he went on Crusade. and it seemed likely to William either that his brother would not come back, or, if he did, that he might be satisfied with some lesser dignity than that of his own duchy. So William revived the old Norman claims on the French Vexin—the territory which lay on the Seine, between Paris and Rouen<sup>2</sup>, and at the same time made war on Helias, Count of Maine, after whose lands his father had ever hankered. From 1097 to 1099 war went on between William and the indolent Philip, who left the defence of his borders to Louis his gallant son. But Walter Tyrrell's<sup>3</sup> arrow in the New Forest delivered France from this danger. The careless Robert of Normandy, who had idled a year among his kinsfolk of Italy and Sicily came too late to claim the crown of England. He did not reach Normandy till the latter part of 1101 by which time Henry Beauclerc, his younger brother was secure on the English throne. Robert was strangely unlike his kin he was indolent and not ambitious, he scarcely cared to beat himself against the Count of Maine or the King of England. Henry was a very different character he crossed over into Normandy and defeated his brother, seized on the dukedom, and sent its rightful owner Robert, a half prisoner to England, where he lived in all sorts of enjoyment and content for seven and twenty years, far from dissatisfied with his lot. Under Henry's wise rule, Normandy tasted something of that peace and comfort to which she had long been a stranger.

<sup>1</sup> This feudal constitution is described in Chapter IV

<sup>2</sup> See above, p. 200, note 3

<sup>3</sup> If indeed he had anything to do with it. Suger's testimony is very interesting, and almost convincing. 'Imponebatur a quibusdam cuidam nobilissimo viro Galterio Tirello quod eum sagitta perfoderat. Quem, quum nec timeret nec speraret, jurejurando saepius audivimus et quasi sacro sanctum asserere quod ea die nec in eam partem silvae in qua rex venabatur, venent, nec eum in silva omnino viderit'—Suger, Vita Lud. Grossi, chap. 1

After the fall of Ascalon many of the Crusaders took ship for Europe, leaving Godfrey and Tancred with three hundred knights at Jerusalem others followed the fortunes of Bohemond and Baldwin, and Raymond, who had sworn never to return, ruled over his little principality of Tripolis. Peter the Hermit went home, and passed the rest of his days in the uneventful quiet of a monastery in the Liège country. Those who brought back tidings of these great triumphs, found that he who had set Europe in motion was gone to his rest, and that another sat in the Pontiff's seat. But the Papacy reaped the fruits all Europe saw that the Pope had moved the world successfully. The new feudal kingdom of Jerusalem held of him he seemed to be lord of both Rome and the Holy City two centres of the faith. The moral result was great, the actual increase of power great henceforth for two centuries the crusading power was to be the weapon by which the Papacy should hold its own against the Empire<sup>1</sup> and rule the minds of men.

When it was known that Godfrey was dead, that the Saracens pressed on the Christians, and that Jerusalem was scarcely safe a new movement at once began. William IX. of Aquitaine the foremost prince of the time, a libertine and a troubadour<sup>1</sup>, who had resumed the lead in Southern France on the departure of Raymond, headed the new levies. But he went with regrets and doubts, as his poem<sup>2</sup> shows,—regrets quite justified by the event. With him went Herpin, Count of Bourges, who sold his lordship to King Philip to raise funds for the war. Thus the French King benefited by the reckless enthusiasm of his neighbours, and for the first time got some hold on the south bank of the Loire. Stephen of Blois and Hugh of Vermandois also joined Duke William IX, they had before deserted the Crusade, and were now forced by public opinion to wash away the stain of that disgrace. They went, and expiated it with their life-blood. This army also passed through Constantinople. The Sultan of Iconium (Konieh) harassed their passage through Asia Minor, and only a remnant of their host reached Jerusalem. William with much difficulty got back to Aquitaine, with hardly a follower. The Aquitanians called on him for their kinsfolk whom he had led forth; and there was no reply.

<sup>1</sup> The way in which the Emperor Frederick II was hampered by his vow to take the Cross is a well-known proof of its power.

Some years later, Bohemond of Antioch came back to Europe to revive the enthusiasm of the West, and led a strong force of Frenchmen and Italians with him,—not to Palestine but to the Bosphorus. He attacked Alexius, the Greek Emperor; but the Latins were not yet ready to make war on the Empire, and the expedition came to nothing. And thus ended the first Crusade.

We may pause here to consider the general effects of the crusading movement, though, properly speaking, we ought to wait till after the days of St Louis, when the enthusiasm had died out. There is, however, some advantage in noting these results at once, so that they may be before our eyes as we move on. And besides, at no later time can we expect to have such leisure as here. Never again will the life of France at home be so uneventful.

<sup>1</sup> He was the first of the Southern Trouvères whose poems have remained to our day.

<sup>2</sup> See Mary Lafon, Histoire du Midi de la France, 2, 11

It seems impossible to lay out a full table of good and bad results, and to strike a cold unimpassioned balance between them. We may only state the chief consequences, and their import, one way or other. Men must ever differ as to the relative weight to be given to this or that element in the problem. To some the Crusades are the means of a natural development of the world from worse to better; to others, they are but the results of a low and hateful state of society.<sup>1</sup> Let us try simply to set out what came of them, and that briefly, remembering that we are considering not merely the first Crusade, at the close of which we stand, but the whole movement and period.

To begin with the evil results

1 Set in the scale the awful waste of human life on an object which from afar may seem noble, but which was to the actors in it little more than a fanatical instinct. It is idle to say that life at home was worth nothing, and that the soldier of the cross bartered a long dreary life for a short and brilliant one. The myriads whose bones marked Eastern highways, or were bleached in the sun of Asia, or who perished in that charnel-house of Christians, Antioch, neither attained their end, nor were happy in the pursuit of it. The aggregate of human suffering and the waste of human power were horrible.

2 Next we may put the degradation of man's moral state. The Crusades made men worse than before—more bloodthirsty and cruel, and more depraved. The cross had long been fastened to the sword—now the sword became shameless in its lust for blood. The sack of Jerusalem in the first Crusade was a deep stain on the moral character of Christendom, and morality suffered even more from contact with the East. Man-

Thus, to one the growth of the Papacy (to take an indisputable result) must seem an unmixed good; to another an intolerable evil; or one may think that literature was awakened by the Crusades; another that it was quite independent of them; one, that the Crusades thrust back the Turk; another that they really paved the way for the fall of Constantinople; and so on.

ners, without becoming refined, became far more dissolute; the canker of immorality, ever the sore evil of France, spread swiftly under Eastern influences<sup>1</sup>, men learnt cunning and lies from the subtle Greek. The Pullani, the half-breed offspring of the Crusaders, were a degraded and despised race. These things cannot be passed over, when we place the glories of chivalry in the other balance.

3. Connected with this is the often-forgotten fact that these wars made the sword the arbiter in all the religious disputes of men. For centuries all wars of intolerance were Crusades. How could Christianity but suffer from this destruction of her loving spirit? Hence sprang the wild wars of the Teutonic knights in the North; the cruel ruin of the fair cities of Provence and Aquitaine in the South. The Frank had long deemed himself the sword-arm of the Church. The Crusades taught him that his tradition was right, and that Christianity rested on that arm. Heroism and chivalry were linked with war against the 'miscreant,' the unbeliever. The comforts of religion here, and the blessings of eternal life hereafter, were believed by the Crusader to be secured by the sword; and that whoever was banned by the Pope became a wretch in whose heart's blood it was the Christian's duty to imbrue his pitiless hands. 'I came not to bring peace on earth, but a sword,' seemed to these ages a prophecy worthy of literal fulfilment. So they turned the sword against Paynim or heretic alike. The Crusade in Provence was a legitimate sequel to the new principle, each war the Pope meddled in was styled a Crusade. Paschal II egged on Robert of Flanders (on his return from the first Crusade) to make a holy war against Henry IV of Germany, whom the Pope styles 'the head of all heretics', and a free promise of the 'New Jerusalem' was made to the warrior if he would undertake this godly enterprise. The Pope let France loose on Frederick II, and called it a Crusade, the Netherlands war was a Spanish Crusade, so too was the Armada. This heritage of violence is the worst evil which sprang from the Crusades there is no good side to this.

<sup>1</sup> In the Roman de Renard, p. 59, we have it briefly, 'Qui bon i vont, mal en reviennent'

4. No permanent results followed in the East. The Mahometans were thrown back awhile but the spirit of resistance was also weakened. The Crusades never reached the heart of the Moslem power. As a great political movement they failed they neither crushed the Saracens, nor made permanent colonies on the sea-board, nor strengthened the natural outpost of Europe, Constantinople. The Mahometans were in a divided condition when Europe fell on them the common danger roused their heroism, and taught them fresh lessons in the art of war. Meanwhile the Latins sapped the foundations of the Greek Empire, and when the Eastward fervour cooled down, and Mahomet recovered his lost ground in Asia, he found his old foe across the Bosphorus weaker than before. The marvel is that Constantinople survived so long there is no greater wonder in history than the long vitality of that dying Empire.

5. Connected with the last remark, we may also note that the estrangement between Greek and Latin widened the breach between the two branches of Christendom. The Crusades destroyed the last hope of unity as the Pope grew stronger, the Greek grew more stubborn the West trampled with mailed foot on the East the subtle Greek felt that between his own taste for religious subtleties, and the hard warriors, who cared nothing for his theology and speculations and despised his feebleness, there never could be union. The Greek had looked towards Rome with willing eyes before now he averted his face with pious horror.

6. We may perhaps add to the account the great growth of the Pope's power. I put this, which is one of the best marked consequences of the Crusades, here among the evil results, though many naturally count it as good, and deem it the most potent instrument in the growth of the modern world. No such power can be all good or all bad, at any time and the Papacy was clearly necessary as a counterpoise to the tyranny of the temporal power it kept alive some sense of right in the world. Yet we cannot look historically at this august institution with unmixed feelings. There is in it too much selfishness and self-assertion, it crushes all movement of society in which it has not the first place, it resists the most vigorous Emperors, enslaves national Churches, makes reform impossible, detests civil rights and freedom. One day it may be possible coolly and fairly to trace its whole influences on the world for good and evil, meanwhile, let us salute without prejudice the grandest figure of the Middle Ages, as it towers in its strength above the princes and peoples of the earth

7 Lastly, and connected with the foregoing, are the evils which resulted from the great increase of the wealth of the clergy, more especially of the monastic orders, and (in part at least) the establishment of the religious orders of knighthood, the standing army of the Papacy.

These are the chief counts of the indictment against the Crusades. we will now look, in the same way, at the other side.

1 Though the waste of life was horrible, we may set against it the desolate character of men's life at home, and the fact that the wider horizon there opened out, and the theatre of action provided, were blessings of no small magnitude. The growth of Europe might be stunted for a time, but the blanks were soon filled up, and the comparative stillness and peace at home favoured the progress of population

2 Though man's moral nature suffered sorely, yet there was a compensating result in the great spread of commerce and of the activity of the human mind. Commerce strengthened the cities, tended in the end to humanise life, and developed fresh wants and new enterprises. As has been often noticed, the Crusaders saw two civilisations, the Greek and the Mahometan, each in some respects higher than their own, and though, as happens when the lower meets the higher, they were very apt to choose the evil and leave the good, still they gained something, and brought back new ideas and feelings, beneficial to Europe in themselves and in their effects. Life became somewhat less harsh, its interests spread more widely. Men learnt something from Eastern diet and dress, usages, arts of war, literature, produce, the pulses of life were quickened, the sense of enjoyment in life put forth some sweet blossoms. And the moral nature of man got some good from the display of the nobler side of chivalry, and from the sight of endurance and heroism. We need not enlarge on this point. We have gone through a reaction against Don Quixote and the distaste for the 'barbarous Gothic, and in our days chivalric qualities are put above rather than below their due place, while we shut our eyes to the coarse vices and faults which went with them, forgetting that chivalry was often brutal in its strength, coarse in its manners. A few brilliant exceptions have cast eternal glory on chivalry in whose dazzling light we fail to see of what poor stuff the most are made.

3 While the Crusades provided this splendid stage for the display of feudal virtues, they also silently undermined the whole caste system of Europe. If feudalism shone bright, it was with a consuming fire. For the Crusades were fatal to many of the great lords. They went and perished, by mischance of war by famine, by pestilence, or on the journey. These not coming back, their lands often fell to churches or kings. And those who did return were the poorer. Some had sold lands, others had taken everything of value they possessed, and had spent it. Many became the paid men of the richer lords. Others took vows and ended their stormy lives in the still cloister. And, besides, other influences were at work on them. The Crusades had freed multitudes of their human cattle, the serf who went on pilgrimage learnt to be free. The isolation too of the feudal lord ceased. He had to jostle with others. He had not to lord it over burghers and men-at-arms, but to find himself among men greater than himself. Good knights won at least as much renown as he, and the rise of the military orders indicated the existence of fresh forces in the world before which the proud nobles stood abashed. Service as connected with and flowing from tenure of land, the essential quality of feudalism, was rudely shaken for knights and even barons were glad to enrol themselves for pay, and not as a matter of feudal service, under the great chiefs. Joinville's 'Life of St Louis' illustrates in every page this weakening of feudal power. The general result was this: royalty was presently enabled to make head against the anarchy into which feudalism had thrust society, and European national life began to shape itself into form.

4. And while feudalism lost, the cities gained. They could not go on pilgrimage, or squander their wealth, as private persons did. They had lords eager to sell them their freedom: the money paid enabled the lords to take themselves out of the way, to the Holy Land, whence, may be, they never came back to harass the burghers and renew their claims of lordship. Kings too, not feeling that they had anything to fear from the cities, granted them many privileges, often for ready money: the quickened pulse of commerce aided them, they grew in size and importance, and were the market-places of the world.

5. And serfdom was lightened. In many cases the serf and the villain bought their freedom of their lord. He, setting forth eastwards, cared little for the persons of his dependents, much for a purse of gold. Thus many emerged into liberty. Others took the cross, and who could hold him less than a brother in arms who was sanctified by the same sacrament of devotion? Instead of slaves and mere beasts of burden they became comrades in days of difficulty and risk: they even made the great discovery that their strength and spirit had a marketable value: they became paid soldiers,—a great step upwards. They took something from the weight of feudal power, and transferred it on the whole to royalty.

6. And royalty was above all the gainer. The kings at first stayed at home, while they were weak, and so gained by not exhausting what little power they had, or coming into dangerous competition with vassals and others stronger than themselves: when they were stronger, they also went crusading, and then they gained again by placing themselves before the world as the great heads and leaders of the movement, they taught mankind to regard them with new respect as the true rulers and lords of men. We have already shown that they gained largely by the weakening of the feudal barons. To trace the growth of the French monarchy the feeble infancy of which is almost lost to sight during the earlier turmoil and enthusiasm of the Crusades, will be our task for the future.

CHAPTER IV

Of Feudalism and Chivalry

HITHERTO we have been content with passing notices as to the earlier state of the feudal hierarchy, the time has now come when we may look more closely into it. For on two different theatres feudalism had lately been called on to display its characteristic qualities in England and in the Holy Land. Whereas in France and Germany it gradually grew up, one knows not how, in England and Jerusalem its principles may be seen in their later development, consciously applied to the founding of new societies. Both these new kingdoms were, more or less, French, that of Jerusalem almost entirely, that of England such in the character and views of the Norman conquerors. By studying these we avoid the confusions and anomalies which sprang up in wild times, we discern the plan of feudalism, as understood by its chief actors its clean-cut theory, side by side with the imperfections which inevitably resulted from its application.

We know that conquering races, settling in a new land, possess themselves of the soil, while the former owners, if they survive, drop into dependence or slavery. We know that when the Germans seized on Gaul this was the case. The chieftains of the incoming tribes became territorial lords, holding their lands by alodial tenure<sup>1</sup>, with no master over them, and only a slight subordination to the chieftain whom they made their king, who was in truth little more than their peer. He and they rewarded their followers with gifts of land and substance, and attached to these gifts the sense of obligation, remaining lords over both lands and men, though without claiming the produce or taking rent. These grants were called benefices, and were said to be held by feudal tenure. These smaller holdings, some of them of great extent, were again often granted in portions by these vassals to their dependents, and a system of what is called subinfeudation sprang up until the whole country was occupied by the conquerors, standing to each other in the hierarchical relations of lord and vassal, first the King then the lords and barons, his immediate vassals, then the arrière vassals who held their lands of the higher lords. The lord had full power even of life and death over the original inhabitants of the land, who became villains or serfs<sup>1</sup>. Between these, and clear of them, stood the freemen, not noble but free, the burghers and the free tenants in the country of these we need not say much, for at the time of which we speak they had but little footing in France<sup>2</sup>. At first powerful vassals strove to turn feudal into alodial tenure, regarding it as more free and independent, as time went on, it became safer to convert the smaller alodial properties into fiefs so as to get the protection of some powerful lord. By the end of the eleventh century this change had passed over the chief part of the alodial lands, though many still remained untouched, more particularly in the South. Beside this prevailing feudal relation, based on the land, for which the vassal paid homage to his suzerain, there was yet another relationship, more obscure in nature, between the persons, irrespectively of the land. This was called 'commendation'<sup>3</sup> under which the weaker paid homage to the stronger with certain conditions, especially of military service and help the stronger undertaking to defend him against all comers. It was a condition mid-way between the alodial and the feudal, and akin to the relations of knighthood.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p 76

<sup>1</sup> Villain is the name for the small farmer who tilled his field or two, and paid his lord a heavy rent in kind. He was ascriptus glebæ, tied to the soil, unable to leave his lord's estate. Serf is the lowest class of all he was in few respects better than the slave of classical or modern days.

<sup>2</sup> There were plenty of them in England, in town and in country. The soagers held their lands by free tenure, and very many besides them were tenants for life: from these in later days came the famous English romes, against whom France had come to set at Crecy or Agincourt.

Hallam likens it to the relation between patron and client at Rome

At the time of the First Crusade the land we now call France was under a comparatively small number of independent lords, of whom the chief were the French king, the Duke of Normandy, and the Duke of Aquitaine, besides several of lesser name. Under these were counts and noble vassals, who held their lands on divers tenures, under them again their vassals, in the state of sub-infeudation, till the land could bear no more subdivision. Though the most of these held their fiefs on a condition of military service, others held by other tenures, such as offices at the lord's court<sup>1</sup>, payments in money or in kind, sometimes of a trivial and grotesque nature, as, for example, tenure by the reek of a roast capon.

All territories held by feudal tenure in the North of France were also under the uncodified system of rights, governed in fact by custom, not by law, by custom sadly apt to vary with the varying strength and weakness of the parties. In the South the imprint of Roman law was never lost, it deeply modified feudalism. That part of France which was under the rule of German custom was called the 'Pays du droit coutumier,' the land of custom-right, extending from its northernmost borders to the right bank of the Loire, where Roman law prevailed, it was called the 'Pays du droit écrit,' the land of the written law, extending from the Pyrenees northwards till it met the other district.

Let us see how this institution was transplanted in its full growth to Jerusalem, and there reorganised, clear of the trammels of European life and custom. It developed itself with surprising rapidity and clearness<sup>2</sup>. 'The ancient Assises of Jerusalem provide us with the clearest and brightest reflection of the manners and laws of feudal Europe<sup>3</sup>.' It will show itself very distinctly on the background of the dark and unknown

<sup>1</sup> Of which the most splendid example is that of the Seven Electors of Germany, who were, strictly speaking, the seneschal, cup-bearer, sword-bearer, &c. to the Emperor.

<sup>2</sup> Whoever will compare English feudalism with this kingdom of Jerusalem should study it in Freeman's Norman Conquest, vol. 4 chap. 17.

<sup>3</sup> So says Beugnot on the Assises, vol. 1 p. 19.

East the feudal towers stand up in strong relief bright under the Western sun, against the thunder cloud of the Moslem power ever threatening to overwhelm them in an angry storm<sup>1</sup>

Jerusalem was taken by the Crusaders on July 23, 1099 and after a few days given up to the wildest excesses, the chiefs of the army reasserted the feudal principle of elective monarchy by choosing Godfrey, their worthiest prince as king. He however refused that name, and became Defender of the Holy City. After the battle of Ascalon, which secured and extended the Latin conquests Syria was called the Principality of Jerusalem and, that the Latins might hold together and communications by land be kept up with Constantinople, the really independent territories of Edessa and Antioch became great fiefs under Godfrey. After a time the Principality of Tripoli was separated from that of Jerusalem, and put on the same footing and Jerusalem, Tripoli, Antioch, and Edessa, became the four elements, the four high principedoms of this Eastern feudalism. The homage done and allegiance promised to the Byzantine Emperor were forgotten the new kingdom was declared to be held straight from the Pope and a Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem was established to complete the insult to the Empire<sup>2</sup>. Round the King's<sup>3</sup> person was grouped a court of officials, modelled on the Capetian court at Paris the whole of Syria was parcelled out, Joppa became the seat of a marquis, there were counts of Bethlehem and Nazareth. In every town a viscount watched over feudal interests. Much of the open country was still in the hands of the Syrians, and they swarmed in the towns their relations to the invaders became afterwards a source of trouble but at the outset the Crusaders paid no heed to them, and divided the land at will.

These territorial arrangements made and made so wisely that none murmured, the wisdom of Godfrey and the Patriarch and the Court was exercised on a new task<sup>1</sup>—that of the construction of a code of laws and customs, civil and criminal, memorable as the first attempt of the kind in the history of feudalism; for even Charles the Great had not attempted a code of laws

<sup>1</sup> The best account of the kingdom of Jerusalem is to be found in the two folio volumes of Count Beugnot on the Arabes of Jerusalem, whence much of the text is drawn.

<sup>2</sup> The Archbishop of Pisa first filled this new office.

<sup>3</sup> Godfrey's successors did not imitate his modesty or his virtues.

First, they made a code dealing with the rights and privileges of the noble-born, and called it 'the Assise<sup>2</sup> of the High Court of Jerusalem,' and followed it up with a like work on the duties and rights of burghers, both among themselves and in their relation to the barons, and this was 'the Assise of the Burgher Court' These two codes were written out fair, in a manuscript with richly-painted capitals, each law being set forth in uncial characters, and were deposited in a coffer, securely locked, and laid up among the treasures of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre<sup>3</sup>, doubtless not without reference to the Ark of the Covenant, and the Tables of the Law hid up therein in the Temple. Here they were jealously guarded the box could not be opened and the Law displayed to the light except in the presence of nine persons, the King and two of his men representing the High Court, the Viscount of Jerusalem and two Burghers representing the Burgher Court, and the Patriarch with two canons the Church of the Sepulchre, as guardians of this precious deposit

Thus they made and hid away their great work, unique and far before the age They hid it, for though they had made a code of 'written law,' the Northern French barons could not reconcile themselves to the Southern system, or abandon their dear familiar 'Custom law' Any attempt to compel them to live under such a system must have failed. It was as natural to the barons to hide away their Code as for the College of Pontiffs and the patricians of Rome to keep the Twelve Tables out of sight of the people though the reason of the act was not quite the same in both cases. No copies were made of the Assises, nor were they often appealed to they lay in the treasury of the Church, jealously guarded from sight, till one day Saladin's men burst in, at the taking of Jerusalem (A.D. 1187), to plunder the sacred place of its pious wealth. Then the chest with the manuscripts, valueless in their eyes, disappeared for ever<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> 'Par le conseil des princes et des barons et des plus sages homes que il lors pot avoir,' says Ibelin, c 1 (Beugnot, 1, p 22)

<sup>2</sup> An Assise is defined in the 'Clef des Assises' as 'toute chose que l'on a vue user et accoustumer et delivrer en cour du royaume'

<sup>3</sup> Whence they came to be called 'the Letters of the Sepulchre' P Paris (Journal des Savans, AD 1831) holds that these 'Lettres du Sépulchre' were a simple Doomsday Book, a register of fiefs and duties But such a book did exist independently under the title of 'Secreta Regis,' 'the King's Secrets', and Count Beugnot (Introduction to vol 2, p 14) shows conclusively that the Letters must have been more than a register of feudal estates

Under these laws the feudal kingdom was governed and pilgrims returning to Europe, carried glowing accounts of them to their ill regulated homes. The Kings of Jerusalem were men of prudence, who did their best to rule their turbulent brethren after the law, and from time to time made such amendments and additions to the Code as were needed. Thus Baldwin I, a prince of learning made considerable changes to him the Code owed an Assise du coup apparent, or justice when a baron smote his man a first law of assault, made necessary by the outrageous tempers of the crusading lords. And Amaury<sup>2</sup> another wise prince modified the conditions of tenure so far, that all arrière-vassals (like those of William the Conqueror in England) had to take oath of allegiance to the King, and to be under his protection thus at once defending them from their immediate lords, and also showing that the tendency towards an increase of the royal power was spreading from France and England to Jerusalem.

The High Court had the King as President, and all the King's men sat in it. If we may accept the account given in the written Assise, it regulated the position and succession of the royal power, the rights and duties of the King's men the functions of the great officers of the kingdom, the Marshal, <sup>1</sup> The Collection of the Laws and Customs of Jerusalem, made by Jean d'Belin in the thirteenth century seems to be a faithful exposition of the customs of Jerusalem as then in use and to be based on the original written code.

<sup>2</sup> A.D. 1163

Constable, &c ; it settled points as to donations, service, sales, succession to fiefs, and the like ; and, finally, all questions between lords and burghers The influence of this Court was thoroughly aristocratic and feudal It became a kind of Privy Council, settling all important questions as to peace and war, the royal succession, and the like. In character it answered nearly to the Court of France, from which the Parliament of Paris was an offshoot

The Burgher Court, or Low Court, was under the presidency of the Viscount of Jerusalem, and the 'sworn men'<sup>1</sup> of the city sat in it It is notable as an early draft of a municipal constitution, though in political interest it falls far below the French Communes of a later date As in the introduction of a code of feudal laws, so in this foreshadowing of civic rights, the Kingdom of Jerusalem is the eastern harbinger of modern Europe Two things helped to give these Courts their marked character. first, the risks to which the Latins were exposed, from Saracens without and Syrians within their walls, and from their own turbulent unbridled vices ; and secondly, the position of the colonists who streamed over from Europe<sup>2</sup> These were often rich and free merchants, to whom rights could not be refused Yet, in a Syrian town the commercial usages of France would have been fatal, consequently the court of each city had well-marked relations and rights, and was closely bound up with the feudal aristocracy of the kingdom ; the town was made as like as possible in its government to the feudal castle<sup>3</sup>

These City Courts were ruled by laws, which formed the 'Assise de Basse Cour', a collection made with no great system, regulating all sales, loans, sea-faring, pledges, contracts for hire of servants or land, and agreements. It also ruled the civil

<sup>1</sup> These were twelve men chosen by the King, or the Lord of the fief in which the Court was sitting They took oath to him, not to one another

<sup>2</sup> In some cases the Latins expelled all natives, to make room for these colonists

<sup>3</sup> A little later the merchant cities, Genoa first, then Venice and Pisa, established colonies for trade purposes, these towns soon became communes, with their own special courts, 'Cours de la Fonde,' or Bazaar-courts

procedure, and asserted emphatically the authority of the civil power over clergy and even over the military orders. Marriage, testaments, slave-holding (even burghers had slaves), were all regulated there every question in social life was dealt with. Penal laws were laid down with the usual severity torture, ordeal, mutilation, follow one another in grim procession, and death, by comparison the merciful, closes up the rear<sup>1</sup>

And lastly, the Syrians were permitted to live under their own laws and uses, with their own courts, presided over by their reïs an arrangement which, though often dangerous, and sometimes accused of rashness, was probably more prudent than any attempt to compel the disaffected natives to live under French customs would have been.

These three Courts sat at Jerusalem and speedily became the patterns for others of like kind throughout the kingdom they were the basis of all feudal justice, over these local courts the King presided if present at their sittings all the political power seems to have been established at Jerusalem.

Such was the constitution of the feudal Kingdom of Jerusalem, a system which in many ways reflected French ideas but was also by force of circumstances, in some respects far in advance of anything yet seen in Europe. The Assises, and they alone gave Frank feudalism sure footing in the East. The Crusaders had been gathered from many lands, it was no easy task to hold them together. For in fact, their life in Palestine was very turbulent and vicious<sup>2</sup> and indeed defiant of the first principles of the feudal polity. The kingdom was an attempt to establish a great colony on French principles, and with French colonists, and, as such, it was a failure. The brightness, gallantry enthusiasm of the French character won brilliant laurels in the war, but the national weaknesses soon came forward when the enemy was no longer at the gates, and patience and prudence were the qualities needed. Then society fell a victim to the corruption of Eastern climate and example.

<sup>1</sup> John of Ibelin says he compiled the Assises, selonc ce que j'ay oy et apres et retenu de clers qui ont esté les plus sages homes dou dit royaume et des plaïs de la dite Court.

<sup>2</sup> That the corruption of morals was fearful is shown by the Assise of Nablous, which is dated A.D. 1129, and unfolds to sight a dark picture of moral degradation.

Together with this great development of feudalism came the outburst of the brilliant qualities of chivalry, which have dazzled the world, making it almost impossible for us to discern the real value of the life of these ages. 'There are,' says Hallam<sup>1</sup>, 'three powerful spirits, which have from time to time moved on the face of the waters, and given a predominant impulse to the moral sentiments and energies of mankind. These are the spirits of liberty, of religion, and of honour. It was the principal business of chivalry to animate and cherish the last of these three.' And thus far it is true, that the belief that a man must be ruled by what is due to himself, and must do nothing below himself, and must hold his own place, and keep others in theirs,—the special characteristic of the aristocratic principle in the world,—obtained great prominence in connexion with chivalry, and grew stronger through the high dignity conceded to it by the public opinion of the crusading ages. At its highest and in theory, chivalry sets before us the perfect gentleman,—gently-born, gentlemanly, truthful, faithful, courteous to women, pure, brave and fearless, unsparing of self, filled with deep religious feeling, bowing before God and womankind, haughty in the presence of all others. Thus is the true knight of romance. That such an ideal could even be set before man for imitation, and that in the chaos of feudal turbulence such flowers could be thought to grow, was in itself a great step towards better things. Yet it must be allowed that the actual knight was usually far below so noble an ideal, and that, in the earlier times at least, coarseness was far more common than courtesy.

The institution of chivalry is usually traced back to Charles the Great, in whose reign we find a Capitulary of the year 807<sup>2</sup>, summoning to the King's court of justice the beneficiaries of feudal lords, as well as the 'Caballari', or cavaliers, who came on horse or rather were bound so to present themselves. These latter seemed to have been the sons of the leudes, who went through a form of institution on reaching the years of manhood. They, being stout youths and having the advantage of being on horseback, soon learnt to think themselves specially brave and to be quite self-reliant. In these early days, however they were but ordinary elements in the general feudal relationship, they had their own territorial standing, their hauberk fiefs<sup>1</sup> small feudal lordships, and, in fact, there was nothing peculiar about them.

<sup>1</sup> Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. 2 p. 450 (ed. 1846).

<sup>2</sup> In Baluze, Capit. 1 p. 460.

These were not the true Knights of Chivalry the knight was a man of honour holding his dignity without tenure of land, having a personal not a territorial claim to consideration. This bright figure of medieval history owes its grandeur not to Charles, but to the Crusades. We may find it in the ancient Commendation by which a well-born but powerless man placed himself under the personal protection of some stronger chief or we may deduce it from the growth of certain principles of human nature, the sense of honour of valour of the dignity of man, in a word, from the nobleness of noble natures in every age,—still it is clear that the Crusades were the soil in which chivalry first flourished. There personal merit got a field for its display the example of the noblest spirits there roused men to applaud and imitate — Godfrey Tancred, Raymond, became names of undying glory in romance and song. There, too, the landless gentleman was on a level with the lord of half a realm, his strong arm and prowess had a real value and price. The younger sons of a feudal chief were thus provided for without any subdivision of territory a thing naturally disliked the boy was sent to a neighbouring castle or to the court of the feudal chief, to be brought up in gallant exercises. As page in my lady's bower<sup>2</sup>, while yet a tender Ducange has these as feoda de lorden. See under Feodum.

He was also called Vassal Le probably = Vassalet, or little-boy, he learnt obedience and courtesy, and, perhaps, respect for woman, and, when he betook himself to the courtyard of the castle, he picked up from the old retainers a certain knowledge of the use of arms, and handled sword and spear; or, best of all, was set on a horse, tasting the first delights of that great power,—hereafter to be bound up with his name and life as a chevalier;—the power of ruling the steed, and overlooking the common crowd. When however the varlet grew too strong for such child's play, he passed in among the squires, and took place as one of the devotees of war. He was led to the church, and there received from the priest a sword and belt. Henceforth he was on the road to the high estate of knighthood. Religion blessed the sword as heretofore, and the youth, in the warm zeal of his years, set himself to win a name, and to defend the faith which had given him this baptism of nobility. He was now no longer in lady's bower, but at his lord's heels. He held his horse, or carried his lance and helm, or watched his banner, or guarded his prisoners; he saw that his lord was worshipfully served at meals, he carved the meat at board<sup>1</sup>. Then, at twenty-one, if he had borne him well and loyally in the trials of his younger life, he prepared himself for the greater consecration, after the humble diaconate, of arms. We all know the common forms of the reception of knighthood; the white robe, the nightly vigil in the chapel, the oath at daybreak, the bed gaily decked, the priest's address expounding these moralities, the Eucharist, and a sort of catechism of knightly faith, then the oath to keep the good laws of chivalry, then the new armour brought out and donned, lastly, the novice bidden to kneel down, and dubbed a knight by his lord. His horse was led to the church-door; he mounted and rode forth, the crowd shouting, the heralds blowing trumpet-peals, and so he entered the second order vassal, alluding to his father's relation to the superior lord at whose court he was

<sup>1</sup> So Joinville tells us that he, as squire, carved at the King of Navarre's table with every possible religious sanction. He now had only to win his spurs at the next feat of arms, to cut down some dozen unarmed rustics, or to put to flight a few men at-arms, or to unhorse a hostile knight then he became a full member of the hierarchy of chivalry.

There runs throughout a parallel between knighthood and priesthood. They were the two sanctified classes, living under a lifelong vow given up to God's service in field and Church. St. Paul's language seemed to be applicable to both the Christian Warfare was localised and made human by the taking of the cross. The knight's oath bound him to defend the faith, protect the weak, honour womankind. In course of time the worship of the Virgin blended still more closely the relations of chivalry and religion, a union which can be traced through many ages, till we see its last development in the dreams of Lovola, the knight of the Mother of Jesus.

Picturesque and noble though the conception of knighthood is, it would have been an indistinct branch of feudal customs and conditions but for the Crusades. Then the order stood out clearly when knight and baron were far from home. Then the greater lords took knights into their paid service—kings gladly attached them to themselves. The feudal lord mortgaged his lands the knight, who had no lands to sell, sold his sword-arm to defend the Church, and grew in men's esteem. He stood upright on his personal service while the territorial basis of the baron's power was slipping from under his feet. In him we see the rudiment of a standing army. The knight demurred at no length of service that great difficulty of a feudal army and the kings must have felt that they had in the loyalty of the knightly estate a counterpoise to the utter anarchy and turbulence of the greater vassals. Moreover both king and knight had one grand task in common—the repression of lawlessness, the redress of wrong, the doing justice and judgment, and the punishment of the evil-doer. The belief that he was the fountain of justice was an element in the character of the king which secured the eventual triumph of royalty: and the good King was also a good knight. Even Saladin is said to have been glad to receive the honour of knighthood, and it is probable that chivalry gained much in courtesy and a high sense of honour by its contact with the nobler natures among the Eastern princes<sup>1</sup>

Still more did the military orders indicate what a new force was growing up. They showed the world a new form of combination. They began in the noblest strain—carrying out the belief that their knighthood was a brotherhood like that of the religious orders. Their early history is full of rare self-devotion and charity. they took vows of celibacy, their whole life was bound to be religious. With one hand they held the sword, with the other they tended the sick and poor. With great irony they called these humble friends their 'lords' (nos seigneurs); as though they would tell the feudal barons that they owed less allegiance and honour to them than they did to the poor sufferers whom they helped. But this did not last. The glories of chivalry, and the picture of the faithful knight, with its bright foreground of rich colour, high adventure, and fair ladies' smiles, with the picturesque towers of a castle rising from the neighbouring hill, must not blind our eyes to the truth. The knightly life, good though it was, and school of men in its day, had in it from the outset seeds of decay. Its basis was war, and the love of war, and the valuing of men by a warlike standard, form a bad foundation for any institution. Knighthood was completely aristocratic in character. it widened the gulf between classes. The 'raskall rout' were of no account with the knight, he held no faith with such, nor had any sympathy with them. The knight and the priest here stood on very different footings. Religion, low as she fell, never quite lost the sense of her duty towards the down-trodden. Knighthood came to despise and ill-treat all below it. Knightly privileges sapped the strength of the order. The knight abused his advantages, was cruel in war, riding down the half-armed and feeble, was licentious in peace. Even so early as the middle of the twelfth century St. Bernard, who had no bias against war attacks chivalry with an unsparing pen<sup>1</sup>. The military orders also early fell into great looseness of manners, and it became clear that in spite of its gallantry, chivalry must fall. Yet it held its place till the growth of regular armies in the English and French wars elbowed it out of the way and the kingly power grew so strong that it could hold in check both feudal turbulence and knightly prowess, and make them fight under the royal flag. Above all, gunpowder was fatal to chivalry. What could gallantry under the coat of mail do against cannon and the new tactics of war? Gunpowder blew down the robber nests of feudalism and the pride of chivalry. The low bred man-at-arms with the new engine in his hands came to be on a level with the noblest knight in the battlefield. Hotspur's fop in Shakespeare<sup>2</sup> was not so far from the point, when he cried—

<sup>1</sup> See Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. 2. p. 463 (ed. 1846).

It was great pity so it was,
This villanous saltpetre should be digg'd
Out of the bowels of the harmless earth,
Which many a good tall fellow had destroy'd
So cowardly and but for these vile guns
He would himself have been a soldier

<sup>1</sup> Non salitria sed salitria, he says of them in his De laude novæ militiæ, quoted in Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 11 p. 221

<sup>2</sup> Henry IV Part 1 i 3.

CHAPTER V.

Louis VI, surnamed le Gros, A.D. 1100—1137.

IN the year 1100 Philip the idle king, desiring to shift from his shoulders the burden of his duty, made, after Capetian usage, his son Louis<sup>1</sup>, then about twenty-two years old, joint-king, and disappeared into obscurity. He lived yet eight years, was reconciled to Rome, broke his promise of amendment, and to the end clung to the vicious woman he had long before stolen away from Fulk of Anjou. In 1108 he died in the dress of a Benedictine Monk, giving orders that he should be buried in the Benedictine Church at Fleury on the Loire, 'for greatly he feared lest for his sins, were he buried at St Denis, he should be carried off by the devil, as was Charles Martel of old<sup>2</sup>;' under St. Benedict's protection he hoped that his bones might rest in peace. There let us leave the weakest of the Capets, and turn our eyes towards a worthier prince, These early kings were feeble, but it was the feebleness of childhood, not of old age, as with the previous races. There does not seem, except in Philip, to have been that extinction of all energy and power of will, which marked the fainéant princes of the Meroving and Caroling dynasties. These men did little, and were little, because they had small opportunities for more. When Louis was adopted by his father in 1100, the crown had as its own domain only the county of Paris, Hurepoix, the Gâtinais, the Orléanais, half the county of Sens, the French Vexin, and Bourges, together with some ill-defined rights over the episcopal cities of Rheims, Beauvais, Laon, Noyon, Soissons, Amiens. And even within these narrow limits the royal power was but thinly spread over the surface. The barons in their castles were in fact independent, and oppressed the merchants and poor folk as they would. The King had also acknowledged rights of suzerainty over Champagne, Burgundy, Normandy, Brittany, Flanders, and Boulogne, but, in most cases, the only obedience the feudal lords stooped to was that of duly performing the act of homage to the King on first succession to a fief. He also claimed suzerainty which was not conceded, over the South of France, over Provence and Lorraine he did not even put forth a claim of lordship<sup>1</sup>. The very first acts of Louis show how feeble he was in resources, and how close to his gates were his antagonists. From the high ground near Paris their castles could be discerned—the din of arms might almost be heard. Northwards, the lord of Montmorency disputed with him the plain of St. Denis—the new fort called the Châtelet was built to protect Paris from this powerful neighbour. Southwards, Montleheri barred the way to Orleans and the Loire and cut the royal domain in two.

<sup>1</sup> The Life of King Louis by his school-fellow friend and adviser, Suger, abbot of St Denis, is our chief authority

<sup>2</sup> Ordericus Vitalis, 2.

What forces had the young King with which to awe his turbulent barons, and to protect or enlarge his borders? He had his own force of character indicated by his two names of the Wide-awake and the Fighter<sup>2</sup>—he had the prime of youth and good looks<sup>3</sup> and lively pleasant ways<sup>4</sup>—a real genius for war and prompt energy to use such tools as he had in the damsels who were sent to Paris by the greater vassals and others, numbering full three hundred gallant youths, eager to win glory under the young King<sup>5</sup>. In addition to these household troops, he got some help from his feudal vassals, and specially from Robert of Flanders, his maternal uncle. The Crusades

<sup>1</sup> See Sismondi, Histoire des Français, tom. 5. p. 8.

<sup>2</sup> L. Éveillé, le Batailleur.

<sup>3</sup> Elegans et formosus, says Suger Vita Ludovici Grossi, 1.

<sup>4</sup> Jocundus, gratus et benevolus—quo etiam a quibusdam simplex reputabatur—Suger Vita Ludovici Grossi, 2.

<sup>5</sup> These Damsels, Damoiseaux, were the Maison du Roi, even at that early time. Louis himself was styled the Royal Damsel.

also helped him, by carrying off the most vigorous of his neighbours, and turning men's attention elsewhere, and lastly, he had an unfailing source of strength in the goodwill of the clergy and people. He was regarded as their champion, he was penetrated with the royal belief—the very salt of kingship—that he was the pure fount of justice, the defender of the weak<sup>1</sup>. In the great struggle which will hereafter come up between Pope and King, this royal quality will be seen to have great weight. The Papacy lost ground, as the King gained. Her justice was not based on a sense of right between man and man, but on the ancient laws and distinctions of the Church, which drew a marked line between the clerical and the lay. So long as the Church could show herself as Justice walking serenely on earth, in the midst of a turbulent world, her authority remained unassailable; but when she strove to withdraw her own militia from the hand of law, she ceased to be a judge and became a partisan. Then the kingly power resisted her with success, for law and right ranged themselves under the banner of secular authority. We shall see how the lawyers of France became the most powerful opponents of papal claims.

With such strength as he could muster King Louis reduced Bouchard de Montmorency and his petty allies, and freed the northern walls of Paris from insult. Then, with seven hundred 'men of choice,' he fell on Ebles, count of Rouci, and defeated him, so succouring the oppressed Church of Rheims, and this too, though Ebles had Burgundy at his back. Soon after he did the like good turn for the Church of Orleans. Next, when Guy Troussell, son of Miles, lord of Montleheri, came back from Crusade, (he had let himself over the walls of Antioch by a rope, leaving behind his luckless men-at-arms to shift as they best might,) the two kings, Philip and Louis, persuaded him in his shame and dejection to give his only daughter to a son of King Philip by Bertrade. With her he handed over Montleheri to them, thus removing the obstacle from the royal cities of Rheims, Beauvais, Laon, Noyon, Soissons, Amiens. And even within these narrow limits the royal power was but thinly spread over the surface. The barons in their castles were in fact independent, and oppressed the merchants and poor folk as they would. The King had also acknowledged rights of suzerainty over Champagne, Burgundy Normandy Brittany, Flanders, and Boulogne, but, in most cases, the only obedience the feudal lords stooped to was that of duly performing the act of homage to the King on first succession to a fief. He also claimed suzerainty which was not conceded, over the South of France over Provence and Lorraine he did not even put forth a claim of lordship<sup>1</sup>. The very first acts of Louis show how feeble he was in resources, and how close to his gates were his antagonists. From the high ground near Paris their castles could be discerned, the din of arms might almost be heard. Northwards, the lord of Montmorency disputed with him the plain of St. Denis the new fort called the Châtelet was built to protect Paris from this powerful neighbour. Southwards Montlheri barred the way to Orleans and the Loire, and cut the royal domain in two.

<sup>1</sup> 'Ecclesiarum utilitatibus providebat, aratorum laboratorum et pauperum, quod diu insolitum fuerat, quieti studebat'—Suger, Vita L. G. 2.

What forces had the young King with which to awe his turbulent barons, and to protect or enlarge his borders? He had his own force of character indicated by his two names of the Wide-awake and the Fighter<sup>2</sup> he had the prime of youth and good looks<sup>3</sup> and lively pleasant ways<sup>4</sup>, a real genius for war and prompt energy to use such tools as he had, in the damsels who were sent to Paris by the greater vassals and others, numbering full three hundred gallant youths, eager to win glory under the young King<sup>5</sup>. In addition to these household troops he got some help from his feudal vassals and specially from Robert of Flanders, his maternal uncle. The Crusades

See Simoendi, Histoire des Français, tom. 3. p. 8.

1. Éveillé, le Ba ailleur

<sup>2</sup> Elegans et formosus, says Suger Vita Ludovici Grossi, 1

<sup>3</sup> Jocundus, gratus et benevolus quo etiam a quibusdam simplex reputatur — Suger Vita Ludovici Grossi, 2.

<sup>4</sup> These Damsels, Damoiseaux, were the Maison du Roi, even at that early time. Louis himself was styled the Royal Damsel.

also helped him, by carrying off the most vigorous of his neighbours, and turning men's attention elsewhere, and lastly, he had an unfailing source of strength in the goodwill of the clergy and people. He was regarded as their champion; he was penetrated with the royal belief—the very salt of kingship—that he was the pure fount of justice, the defender of the weak<sup>1</sup>. In the great struggle which will hereafter come up between Pope and King, this royal quality will be seen to have great weight. The Papacy lost ground, as the King gained. Her justice was not based on a sense of right between man and man, but on the ancient laws and distinctions of the Church, which drew a marked line between the clerical and the lay. So long as the Church could show herself as Justice walking serenely on earth, in the midst of a turbulent world, her authority remained unassailable, but when she strove to withdraw her own militia from the hand of law, she ceased to be a judge and became a partisan. Then the kingly power resisted her with success, for law and right ranged themselves under the banner of secular authority. We shall see how the lawyers of France became the most powerful opponents of papal claims.

With such strength as he could muster King Louis reduced Bouchard de Montmorency and his petty allies, and freed the northern walls of Paris from insult. Then, with seven hundred 'men of choice,' he fell on Ebles, count of Roucy, and defeated him, so succouring the oppressed Church of Rheims, and this too, though Ebles had Burgundy at his back. Soon after he did the like good turn for the Church of Orleans. Next, when Guy Troussell, son of Miles, lord of Montleheri, came back from Crusade, (he had let himself over the walls of Antioch by a rope, leaving behind his luckless men-at-arms to shift as they best might,) the two kings, Philip and Louis, persuaded him in his shame and dejection to give his only daughter to a son of King Philip by Bertrade. With her he handed over Montleheri to them, thus removing the obstacle from the royal highway southwards,—‘whereof the two kings were as glad, as if they had taken a mote out of their eye’ Montleheri was entrusted to Guy of Rochfort, uncle of Guy Troussell, who had gone over to King Philip on his return from Jerusalem. The young King was forthwith affianced to Guy of Rochfort’s daughter and the father was made seneschal. But, for some reason, we know not what,—it is one of the puzzles of this reign—Louis threw away this chance of securing Montleheri, the key of the position. He broke with Guy, declined his daughter, and plunged at once into the delights of war. In 1107 Pope Paschal came to France, to confer at Châlons-sur-Marne with the archbishop of Trèves on the Investitures’ quarrel, and Louis persuaded the Pope to release him from the child marriage.<sup>1</sup> Guy was deposed from his seneschalship and dismissed the court. He fell to war, backed by the troubled spirit of Bertrade, who hoped to place her son Philip on the throne, and by the discontented barons, who feared the vigorous young King. But Louis was too quick for them. The inhabitants of Montleheri ejected Philip Bertrade’s son, and opened their gates to the King. Bertrade seeing that her plans had failed took the veil in the convent of Haute-Bruyère, a dependency of Fontevrault, that strange double foundation, in which the nuns in their cloister sang and prayed, while the monks in the field tilled the land and supported the community, a lady abbess being set over both nuns and monks, the nuns also taking precedence. No institution so favourable to woman had ever been established in Christendom it is among the proofs of the new powers of chivalry. There Bertrade did not continue long before she died.

<sup>1</sup> 'Ecclesiarum utilitatibus providebat, aratorum laborum et pauperum, quod diu insolitum fuerat, quieti studebat'—Suger, Vita L G 2.

In the midst of this struggle died King Philip, in 1108, and on the very next Sunday Louis was crowned at Orleans by the archbishop of Sens. one wonders why he should not have waited a few days and why not have gone to Rheims, where the kings were ever wont to be crowned? The truth seems to be that he was afraid of delay, which in the midst of these wars might be dangerous to his crown. No sooner was he crowned than he hastened away to renew his struggle with his neighbours, and slowly he gained strength and firm footing, till in 1111 we note the rise into prominence of a new and significant ally. He was besieging Le Puiset, a castle belonging to Hugh the Fair; and in his army were the peasants of the Church-lands, who smarted under Hugh's depredations, armed and led by the curates of their parishes. Suger tells us how one village priest at the head of his rustic troop first broke into the robber's den. He made his way unharmed and alone to the palisade, and began to pull the stakes away. finding himself unmolested, he beckoned to his men below, who hastened up, and broke their way in. The King's troops were at the same time attacking the place on another side. Thus the serfs appear as a faithful militia. There was no doubt as to their loyalty or readiness. It was a peasant rising, under guidance of authority and right, against the shameless oppression of the barons. This opportune help was probably gained for the King in great part by Suger himself, to whom Louis had entrusted the priory of Toury, hard by Le Puiset, where a kind of fortress of observation was built. In this, and in many other acts, Suger showed himself one of the most important founders of the French nation. He supported the King in his desire to do justice; he brought great administrative gifts to bear on the social state of the country, his advice was ever sage, and generally successful, he was the ruling spirit of the reign of two kings, the first of those great churchmen who presided over the growth and fortunes of the French Monarchy.

<sup>1</sup> Suger Vita L. G. 8.

<sup>2</sup> Filliam ejusdem Guldonis uxorem nobilem. Suger Vita L. G. 8.

In this series of petty wars King Louis showed great energy and bravery, sometimes fighting in the forefront, like a common soldier; always first to begin and last to leave off, until he brought his own vassals into tolerable order. Throughout all he gave to his wars the stamp of right and justice. The ill-doer was called to appear before the King's court, for the judgment of his peers. If he came and was condemned, the King executed judgment on him. If he refused to appear he was attacked and brought under for his contumacy. The conceptions of justice and loyalty became daily more and more closely connected.

It is usual to say that the King was wisely inclined to defend the poor to side with the Church, to encourage the Communes in cities. The first and second of these statements are quite true of the third there are no substantial proofs. Indeed, it assumes a state of things which had as yet scarcely begun to exist. The King was active and intelligent but it was too much to expect him to foresee the future importance of cities. Even Suger himself shows no sign of such discernment. In fact, Louis, in the case of Laon, did not hesitate to sell his help to the bishop because he outbid the citizens, they offered him 400 livres, the bishop 700 and the King at once accepted the higher bid. He had before granted the citizens a charter he now revoked it at once and when they resisted, he crushed them without mercy. He gave privileges, it is true, but not free constitutions, to the five chief cities of the royal domain Paris, Orléans, Meun, Étampes, Compiègne. Otherwise, he hardly seems to have done more than let the movement take its course nor is his name so closely connected with the cities as are the names of some other great lords of the same period. The feudal lords of towns were glad to sell their claims for ready money even the King did it. In Burgundy Normandy Guienne, this first stir of civic life took place in the South of France the cities, inheriting the traditions of old municipal rights from Rome, were already well advanced in the path of independence.

Meanwhile, as King Louis grew stronger the hold of Germany on Provence and Lorraine relaxed the long war of investitures, fully engaging the Emperor left him no leisure to look after these outlying portions of the Empire and the feudal lords in these districts became all but independent sovereigns. This rendered the King's eastern frontier safe from danger these princes were so new and so isolated that there was nothing to fear from them. The Norman border was very different.

There, a united and warlike race was ruled by a King who had all the resources of England at his back, and was infinitely stronger for war than his restless brother of France. But Louis recked nothing of all this. He espoused the cause of William Clito, son of Robert, grandson of the Conqueror, and plunged into war. In early life he had resisted William Rufus with great credit—he won no credit now. Normandy was laid low, churches became the barns and refuges of the country folk—the Norman churches, so solid and warlike in structure that they might easily be turned into fortresses—and the usual misery was inflicted on the defenceless. Louis was well beaten at Brenneville<sup>1</sup> in 1119, and though the clergy responded to his cry for help, he felt that he was in the grasp of the stronger man, and sought how to escape from the difficulty into which he had thrust himself. Pope Calixtus II was holding a council at Rheims, he laid before him his complaints against Henry of England. The Pope brought about a reconciliation, the terms of which were honourable for Louis though he failed in his nominal object, the establishment of William Clito, who had to fall back into obscurity and abandon his claim to the duchy.

Louis was not likely to rest, and in 1124 there was again a threat of war. Henry of England made alliance—prophetic of many later combinations—with his son-in-law, Henry V of Germany, who undertook to invade Eastern France and to threaten Rheims. Then the King summoned his vassals to his help. The men of his own domain, now quite broken in, came readily. Rheims and Châlons sent six thousand men, Laon and Soissons the like, Orléans, Étampes and Paris with the King's own body-guard, his 'damsels,' formed the centre of his army. In their midst waved the Oriflamme<sup>2</sup>, the sacred judgment on him. If he refused to appear he was attacked and brought under for his contumacy. The conceptions of justice and loyalty became daily more and more closely connected.

<sup>1</sup> Described in Ordericus Vitalis, bk. 12. But Suger has very little to say about this disaster of his royal friend (ch. 25). The name of the place at that time was Brenmulf.

<sup>2</sup> The Oriflamme was a flame-red banner of silk, three pointed on its lower side and tipped with green. It was fastened to a gilt spear. It was in fact the banner of the Counts of the Vexin, who held under the Abbey of St. Denis, and laid their flag on its altar. When the Vexin fell to the King (in the days of Philip I, circ. 1087) the Oriflamme was adopted as the royal standard.

It is usual to say that the King was wisely inclined to defend the poor, to side with the Church, to encourage the Communes in cities. The first and second of these statements are quite true of the third there are no substantial proofs. Indeed, it assumes a state of things which had as yet scarcely begun to exist. The King was active and intelligent but it was too much to expect him to foresee the future importance of cities. Even Suger himself shows no sign of such discernment. In fact, Louis, in the case of Laon, did not hesitate to sell his help to the bishop because he outbid the citizens, they offered him 400 livres, the bishop 700 and the King at once accepted the higher bid. He had before granted the citizens a charter he now revoked it at once, and when they resisted, he crushed them without mercy. He gave privileges, it is true, but not free constitutions, to the five chief cities of the royal domain, Paris, Orléans, Melun, Étampes, Compiègne. Otherwise, he hardly seems to have done more than let the movement take its course nor is his name so closely connected with the cities as are the names of some other great lords of the same period. The feudal lords of towns were glad to sell their claims for ready money even the King did it. In Burgundy Normandy Guienne this first stir of civic life took place. In the South of France the cities, inheriting the traditions of old municipal rights from Rome, were already well advanced in the path of independence.

Meanwhile, as King Louis grew stronger the hold of Germany on Provence and Lorraine relaxed. The long war of investitures, fully engaging the Emperor left him no leisure to look after these outlying portions of the Empire and the feudal lords in these districts became all but independent sovereigns. This rendered the King's eastern frontier safe from danger these princes were so new and so isolated that there was nothing to fear from them. The Norman border was very different.

There, a united and warlike race was ruled by a King who had all the resources of England at his back, and was infinitely stronger for war than his restless brother of France. But Louis recked nothing of all this. He espoused the cause of William Clito, son of Robert, grandson of the Conqueror, and plunged into war. In early life he had resisted William Rufus with great credit—he won no credit now. Normandy was laid low, churches became the barns and refuges of the country folk—the Norman churches, so solid and warlike in structure that they might easily be turned into fortresses—and the usual misery was inflicted on the defenceless. Louis was well beaten at Breneville<sup>1</sup> in 1119, and though the clergy responded to his cry for help he felt that he was in the grasp of the stronger man, and sought how to escape from the difficulty into which he had thrust himself. Pope Calixtus II was holding a council at Rheims, he had before him his complaints against Henry of England. The Pope brought about a reconciliation, the terms of which were honourable for Louis though he failed in his nominal object, the establishment of William Clito, who had to fall back into obscurity and abandon his claim to the duchy.

Louis was not likely to rest, and in 1124 there was again a threat of war. Henry of England made alliance—prophetic of many later combinations—with his son-in-law, Henry V of Germany, who undertook to invade Eastern France and to threaten Rheims. Then the King summoned his vassals to his help. The men of his own domain, now quite broken in, came readily. Rheims and Châlons sent six thousand men; Laon and Soissons the like, Orléans, Étampes and Paris with the King's own body-guard, his 'damsels,' formed the centre of his army. In their midst waved the Oriflamme<sup>2</sup>, the sacred banner, which King Louis had with great solemnity taken from the altar of St. Denis. The Count of Champagne was there with a strong force, the Duke of Burgundy did not fail and Vermandois brought his horsemen and the footmen of St. Quentin, Pontoise, Amiens and Beauvais completed the army. The greater lords, who lay without the circle of the King's immediate influence, did not dare to refuse, but managed to arrive too late. 'The most noble Count of Flanders would have tripled the host, had he been summoned earlier. William of Aquitaine Conan of Brittany, the warlike Fulk of Anjou were also hindered by the distance and the suddenness of the appeal'. The King prudently showed no dissatisfaction and the French chroniclers tell us that the fame of his energy and preparations deterred the Emperor, who halted abandoned his enterprise, and fell back on Germany a rumour of troubles at Worms was probably the true reason of his retreat. Still in France herself the knightly King won no small credit<sup>1</sup>, men began to regard him as the central figure of all France though the great feudal princes had not joined him, they had recognised the validity of his summons as against the foreigner. Peace was made with Henry of England and the sacred Indict<sup>2</sup> which contained a nail from the cross, the crown of thorns, and the bones of saints, which had all been brought forth to fight for King Louis, were restored with much reverence by his own hand to their shrine at St. Denis. The death of Henry V within a year confirmed the truth of men's belief that heaven fought for their king. The royal power thus slowly rose clear of all feudal powers the King was no longer one among his peers but had superior rights and powers of his own. Nothing shows this so clearly as his intervention between the Bishop of Clermont and the Count of Auvergne, backed by William of Aquitaine. The King in spite of his unwieldy bulk and the summer heats, marched southwards, with the lords of Flanders, Anjou, and Brittany in his train, 'army enough to have conquered Spain,' says Suger. these great lords were in good time now. Willam, great prince as he was, humbled himself, came into the King's camp, begged 'his Majesty' to accept his homage, and offered to submit the dispute to the judgment of the barons. It was easily adjusted, and men discerned that King Louis was a real power even beyond the Loire. Thence to the Northern border, to Bruges, where the Provost Bertulf had set on his nephew Buchard to slay Charles the Good at his prayers in church. The King avenged him brutally, with fiendish malignity of punishment, and then, as Suger says, 'having washed and rebaptised Flanders with much blood,' he made William Clito the Norman, his protégé, their Count. Thence he returned home, and as soon as he was gone the Flemings cast William out, and presently he perished at the siege of Alost. Then Louis and Henry of England agreed to appoint Thierry of Alsace Count of Flanders. Thus was the King's activity felt from North to South.

<sup>1</sup> Described in Ordericus Vitalis, bk. 12. But Suger has very little to say about this disaster of his royal friend (ch. 25). The name of the place at that time was Brenmulf.

<sup>2</sup> The Oriflamme was a flame-red banner of silk, three pointed on its lower side and tipped with green. It was fastened to a gilt spear. It was in fact the banner of the Counts of the Vexin, who held under the Abbey of St. Denis, and laid their flag on its altar. When the Vexin fell to the King (in the days of Philip I, circ. 1087) the Oriflamme was adopted as the royal standard.

<sup>1</sup> Suger Vita L. G. c. 27 (Dom Bouquet, tom. 22 p. 11).

<sup>2</sup> Idem aut asperum fuit quoniam ad campo triumphalist. — Suger Vita L. G. cap. 27.

The Indict was said to have been deposited at St. Denis by Charles the Bald; it had belonged to Charles the Great, and was laid up by him at Aix.

He was much oppressed by his infirmities and needed help; so, like his fathers, he had his eldest son Philip crowned King in 1129. But in 1131, when the lad was sixteen, as he was riding out of Paris with his men, in the suburb a 'diabolical pig'<sup>1</sup> ran between his horse's legs, and down came steed and rider. The boy was picked up senseless, and died that night, to the infinite grief of his parents, and of all the great men of the land. They buried the 'hope of the realm,' the boy of high promise, at St Denis, and within a fortnight crowned in his stead his brother Louis, 'the Young,' a little lad, in the presence of a vast crowd from every part, Aquitanians, Germans, English, Spaniards, being there<sup>2</sup>, and from their presence the happiest auguries were drawn,—auguries not destined to be verified by time.

During these same years troubles fell on Normandy. In 1129

<sup>1</sup> Suger, Vita L. G. in Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 12, p. 59

<sup>2</sup> Ibid.

the Empress Matilda, widow of Henry V, heiress of Normandy and England, married Geoffrey Plantagenet, Count of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine. On the death of Henry I, the Norman barons and the citizens of London passed them both over, and in 1135 chose as King of England Stephen of Blois, a grandson of William the Conqueror. Hence sprang a wild and desolating war in Normandy as well as in England.

While Louis, worn out by illness and his bulk, against which he chafed and fought in vain, was devoutly preparing for death, there came messengers to him from William of Aquitaine with a proposal of great moment. William had a daughter Eleanor, whom he offered in marriage to the boy King Louis the Young. The old King rejoicing greatly and hoping that the rich and civilised South would hereby become a part of the kingdom, spent all his remaining energies in hastening his son's departure, entrusting him to the care of his most valued friend, the Abbot Suger. The child-bride and bridegroom met at Bordeaux in the presence of the chief men of the South the marriage took place, and Eleanor was crowned Queen of France. The two dying princes, the fathers of the pair, did not live to hear the end. William never returned from his pilgrimage to Compostella, whither he went to make but a poor and tardy acknowledgment for a life of crime. Louis, on his way to die at St. Denis, yearning once more to see the home of his pious boyhood, was seized with the pains of death at Paris and expired, lying on a cloth strewn with ashes. They buried him in a worthy place among his fathers at St. Denis (A.D. 1137).

Thus ended the formal independence of Aquitaine and at the same moment the great founder of the royal power of France breathed his last, without seeing the fulfilment of his life's labours. He was a noble king, a noble man. His loving biographer Suger has left us a full account of his energy, ability, merriment in health and cheerfulness in sickness,—he was so mirthful that some even reckoned him a simpleton,—his piety and humbleness of heart, his untiring activity of life, his holy end. He tells us, too, of the love his friends bore him, and of the gratitude of the common folk towards him. 'As he seemed to recover health, shortly before his death, and rode a horse, or was carried in his litter, he came to Meudon on the Seine as he went all men ran together from castle and town, or from the plough-tail in the field, to meet him and show their devotion to the King who had protected them and given them peace<sup>1</sup>.'

Had his work been less thoroughly done, it could not have survived the folly of his successor. As it was, Louis the Young and his queen, instead of uniting all France in one great kingdom, retarded for half a century, though they could not stop, the building up of the French monarchy.

While France was waking to a sense of national unity, she was also rising in moral dignity, through the influence of the reviving Church. Her noblest architecture dates from this time, and a nation's life may be said to be marked by its buildings as much as by its speech. In these days 'Gothic' architecture was born. The massive Norman churches gave place to the more cheerful French style. The huge column was enriched with light and graceful shafts; the circular arch, unbroken, unyielding, was replaced by a sharp-pointed one. The conventional and heavy ornament of the older period gave way before more graceful and truthful forms. For the solid tower, men built the light spire; the small windows expanded, and were filled with richly coloured lights. The Norman style had expressed the old Scandinavian feeling, modified by the sense of warlike power and resistance, and by contact with the Roman style of building, the new style told of the influences of chivalry on a race which loved colour and light and change, which looked on things bright and vigorous, less defiant, less permanent, more refined, more sensuous<sup>2</sup>.

The Church, in fact, rose as a mistress and a mother. The King was devoted to her service, the feudal world pledged its homage to her, the chief minds of the age were reckoned among her children. Bernard, 'last of the Fathers, Abelard, the subtle Rationalist, Suger the prudent politician, were the three greatest names of the time. St. Bernard, the great Abbot of Clairvaux, the Pope's champion and adviser moved alike in the Church and the world as the guiding spirit of the religious revival. He made peace or war taking part in all the affairs of Europe and carrying into all an intrepid and clear faith a warmth of devotion, and a noble purity of conduct. Over against him we may set Suger, Abbot of St. Denis, the politician, the King's champion, a man far in advance of his times, sound and practical, capable of feeling all the movements of the day at one time a courtly abbot with princely train, at another moment a humble ascetic, influenced by the revival of the age and winning a reputation for piety even for sanctity a scholar, and for the age a writer of taste a consummate man of business, who could build a noble church, and recover the lapsed possessions of his abbey or sit in the councils of his prince as chief, governing the kingdom with singular sagacity and success. And Abelard, who had been an unwilling sojourner at St. Denis when Suger was first made abbot, a name of romance, the most learned scholar and most luckless lover of his time, who brought back to the world the supremacy of Aristotle who roused the desire to inquire into the causes of things, who founded all knowledge on the human reason and on the investigation of facts who wrote bold treatises on things the most mysterious, even on the nature of the Holy Trinity—he it is who established the intellectual reputation of Paris, and, though he bowed the head before the clergy and did not dare to measure swords with St. Bernard began a new and all important epoch in the history of Philosophy

<sup>1</sup> Suger, Vita Lud Grossi, Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom 12, p 62

<sup>2</sup> This is the change in architecture from what is called in England the 'Norman' to the 'Early English', from St Cross to Romsey Abbey, from Romsey Abbey to Salisbury Cathedral

CHAPTER VI.

Louis VII, 'the Young,' and the Growth of Civic Liberties, A D. 1137-1180

LOUIS VI had been a firm friend to and defender of the Church, but Louis VII, the Young, was its slave. The strong man drew strength from the connexion, the weak man only displayed his weakness. Brought up by the piety of his father under Suger's eye among the monks of St. Denis, he sucked in prejudice and feebleness from the cloister, while he learnt nothing of real wisdom from the sagacious abbot. Yet, though Suger could not give him wisdom, he impressed him with respect for it, and the weak King, deferring often to his tutor's judgment, was saved from utterly marring his father's work. He listened to Suger because he honoured him as a Churchman not because he recognised in him the shrewd, long-headed man of the world. The monkish historians cannot enough praise the monkish King. Stephen of Paris begins with high hopes of him 'so pious, so clement, so catholic and kindly, that were you to see his bearing and simplicity of dress you might think he was not a king, but some good monk<sup>1</sup>' His queen afterwards said something like this, not meaning it as a compliment. 'He loved justice,' adds Robert, 'and defended it with zeal: he was in life and conversation a thorough Churchman.' And Stephen, eye-witness of his hero's doings in this earlier time, adds two tales as to his humility before the Canon: how he made even the lowest sexton and bedell go before him into the church and how he humbled himself at St. Denis one day for having without leave of the community supped at their charges, at Creteil one night, when overtaken by the darkness before he could ride on to Paris. No wonder that the monk was delighted with his piety. This pliant weakness and soft conscience towards the Church bore its natural fruits as we shall see. He was called the Young when he came to the throne, being but a lad when first crowned, and a youth of about eighteen when he became sole King he retained the name, and deserved it, as long as he lived.

<sup>1</sup> Robert of Paris, in Dom Bouquet Œuvres tom. vi. p. 84.

For a short time all went tolerably straight. He was crowned with Eleanor of Aquitaine by his side and in that public act men saw the sign of the alliance of North and South. Yet ere long he was discreditably repulsed in an attempt to make good his claims against the great house of Toulouse, and was quickly taught what was the real extent of his authority over the South.

In this same year of his accession, Stephen of Blois and England took Lillebonne on the Seine, and passed thence with his Normans and Flemings into Anjou, but there a quarrel arose between the two nations over a hose of wine<sup>1</sup> and the invaders had to withdraw into Normandy.

Next, the King plunged into a quarrel with Innocent II, touching the Church of Bourges. Supported by Suger he very properly asserted his right to name the archbishop but the Pope replied that he was but a child and at once consecrated a nominee of his own. To this quarrel, in which the King was in the right, are due all his mishaps —hence sprang the second Crusade, hence the divorce hence the claims of Henry of England. For as this dispute went on, Theobald of Champagne thought well to fish in troubled waters, and sided with the Pope the angry King attacked his lands, took Vitry by storm and burnt down the parish church, with some hundreds of poor folk in it. The King's conscience smote him after this horrid act. and he made peace with the Pope,—on condition that he should do penance by a Crusade. St Bernard had throughout supported the Pope against the King; he now threw himself hotly into the scheme for a second Crusade. He passed from city to city, preaching, like a second Peter, with all Peter's enthusiasm and his own power and learning. The Latins had been losing ground in the East, and now came news that Edessa the outpost of Christendom, had fallen to the Turks with a horrible slaughter of Christians. All Europe was moved at Vézelay Louis and his young wife took the cross, and men hastened to follow their example. The King did it as a penance for his crime, penance was throughout the leading thought, the Crusade was a crusade of criminals.

<sup>1</sup> Una hose vini, sc. acree vino plena, in England called a fish.

Suger tried in vain to stem the tide. His clear sight discerned the risk the young French monarchy was running, and the thankless task which awaited his own old age. But nothing could turn aside the excitable King, and Bernard's enthusiasm easily overbore Suger's prudence. Thus these two great churchmen, with ever diverging sympathies, took part, even at that early day, in the constantly recurring struggle between Papal Empire and French Monarchy.

The fire was kindled through all France. Once more monasteries grew, churches sprang up. At Chartres, for example, there was a complete 'revival'—men yoked themselves to carts and dragged stones, timber, provisions, for the builders of the cathedral towers—the enthusiasm spread across Normandy and France; everywhere with the same penitential symptoms. 'Humility and affliction on every side, penitence and confession of sins, grief and contrition in every heart. You might see men and women drag themselves on their knees through deep swamps, scourge themselves, raise songs and praises to God; take part in the working of plentiful miracles<sup>1</sup>.' On such sensitive ears as these fell that 'heavenly organ,' St. Bernard's voice 'after its sort pouring forth the dew of the divine word' and France sprang to her feet. It was the same with Germany though the Germans did not understand a word, the great preacher's voice and manner were enough they took the cross by thousands. Even Conrad III, the Emperor with several princes of the Empire, was carried away by the enthusiasm. To Bernard, mainspring of the movement, was offered the chief command, but he, wiser than Peter perhaps warned by his fate refused to accept it he set himself, instead, to save the wretched Jews. For just as before the Christian enthusiasm broke out in cruel persecution of these inoffensive people. It is to the infinite credit of the Saint, that he threw the mantle of his protection over them, and saved them from the horrors of a fanatical and selfish persecution.

<sup>1</sup> So says Robert de Monte (A.D. 1145), in Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 13. 290. He ends his account of the carts dragged by the devout peasants to Chartres with the curious reflection that 'you might say it was the fulfilment of the prophetic words "Spiritus Dei erat in rotis"'

In 1147 the French army was ready Conrad with the Germans was a little before them. France was entrusted to the care of Suger as Regent, together with the Count of Nevers. Nevers fled from his responsibilities into a convent, and then Suger in reality administered the realm alone, though the Archbishop of Rheims and the Count of Vermandois were appointed as his nominal assessors.

Nothing could be more wretched than the result of this grand Crusade headed by the two greatest princes of Christendom. Manuel Comnenus at Constantinople did them all the harm he could. Conrad pushed on across Asia Minor without provisions or trustworthy guides. He fell into the hands of the Turks, who routed him utterly. The poor remnant of his host some five to six thousand, fell back on the French, who had also suffered much from the Byzantine Emperor<sup>1</sup> and were painfully moving along the coast of Asia Minor. At every step they felt Greek treason and Turkish enmity, until at last, on their reaching Attalia, it was agreed that the King with his knights

<sup>1</sup> Odo of Deuil, in Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 12 p. 92

The bishop of Langres actually advised Louis to storm Constantinople and make it a true bulwark for Europe against the Infidels. But the King, loyal to his vow refused to do it, and went on.

should take ship, and the rest push on by land to Antioch. Thus the unstable King left his flock to its fate, its fate of death or slavery. It is said that he did it reluctantly; anyhow it is one of those things which no true King of men could have done at all. Very different was the conduct of St. Louis in a somewhat similar case. Of all that mighty host of pilgrims, reckoned at nearly half a million, scarcely ten thousand reached the Holy Land. From Antioch the King pushed on, caring only to fulfil his vow, and to do penance for the scene at Vitry, and so made his way to Jerusalem. There, on the altar of the church of the Sepulchre, he offered up the lives of that great host which he had misled and abandoned. With half a million souls he bought his absolution, while with it he also won the alienation and hatred of his queen, and consequent loss of all Southern France, and the utter disgrace and discredit of his reign. He turned his face homewards, after a miserable attempt to take Damascus, which only showed the discord of the Christians, and added somewhat to the great and useless sacrifice of life that had been made. Nor was he allowed to reach France without further disgrace. The Greeks captured him on the high seas; he was rescued by the Sicilian Normans, who put him ashore safely on the French coast, in 1149. So he returned home, a miserable degraded being, he had abandoned his army, his Queen Eleanor had abandoned him, with expressions of uttermost contempt. Unstable as water, he could not excel.

One thing alone came out of this Crusade<sup>1</sup>. The German and French armies having joined, and the remnant of the Germans having ranged themselves under the French King's banner, the French learnt to look on Louis as at least the equal of Conrad the Emperor. They felt they were a nation of one speech, while the Germans were a nation of another, that is, they felt themselves marked off from other people by distinct national characteristics. A clear step forwards in the growth of the French Monarchy.

<sup>1</sup> La Vallée, Histoire des Français, tom 1, p 327

Louis found France stronger and more compact than when he set out. Suger as Regent had repressed turbulence and crime, had administered the King's estates prudently had done justice had helped the poor and oppressed, until his name spread to distant lands, and men came from far to see the wisdom of this new Solomon. With joy and thankfulness as a good steward, he rendered up his charge into the King's hands and went humbly home to St. Denis, whence he seldom afterwards came forth living only to protect the poor the widow and the fatherless, and to administer the affairs of the Abbey with the same wisdom and success which had attended his management of the greater business of the kingdom<sup>1</sup>. So he spent the rest of his days in peace—Suger the poor monk, one of the true founders of the French kingdom.

Louis, left to himself soon went wrong. On his return to France, Suger had prudently advised him to dissemble his grievance against Eleanor his wife, seeing that an open breach would rend France asunder. But the foolish King consented to a divorce, after a slight and heartless opposition and Eleanor left the court, bearing with her Poitou and Aquitaine as a dower for the next husband she might choose. St. Bernard, at the time of the quarrel between Louis and the Pope, had accused the King of marrying his cousin<sup>2</sup> and doubtless the accusation stuck in the King's tender conscience, and made him all the more ready to acquiesce in the divorce. After a romantic journey, in which she narrowly escaped more than one turbulent suitor eager to carry off the heiress Eleanor reached Poitiers in safety and before long found in Henry of Anjou a worthy mate. In 1153 he had succeeded to his father's lordships. He was Count of Anjou, Touraine, and Maine he had strong hold on Normandy indefinite but not despicable claims on England a brave soul of his own, and a strong hand to take and keep Wherewith he wedded the great heiress, in spite of the King, who, as his suzeran, forbade the banns He wedded her and went at once to do homage to the King, his liege, for the very lands he had in fact wrenched out of his hand

<sup>1</sup> See the Encyclical Letter of the Chapter of St. Denis on his death; Cœuvres Complètes de Suger p. 424.

<sup>2</sup> Hugh Capet's wife was sister to William Fler-à-Drais, Eleanor's grandfather so that Eleanor was the King's cousin seven times removed.

In vain did Louis make league in 1153 with Stephen of England, Geoffrey of Anjou, Henry's younger brother, and Henry of Champagne, to check the growing power of the great Count of Anjou Henry was far stronger than the three, and forced Louis to make peace, securing his position in France, as lord from sea to sea, from the Norman coast to the Gulf of Lyons Then he crossed over into England, a new Conqueror, at the head of a strong army, and the English barons, all discontented, fell to him Stephen made what peace he could, recognising him as his heir And thus Henry overcame the coalition in the usual way, dividing its members, and conquering them in detail Next year Stephen died, and Henry ascended the English throne without a murmur<sup>1</sup> The great controversy between England and France takes definite shape from this time, in the form of a life and death struggle for the French monarchy and nation At first the contest lay between two Frenchmen, and between lord and vassal (for Henry had done homage to Louis for his possessions on the mainland), not yet between two equal sovereigns, and two proud and hostile nations Still the general issue was the same in the earlier age, though the high interest of the later periods was wanting The present struggle lay half-way between the old squabbles and half-private wars arising out of feudal relationships, and the new and grander wars which were soon to spring up between monarch and monarch, nation and nation. A day would come when the very throne of France would be claimed by an English king; and the claim all but established by the sword This later quarrel lay involved in the earlier one, and Henry of Anjou, with his determined character and splendid resources, might well, even without hereditary claims, have joined the French crown to that of England. From the weakness of Louis the Young no obstacles could arise, the growing sense of national life in Northern France alone resisted and staved off the evil day till the vigorous son of this poor creature became King and then the peril passed away for a time.

<sup>1</sup> William of Newbridge, Bk 13, p 102

No men could be more utterly unlike than Henry and Louis, and it was no small part of the invariable ill fortune of the French King that he was forced to stand, in all his littleness, side by side with the bold form of the successful Count of Anjou who is one of the grandest figures in the history of royalty. In the words of the Anjou chronicler he was 'vigorous in war marvellous in prudence of reply frugal in habits, munificent to others, sober kindly peaceable'. He secured his broad territories and held them wisely and firmly. He reformed England, driving out the locust-cloud of Flemings who had come over in his predecessor's train, abolished certain imaginary earls, bore himself so wisely defended himself so manfully that all men, even his foes, praised him. And if in later life he gave way to his passions, and his strong nature grew more vehement, we must remember that never was prince so sorely tried.<sup>1</sup>

Against so great a rival what chance had the French King? —a man whom his wife despised and escaped from—carrying her knowledge of his weakness straight into the enemy's camp—a man who was the humble servant of the clergy and yet too impetuous and unstable to follow their advice—who threw away half his strength, and did not know how to husband the remainder—who had been foiled in the South, and had deserted his soldiers in the East—how could men trust in him, and rally round him in his struggle against the King of England?

In 1156 Henry gathered a great army to subdue Ireland,

<sup>1</sup> In Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 12, p. 482.

It must be remembered also that the monkish historians are certain to have exaggerated his faults. They had a natural antipathy to a strong man especially if he opposed all they counted most sacred.

but diverted it from its purpose, and landed on the French coast, to support his claims to the remains of his father's property in Anjou and the Breton country. He and his allies disturbed the whole land, from the Pyrenees to the borders of Flanders, but we have no record of noteworthy deeds. Two years later (A.D. 1159) Henry marched on Toulouse, and might have taken it, but he forbore, because Louis was in the city; and the great vassal was never unmindful of his feudal loyalty to his suzerain<sup>1</sup>. In the next year the King made peace. Henry, the English King's son, did homage for Normandy to Louis, and soon after espoused Margaret, the French King's daughter, who brought him Gisors and two other castles on the Norman border, as her dower, places which were said to pertain of right to the duchy. Next year King Henry made vigorous use of this peace. He prevented others from building offensive strongholds on his frontiers; he strengthened all his border-fastnesses, especially Gisors, made a park and palace hard by Rouen, restored the hall and chambers by the tower of that city; for Rouen, rather than London, seemed to him the centre and capital of that Anglo-French monarchy which all his life he struggled to found and consolidate, he built a fine lazaret-house, and in many ways showed activity and discretion. The same he did in Aquitaine, in England, in Anjou, and elsewhere. A little before this time he had begun to lay hands on Brittany, and, after a resistance which lasted for ten years (A.D. 1156-1166), he compelled the sturdy duchy to do him homage. Henceforward Brittany, hitherto so isolated and independent, enters into our history, and takes her share in the struggles between France and England, though in language, manners, and feeling, she was still—nay, has continued to be up to our own day—distinct from the rest of France.

<sup>1</sup> Robert de Monte, App. ad Sigebertum, in Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom 12, 303. 'Urbem totam Tolosanam noluit obsidere, deferens Ludovico Regi Francorum, qui eandem urbem contra regem Henricum Angliæ muniverat.' Henry afterwards showed a like respect for his feudal obligations, to his own loss, in the boyish years of Philip Augustus.

Thus, by about the year 1160 Henry had secured Normandy, Poitou, and Aquitaine had fensual suzerainty over Auvergne was lord of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine had firm hold on Nantes, with good hopes of the rest of Brittany, had wrested Quercy from Toulouse had subjected Gascony was ally to Champagne, and protector of Flanders. And yet, with all this overwhelming power he had now reached the highest limit of his success, and could do no more, even against the feebleness of Louis VII.

For as he grew older the worse side of his character became stronger. He made the clergy his bitter foes. He tried to curb that dangerous power by the Constitutions of Clarendon, which were passed in 1164 and were designed to bring the clergy under secular restraints. The quarrel soon broke out into open war. On the one side was the King with his barons and some bishops; on the other side, Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury once the King's favourite and chancellor now his deadly opponent. Behind Thomas were the Pope and the French King as well as the general favour of the English clergy, and the national dislike and resistance of the English, who had no sympathy with the foreign King, who was not even like the Normans who had conquered them and settled down among them. Thus, at the end of Louis's reign, the two Kings were nearly evenly balanced. This period may be divided into two parts,—the struggle between Henry and the archbishop (A.D. 1164–1170), and that between the King and his undutiful wife and children (A.D. 1173–1180). In spite of all, Henry persisted, strengthened himself in Brittany lost no ground in Aquitaine, and conquered Ireland. His plan was to yield nothing of worth, but to show himself ever ready to be reconciled to Becket, who with his many reservations and obstinacy sorely tried the irritable monarch's temper, to enlist the goodwill of the easy-going Pope, Alexander III as we see in his appeal to him to sanction the conquest of Ireland and to pay the utmost respects to his suzerain, so far as homage and declarations went, as we see at the opening of the contest between the kings for the possession of Auvergne. Auvergne was on the skirts of either power: the French King's influence had spread beyond the Loire, and the English King's claims on Aquitaine included those of suzerainty over it. So, when Louis redressed the wrongs done by William, Count of Auvergne, to the Bishops of Clermont and Puy, though Henry wrote to beg he would hand over to him the illdoers, being his vassals, still he fully recognised the French King's rights as superior lord, and declared that he would 'do whatever he ought, as to his lord'.<sup>1</sup> Thus, as he often did almost ostentatiously, he proclaimed himself the French King's vassal.

Moreover, while Henry's power was thus suffering from his contest with the Church, a mishap befell him, the whole importance of which did not appear till after his death. In 1160 Constance, King Louis's second queen, died in giving birth to a daughter. 'The King and the whole realm were exceedingly sad thereat, but, afterwards comforted by his barons he somewhat forgot his deep sorrow,'—and (fifteen days after the poor lady's death<sup>1</sup>) wedded Ala or Alice, daughter of Theobald of Blois, a noted beauty of the court. She, in 1165, bore him a son (as yet he had none but daughters), to the great joy of all France. Well-omened names were bestowed on him: he was the 'God-given,' the 'Magnanimous,' the 'August',—Philip Augustus, who was destined to raise the contest between England and France to really national proportions, and to teach the English King to regard England, and not Normandy as the true centre of his dominions; who was destined also both to expand and to consolidate the French Monarchy.

It is not ours to relate the painful contest between angry King and stubborn Prelate, in which it is impossible to feel full sympathy with either. The French King supported Becket, the English King was not, as one might have expected, opposed by the Pope, Alexander III, a man of a soft and timid nature, who perhaps scarcely grasped the importance of the issues raised by Becket. Ceaseless negotiation, more or less sincere, went on. At one moment Becket, at Vézelay is thundering excommunications against the followers of the old customs of England, and heralding the dawn of the new glories of the Papacy, at another time, the King interposes to reconcile the foes again, the Pope himself sends his messengers, whose names and fruitless mission the chronicler turns into a pretty pun.<sup>1</sup> At last, in 1170 the great crime and greater blunder was committed. Becket fell, a martyr in the eyes of the Church victim of a courageous and inflexible adherence to his principles. When Henry heard of his death he was struck with horror—at least he seemed to be so. For days he shut himself up in his chamber refusing sustenance. He saw at once that his foe would be more formidable dead than alive, and hastened to disavow the act of the four knights. He offered to take the cross—he was compelled to repeal the Constitutions of Clarendon—he spent large sums of money at Rome—and money he had always at command, like a prudent prince,—he swore that he would support Alexander and his successors, so long as they recognised him as a catholic king—swore that he would not hinder appeals to Rome—that he would take the cross for three years and go in person to Jerusalem—and he would give the Templars money to pay two hundred soldiers for a year.<sup>2</sup> he allowed the Bull of the yearly celebration of the Martyr's memory to be published in England. In a word he took in much sail, and so weathered the storm.

<sup>1</sup> Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom 12, p 130, 'faciam quicquid debuero, sicut domino'

As yet the French King could reap no advantage from all this humiliation. It was from another, and that a very unexpected side that his revenge was to come—namely, from Eleanor the wife of his own youth, the wife of Henry's manhood. Whether or no the romance and tragedy of Fair Rosamond be true, it is certain that, in 1172, Eleanor declared herself deeply wronged by her husband, and set herself to rouse her Aquitanians to revolt. Louis played a mean part in this sad drama, by poisoning the mind of Henry Courmantesel against his father, under his influence the young man summoned King Henry to give up to him either England, or Normandy and Anjou. In order to enforce this demand Louis, at the head of a great league of Frenchmen, Flemings, men of Chartres, Champagne, Poitou, Brittany, attacked Normandy and Anjou, which defended themselves in a very half-hearted way. Then Henry II fell back on his last reserve, his treasures, and with them called out of the earth an army of defenders of a kind hitherto but little known in European warfare. The lawless times, and especially the Crusades, had created a large floating population of unsettled adventurers, who were usually called Brabançons (as many came from Brabant), or Cottereaux, from their long knives. These wild fighting men crowded gladly round a King who offered war and pay, he enrolled, some say ten, some twenty, thousand of them. They formed a rude standing army, a new power, which was not hampered by feudal customs. The King could keep them afield as long as he would, and, while he had them out, could handle them far more certainly than he could the half-independent barons, who answered his summons, and did him feudal service. With this new army he faced Louis VII, who had seized and burnt Verneuil by an act of low treason<sup>1</sup>. Henry routed him, then quelled the Bretons, then, in the following year, mastered Anjou and the south-west, then came swiftly back to England, where he recovered his influence by doing ostentatious penance at Becket's shrine,—with what strange feelings and thoughts, as the monks laid the scourge across his bare shoulders, who shall say! Tidings reached him at the same moment of the taking of William of Scotland, and he felt he might safely return to France. There he relieved Rouen, and, in the same autumn, received the submission of his three rebel sons, Henry Richard, and Geoffrey. Geoffrey retained Brittany. Richard became Duke of Aquitaine, where, in spite of the patriotic songs of Bertram de Born, who roused all the fire of the South by his stirring Sirventes or war-songs, his vigour, courage and military genius entirely crushed the spirit of resistance in Poitou and Guienne.

<sup>1</sup> Sicut pœna Regem Gratianus prothom non laevult, sic nec pœna Archiepiscopum aliquis viciu P'riores in memoria! — Dom Bouquet, Recueil, tom. 13, p. 183.

<sup>2</sup> Benedict of Peterborough (ed. Stubbs), 2 p. 12.

<sup>1</sup> See Benedict of Peterborough's Gesta Regis Henrici II, vol. 1, p. 54 (ed. Stubbs)

A new element of discord arose in these warm southern climes, their quickened intellect, their higher though perhaps more corrupt civilisation, led the Southerners into strange forms of belief and the authority of the Church was shaken. Louis was called in to stop the tide but he was very reluctant to interfere in the way of persecution.

His days were now drawing to an end. In 1179 being hard on sixty years of age, and already touched with paralysis, he called a great assembly at Paris, and told them his wish that his boy Philip should forthwith be crowned at Rheims. All princes and prelates applauded, and, after a short delay caused by the King's illness, Philip was crowned at the age of fifteen.

There are two circumstances to be noted at this coronation one, that the Cathedral of Rheims was thereby marked out as the future coronation place of all French kings, the other that the Twelve Peers of France are said to have been present at the ceremony. These were the nobles who held the great fiefs immediately from the Crown and their number had been fixed by Louis VII at twelve, six lay and six ecclesiastical. They were the Dukes of Normandy, Burgundy, Guienne, the Counts of Champagne, Flanders, Toulouse, the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Bishops of Laon, Noyon, Châlons, Beauvais, and Langres.<sup>1</sup>

Thus, for five generations without a break, the custom of crowning the son during his father's lifetime had been recommended by the King and accepted readily by the nobles and people. The 'King never died', and the result was that the thought of changing the hereditary succession seems never to have entered the French mind. Of all the hereditary crowns in Europe, the French became the most firmly established.

<sup>1</sup> It is worth noting that the immediate vassals of the Duchy of France who held of the King as Duke, not as King, were not Peers of France.—Dunoy Hist. de France I 295.

The father lingered on a few months at Paris, passing away in September, 1180, he was buried in the Abbey-church of Barbeaux, near Melun, which he himself had built. Thus ended, in peace and silence, the long, stormy, inglorious reign of Louis VII, 'the Young.' A prince pious, learned, gentle, he wins all praise from his monkish biographer, save that he could not be roused to persecute the Jews. He brought much land into cultivation; built many churches and abbeys, set the example of enfranchising serfs, founded many of the 'new towns,' the Villeneuves of France; advanced to some extent, where it did not clash with other interests, the Communal movement, he issued four-and-twenty charters for cities, and confirmed the ancient privileges of the Paris merchants. With the great Abbot Suger at his side, he was saved, doubtless, from many blunders. If he leaves behind him no great name, he still has the honour of having done less than many French kings to hinder the welfare of his people.

CHAPTER VII

Philip II, surnamed Augustus, A.D. 1180-1223.

PHILIP AUGUSTUS was fifteen years old when he began to reign alone yet, boy though he was, he never for a moment swerved from his course, or made a false step in it. Coming so young to his crown, he grasped with all a boy's eagerness at the dignity of the royal name, and being proud of disposition and not without a tendency to romance, he at once set his kingship in his own mind far above all, even the greatest, of his neighbours, while at the same time he pleased his imagination with dreams of the restoration of a Caroling realm, to which his attention was specially called by his first marriage, he deemed himself destined to recover the whole breadth of the Empire of Charles the Great. There is a story which may well be true, to the effect that when he was scarcely twenty years old his courtiers saw him gnawing a green bough, and glaring about him wildly. One of them asked him boldly what he was thinking of and he replied, 'I am wondering whether God will grant me or my heirs grace to raise France once more to the height she reached in the days of Charlemagne! For forty three years he pursued this end, and brought to bear on it a cold pertinacity a freedom from uneasy scruples, a clear sagacity in conceiving crafty plans and constancy in carrying them out. No wonder that his reign is an epoch in the history of French monarchy and that he succeeded in raising the royal power far above the highest level it had hitherto reached.

I. FIRST PERIOD, A.D. 1180-1199

When Louis 'the Fat' died in 1137, he had taken good care not to allow the unity of the kingdom to be weakened by those grants to younger sons which so often had undone the work of a lifetime. he left, in substance, all the royal domain to his successor, Louis the Young. Fortunately for the monarchy, this weak prince left only one son, and had therefore no temptation to divide his territories, and Philip Augustus succeeded to all the power which had been painfully gathered together by his grandfather. The kingly office at this moment was regarded by men as a power distinct from feudalism, and as only partly territorial. The King was not merely the headbaron of the system; he was possessor of a real, if indefinite, claim on the respect of mankind, as one solemnly consecrated to his office, and inheritor in a dim way of the ancient conception of kingship, he was felt to be the brother of the kings of England and Normandy, and of those of Spain, as something between Pope and Emperor on the one side, and the independent and powerful Dukes (as of Burgundy or Flanders), on the other. His was an independent and general power, with claims on the allegiance of all France, the centre round which the unity of the nation was already beginning to form.

The first act of the young King's reign was a sad one. Glad to taste the pleasures of power, and urged to it by his clergy, Philip marked the opening of his career by a violent attack on the Jews, whom his weaker and more humane father had spared. They were all banished the realm in 1182. Other like acts followed. An edict was issued which punished profane swearing with death. the Paterins also, an obscure sect, who 'ventured to attempt a reform of morals as well as of dogma<sup>1</sup>,' were hunted down and burnt, 'passing'—so ran the formula—'from the short temporal flames to the eternal flames that awaited them.'

<sup>1</sup> Sismondi, Hist des Français, tom 6, p 12

<sup>2</sup> Chron de S Denis, p 350

Even in his father's lifetime, Philip had shown his kinsfolk that he could and would act for himself. Alce the Queen and her four brothers, had formed a sort of council, in whose hands the old King left the care of all things. But Philip had gone to Philip of Alsace, Count of Flanders, and without asking leave of any one, had married Isabella of Hainault, his niece by which step he allied himself with the older dynasty. No sooner was the old King gone than almost all the great vassals, including the Count of Flanders himself attacked the youthful King. But he was helped by Henry Courtmantel, son of Henry of England, and held his own till winter brought rest. Henry of England then interfered in hopes of peace. Philip, in right of his wife, claimed the succession of her mother Elizabeth of Vermandois, who had just died, he was persuaded to content himself with Amiens and some lesser concessions. Amiens had been held as a fief under its bishop and when that churchman claimed homage from Philip Augustus, the proud boy answered haughtily that he as King neither could nor ought to pay homage to any man —and claimed for monarchy a lofty superiority over feudalism.

Yet did he not disdain the aid that feudalism brought him he accepted the homage of Henry of England, and such help as that great vassal well-nigh worn out with war and the turbulence of his sons could give. Those four sons of his, Henry Courtmantel, Richard Cœur de Lion, Geoffrey and John, had done all they could to destroy their father's power and happiness, and in the end they succeeded in ruining their own fortunes. They kept up great state and court, with many followers but having neither money nor estates with which to reward these hangers-on they were tempted, even against their own true interests, to struggle for whatever they could get. Thanks to this, the French monarchy was enabled to rise above all its dangers. Henry Courtmantel died so also Geoffrey leaving a posthumous son, Arthur whose name recalled to the Bretons their great hero and towards whom they seemed to be drawn by all the force of their romantic and imaginative nature.

Philip now embarked in a series of wars First, in 1185, he waged successful warfare against his old friend the Count of Flanders, successful so far that the Count, although he had on the whole the best of the fighting, ceded to the King the county of Vermandois, and confirmed him in possession of Amiens Success tempted the young King to go on, he was no sooner clear of the Flemish count than he fell on Hugh III, Duke of Burgundy (A D 1185-1186) Hugh appealed to Frederick Barbarossa, whose vassal he was for part of his lands, but as the Duchy of Burgundy was no part of the ancient Kingdom of Burgundy<sup>1</sup>, nor was held under the Empire, Frederick refused to interfere on another man's ground. Philip relieved Vergy, besieged by the duke, and encouraged the Burgundian bishops to carry their grievances before him, raising the remarkable plea that all churches held direct from the crown, even though they were within the borders of the greatest fiefs He then took Châtillon on Seine, and was moving forwards when Hugh met him with submission. The young King exacted severe conditions, to which the great vassal submitted then, with a prudence marvellous for his years, and possibly with some of the generosity of youth, he remitted them all He was content to have shown his power, and not less content to secure the friendship of so strong a neighbour he also foresaw a still harder task before him, and desired to make his eastern frontier quiet and secure.

And now began the many restless years which lay between the French King and the attainment of his great desire, the subjection of Normandy. In 1186 we have the first of a long series of discussions under the 'Eln of Conferences' between Trie and Gisors all went peacefully awhile, but

<sup>1</sup> Burgundy was in three parts, lying side by side (1) the Duchy of Burgundy which was nearest to France, on the upper Seine and the Saone, south of Champagne, north of the Lyonnais, and was a fief under the French Crown (2) then (going eastwards) the County of Burgundy or Franche-Comté, from the east bank of the Saone to the Jura (a fief under the Empire) and (3) the lesser Duchy, which occupied a considerable part of modern Switzerland, and formed the northernmost portion of the ancient kingdom of Arles (also under the Empire)

Even in his father's lifetime, Philip had shown his kinsfolk that he could and would act for himself. Alice the Queen and her four brothers, had formed a sort of council, in whose hands the old King left the care of all things. But Philip had gone to Philip of Alsace Count of Flanders, and without asking leave of any one, had married Isabella of Hainault his niece by which step he allied himself with the older dynasty. No sooner was the old King gone than almost all the great vassals, including the Count of Flanders himself, attacked the youthful King. But he was helped by Henry Courtmantel, son of Henry of England, and held his own till winter brought rest. Henry of England then interfered in hopes of peace. Philip in right of his wife, claimed the succession of her mother Elizabeth of Vermandois, who had just died. He was persuaded to content himself with Amiens and some lesser concessions. Amiens had been held as a fief under its bishop and when that churchman claimed homage from Philip Augustus, the proud boy answered haughtily that he, as King, neither could nor ought to pay homage to any man—and claimed for monarchy a lofty superiority over feudalism.

Yet did he not disdain the aid that feudalism brought him. He accepted the homage of Henry of England, and such help as that great vassal well-nigh worn out with war and the turbulence of his sons could give. Those four sons of his, Henry Courtmantel, Richard Cœur de Lion, Geoffrey and John, had done all they could to destroy their father's power and happiness and in the end they succeeded in ruining their own fortunes. They kept up great state and court, with many followers, but having neither money nor estates with which to reward these hangers-on they were tempted, even against their own true interests, to struggle for whatever they could get. Thanks to this, the French monarchy was enabled to rise above all its dangers. Henry Courtmantel died, so also Geoffrey leaving a posthumous son, Arthur whose name recalled to the Bretons their great hero and towards whom they seemed to be drawn by all the force of their romantic and imaginative nature.

Philip now embarked in a series of wars First, in 1185, he waged successful warfare against his old friend the Count of Flanders, successful so far that the Count, although he had on the whole the best of the fighting, ceded to the King the county of Vermandois, and confirmed him in possession of Amiens Success tempted the young King to go on, he was no sooner clear of the Flemish count than he fell on Hugh III, Duke of Burgundy (A D 1185-1186) Hugh appealed to Frederick Barbarossa, whose vassal he was for part of his lands; but as the Duchy of Burgundy was no part of the ancient Kingdom of Burgundy<sup>1</sup>, nor was held under the Empire, Frederick refused to interfere on another man's ground. Philip relieved Vergy, besieged by the duke, and encouraged the Burgundian bishops to carry their grievances before him, raising the remarkable plea that all churches held direct from the crown, even though they were within the borders of the greatest fiefs. He then took Châtillon on Seine, and was moving forwards when Hugh met him with submission The young King exacted severe conditions, to which the great vassal submitted then, with a prudence marvellous for his years, and possibly with some of the generosity of youth, he remitted them all He was content to have shown his power, and not less content to secure the friendship of so strong a neighbour he also foresaw a still harder task before him, and desired to make his eastern frontier quiet and secure

And now began the many restless years which lay between the French King and the attainment of his great desire, the subjection of Normandy. In 1186 we have the first of a long series of discussions under the 'Elm of Conferences' between Tine and Gisors all went peacefully awhile, but things were in such a state that pretexts for war were never wanting. Richard Cœur de Lion had attacked Raymond V of Toulouse, who called on the French King as his lord for help—a great change from the older attitude of the Southern states. Next Philip claimed the restitution of Gisors and the Vexin which had passed to the other side when Margaret married Henry Courtmantel. When he died and she married again the French King with no small show of justice, claimed them as having lapsed to him by her second marriage. There was a third dispute as to the lordship over Brittany whose duke, Geoffrey Plantagenet, was dead but his widow gave birth to a boy, Arthur and by his birth this point was settled for a while. Lastly Philip pushed on the marriage of his sister Alix to Richard, who was still at variance with Henry he seemed eager for open war with the veteran of England. But conference followed conference under the ancient elm, truce followed truce for the old King could not trust his sons or his followers, nor did Philip feel at all sure as to the fidelity of his comrades. War however at last began. Philip attacked Aquitaine, which was under Richard's care, the impetuous prince was false to his father and seemed likely to go over to his enemy. Then Henry made peace for two years, on terms favourable to Philip and Richard hastened into the French King's camp where he became so friendly with him that they drank of the same cup, lodged in the same tent, even slept in the same bed<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Burgundy was in three parts, lying side by side (1) the Duchy of Burgundy which was nearest to France, on the upper Seine and the Saone, south of Champagne, north of the Lyonnais, and was a fief under the French Crown (2) then (going eastwards) the County of Burgundy or Franche Comté, from the east bank of the Saone to the Jura (a fief under the Empire) and (3) the lesser Duchy, which occupied a considerable part of modern Switzerland, and formed the northernmost portion of the ancient kingdom of Arles (also under the Empire)

And now came terrible news from the East. The Christians had grown ever weaker till at last, in 1187 Saladin met them in the Tiberiad, and defeated them utterly after a two days battle. The true cross, Guy of Lusignan, the titular Prince of Antioch, the Grand Masters of the Temple and of St. John all fell into the victor's hands. He swept on over the powerless land, and Jerusalem lay prostrate before him nothing was left to the Christians save Tyre, Antioch, and Tripoli. When these sore tidings reached the West all men stood still and held their breath. The Pope, Urban III, died of grief war, pillage, debauchery, crime, suddenly ceased: 'Verily we are guilty by reason of our brother,' was the thought in every heart, and the danger was brought home to all minds by the descent of a vast host of Arabs on the Spanish coast. The voices of the new Pope, Clement III, and of William, Archbishop of Tyre, broke the silence, the Kings of France and England once more met at Gisors, they embraced and took the cross. Richard joined them, as did a crowd of great princes and barons. The Emperor Frederick Barbarossa did the same.

<sup>1</sup> Chron. de S. Denis, p. 363

Yet even then Philip and Henry could not be still. War recommenced in 1188, but now Henry's strength was gone. His barons deserted him, his sons betrayed him, he was compelled to make a shameful peace, to declare himself Philip's liegeman in full, to yield Berry, a duchy lying south of the Loire below Orleans, and to promise pardon to all who had betrayed him. We are told that he asked to see the list of those whom he was thus compelled to pardon, and that when he saw the first name, the name of his favourite son John, for whom he had done and suffered so much, his heart broke, and with a bitter curse on all his children, he lay down and died.

Henceforth the power of the house of Anjou receded, and the lordship over France was assured to the house of Capet.

And now the great princes of Europe began to think seriously of their vow. The brave old Emperor, Frederick Barbarossa, took the land route, passed safely through the snares of Constantinople, and led his army unscathed over the worst part of its march, took Iconium, and was pushing on, when, in crossing a little river, he was by some trivial accident swept away and drowned. His Germans fell into despair, the Duke of Swabia, who took the command, brought only about five thousand men through to the camp under the walls of Ptolemais.

Richard, impetuous, eager to be gone to fresh fields of fighting, sold his lands by auction, not content with the large sums which his father had left behind him. Philip, whose heart never went with the Crusade, bade his faithful Parisians fortify their city, he saw that Paris was to be the heart of France. They set off, Richard for Marseilles, Phillip who had no port on the Mediterranean, for Genoa, and both were constrained by contrary winds to winter in Sicily. Here jealousies which might have been avoided in more stirring times, broke out between the two Kings. But Phillip patiently endured the turbulence of his rival, and set forth first for Ptolemais. Richard, following later and being driven by storm to Cyprus, seized that island and kept it. At last he reached Ptolemais, and, after innumerable skirmishes and feats of arms, the place capitulated. But the French King liked neither the holy war nor the wild heroism of the English King and knew well that his right place was at home. He was in no sense a knight errant on the contrary his cold calculating nature made him dislike the bootless war which wasted his resources and did not even give him barren glory in return. He swore to respect his rival's territories, handed over his army to Hugh of Burgundy and set sail for home.

As he passed through Rome, he shamelessly tried to persuade Pope Celestin III to release him from his oath to respect King Richard's lands. The Pope however refused to be a party to such a scandal and Phillip was compelled to content himself with doing Richard what harm he could by means of his brother John. The English King had declared Arthur his heir and John in revenge threw himself into the arms of Phillip whose mean and ungenerous nature gladly took advantage of his rival's absence.

Richard, after feats of heroism and gleams of warlike genius, gave way before the impossibility of his task, made a treaty with Saladin, securing to the Christians the seaport towns, and a safe roadway for purposes of pilgrimage to Jerusalem and, having thus done what he could for his cause set out by sea for home. Shipwrecked in Dalmatia, he tried to cross Germany in disguise he was detected and taken by his mortal foe Leopold of Austria, whose banner he had outraged at Ptolemais. Leopold handed him over to Henry VI, the Emperor

No sooner had tidings of his captivity reached France, than Philip attacked Normandy, taking Evreux, and besieging Rouen. John joined him with such help as he could bring. They did all in their power to persuade the Emperor to hold the English King prisoner; but the whole of Christendom was moved at the sight of its hero in chains, and, on hard terms, Richard was let go free. John at once gave way, and made his peace with his brother. The war was languid, partial, indecisive—for both Kings were exhausted by the efforts they had made in the Holy Land. The upshot was a truce, under the terms of which Philip became master of Auvergne in 1196.

In the next year, however, we find Richard everywhere more than a match for his rival. The great vassals turned towards him, jealous of the power of their suzerain. Château Gaillard rose to bar the French King's progress towards Rouen, for Richard was aware of the great blunder committed when part of the Vexin and Gisors were ceded to France, and the road to Rouen laid bare. He had a true genius for fortification; and was not only his own engineer, but his own master of the works.

In the midst of his successes, the new Pope, Innocent III, interfered in the interests of peace, and made the two Kings conclude a truce for five years. But Richard could not rest. Some one told him that a great treasure had been found in the Castle of Chalus, near Limoges. After the feudal custom it pertained to the suzerain, and Richard claimed it. The Viscount of Limoges either had nothing to give up, or had it and refused, whereon Richard attacked the castle. One on the walls drew a bow on him as he was looking at the defences, the arrow wounded him, and after ten days he died. His men had taken the castle meanwhile, and had hung all the garrison, except the soldier who had wounded the King. It is said that Richard, with a gleam of his nobler nature, pardoned him, and ordered him to be set free; whether this be so or not, they kept him till their master was dead, and then put him to a brutal death. Thus the chivalrous King passed away in the midst of wild scenes of war and murder.

So died the chiefest fighting man of that royal race. Richard had all the worse qualities of chivalry in an exaggerated form. He was proud, cruel, turbulent, furious in anger, licentious, rapacious, but withal heroic in combat, almost to madness, far in advance of his time in military skill, splendid in court, worshipped by his knights. There was a belief at the time that the house of Anjou were sprung in part from demons, and the character and conduct of Henry's four sons gave point to the popular fable. Richard especially seemed to be given over to a wild spirit of reckless bravery and as reckless crime. He was the last King of England who ruled from Rouen during all his reign he hardly spent six months across the Channel, so little did he regard England as his home. When he and Philip swore faith to each other before setting forth for Ptolemais, their oath was that they would defend one another's rights Philip as he would defend his city of Paris Richard, as he would his city of Rouen<sup>1</sup>. In this respect a change was now coming for the misfortunes of King John's reign drove him perforce to England, and the loss of Normandy which we have next to relate, made London for the future the sole capital of the kingdom.

II. PHILIP AUGUSTUS ADDS NORMANDY TO HIS DOMINIONS.

A.D. 1199-1206

When tidings of Richard's death came to Phillip he must have felt that the moment for which he had waited so long was come at last. Against the experience and sagacity of Henry II he had been able to do but little though even from him he wrested something and Richard's heroism and warlike ability had been at least a match for his cold and cautious antagonist. But now there remained of all the Plantagenets only young Arthur of Brittany who might be more useful than dangerous, and John, the great King's last and feeblest son. According to the popular belief the evil spirit that possessed him was the demon of cowardice and sloth, of luxury and self-indulgence—the weakest and worst of all the race, he was destined to degrade himself before the French King, before his barons, before the Pope. Whatever he touched, he spoilt.

England and Normandy at once declared for John, despising the Breton Arthur, but Anjou, Maine, Poitou, Touraine, raised Arthur's banner, and, feeling themselves unable to stand alone, put themselves under Philip's protection. The wily King suggested that a fair division would be, the French provinces for Arthur, and England for John. But John was not prepared to accept England as his home, he was as little English as his brother. War broke out at once, Philip desiring nothing so much. In the name of Arthur he swept across Brittany, and every town he took he at once dismantled, to the dismay of Arthur's party. But he soon felt that he could not prosper so long as he continued to be at variance with the Church, consequently, he made peace with John, retaining Evreux and some strong places in Berry, agreeing to marry his son, Louis, to John's niece, Blanche, and abandoning altogether the defenceless Arthur to his fate. Philip's quarrel with the Church was on the old lines, the old struggle as to matters of divorce and marriage. Philip had taken a great dislike to his bride, Ingeborg of Denmark, and had made obsequious bishops dissolve his marriage with her soon after the wedding-day. The poor young Dane, who knew no word of French, was told by signs that Philip had divorced her, and in her grief and anger she appealed to Rome. In the chair of the Pontiffs sat Innocent III, ever ready to interfere, only too glad when the passions of Kings gave him so good a reason for interference. For Philip had not only sent Ingeborg away, but had taken to wife the beautiful Agnes of Meran, whose misfortunes form one of the romances of the age. The Pope at once threatened Philip with excommunication, and the kingdom with an Interdict; and, in 1200, this curse was laid on the unoffending people. It is true that it did not directly punish the offender, but, on the other hand, it oppressed his subjects, and their discontent must after awhile compel him to yield. Philip fought vigorously against this foreign interference his pride and passion were alike engaged in the struggle. Still, he was too clear-sighted not to see that he must be the loser, and therefore, even after a council had been called at Soissons to judge the case, he did not stay for the sentence, but took again his Danish wife, and left the town. He treated her with no affection, and with the scantiest courtesy still the Pope had won. Philip was restored to clerical favour and the cloud gathering on his fortunes melted away. The time had not yet quite come when he could brave the imperious Pope, nor was his cause in itself sufficiently strong and good to enlist the hearts of his great vassals, the goodwill of his clergy and to neutralise the distress arising to the people from the Interdict.<sup>1</sup>

Meanwhile changes were passing over the face of the age. The fourth Crusade from which the King stood coldly aloof never went near Palestine the Crusaders took and sacked Constantinople (A.D. 1204) and spread across Macedonia, Greece, Roumania, extending the power of Venice over the Peloponnesus and the Isles of Greece. The old thought, that a Crusade must strike straight at the holy places, had now almost died out. The Moslem was attacked on his flanks, in Asia Minor, or in Egypt the Christians, on the whole, had made little impression on the unbelievers.

Royalty at Paris gained greatly in strength the King's hand was felt everywhere everywhere men had a fresh sense of security royalty and the law sprang into full life together. The University of Paris, now first created, became the centre of European learning first type of universities soon to spring up elsewhere. The studies there encouraged passed far beyond the old curriculum by the side of the recognised seven studies, the old trivium and quadrivium,—grammar rhetoric and logic, arithmetic, geometry music and astronomy—the laws of man's thought in language, and of his thought in numbers—came in two great subjects, which were destined to change the whole face of knowledge and political life; the study of Medicine and the study of Law. Medicine led on to experimental philosophy; and Law settled the bases of society and marked the relations of man to man independently of feudal customs. The influences of Medicine do not so much concern us here: those of Law are all-important.

<sup>1</sup> An Interdict suspended all the offices of religion. No man could be christened or shriven, could be married or buried, while it hung like a black pall over city and field.

The story runs that the Pandects of Justinian were rediscovered at Amalfi in 1135, they formed the base of the great law school of Italy, Bologna. Thence they passed to the French seat of southern learning, Montpellier; thence to the heart of the new-born kingdom, Paris. There they were welcomed eagerly: the Roman law, with its exactitude and logical coherence, was what society wanted in its attempt to establish itself on more secure foundations. Especially was it clear that the royal power must gain by the spread of the rigid conceptions of order and subordination contained in the Pandects. And Philip Augustus was endowed with a cold clear mind and a keen sense of his royal dignity, which easily discerned the great value of the law to him as an instrument for advancing his high pretensions. If it is true that the greatest men have a passion for justice, it is equally true that great Kings are irresistibly attracted towards the law, and Philip with his delight in the newly revived Roman Law may be well compared to Edward I, 'the Justinian of England'. In the Roman Law the royal claims found a sanction before which all society was willing to bow. Law and the lawyers became the strongest supporters of the monarchy, and stood it in good stead when it resisted the claims of Papal power, for the law was a double-edged sword, with which the King could smite both Pope and Feudalism. By the side of this great engine of government, the Civil Law, grew up an analogous ecclesiastical code, the Canon Law, which regulated the relations of churchmen among themselves, and in their dealings with the laity. As the Civil Law strengthened the claims of Kings, so did the those of Popes. The struggle between them was sharp and lasted long.

At this same time Northern and Southern France alike as well as Germany, teemed with noble growths of poetry. On the Frankish hills grew the epic on the sunny slopes of the south sprang up the lyrical poems of the troubadours. The Northern poets told of Arthur and Charlemagne the old half-mythical tales grew into chivalric epics and men, consciously or not, took them as motives and guides. It was not difficult in that young age of chivalry and of crusading adventure for men to feel that life was an acted epic. Phillip Augustus himself yearned to raise his kingly state to the level of the Empire of Charles the Great.

And indeed we are coming to the epical period of his reign, when the Norman campaigns brought out all the King's higher qualities, and gave him a great place in history.

In 1202 the luckless Arthur who had placed his hands between those of Philip, swearing fealty for all his lands, and all his claims, fell after a disastrous battle into the hands of his uncle, King John, and was carried captive to Rouen tower.

And there he disappeared. How no man knows to this day but all men at that time agreed in suspecting that John who, was fully capable of such things, took the boy in a boat, stabbed him and threw his dead body into the Seine. Murderer or not, John, like his father Henry in the case of Becket, had a far worse foe in the dead than he had had in the living. All Europe was aroused. The Bretons rose at once the boy was their Arthur faint shadow of their ancient hero and they had hoped to become a great people under him. Phillip arose as the avenger, with justice and interest alike calling him on, and helping his steps. Anjou and Brittany attacked the Norman frontier from the south. Phillip entered Poitou where all men rallied to his banner. John lay still at Rouen and made no sign, spending his days either in bed or at table.

Phillip soon saw that he could do better farther north and made ready to reach the heart of John's power in Normandy.

THE ENVIRONS
 OF
 CHATEAU CHILLARD

From Phidias & Dore.

- A small island, on which King Richard placed an octagonal work, with bridge
 1. The de-Pont, seen from the river, and called Petit Anchoy.
 2. Marsh or lake, formed by obstruction of
 3. The phoson on which Philip Augustus entrenched himself.
 4. A triple stockade.

The great fortress of Château Gaillard lay across his path it must first fall before Rouen could be reached

The Normans were ever great castle builders, whether in England or in Normandy At first they were content with a great donjon or hall, in and about which they lived when at home, and which they fortified as strongly as they might Gradually, as their needs grew and skill increased, they added outworks, took advantage of strong positions, and developed complete fortifications Of these the Château Gaillard is a splendid specimen: the greatest monument—greater even than his eastern exploits—of the genius of Richard He intended it to be the defence of Normandy, and a standing menace to France From it Normans should ever go forth, past it no Frenchman might dare to push. and had not John been a shiftless coward, no Frenchman could then have entered into it. About eight leagues above Rouen, as the crow flies, the Seine makes a great sweep to the north like a horseshoe, enclosing the peninsula of Bernières. At the head of the curve, on the right bank, the river has washed the chalk hills into cliffs of a good height, broken by a level valley about a mile across, through which a little river, after losing its way in a long swamp, at last falls into the Seine. Here on the right bank a spur of chalk runs down from the high downs, scarped on one side by the Seine, and very steep and rough on the other side, where it descends towards the swamp steep also and difficult is its lower end or point Beneath it, between the marsh and the Seine, lies the village of Little Andelys some two miles up the valley stands the small town of Great Andelys. Through this town the road from France into Normandy dropped down upon the Seine From the hill-side the eye wanders over the broad flat peninsula of Bernières on the left bank of the river: at your foot lies a little island, very handy for a bridge On the chalk spur, overhanging the Seine, where there is scarcely room for a road to pass between cliff and river, stands the famous fortress, the 'gay castle' At the very point of the tongue of land rises the donjon<sup>1</sup> built with marvellous art it is defended impreg- nably on three sides by natural rock, while a narrow footway from Little Andelys winds up to a postern in the donjon's walls. The spur broadens as it passes towards the main high land, broadens and rises gradually, so that half a mile back from the point one quite looks down on the fortress. This, then, was clearly the dangerous side, and here defences were multiplied—too much so as the event proved. For from the nature of the ground, each outer work when taken commanded the next, which lay somewhat lower. The whole fortress may be described as something like a ship in form, as it lies on the spur the lowest and narrowest end was nearly filled by the donjon, while at the upper end, where it looked towards the higher level land, was built a triangular fort. Down on the river level Little Andelys was built and slightly fortified so also was the island on the Seine, so also the roadway under the castle. The Seine was blocked by a stockade, intended to keep French boats from dropping down on Andelys.

This was the elaborate system of defences which protected the heart of King Richard's possession, the city of Rouen, from all attack by way of the river.

When Philip Augustus in the autumn of 1203 came down on the Norman frontier, having full command of the Upper Seine, he had no difficulty in crossing over to the peninsula of Bernières. This he found entirely undefended—King John's first great blunder. Here, unmolested, he drew his lines across from river to river thus beginning the investment of the place. In the castle lay Roger de Lacy Constable of Chester with the flower of King John's troops not many but right gallant men. Next, the river stockade was broken through, and the King's ships came down and were formed into a bridge just below the island a bridge with towers high enough to command the châtelet or fortress on the island. John sent a force to relieve <sup>1</sup> See the article Châteaux, in M. Viollet le Duc's splendid Dictionnaire de l'Architecture (Paris, France), to which I am much indebted. I take this opportunity of thanking him warmly for his kindness in allowing me to reproduce his two admirable plans of Château Gaillard.

CHATEAU - GAILLARD.

- 1 Neck of Plateau, held by Philip Augustus.
- 2 Foreworks of Castle.
- 3 Well
- 4 Buildings.
- 5 Main Entrance.
- 6 Counterscarp
- 7 Moat.
- 8 Keep
- 9 Escarpment.
- 10 Postern.
- 11 Flanking Towers.
- 12 Outer Tower and Wall.
- 13 Stockade.

the place, but he did not venture out in person, and the attempt failed. After this single effort he left Philip to take the castle at his leisure. The palisade of the châtelet was burnt, and Philip occupied the island. Now came the horrid spectacle of twelve hundred poor creatures, non-combatants, men, women, children, thrust out from Little Andelys and the island, and left to perish of hunger between the chalk rocks and the river. If they turned towards Andelys, the English refused them entrance; if towards the river, the French forbade them to pass. When half had perished, Philip Augustus riding by, cast an eye of pity on the remnant, he bade his men give them bread, and let them pass through his lines in peace. Soon after the fall of the châtelet Little Andelys was forced to yield, for the English were too few to defend the town. And now Philip had firm hold of everything below the castle. But he saw clearly that, to succeed, he must also attack from the castle above; he therefore moved the bulk of his force to the neck of the slope just over Château Gaillard, where the spur of land joins on to the mainland. Here he drew two lines, one on either side of his camp, across the shoulder of the hill, and built a wooden tower, and other needful buildings. He also set a force to guard the entry to the castle from the side of Little Andelys, and the blockade was complete. But now came against him a new and dangerous foe. Two churchmen rode into his camp, with a summons from the Pope. The Kings were ordered to suspend their struggle, and submit the points at issue to the judgment of the Church, under pain of Interdict. But Philip was already<sup>1</sup> prepared for this papal assumption. Eleven great nobles, under their seals, had given him written promise to defend him against Pope or Cardinal, and these documents were shown to Innocent. The Pope saw he had gone too far; and his second letter is in humorous contrast with his first—the first so haughty, the second so affectionate, almost cringing—in the holy interests of peace.

This storm outridden, the siege went on as before. About this time Philip's skirmishers and foraging parties prowling about knocked at the gates of Rouen, the wretched King within woke from his slumbers and luxury—but not to fight. He fled into England, leaving Normandy to its fate. As he passed out of Rouen gates, that city ceased to be the centre of the Anglo-Norman power. John's follies and reverses and the loss of Normandy at last restored to England her proper national position.

<sup>1</sup> The engagement made by Eudes of Burgundy is dated July 1203

In February, 1204 the triangular fortress at the eastern end of the castle was assaulted and taken next the outworks of the castle itself fell each point yielding good shelter as the French pushed on, until at last, on March 6 1204 after a five months siege, the great tower the last defence, was given up into Philip's hands. It is said, and it illustrates the characters of feudal warfare, that before the actual assault of the place only four English knights had been slain. There were but one hundred and eighty fighting men left in Château Gaillard when Philip entered it.

This one success decided all. The Norman towns knew that there was no help from John, and that if Château Gaillard could not withstand him no other stronghold could do so. The rest of Philip's march was a continual triumph. Falaise resisted strong as it was, only seven days. Caen Bayeux, Lisieux, threw open their gates. Guy de Thouars, Governor of Brittany, took Mont St. Michel and Avranches, and then joined Philip at Caen. Thence the French King moved on to Rouen. Even there with a braver prince, resistance had been possible for Rouen was strong and hated the French. But what could be done for such a creature as King John? The city capitulated on honourable terms, and Normandy at last became a part of the kingdom of France. Brittany had already given herself up to the avenger of Arthur. For a while the Normans were restless under the stranger as they deemed the French King. As however Philip was as wise in peace as he was skilful in war Normandy before long became thoroughly reconciled to her new lord.

Poitou, Touraine, and Anjou fell at the conqueror's feet. Thouars and Niort held out for John, Rochelle on the coast alone gave him entry into France.

The campaign of 1203, 1204, was of vast use to the royal power. The King with one hand strangled the Normans, while with the other he pushed back the haughty and menacing Pope. All the country folk, wherever he passed, declared for him, he rose far above all rivalry, and made the kingdom of France real in the eyes of men. Not content with these material gains, he summoned King John to undergo the judgment of his peers in the matter of Prince Arthur. But the 'King of England' could not permit the 'Duke of Normandy' to appear. John was willing to retain his substantial advantages where he was King, and to let judgment go by default where he was vassal. So he was declared guilty of murder and treason with great solemnity, deposed from all his fiefs, and condemned to death. Thus King Philip gave his conquests the appearance of legal right, and retained a plea for pushing his advantages still further, if occasion served. Though it is not known what peers met to give this judgment, from this time the 'twelve Peers of France' seem to emerge more clearly out of the mist of time. Probably those sturdy chieftains, who, like Eudes of Burgundy, promised under their hand and seal to stand by the King against the terrors of a Papal war, formed the Court of Peers. They were certain, when they had given such a proof of confidence and devotion, to take care that Philip's interests suffered no harm. Faithful to the strong feeling, which has been already noticed, that the French Court was the rightful successor of that of Charles the Great, the number twelve had been chosen, six laymen, six ecclesiastics. The great vassals of the realm were thus grouped round the royal power, and lent it fresh dignity, while it also gave a sanction of right and justice to its acts.

III. THE PROVENÇAL CRUSADE.

We must now turn aside, and trace the course of events in Provence, where a horrible war waged under pretext of religion prepared the way for the union of the hitherto independent Southerners to the kingdom of France. Philip Augustus stood aloof from this struggle, yet he and his reaped the fruits of it, although the end did not come in his day.

As far back as the year 1181 Henry of Clairvaux, a cardinal and bishop of Albano had been sent by Pope Alexander III into Languedoc to convert the Albigensians, and entered the territories of the Viscount of Beziers at the head of a body of fanatics. The Church was on the dark path along which the Crusades had begun to force her — she called for the strong arm of violence and oppression, with which to crush the errors which had taken hold on the Southern mind. In that warm land, where poetry and love, art and architecture, had their home, freedom of opinion and speculation were natural. Above all, the movement of the century was hostile to the claims of the priesthood. All the heretics of Provence, whatever their views, agreed in this — and this, above all, alarmed Rome.

It is unfortunate that our knowledge of the religious and intellectual movement of Provence is derived entirely from the writings of their bitterest enemies, the monks. Their prejudices on the one hand, and the equal prejudices of writers eager to do honour to the forerunners of Protestantism on the other have made it hard to get at the truth. Still, in the account of Peter the Monk of Vaux Cernay, a bitter foe to the sectaries, we may discern some of the lines of truth. It appears that we must draw a clear distinction between the Albigenses and the Waldenses. The former whose headquarters were at Toulouse were rather a philosophical than a religious sect. In the year 1167 they had held a sort of council at Toulouse, to which deputies came even from Asia, indicating even then a formid able organisation They had their own bishops. They were in fact the descendants of the Manicheans<sup>1</sup>, some of whom had been burnt nearly a century back at Orleans Their opinions are to us exceedingly dim and uncertain; but sure it is that they rejected Rome, her sacraments, images, purgatory, priests They divided their followers into the 'perfect' and the 'believers' the 'perfect man' had passed through a spiritual baptism, and was then devoted to a life of the utmost severity. This world to him was the work of an evil spirit, was hell itself; and he would do nothing which might enlarge hell's borders. therefore death was his greatest blessing, and marriage a cursed indulgence absolutely forbidden him. The old doctrine of a dualism, a good and a bad magical power, took practical form in the lives of these stoical philosophers The 'believers' were not tied to so ascetic a life they might live in the world, yet doing so as those who hoped some day to be permitted to enter into the ranks of the 'perfect.' Their life is said to have been purer than that of either the clergy and laity of the Church

The Waldenses, on the other hand, had their headquarters at Lyons, and belonged to the mountains, not to the warm plains. Theirs was essentially a religious not a philosophical movement, though the political consequences of their belief, if carried out, would have been serious enough.

These 'poor men of Lyons' were of an apostolical spirit. They even thought that they were bound to wear wooden shoes, sabots, 'after the manner of the Apostles<sup>2</sup>.' They forbade all swearing, all slaying of man; and they held that any 'insabbattatus' might break the bread of Communion, thereby denying the whole priestly power. They were eager to teach and to spread the Bible, while the Albigenses were rather desirous of lessening the influence of the Scriptures, they translated it into the vulgar tongue, and preached from it, and read it zealously. Their fundamental doctrine was that of the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit. Whoso had that was favoured of God, no other orders or divisions of society were of any importance. And thus their tenets led directly to socialism, and struck hard at the position of priest and baron. Their life was one of the utmost purity and simplicity, even their opponents allow so much.

<sup>1</sup> For the Manichean tenets, see Mosheim, Eccles Hist. Cent III, part 2, ch 5

<sup>2</sup> Hence their name of Insabbattati.

The Crusade which smote them in passing, was really directed against the greater and Manichean movement of Toulouse and Beziers.

The South of France stood absolutely apart, not only from the North, but also from the tendencies of medieval Christendom. It was remarked with horror that the Albigensians did not persecute and that even the Jews in Southern Gaul had every civil right—could hold lands—could take office—had their synagogues and their schools, took the lead in the study of medicine—were bold and bright guides on the difficult paths of philosophy. To the South also Western Europe owed both Medicine and Aristotle—two powers often opposed to Rome. Moreover the South had never really accepted feudalism and now it seemed not impossible that she would begin a municipal and democratic movement, which might altogether imperil the dominion of the Church. Was it not time to move? Was not a Crusade needed? Was it not well that the Church hand in hand with feudal France, should pour down on and crush a land so full of strange opinions? Once more Rome allied herself with barbarism against civilisation, and the mailed form of the northern knight, side by side with the pitiless priest, entered in to destroy in the name of Christ.

Innocent III at last was roused to action. He sent into Languedoc his legates, two Cistercian monks and over them he placed Arnold of Amaury abbot of Citeaux, the most capable instrument in the world for his purposes. He was ambitious sincere, fanatical—he had the virtues of a monk, and more than his vices. The zeal of Jehu filled his heart and took, like Jehu's, the form of pitiless bloodshed. Yet at the outset his mission failed. The lay powers of the South offered no help the monks preached, and men laughed. The Bishop of Toulouse was lukewarm: he was deposed, and Fulk or Folquet, once a brilliant troubadour and gallant, now a fanatical and false monk, was established in his room. His part in the coming struggle is a well-marked and a shameful one.

The legates, disgusted with their work, were sadly returning towards Italy, when, by chance, near Montpellier they fell in with the Bishop of Osma and one of his Canons, who were making their way home to Spain from Rome. These succoured the fainting Cistercians, turning aside from their journey to help them. The mission began anew, with fresh vigour and more success. That Canon of Osma was Domenico: the world-famous founder of the order which bears his name, the true parent of the Inquisition<sup>1</sup>.

Things went on swiftly towards bloodshed. In 1207 Raymond of Toulouse was excommunicated by the Pope: though he professed submission, he showed no energy in persecution, there arose a quarrel between him and the legate, and in the course of it one of the count's retainers stabbed the churchman, and fled. The murder of the legate, known in Roman hagiology as St Peter Martyr, became one of the favourite subjects for the skill of the painter. It does not seem that Raymond was personally in the least to blame for this murder. None the less did vengeance fall on him. Innocent, who had before appealed to the sword, now redoubled his efforts, Raymond, already excommunicated, was cursed anew, pardons and indulgences, and all the apparatus of an Eastern Crusade, were brought out; the dangerous and disastrous journey to Palestine, of which men were now weary, gave place to an attack on the pleasant fields and cities of the South —no sea to cross, no deserts or treacherous Greeks to face, no myriads of Saracens, but a land to be conquered, far richer in spoil than the Holy Land, with spiritual advantages just as great, and opportunities for proWess, rapine, cruelty, bloodshed, enough to please the most exacting

<sup>1</sup> 'Un immense anathème pèse sur la tête de ce moine, qui passe pour le génie de l'Inquisition incarné. Doménique pourtant était né avec une âme tendre, avec l'amour de Dieu et des hommes' —Martin, Hist. des Français, tom. 4, p. 25

Raymond was completely cowed. He made submission, refused to listen to the voice of his gallant nephew Roger Viscount of Beziers, and went home. Weak and undecided, he tried to ward off destruction by half measures and by missions of prelates to Rome, while he allowed the outpost of his situation Beziers, to perish unassisted.

Frenchmen Normans, Burgundians, and others, men of Poitou and Auvergne Aquitanians and Gascons, were gathered together to destroy the South. Raymond himself was constrained to join the invading army and to act as its leader. Beziers was taken by assault, every soul in it was murdered, the city burnt. There it was that the Abbot of Cîteaux is said by one of his brethren, a contemporary to have made that monstrous answer to one who asked him how to distinguish heretic from orthodox, Kill them all God will know His own. And they did so.

After giving this example of the work before them, they passed on to Carcassonne, where Roger the viscount lay. Peter of Aragon, the viscount's feudal superior came and tried to make terms for his vassal but in vain. The stern implacable churchmen offered such terms as Roger could not accept, and the siege went on. With incredible falseness—'no faith with heretics—the besiegers swore that if he would enter the camp to treat for a capitulation he should be let go safe and sound. He went, was seized and made prisoner and died soon after—men said of poison. So ended the first period of the war and with it the noblest character it produced. The territory and title were given to Simon of Montfort, who became thenceforth the secular arm of the Crusade. The great lords of the South all gave in the forty days service of the barons was over and the crusading army melted away.

It is said that Innocent III was touched by the horrors of the sack of Beziers and was not desirous of pushing Raymond of Toulouse too far. But matters had passed out of his hands: the legate Theodicus (who had succeeded Milo), the abbot of Citeaux, Arnold of Amaury, and Simon of Montfort, were all eager to push on their advantages. Bishop Folquet, with the zeal of an evil spirit, ever stirred them up to act and Raymond did but humiliate himself in vain. The terms offered him by the Church were so monstrous, that they roused even him to vigour. The Count of Foix, and the chief lords of the northern slopes of the Pyrenees rose in arms, and the war began again. But the gallant young Viscount of Beziers was dead, and the chivalric Peter of Aragon, who would gladly have defended the independence of his vassals, was called away to resist a grand invasion of African Moors, who threatened to avenge on Christian Spain the attacks that Christendom had long ago made on Palestine.

Early in 1211 Simon was ready to attack the princes of the South. In 1210 he had reduced sundry outlying castles in the Beziers district he now moved onwards towards Toulouse. In that city Folquet raised a Catholic party, and the nobles enrolled themselves in a league against him. Like the towns of Italy, the city was torn between a 'white' and a 'black' faction. At last the bishop's followers were driven out of the city, and joined the invaders. These were not only Frenchmen, but Germans and Belgians, under the Duke of Austria, and the Counts of Mons and Juliers. But the brave Count of Foix routed them, and the peasantry destroyed their scattered fragments. Still the main body advanced, and appeared before Toulouse. Then the brethren of the white faction awoke to the thought that their city was dearer to them than the dominations of strangers could be; and they broke away from Bishop Folquet and made peace with their fellow-citizens. For that year the invaders did nothing. Their forty days' service elapsed, the place showed no signs of feebleness, and in the autumn all was once more quiet.

In 1212 Montfort defeated his foes, and busied himself in reducing all the outlying territories which might possibly bring help to Toulouse, even the Agenois, a district not troubled with Albigenses, was ravaged and its fortresses rased. Raymon<sup>d</sup> saw that nothing remained but Montauban and Toulouse, and fled for safety to Peter of Aragon.

Then the invaders fell on the spoil. To every man a portion—the Southern sees were filled by shameless Northern bishops, the furious Arnold made himself Archbishop of Narbonne, the Abbot of Vaux Cernay became Bishop of Carcassonne, and so forth—the fiefs of the South were distributed among the barons and knights of the North. The South received now what it had never before had—a completely feudal form—the whole of its special characteristics were trampled down, its influence on the growth of the human mind and of social life was extinguished. But now the great invasion of the Moors was crushed (A.D. 1212) in a tremendous battle, and Peter of Aragon was free to undertake the affairs of his ruined vassals. He sent to Rome a full account of the doings of the Crusaders. Innocent III was startled, and expressed regret for the evils he had caused. None the less did the persecutors push on their advantages—they succeeded in representing their case to the Pope in such a light that he changed his tone and bade them finish as they had begun. Then Peter crossed the Pyrenees with a large army, and all the oppressed South rose with joy. They attacked Muret, the garrison of which place threatened Toulouse. Hither Montfort hastened, and France measured strength with Spain. The Spaniards the more numerous but the less disciplined, were defeated, and Peter perished with the flower of his troops. Thus ended in failure the attempt to drive the strong man out. Montfort pushed the advantage he had thus gained, till nearly all the South was under his feet. The cities that still stood submitted humbly to the Legate, promising to abide by the decision of Rome. Raymond took up his abode in a private house till the coming Council of Lateran should decide his fate. By 1215 Simon held almost all the South as 'prince and monarch of the land. And thus ended the second period of the war.

In November 1215 met the great Lateran Council, at which both Domenic and Francis of Assisi appeared—a fact which by itself marks it as an epoch in the history of the Christian religion. To us its interest centres in the cry of the oppressed South. There was no reticence; one plain-spoken knight of Beziers challenged the Pope to meet him at God's judgment seat, unless he gave back to the son of Raymond of Toulouse his father's lands. Nevertheless the voice of the oppressed, and the soft cry of human feeling could not prevail. Though the Pope, it is said, was touched by the appeal of the younger Raymond, the Crusaders still held their own. Simon won for himself all the heritage of the house of Toulouse.

Next spring Simon made splendid progress through admiring France, where he was regarded as God's hero, the new David, the Judas Maccabaeus of the Church, at Paris he did homage to wary Philip for his conquests. Then he returned, acknowledged lord of all the South, to the desolated land whose beauty he had destroyed, whose cities were in ruins, whose chivalry was scattered, whose arts and wealth had been pillaged, the miserable wreck of a noble land.

Meanwhile the two Raymonds, father and son, trusting to the encouragement given them by the Pope, made ready to recover their inheritance. The tide turned. Discord had arisen between Simon and Amaury. The younger count attacked Beaucaire the older entered Aragon, and thence returned with an army. Simon hastened to relieve Beaucaire, but the younger Raymond, who held the town and was attacking the castle, defended himself with success, and De Montfort for the first time saw his fortunes ebb. The place fell, and Simon hastened back to Toulouse, where matters were already critical. The citizens, learning that in his great anger he was determined to destroy them, barricaded their streets, and stood on the defensive. As, however, many of their citizens were in his hands, and he threatened to kill them all, the city yielded. He destroyed the better houses, the towers, the gates, then, having as he thought made the place harmless, set out to attack the Count of Foix. But, directly he was gone, the heroic city rose from the dust, and called back her old prince. In 1217 he re-his way into the place. The towers and walls rose speedily all the South hastening to help nothing could exceed the joy of the people, unless it was their hatred of the French oppressor. In vain did De Montfort attack the city with all his skill and force after a siege of nine months he was killed by a stone from a machine on the walls, that lucky blow restored the South to liberty. In vain did Philip of France throw his weight into the Northern scale, by sending his son Louis with the Duke of Brittany and a strong army to reinforce Amaury Simon's son. The oppressors were everywhere foiled, in vain did the new Pope Honorius III hound men on to another Crusade in vain did Amaury offer his estates to King Philip.

The Northern invasion failed the South however was weakened, the house of Toulouse much reduced things grew ready for that absorption into France which would one day take place. For the time the hand of the persecutor was stayed not till twelve years later was the quarrel finally fought out (A.D. 1229) then the house of Toulouse fell for ever.

IV THE DAY OF BOUVINES. (Aug 29, 1214)

Philip Augustus, meanwhile, looked on in quiet, well pleased at the troubles of the South, which weakened those great and independent houses which stood between him and the advancement of his kingdom beyond the Loire. But now fresh risks began. The feudal lords grew uneasy at the steady growth of royal power the Count of Flanders, the Count of Boulogne and others, felt themselves in danger. King John, though the barons hated him heartily was also Philip's foe and when Otho King of Germany in the low ebb of his fortunes, crossed over to England and joined his uncle the King the hopes of the feudal party began to rise. Still more did they rise when Philip of Swabia, Otho's rival, was killed and Otho came to be recognised on all hands as Emperor. Now however the dark shadow of a Papal intervention came on. In 1208 England was put under Interdict, and in the next year John was excom municated Otho also, by the very fact of being Emperor, after having been the Pope's protégé became his bitter foe, and was in his turn excommunicated in 1210, while Frederick II was set up against him

Philip, wary and clear-sighted, now came forward as the Pope's champion, hoping thereby to crush King John, and perhaps to possess himself of England. He took the trouble once more to bring forward poor Ingeborg, his Danish wife, and to display her with all outward honour as his wife, thus hoping to shew the Church how ready he was to do her bidding. In 1213, he called an assembly of his barons at Soissons, to which Ferrand of Flanders refused to come, a defiance which the King for the moment overlooked. For he was eager to attack England he gathered an army near Boulogne, and all was ready, when he learnt with amazement and anger that Pandulf the Legate had induced King John to submit to the Roman See, to make ample reparation to the bishops of his realm, to place his kingdom in the Pope's hands, and to receive it back from him as a fief of the Papal Empire, with the guarantee of that security which such vassaldom was supposed to give. After this great success, Pandulf returned to Boulogne and set himself to appease and amuse the French King. It was clear he could not allow him now to cross into England, he therefore pointed out to him the advantages of an attack on Flanders, in order to avenge the slight which Ferrand had put on him. His barons, remembering what riches lay stored in Flemish cities, were content to change their course. The fleet, which had been intended to carry them over to the English coast, was sent round to the Scheldt, and Philip entered Flanders. The fleet took first Gravelines, then Dinnic, at that time the port of Bruges.

While this rich city was occupying their attention, the ships were attacked by the Earl of Salisbury and Renaud of Boulogne half were taken or destroyed, the remainder blockaded in port. In vain did Philip hasten up, he could do no more than the blockaded vessels to save them from the enemies. He consoled himself by pillaging and burning the rich Flemish towns, and towards winter he retired to Paris.

Next spring (A.D. 1214) the war took larger form. Throughout the winter Ferrand of Flanders and Renaud of Boulogne had busied themselves in Lorraine, and stirred up war. Otho and John were names which gave a national appearance to the coalition, but it was really the war of the aristocracy against the royal power, and Philip was justly uneasy as to the fidelity even of the barons round his person, though in proof they showed themselves trusty and true. Though the underlying contest was between feudalism and royalty on the surface the combinations wear a curious resemblance to those of later times and of very different real conditions. We have the Kings of England and France and the Emperor of Germany contending in Flanders. The externals of the struggle might have suited a much later age. Philip Augustus had to defend himself on two sides. He had to resist King John, who threatened Poitou and Otho who was preparing to enter Flanders. To watch the former he sent his son Louis, to face the latter he marched in person with all the strength he could muster. King John, who landed at La Rochelle and took Angers, retreated before the French, and left no mark on the campaign. But affairs in the North were very different. Otho with such Saxons and Brunswickers as would follow him—for he had but a poor following of Germans—entered Flanders, and encamped at Valenciennes. There rallied to him the barons of Flanders, and the communes of the cities, the warlike nobles of Holland, the gallant Lorrainers, and a good show of mercenaries under Hugh of Boves and lastly a body of English knights and bowmen under the Earl of Salisbury. On the other hand, King Philip had with him the Duke of Burgundy the Count of Saint Pol, and the Viscount of Melun with their men, representatives of high feudalism. Then there was the most notable knight of the time, William des Barres, and great store of other good knights round the King. Then we must count up the churchmen, who mustered in some force two of whom, Goerin, Bishop of

Senlis, and the Bishop of Beauvais with his mace<sup>1</sup>, did doughty deeds of war, and lastly came the Communes of many northern towns and abbeys, which sent their militia, and contributed not a little to support the fortunes of the King

Philip did not await them within his borders, but pressed forwards, 'ravaging royally' as he went, attended by the prayers and blessings of the Church. His chaplain, William the Breton, has left us a full account of the campaign, in which he was present throughout. When the two armies drew near to one another, not far from Tournay, the French barons would not let Philip advance farther, and the King, against his will, began to retire. The same day Otho moved forward, the French not knowing it, and, before the day was far spent, there was but a hill between the two armies. The King's men, in the heat of the day, came down to Bouvines on the river Marque, not far south of Tournay, and, while his forces slowly defiled across the bridge, Philip lay down to rest awhile under an ash-tree, beside a little chapel. Here tidings came that his rear was hard pressed by Otho, who thought to fall on the French army while cut in two by the river, and to crush the rear before the van could come back to help. Philip at once sent men to hasten back the foremost in the retreat, and with them the sacred Oriflamme, which had early crossed the bridge. He himself entered the chapel and uttered a brief prayer, then spoke cheerily to his knights, as a King who had faith in God and in himself; lastly, with a glad countenance, 'as one who went to wedding or to feast,' rode forward to meet his foe. The English held the right wing of the allied army, the Emperor the centre, having with him a kind of Italian car<sup>2</sup>, on which was raised his standard of war, a golden eagle on a dragon's back; the Count of Flanders the left; while the brave Bishop of Senlis acted as marshal to the French host, and spread their scanty line out thinly, so as to make fair front to their enemy till those who had crossed the bridge could return. Over against the Flemings were the Duke of Burgundy, the Count of Saint Pol, the militia of St. Medard's Abbey in Soissons. The King held the middle battle, as was fitting on his left were the Counts of Dreux and Ponthieu behind the King himself stood his good chaplain, William the Breton, with another clerk chanting psalms the battle through.

<sup>1</sup> With his mace, because he held that a churchman should never shed blood. So he killed his antagonist, if he could, by breaking his head.

<sup>2</sup> Like the Carroccio of the Italian armies

The vassals of St. Medard of Soissons opened fight charging down on the Flemish chivalry gallantly but in vain. What could these ill-armed citizens do? The knights, however deigned to support them, and the battle soon became general. Then the battle of the chivalry on either side raged greatly though without decisive results. The young knights as at a tourney cried to each other to remember their ladies. The Count of Saint Pol did wonders he had sworn that he would show the King whether he were a traitor or no. After three hours of confusion, Ferrand, Count of Flanders, was beaten down and taken prisoner and the left wing of the confederates was crushed. Meanwhile the communal militia came hastily back over the bridge, in good spirits—their will was hearty though their strength was small and every hour the French battle gained in weight. The German knights pierced through to the French King unhorsed him, and went nigh to kill him. Then arose a cry of need and William des Barres, hearing it afar left hold of Otho—for he had in his turn penetrated to the heart of the German army and had seized the Emperor—and returned to rescue the King. Up came the communal troops at the same time, and Philip was saved. From this moment the battle went for the French. Otho's horse, wounded, and mad with pain, galloped with his rider off the field nor did Otho care to return. Philip pressed on, shewing himself a good knight and noble king and the resistance began to melt away. Before long the Dukes of Brabant and Limburg and all the centre, took to flight. There remained only the right wing where were Renaud of Boulogne and the English. These finally gave way. The English were routed chiefly by the fierce Bishop of Beauvais, who laid about him mightily with his mace, and felled the Earl of Salisbury like an ox Renaud, who had been the first to stir up strife the winter before, was the last to lay down arms. the field was won ere night. In the hands of the victors were Ferrand, Renaud, the Earl of Salisbury, and many other men of name. The King distributed these among his chief supporters, that they might enrich themselves with good ransom, some he handed over to the cities, Ferrand, who had defied and insulted him, he took with him as a prisoner to Paris.

So ended the battle of Bouvines, the first real French victory. It roused the national spirit as nothing else could have roused it, it was the nation's first taste of glory, dear above all things to the French heart. The clergy and common folk welcomed the King with transports of joy, the march back to Paris was a triumph; the citizens poured out, the University came forth to do him honour. The Communes had right good reason to be proud of their share of the war. They had only broken themselves against the iron-mailed chivalry of Flanders and Germany, yet they had done it gallantly, had helped to rescue their King, had fought side by side with knights, above all, had been permitted to measure arms on equal terms with feudal lords and now the King had thanked them, and given them presents of noble prisoners, that they might have feudalism in their hands, and bring it down, and win good ransom from it. The battle somewhat broke the high spirit of the barons the lesser barons and churches grouped themselves round the King, the greater lords came to feel their weakness in the presence of royalty. Among the incidental consequences of the day of Bouvines was the ruin of Otho's ambition. He fled from the field into utter obscurity. He retired to the Hartz mountains, and there spent the remaining years of his life in private. King John, too, was utterly discredited by his share in the year's campaign. To it may partly be traced his humiliation before his barons, and the signing of the Great Charter in the following year at Runnymede.

Thus one great siege and one great battle, Château Gaillard in 1204 and Bouvines in 1214 raised the French monarchy far above its former self. The siege gave it a great preponderance in territorial weight, by securing Normandy and the west of France while Bouvines crushed the coalition of the barons and princes against Philip, and left him far the most renowned and powerful prince of Christendom. He had now little to do except to consolidate and hand down his high authority. The fortunes of royalty in France were made.

V TO THE DEATH OF KING PHILIP A.D. 1214-1233

For a brief time King Philip's mind was turned towards England. Soon after John's return from his disgraceful campaign in France, the barons compelled him to sign the Great Charter of English liberties (A.D. 1215). But John was not the man to stand loyally by any act he signed and broke faith. Innocent III, to whom he appealed, identified himself with the evildoer. He declared the Charter unlawful and evil and as supreme lord of England annulled it. The sympathies of the Church had passed from the oppressed to the oppressor—the Papacy was become a political rather than a religious institution. In this act Innocent may be said to have begun that great struggle between Rome and the proud Island, which has had so great an influence on the healthy growth of the political liberties of England.

The English barons would not yield to the Pope's dictation, and, finding themselves hard pressed, offered the crown of England to Louis of France, Philip's eldest son, whose wife, Blanche of Castile, was grand-daughter to Henry II and gave to Louis a kind of excuse for claiming the English throne. Under her ambitious influence the prince accepted the tempting offer and betook himself to England in 1216. The Legate brought to Philip letters from the Pope begging the king to forbid his son to invade England and vex his vassal John.

But Philip replied that the English kingdom was not, nor ever would be, vassal to St Peter, for that no King can give his kingdom to another without consent of his barons<sup>1</sup>. A notable declaration of Philip's high views as to the royal power, and also as to the importance of the independence of the barons. He delighted to call his own lords round him for counsel, and to listen to their advice, as he did before Bouvines, even when it differed from his own opinion. Still, though he protested against the Papal assumption, he did not care to make trouble with the Church, and he therefore acted prudently in the matter, interfering as little as possible, and that only under pressure from his vigorous daughter-in-law, Blanche of Castile.

When Louis reached England he was joined by nearly all the barons, and, for a little while, seemed to have good hopes of becoming King of England. But John died, and then the barons, having got rid of the tyrant they hated, deserted the banner of Louis, and rallied round King John's young son, Henry, for they naturally hoped that his minority would give them time and opportunity to strengthen themselves. Then they defeated the army of Louis at Lincoln, and shut him up in London, where the citizens had not abandoned his cause. The French relieving fleet, under Eustace the Monk, was met in the Channel by the hardy sailors of the Cinque Port towns, and utterly defeated. Eustace was taken and beheaded. Then Louis made the best terms he could, and returned to France. and Henry III reigned undisputed King.

This episode did not at all shake King Philip's ascendancy in France. He ruled peaceably and sagaciously over his people, avoiding all risks and quarrels now that he had all to lose, and cared not to win more. He lived much with the clergy, returning to the pious tendencies of his early life, and showing himself ready to support them in their attempts against heresy.

Even in persecution he was reluctant to take part, when it meant active warfare. The Roman Court tried hard and long to engage him in the new Albigensian crusade, he held aloof, and sent his son, and did but little in it. At last (in A.D. 1222) his health began to give way just as he seemed likely to yield to the Pope's wishes. Fever set in, against which his vigorous constitution struggled for ten months. In 1223 he could battle with it no longer and died. The will he left shews us how huge a fortune he had gathered, and how determined he was to buy for himself the goodwill of the Church and the blessings supposed to follow with it. He left large sums for religious purposes, specially with a view to the better furtherance of persecution thereby shewing himself in full harmony with his spiritual friends. The bulk of his wealth he left to his son, Louis and took care not to weaken the royal power by any dismemberment of the domains or any great apanages<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Matthew Paris

So passed away this great King who did more than any one had yet done for royalty in France. A great King but not at all a great man. Had he shewn more generous breadth of spirit, he might have taken rank among the greatest.

As we have drawn out the story of his reign we have noted the chief characteristics of his mind his coolness and patience no eager ambition or restlessness but an aim taken with a steady hand and a farseeing eye His ruling quality was pride a noble pride in being King and a firmness and dignity in asserting and fulfilling his ideal of the kingly place. But with him coolness was also coldness he was at no time a genial or friendly man. And with coldness went not unnaturally a want of generosity of character which sometimes descended into trickiness, cunning or deceit, as when he tried to get Pope Celestin to release him from his promise to King Richard or when he tempted away from the old King Henry II his undutiful sons. Such a man could well conceal his feelings, nurture secret anger, wait, dissembling fairly for occasions of requital, if not of revenge He was a great captain rather than a gallant soldier His nature was far from being cowardly, and he knew that a King's armour was good and sound, but he had none of that heat of courage which in those days made heroes, and which burnt so high in King Richard. He was eminent as an engineer in war his skill conduced greatly to the capture of Château Gaillard, he laboured strenuously to strengthen the fortifications of his chief cities In general he was fair-minded, and kinglike in his respect for justice It was noticed of him that he gave full compensation to those whose houses he destroyed when he fortified Paris, a stretch of just dealing hardly credible in those days His political sagacity was perhaps the most remarkable quality in his character He succeeded, even in very critical times, in keeping the greater lords faithful to his crown he took pleasure in and presided over their assemblies, he began the shadowy greatness of the Court of Peers, he passed successfully through the great peril of several trials of strength with the Pope, yielding where no political question was involved, as in the case of Ingeborg, but standing firm, defiantly firm, when the royal prerogative was attacked The greatest Pope of the century gave way before him He checked the pretensions of the spiritual tribunals, marking out clearly the relations of the barons and the Church; and he braved the threat of an interdict firmly and successfully, when he felt it his duty to coerce the Bishops of Orleans and Auxerre, who were minded to be contumacious before the royal power, he succeeded in making feudal privilege and power spring largely from himself He saw the importance of his cities, and encouraged their growth and independence, as we have seen at the battle of Bouvines Paris, his capital, he especially cherished; paved her chief streets, which up to that time had been common sewers, muddy, ill-smelling, and pestilential, he new-walled the town, giving it more room to grow, had good houses built, and set up excellent markets

<sup>1</sup> Apanage is the Low Lat. apanarium (ad panem), a provision for sustenance given to younger sons and charged on the estate. Cp. the German word Panierbrief.

Whether himself learned or not, he was fully aware of the uses of learning, he encouraged and expanded the University of Paris he loved the literature of his day, its romances of Alexander and Arthur, and Kalleman.

Religion of a kind was an element in his character—a religion that had no weakness in it. His cold nature allowed him to favour persecutions—they were not distasteful to him, and they kept Rome in good humour. Innocent was not likely to push a strong man hard, when that strong man was also vigorous in repressing Jew and heretic. On the other hand, Philip's religion mixed up throughout with his own interests, never overbore his cool judgment, or led him to pay deference to the Church, if she encroached on his prerogative.

In sum, the King's character though it falls far short of greatness, and though very deficient in those qualities which ensure our goodwill and affection, was in a remarkable degree fitted for the work he set before him,—the work of building up, stone by stone, the great edifice of Monarchy.

VL. LOUIS VIII A.D. 1223-1226

Louis the Eighth, Philip's son and successor was the husband of Blanche of Castile. What little vigour he displayed arose chiefly from her prompting and pushing as in the case of his brief kingship in England.

At his accession there was much joy and his barons signified the same by voting that they would prefer not to pay the interest of their debts, which were heavy, and due to Jews, and, that, as to the capital, they would defer its repayment to a distant date. There came, however a grave constitutional change, which much affected the nobles for the high officers of the King now began to sit with them in their court, counting as their equals in rank.

Louis VIII had two wars in his short reign—one in the south west, the other in the south-east. The former was small and successful—he conquered Lower Poitou, and even reduced Rochelle, the English King's doorway into France<sup>1</sup>. In 1226

<sup>1</sup> In the Huguenots time we find this important town again made the point at which the English entered into France. It was destined to be the last stronghold of French aristocracy and of the Huguenots.

Louis undertook the second of his wars, the Crusade, to which the Church incited him. With a great and well-appointed army he swept all before him down the Rhone till he reached Avignon. Here, as the proud city refused to let him pass through it in pomp of arms, he sat down for a long siege, although the city held not of him but of the Empire. The brave men of Avignon, ever turbulent and hot, made vigorous resistance, and fever spread through the King's camp. Still he went on, till at last the place treated for capitulation, and got terms which were not very severe. The campaign however was over, the forty days of feudal service were long gone by, and the King broke up in the autumn, and marched northwards, intending after winter to return and to crush the heretics by the capture of Toulouse. But the camp-fever was upon him and he sickened and died at Montpensier in Auvergne, leaving behind him a boy, Louis, aged only twelve years, and his noble widow, Blanche.

His will proved his feebleness, and how unlike he was to his father and his son; for he divided the domain, reconstructing great principedoms for his children, whose interests must infallibly before long be hostile to those of the crown. Thus he played into the hands of the barons, who were alarmed at the royal power, and eagerly looking for an opportunity to reduce it to its older form.

CHAPTER VIII

Louis IX called Saint Louis A.D. 1226-1270

I. THE KING'S YOUTH. A.D. 1226-1244

THE accession of Louis IX to the throne in 1226 was a critical moment for the French monarchy. Feudalism was thoroughly alarmed and on the watch for an occasion to recover lost ground. A child on the throne, ruled by a foreign mother, seemed to be their opportunity. The year before Count Peter of Dreux, the vigorous regent of Brittany, had made a treaty with England against the King, and, among other great barons on the move, those of Aquitaine joined the Regent, taking as their head Richard of Cornwall, the younger brother of Henry III of England. The young King and his mother had to struggle with one or another confederation of barons for sixteen years, from his accession down to the year 1242, when the feudal party finally gave up the contest, and recognised the complete superiority of the royal power.

The Queen made all haste to have her son crowned at Rheims. The summons to attend the coronation issued by the barons who had surrounded the death-bed of Louis VIII was disregarded by almost all the great lords of France. Philip Hurepel, the rough uncle of the boy, was there, some churchmen also, Enguerrand lord of Coucy, and the young Duke of Burgundy. John of Brienne, the soldier of fortune, the titular King of Jerusalem, who would one day become Emperor of Constantinople, was present—he was usually to be found at great ceremonies, wherever in fact he was likely to be treated with respect and kept at the cost of others, no one else of name appeared. Theobald of Champagne made as though he would have come, but Philip declared that he would openly charge him with being the poisoner of the late King,—and the Count of Champagne stood aloof. All the great barons of the West and South were absent. Henry III of England, the chief of them, hoped to wrest away all that Philip Augustus had conquered, the feudal barons thought to recover their independence. Blanche had nothing with which to oppose these formidable foes, save the innocence of her boy, the half-hearted support of a few barons, the good-will of the Papal Legate, and her own genius and gifts. With these she broke asunder every combination, secured Louis on the throne, imprinted on his mind that sense of religion and delicacy of conscience, that honesty of purpose and self-denial, that consciousness of what was due from him and to him, which made St Louis first among Kings. He alone combines the virtues of a churchman with those of a layman, in him alone the qualities which are usually fatal to kings turned to advantage. Royalty, which under the cold shrewd sway of Philip Augustus had made such great strides towards power, was warmed into higher life by the nobleness of St Louis. It captivated the heart and imagination of men, and grew strong by the display of softer qualities. The French nation, full of feeling at all times, was at this time deeply penetrated with religious sentiment. St. Louis, like other great men in other times, was the living expression of the aims of his age: in him chivalry received its crown, in him the fresh humanity of the time found its expression, and religion was illustrated and ennobled.

No sooner was he crowned than the barons, who had demanded the release of all noble prisoners as the price of their attendance at the coronation, and who, on being refused, had absented themselves, drew together, and made league against the queen-mother. Theobald of Champagne, Peter Mauclere<sup>1</sup>,

<sup>1</sup> So called from the ill he wrought to clerks. He was noted for his hatred of ecclesiastics.

the regent of Brittany Hugh of Lusignan, Count of La Marche Richard of Cornwall and, in a secret manner Raymond VII of Toulouse, took Enguerrand, lord of Concy a baron of high nobility and small lands, to be their head. They reckoned on being supported, if not led, by Henry III of England but then, as after that feeble prince failed them utterly. He had no force of character he was governed by favourites he was engaged in a constant and unsuccessful struggle against his own barons and people so that he must have felt that in joining the French barons he was fighting against his own side. Queen Blanche found means (it is said by plentiful gifts of money) to interest in her behalf Henry's earliest minister Hubert de Burgh. The true head of the league was Theobald of Champagne, but the Queen, by her powers of fascination, succeeded in detaching him from the barons party and both then and later he gave up his own interests for her sake. Although he had deserted them the barons met in force at Corbeil. Queen Blanche, who was at Orleans with her son, hastened towards Paris. When they reached Montleheri with a very scanty escort, they learnt that the barons were at Corbeil in great force, threatening the road to the capital. Thence the Queen sent messengers to Paris, begging help. The citizens with great willingness came forth in arms to bring them on their way. From Montleheri to Paris the road was filled with folk, armed or unarmed, who cried to our Lord to give the King long life and to defend him from his foes and so did He<sup>1</sup>. And thus the King came safely to Paris, none daring to withstand him, and was welcomed heartily by his devoted burghers, who from the time of their great benefactor Philip Augustus, had been warmly attached to the King's party. In this same year 1228 the magistrates of all communes took oath to defend the King and his friends against all comers.

A languid war went on till 1231 when the treaty of St. Aubin du Cormier gave the victory to Blanche. In that treaty we find the famous Hugh of Lusignan, Count of La Marche, reckoned among the King's men, and, consequently, Anjou and Saintonge regarded as his fiefs. The island of Oleron, on that coast, was ceded to him by Henry III. This treaty may be said to close the worst troubles of the King's minority. In 1234 Peter Mauclerc became his vassal, and was ever afterwards one of his most devoted followers. The war with the barons was now over, the young King having held his own with them, but there followed immediately (from 1231 to 1236) a similar struggle with some of the great feudal bishops, in which the firmness, skill, and prudence of Queen Blanche triumphed again, and the King learnt the more difficult lesson of standing up boldly against spiritual opposition, and of discerning between right and wrong, even when priestly vestments cloaked the evildoer. Even the Popes had, to a certain extent, interfered in favour of the feudal party. Honorius III had not been friendly to Blanche, nor was Gregory IX, who, in 1234, actually threatened the King with excommunication if he did not desist from his attempt to restrict clerical jurisdiction. But the Queen through her influence over the Legate disarmed the papal illwill, and pursued her course unimpeded, another lesson, doubtless, for the young Prince. During this period Theobald of Champagne became King of Navarre, he had sold to the crown Chartres, Blois, Sancerre, and Châteaudun. Philip Hurepel died. Peter Mauclerc ceased to be regent of Brittany. Time, the friend of the young, had worked silently in the King's favour.

<sup>1</sup> Joinville, Vie de S. Louis, chap. 2.

Meanwhile, the course of affairs in the South was equally fortunate. In 1229 the treaty of Meaux, ratified at Paris, brought to an end the long quarrel between France and Toulouse. Raymond VII, worn out with war, agreed to terms, which meant the gradual absorption of the South, and the King's rule over states, which then and for long after were regarded as completely foreign. The name of France was not applied to the South for three centuries to come. In this treaty Raymond bound himself to search out and punish heretics with fresh vigour, to take the cross in person, and to go over sea to fight the Saracen for four years. The King left him Toulouse, which, it was agreed, was to fall after his death to the King's brother, Alphonse, who should marry the count's daughter, if they died childless, then it should lapse to the King himself. He also ceded to the King all other his lands and domains on the French side of the Rhone (the right bank) while the possessions he held across the Rhone, 'in the Empire, were destined to pass, in 1274 into the hands of the Church by which means the Papacy obtained the Venaissin, a possession which it held till the French Revolution. In addition to these hard terms, the poor count had to fill the ditches and throw down the walls of thirty of his strong places, and of Toulouse herself to give up sundry towns as hostages, and to pay a heavy fine, half to the King half to the Church. For all that remained to him he did homage to the crown. Thus the whole Duchy of Narbonne came at once into the King's hands the house of Beziers was disinherited the county of Toulouse was secured to the royal house, with a prospect also of the eastern part of Guenne. Then at last the luckless duke was reconciled to the Church and France entered into possession of a land ruined and in tears, a land conquered, if not convinced. The South of France long suffered from these terrible wars long it deemed itself a captive, and struggled at times for freedom for centuries it retained its old nomenclature, not till the fourteenth century did the name of Languedoc appear nor was it spoken of as a part of France till near the period of the Reformation. It was, and is, a land apart its customs, dialect, the figures and faces of its inhabitants, all still shew signs of the old independence, though of its wealth, luxury, and learning little trace now remains.

The Inquisition, under the direction of the Dominican Friars, was established over the prostrate body of the exhausted South in the year 1233 in the joint interests of the French King and the Pope. The great monarchies, even in their rise began to lapse into tyranny We find even Frederick II the head of the Holy Roman Empire making this horrible engine of in These years passed in tolerable quietude, the King being busy regulating affairs, and keeping in order the churchmen of his realm. In 1238 he was appealed to for help by Baldwin II of Constantinople, and gave him much gold in return for which he received the Crown of Thorns (there was one already at St. Denis), which he accepted with marvellous devotion, and placed with great honour in his new Chapel<sup>1</sup> at Paris, a building which seems to express in its beauty of proportion, construction, and ornament, something of the exquisite harmony of the King's character.

While peace reigned in his land, terrible war was raging abroad. The great struggle between Gregory IX, the aged Pontiff and Frederick II of Germany the most brilliant of Emperors, splendid in his very vices, was at its height. Though the Tartars or Turks, a hideous race, who struck terror into every heart, were knocking at the Eastern gates of Europe the Pope would not relax his efforts to destroy the man who ought to be the bulwark of Christendom. Even the Moabites who, much divided among themselves, had suffered greatly from hordes of Mongols, sent ambassadors crying for help to France and England. But St. Louis did not stir either we will send these Tartars to Tartarus said he to his weeping mother or they shall send us to heaven with which pleasant dilemma he turned aside to other business. In England the Bishop of Winchester said in council Let them and the Saracens fight it out, till both are destroyed then will the Church fill all the earth and so England let them be the Pope smiled at the danger—'at any rate they will first destroy Frederick. The Emperor himself lingered in Italy, while the Germans, under orders sent by him, met and repulsed the Tartars on the Danube, and this great peril was averted.

The head of Christendom gave no credit to Frederick for this great service done by his Germans his energies, marvellous in an old man now drawing near to his hundredth year were strained to the utmost to destroy his foe. The Emperor was excommunicated, and therefore, according to Papal theory, deposed. The Pope cast about for a successor, and offered the imperial crown to Louis for his brother Robert of Artois. But the wise King was steadily neutral in this unholy strife, and at once refused the tempting bribe in terms which, if Matthew Paris<sup>1</sup> may be trusted, must have sounded strange and bitter to the Pontiff. He denied the Pope's right to depose a sovereign prince, who had no peer in Christendom, without proof of the accusations brought against him; if Frederick was to be judged and deposed, it must be by a General Council, he had ever regarded Frederick as innocent, and as his very good neighbour. Not content with this, the French King and his barons sent a friendly embassy to the Emperor, and continued to be on good terms with him. When Frederick in 1241 captured a ship-load of French prelates and others, on their way to Rome to a General Council, which had been convened for the purpose of sanctioning his deposition, Louis wrote the Emperor a firm letter threatening to declare war against him; and Frederick at once gave them their liberty. At a later period we find the King respecting Frederick's rights in the East, although by that time he had been excommunicated again after the Council of Lyons. So raged the war between the two heads of Christendom, to the detriment of all that was good. Gregory died in 1241. After nearly two years<sup>2</sup> Innocent IV succeeded him, and followed in his footsteps. The Papacy gave the house of Hohenstaufen neither peace nor respite, till it had soiled its hands in the blood of the last of the race (A D 1268).

<sup>1</sup> This is the Sainte Chapelle built to receive this dabbous relic.

In that same year of Gregory's death, 1241, Louis tried to make his brother Alphonse Lord of Poitou and Auvergne, the barons resisted, called in Henry III from England, and so roused the embers of old discontents. Hugh of Lusignan, <sup>1</sup> Matthew Paris, the chief historian of this period, wrote with a very strong bias against the Papacy, and in favour of the Kings of Europe. His speeches are therefore not to be trusted, although his narratives are worthy of credit.

<sup>2</sup> This interregnum alarmed the King, Matthew Paris tells us he threatened the Cardinals that he would establish a French Pope, according to the powers granted by St Clement to St Denis — Matthew Paris, p 532.

Count of La Marche defied Alphonse at Poitiers, renounced his homage and rode off on his war horse after setting fire to the house in which he had lodged. Henry III came, not indeed with a great army for the English barons refused to go, but with three hundred knights and thirty barrels of money, to pay for troops. But Louis shewed unexpected vigour. He gathered all the force he could and entered Poitou, occupying the strong places one after another. He was before Fontenay, when Henry sent knights to defy him. he took the place, and then, having reduced everything north of the Charente he came down to Taillebourg on that deep river purposing to cross by a narrow stone bridge there. He found the English King and the Count of La Marche on the other bank. they had not secured the bridge or the castle which commanded it and the French began at once to cross with all haste and to fall on the English. At first, however they were like to have been driven back, then the King himself seeing their need, passed over and came to the forefront of the battle and when the English saw that, they gave ground and retreated to Saintes, closely followed by the King's men. A second battle was hotly fought in the neighbourhood of that town, the English were overborne, and King Henry fled into Gascony. Then the Count of La Marche yielded himself to the King and was pardoned, with the loss of all the lands that King Louis had conquered. Henry III fell back on Bordeaux and spent in idleness the remainder of the money he had brought with him, and in 1243 made peace with Louis, who did not care to press the English King hard for he was his brother-in-law<sup>1</sup> and Louis himself like a multitude of his fighting men, was suffering grievously from camp-fever. Then Henry went back to England and landed at Portsmouth, 'with as much bravery as if he had conquered France. Louis returned sick to Paris.

At the same time Raymond VII made a last attempt to reassert the independence of the South. It was all in vain.

<sup>1</sup> Henry III had married in 1235 Eleanor the second daughter of Raymond Berenger and younger sister of Margaret, Queen of France.

Though the country rose willingly, no help from Spain or the Pyrenean barons came to him, Henry III was unfit and unable to help him. He saw his error, and hastened to make submission to the King, who, ever prudent and moderate, consented to receive him on the old terms of the treaty of Paris. Thus ended the last coalition of the barons against the King. And at the same time (A D 1244) the long and mournful persecution of the Albigenses closed with their final extinction. In the high gorges of the Pyrenees, on an almost impregnable rock, stood the Castle of Mont Segur (Mons Securus), last refuge of the persecuted. There a few proscribed nobles and knights, with about two hundred Albigenses and their Bishop, kept up a petty warfare with the plains below. They were attacked by the Bishop of Albi, and the French Seneschal of Carcassonne, and after a long and heroic resistance, were surprised by a body of mountaineers, who succeeded in climbing the rock by night. They then surrendered, on condition that any who retracted their opinions should be spared. But not one man or woman among them cared so to save his life, they were all shut up in a building made of palings and stakes, and burnt to death. Thus perished the last of the Albigenses, after thirty-five years of un pitying warfare, of nameless horrors. Manichean opinions thenceforth faded away, though they might still be traced in some parts of the South, and, later, in North Italy and on the Danube. Their day was past, and in the fifteenth century the last sparks of this fire, which once had threatened to kindle half Europe, were stamped out by the heel of the Ottoman invader.

Louis now proclaimed that as 'no man can serve two masters,' all barons holding fiefs under him and also under Henry of England, must choose one lord or other, and almost all chose to abandon their holdings under the King of England. Hereby the separation between France and England was made far more marked, and the wars that from this time raged between them became thoroughly national, although ancient claims and names were still used. Finally, in 1246, Charles of Anjou, the King's brother rode with five hundred knights into Provence and claimed his bride the Countess Beatrix. Raymond Berenger who would fain have married her to Raymond VII was lately dead, and the moment seemed fortunate to the harsh and cruel Frenchman, whose character formed so strange a contrast to his brother's. He carried off the heiress unopposed this was the true end of the separate political existence of Provence

II. THE KING'S FIRST CRUSADE, A.D 1245-1254

Meanwhile the King had been slowly preparing for the great act of his life the Crusade. In 1244 not long after his return from the south west, he was taken with so sharp an illness, that he was brought to utter weakness, and his attendants disputed whether he were dead or no but he rallied, and called for the cross and when the queen his mother heard that he had recovered speech, she showed as much joy as could be but when he told her he had taken the cross, she lamented as much as if she had seen him dead<sup>1</sup> After him his three brothers, Robert of Artois, Alphonse of Poitiers, Charles of Anjou, who was afterwards King of Sicily, also took the cross, together with a goodly company of barons and knights. Not content with these volunteers, the King by a pious fraud caught many more. For it was the custom to give each courtier a new robe at Christmas-tide<sup>2</sup> and on Christmas-eve 1245 the King bade all his court be present at early morning mass. At the chapel door each man received his new cloak, put it on and went in. At first all was dark but when day broke, each man saw on his neighbour's shoulder the cross which betokened the Crusading vow. Then they jested and laughed, seeing that their lord King had taken them piously preaching by deeds not by words. Afterwards, as they reflected that they could not decently throw down the sacred sign, their laughter became mixed with tears<sup>3</sup> for men were not then very eager to undertake the holy war

<sup>1</sup> Joinville, chap. 2.

<sup>2</sup> Whence Christmas Day came to be called the day of new clothes.

<sup>3</sup> Matthew Paris, p. 604.

In the year before, about the time of the King's illness, the Pope, escaping like a fugitive from the risks around him, took ship for Genoa, whence he proposed to go on to Citeaux in Burgundy. He knew that the King had agreed to visit the great abbey at the time of their chapter in 1244, and hoped, by his own influence and that of his faithful allies the monks, to entrap him into an unwary promise of support against the Emperor. So when King Louis came in state to the abbey gates he saw a long line of monks, some five hundred of them, filing forth from the porch of the abbey church, these all knelt before the King, beseeching him with pious tears and sobs to help the 'father of the faithful persecuted by a son of Satan' (so they described the Pope's attack on Frederick), and to receive him into his kingdom. The holy King, greatly affected, also knelt before the monks. yet, for all that, his prudence overcame his feelings, and he answered cautiously that he would defend the Church, as far as was just and proper, against any ill-doing of the Emperor, and would receive the Pope, if his nobles assented thereto. The barons however did not assent, and the Pope had to abandon his intention of holding a Council at Rheims, and to fix on Lyons as the most convenient spot, it being on the edge of the French kingdom. Lyons, which in Roman times had been, as we have seen, the heart and centre of the imperial system in Gaul, now lay on the border-line of two states, part in France, part in the Empire, divided by the Saone. The city was governed partly by the archbishop and canons, who warmly supported the Papal cause; and partly by a civic government, which, sympathising with and following the Lombard cities, also sided with the Church against the Empire. Thus the place was well suited for a council and here the Pope condemned and, with the sanction of the assembled prelates, again excommunicated the Emperor. the strife between them grew darker and more unyielding. Years before, Pope Gregory IX had preached a crusade against Frederick, bidding those who undertook it wear the cross-keys on their shoulder instead of the simple red cross. gladly would Innocent IV

now have turned aside the single-minded King from his Crusade in the East to one nearer home. But Louis was firm he was clear as to his duty in the East he was by no means clear as to the justice or wisdom of crushing the Emperor and so after warmly but vainly essaying to make peace between the combatants, he left them to fight out their differences, and went on quietly making ready for his departure.

One of his last acts, before going was to approve and give powers to a remarkable league of his barons. The lay aristocracy was jealous of the encroachments of the clergy they bound themselves to resist them in matters of jurisdiction, and to oppose the consequent levying by them of large sums of money from the people. They agreed that if any noble were unjustly excommunicated they would all in common neutralise the curse, so far as in them lay. The Pope answered the barons manifesto by a vigorous letter, and there the matter stood. He was not strong enough to push matters to extremes while he had other and heavier work on hand. It was a remarkable quarrel shewing how thoroughly the King and his barons had come to see that their interests were the same and how clearly the King was determined not to let fall from his hands into those of the clergy the administration of justice in his realm.

By the late acquisitions of the crown in Provence France had become at last possessed of a seaboard on the Mediterranean, and the King had dug at Algues Mortes<sup>1</sup> a canal and a harbour to serve him as a southern port. Hither he came in the summer of 1248 and hence he set sail, with much religious solemnity for Cyprus, the rendezvous of the expedition.

It was agreed that the Crusade should not be directed to the Holy Land in the first instance, but to Egypt. Partly it would seem, because the King was unwilling to interfere in the struggles of Pope and Emperor in which he must have been involved had he gone to Jerusalem. For Frederick was King of Sicily and Jerusalem and the Pope had already declared that he had forfeited his crown, and had named Henry of Lusignan as his successor. Frederick's officers and the Knights of the Temple were at open feud, and Louis would surely have been mixed up in their quarrels. And besides, Jerusalem was a heap of ruins, an open defenceless town, almost without an inhabitant, and the Christian cities on the coast seemed for the moment safe. For the Tartars had destroyed the power of the Sultan of Iconium, and Palestine lay untouched. Egypt, on the other hand, was the very heart of the Moslem power. The Sultan of Cairo was nominal lord of Palestine, and the road to Jerusalem certainly lay through 'Babylon,' as Cairo was then called. Therefore the King did wisely to strike at Egypt first—only that a blow struck at the heart of a great power should be struck promptly and hard.

<sup>1</sup> Aquae Mortuae, the stagnant waters.

After eight months at Cyprus, the good King set sail for the Egyptian coast. A storm dispersed the fleet, and delayed it a few days. At last, in June 1249, the King's ship sighted the low line of the coast and the town of Damietta, and saw the Sultan's cavalry, the Mamelukes, drawn up along the beach. With a vigour which brought its reward, the King, with all his army at his back, dashed ashore, drove back the enemy, and won firm footing on the land. The Egyptian Sultan was sick to death, discord reigned and distrust, it was a fortunate moment for the attack. The unbelievers were seized with panic, and abandoned Damietta without an effort—a city which was very strong and well-provisioned, and which had already shewn what it could do when besieged, having once stood out for fifteen months. Thus far all was well—the Crusaders had landed well, and had taken a most important city, which gave them harbourage and a starting-point. But now mistakes began, and the weak side of the King's character showed itself. He was no general; and underrated the value of time in war. Napoleon, criticising his action on a scene he knew well, said of him that if on the 8th of June 1249 Louis had pushed on, as the French did in the Revolution days, he would have been at Mansourah by the 12th—the Aschmun C...

have been dry the waters being at their lowest, he might have crossed at once, and so have reached Cairo before the end of June. In less than a month he could have conquered Egypt. But the King feared the rise of the Nile, and determined to remain till the river abated before crossing. Thus he wasted the first fruits of his campaign. Idleness, debauch, disease, the fiends which overtake those who delay in war revelled in his camp and, at the end of five months and a half when the King set forth, the traditions of success were broken, what little discipline there had been was gone, the actual force was weakened. The army took a month to advance sixty miles, and then sat down to build a causeway over the Aschmun branch which runs out of the Damietta arm of the Nile<sup>1</sup>. Here they wasted men, patience, and time in a mad attempt and, at last, after suffering from the Greek fire which the enemy discharged at their works, and from disease and want, they discovered a ford, by which they crossed over near the town of Mansourah. The Count of Artois, the King's brother the Templars, and the Earl of Salisbury were over first, and refusing to wait for orders, with true feudal contempt for any combined plan of action, pushed on, driving back the Saracens through Mansourah. Beyond that town the Paynim rallied, thanks to the bravery of the Baharites or Mamelukes, who that day saved the Egyptians from complete defeat. They shut up the Christians in the town, and there the King's brother with a multitude of knights, was slain. The battle was a confused struggle, with no man as chief or head. The King behaved like a gallant knight, not as a commander. He exposed himself to the thick of the fight, and had near been taken by the Turks. Never says Joinville of him that day have I seen a knight of so great worth he towered above all his battle by the head and shoulders<sup>2</sup>. All that hot day the struggle went on, but,

Joinville, ch. 5, gives an unintelligible account of the Nile Delta and the arms of the river. He places the French army in an impossible situation, between the Damietta and the Razi (or Rosetta) branches.

<sup>1</sup> Joinville, ch. 5.

The Saracens spent several days massacring in cold blood the common soldiers. The barons and all who could pay ransom were retained. They were carried to Mansourah, and there, after much negotiation, the King agreed to purchase his freedom and that of his barons, by the cession of Damietta, the payment of a million bezants<sup>1</sup> and a truce for ten years. Damietta had been held bravely by the Queen, whose firmness together with the pity caused by her helplessness, had hindered the garrison from taking flight when they heard of the King's captivity. In the midst of her anxiety and trouble, she had given birth to a son, whom she named John Tristan, in remembrance of her sorrows.

At the same time the Mamelukes, long restive under the Sultan, revolted and slew the last of the Ayoubites, the family of Saladin (A.D. 1250). Thus, with the defeat of the French, began the long dominion of the Mamelukes who formed the military strength of Egypt for centuries, till another army of Frenchmen led by Napoleon landed in Egypt, and broke their power. These troubles among the Moslem nearly brought the prisoners to their deaths—nothing but the prospect of the ransom saved them. Throughout all, the wonder and veneration of all men was fixed on the King whose simplicity, firmness, piety, and gentleness, extorted the high praises even of his enemies. At last they were allowed to go on board some Genoese ships. Damietta was given up the ransom paid, and some set sail for home, while the King steered for the shores of Palestine. Twelve thousand Christians were left behind as prisoners.

Of two thousand eight hundred knights, who were in the King's battle at first, scarcely a hundred followed him to the Holy Land<sup>2</sup> and these were but the wreck of themselves. The fever clung about them, the King was very ill. Still he refused to abandon his task so long as he had life and with tottering steps landed at Ptolemais, which was the only Christian city, excepting Tyre, that had not fallen into Saracen hands. Here they again suffered much from sickness, and the barons round the King pressed him to return home. But he still refused, though he allowed his two brothers to go. They had grieved him sorely by wasting their time at the dice.

<sup>1</sup> This bezant (so named from Byzantium), was a gold coin, worth a little less than ten shillings.

<sup>2</sup> So says Joinville. De tous voz chevaliers, says Guion Malvoisin, que amenantes en Chippre de deux mill huit cens, il ne vous en est pas demouré ung cent.

The King's brothers returned safely to France, where Alphonse, Count of Poitiers, took possession of the states of the South, which had fallen to him through the death, in 1249, of his father-in-law, Raymond VII; and Charles, Count of Anjou, the other brother, found that the great cities of Provence had recovered their independence, and were modelling themselves on the plan of the Lombard Republics. He attacked Arles and Avignon, and destroyed their new-formed governments. Marseilles held out for six years, she too at last had to succumb, and with her perished the civic independence of the South.

When Europe learnt the perils of Louis, all men groaned and accused heaven. 'How could the holiest of kings have been so treated?' asked Pope Innocent, who nevertheless took no steps to succour him,—he could not turn aside from his great work of crushing the Hohenstaufen. Frederick II had been poisoned just as he was preparing to bring help to Louis; but Conrad still remained, and the efforts of the Papacy were redoubled. France was filled with indignation when she heard the Papal emissaries preaching a crusade, not to deliver their King and hero, but to destroy the unfortunate sons of Frederick II, and the barons refused the Pope all help. Blanche, now in full accord with them, took strong measures, and declared that she would confiscate the goods of any who took that cross, and stopped the mouths of the Papal militia, the Dominican preachers. A great popular agitation began, a Crusade of the poor, the serfs, the shepherds<sup>1</sup>. The Queen at first favoured them, as their professed object was to succour the King. But when from invective they passed to action, and killed twenty priests at Orleans, she was obliged to repress them with the strong hand.

<sup>1</sup> Hence called the Crusade of the Pastoureaux

Four years the King spent in Palestine. The Saracens had no strength there, or they could easily have crushed him. He negotiated and fought for the release of captives, and, in fact, freed all prisoners in Egypt, a matter which he had very much at heart. He strengthened such places as remained to the Christians, Caesarea, Sidon, Jaffa, Ptolemais, he did all that was possible to hold together and secure the slight footing the West still had in the East. His army however dropped gradually away from him. One baron after another had pressing private business at home, and sailed off. At last, in the end of 1252 or in 1253<sup>1</sup> the noble Queen Blanche died, and the King feeling that he had done well nigh all he could in the East, and that France without Blanche was in peril, with such a Pope as Innocent on one hand, and such a neighbour as Henry III on the other determined to return home. At this all were glad, save the Legate who begged Joinville to go home to his lodgings, and when he was shut in, he took his hands, and began to weep and to say, Seneschal, I am right joyous, and thank God that you have escaped from so great perils wherein you have been in this land, but, on the other hand, I am very sad and dolorous of heart, since I must leave your very good and holy company to return to Rome among the dialoyal folk there.<sup>2</sup> Strange confession for a Papal legate to make. but a proof, if it were needed, that Louis was already regarded as the most saintly man on earth.

The King reached Hyères in safety and in September 1254 was once more in Paris shewing as he entered the city the marks of profound sorrow in his countenance for he thought that Christendom had been covered with confusion through his own shortcomings.

<sup>1</sup> All the chroniclers, who give the date make it Dec. 1252 except William of Nangis, who says 1253. The later date seems to fit best with Joinville's narrative.

<sup>2</sup> Joinville, ch. 14.

III THE KING'S LATER LIFE. A D. 1254-1270

Now begins the best part of the holy King's reign. He never wearied at his task of making peace in all his borders. Such was his reputation for firmness, justice, and sanctity, that he was able to exert a wonderful influence for good. He made a treaty with King James of Aragon in 1258, by which the Spaniard gave up his fiefs in the South of France (some ran even into Auvergne), while Louis gave him secure ownership of Montpellier, and abandoned his old claims on the Spanish March and on Roussillon. In the next year, in his love of peace he handed over to Henry of England Périgord, the Limousin, the south part of Saintonge, and his suzerainty over some smaller districts, while Henry in return gave up all his claims on Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, Poitou, and Northern Saintonge. The inhabitants of the ceded districts were little pleased, and, in after days, refused to celebrate the saint's-day of the King who had thus handed them over against their will to the English. His Council also remonstrated with him for it, saying that if his conscience bade him give up these districts, still more ought it to lead him to give up the rest of King Philip's conquests. But the King held that he did it, not as matter of conscience or justice, but solely 'to create love between his children and mine, who are cousins-german<sup>1</sup>.' And many times he acted as peacemaker between quarrelling barons, avoiding strife, doing justice, and setting to all the realm the noblest example of the life of a Christian prince. He taught and watched over his children, he gave plentiful alms, built lazaret-houses, hospitals, houses for the blind, penitentiaries. many times did he with his own hand cut bread and pour out drink for the poor. He built churches, <sup>1</sup> Louis and Henry had married two sisters. The cession of these provinces may have been connected with a promise said to have been made respecting them by Louis VIII, at the end of his feeble kingship in England. And, besides, we learn from Matthew Paris (p. 642), that, in 1247, the Bishops of Normandy had pronounced the King's claims to that duchy to be valid and just.

nunneries, abbeys without stint 'even as a scribe illuminates the book he has writ, that it may be fairer and held in more honour so did the holy King illustrate and beautify his kingdom with monasteries and churches, which he built and endowed during his lifetime<sup>1</sup> He dispensed his large patronage with great conscientiousness corrected and regulated the doings of his balliffs, judges, and other officers, forbade private war and judgment by duel was ever ready to hear the appeals of his people, oftentimes did justice, after mass, seated under an oak at Vincennes, kept open court, and gathered his barons round him by his cheerfulness and generous ways in a word, he ruled the land as it had never before been ruled, until security brought plenty the returns of the royal domains were doubled, arts flourished learning was held in honour and men enjoyed, throughout the length and breadth of France, a nobler and better life.

But, throughout all these years of well-doing one master passion still held the King's mind a passion which, when he was on Crusade before, had made so good a husband and father forget the noble wife who was so worthy of him<sup>2</sup> which made him think nothing of the solid good he was doing at home, and of the grievous misfortunes he had before brought on his followers. For thirteen years he cherished this desire, and at last, in 1267, at Lent, he summoned all his barons to Paris, and again took the Cross, together with his three sons, to the consternation of all prudent people He was so weak that Joinville had to carry him in his arms from house to house, he was not fit to sit a horse or even to be carried in a litter

<sup>1</sup> Joinville, chap. 15

<sup>2</sup> As we may learn from Joinville's account of her arrival at Sayette (Sidon), after she had given birth to a daughter. When I heard tell that she was come, I rose up from before the King, and went to meet her. And when I next saw the King, who was in his chapel, he asked me if the Queen and the children were well; and I said, yea. Then he said, I know when you rose that you were going to meet the Queen, and therefore I sat still for the sermon. These things I have related, because I had been five years about him, and never before had I heard him mention the Queen or the children, and it is not a good way methinks, to be a stranger to one's wife and little ones.—Joinville, chap. 13.

The stout old seneschal, who had stood by his King in Egypt and the Holy Land, and had ever told him the blunt truth without fear, refused to take the Cross again, and told the King why 'While I was serving God and the King over sea, the men and officers of the King had greatly oppressed and trodden down my subjects, so that they were thereby so impoverished that never will they and I recover from it And I see clearly that, were I to betake myself again to the pilgrimage of the Cross, it would be the utter ruin of these my poor subjects' And he goes on to say, that 'those who counselled the King in this enterprise did great evil, and sinned mortally. For, while he was in France, all his realm was in peace, and justice reigned But the moment he was out of it, everything began to grow worse' And so the greyhaired seneschal stayed at home, and tended his own people in peace and justice Louis, after three years' preparation, set forth in 1270 This time he steered wide of Palestine, and made for Tunis, for what reason we know not Some say he had heard that the prince of that place was minded to become a Christian, others, that his ambitious brother, Charles of Anjou, who had so lately subdued the two Sicilies, urged the King to break the power which lay over against him, and made the high sea dangerous for his fleets, others, that the King believed that the Mussulmans of Tunis were the chief supports of those of Cairo, and that he must begin with them Sure it is that the aim which so often guided a Crusader's movements, the desire to win merit in God's sight by slaying Paynim, could be as easily attained by a battle at Tunis as at Ptolemais or Cairo, and the barons were naturally reluctant to take the long voyage to a shore on which the memories of past failures sat awaiting them like ghosts foreboding doom However it was, the fleet sailed for Tunis They landed without difficulty, and, while they waited for Charles of Anjou on the burning shore of Africa, pestilence at once smote down the host. The King's utter weakness laid him open to an attack. He was seized with dysentery, and soon felt the end was at hand He called to his bedside his son F gave into his hands a written paper of advice which he charged him to heed as though it were his will soon after he yielded up his soul to God. He passed away on the day after St. Bartholomew's Day, 1270 and with him died out the last spark of the crusading spirit. He had reigned for forty-four years, and was fifty six years of age.

When, after his canonisation, the friar who preached the sermon at the translation of his body from St. Denis to the Sainte Chapelle called him 'the most loyal man of his age' he summed up in these words his whole character. There have been men of wiser judgment and of warmer affection, but a more loyal spirit never breathed. Truthfulness and honour were natural to him loyalty to his Master in heaven to his servants on earth, shone in his every act. No more unselfish man lives in the pages of history. His sensitive and pure conscience sometimes led him into excess of zeal or of self negation his devotion and depth of religious feeling made him a persecutor on one side and a dupe to superstition on the other — still, no one can feel that his character suffers deeply from these blots. He was genial, fond of society and good talk, he said that there is no book so pleasant as quolibets that is, as that every one should talk at will — if great folk dined with him, he was right good company to them and amiable<sup>1</sup>. In his habits no man could be more temperate or pure in person delicate and fine, having a grave sweet face almost womanly in expression with great noble eyes which looked straight forward, hiding nothing permitting no concealment. Even the Arabian historians felt the fascination of his tall and handsome presence and elevated character. This prince was of a fine countenance, he had intelligence firmness, piety, his noble qualities won him the veneration of the Christians, who trusted him implicitly<sup>2</sup>. He was wise and honest, doing justice and honouring the truth he could even bear to have the truth told him He was firm, perhaps obstinate, where he felt sure of his ground Not a good general, he loved peace more than war. He was careless of his own life, nor was it ever in his thoughts. otherwise he was not given to feats of prowess, or what men called heroism, his delicate frame and temperament were not suited to that. Still, he would face death rather than desert his people,—his life for theirs at any time. He was fond of learned men, though perhaps his own learning was scanty, he was sufficiently noble not to chafe at their superiority Under him the Sorbonne, the theological faculty at Paris, was created, under his patronage the University drew to itself all the learned of Europe the German Albertus Magnus, the Italian St Thomas Aquinas, the English Roger Bacon, studied there The French language sprang into a new and brilliant life Poetry and history, with wonderful freshness and truth, gave grace and power to the tongue Joinville, whose Chronicle we have followed, wrote a little later with a simplicity and vividness which render his book one of the noblest monuments of French literature. To read him is like studying one of the fine manuscripts of the same age, each page is adorned with paintings which, in their quaintness and purity of feeling, their clearness of conception and happy grouping, and brilliant freshness of colour, display before our eyes the real life of the times

<sup>1</sup> Joinville, chap. 16.

<sup>2</sup> Aboul Moussen, quoted in the Collection Universelle des Mémoires, &c., tom. 2, p. 59.

Saint Louis did most for France, strange as it may seem, as a lawyer It was by the law that he met the chief difficulties of his government thus he attacked the feudal jurisdictions in many ways (1) He absolutely forbade judicial combats and private warfare, and compelled the mail-clad baron to stand on equal terms before the judgment-seat, no longer allowing the brute privilege of the strong man armed. The working of this may be seen in the tale of Enguerrand, lord of Coucy, proudest among the feudal landowners, though no more than a baron<sup>1</sup> This man caught three Flemish students rabbiting in his warren, and hung them up at once, that seeming to him the simplest way of enforcing his game law. But the lads had friends, who brought the matter before the King. Saint Louis summoned Enguerrand, who refused to come on which the King shut him up in prison, and compelled him to appear before the royal court. There the angry knight refused to submit to judgment and offered wager of battle. But the king replied, that in the case of the poor the Church, and the weak, no man shall proceed by way of battle: battle is not the path of justice. And he compelled the judges though they were all Enguerrand's friends, and sympathised with him, to condemn him to death. This sentence was afterwards commuted to a heavy fine, with loss of his private court of justice and his rights of warren and thus the King showed that he was too firm and too strong for any one safely to indulge in the waywardness of feudal injustice. (2) He limited the feudal jurisdictions, taking many classes of cases out of the feudal courts, and transferring them to his own hearing. Lastly (3), he weakened their independence by instituting a right of appeal in all cases to the King, so that he not the barons, became the last court to which the wronged might have recourse. He re-established the Missi Dominici of Charles the Great, those royal commissioners, who went through the realm and were the King's eyes, spying out what was amiss, and bringing swift redress. To him is due the direction given to the Parliament of Paris under his hand. It became a pure magistrature, the centre-point of the justice of the whole land.

<sup>1</sup> 'Je ne suis Roi ne duc Prince ne comte aussy je suis le sire de Coucy'

The King also greatly enlarged the extent of the royal domain, not only by conquest, but by purchase. He bought the lands of ruined vassals, which lay dotted about within other great lordships. Here he always introduced the royal Establishments<sup>1</sup>, or codes of law ; bringing them more or less under Roman law, and seeing to its fair administration by the hands of bailiffs and provosts. The provosts received the taxes, the bailiffs did justice in the King's name, and were called to the Parliament as referees in cases of appeal. The lawyers only could administer the written law, for they alone had learning enough for that. It was very different from the thumb-rule Custom of the Castle Court. The barons cared little to sit by these shrewd learned folk, who knew so much more than they did, and had such different sympathies. This cause contributed largely to that change in the character of the Parliament to which we have alluded.

<sup>1</sup> The Établissements of St. Louis are a confused body of laws, thrown together without order dealing with all questions civil or criminal, according to Custom-law compiled by the great lawyers of the reign. Pierre de la Fontaine, Geoffrey de Villeter, Philip de Beaumanoir. Beaumanoir's Coutumes de Beauvoisis were a remarkable attempt to codify and establish existing Custom-law without direct reference to either Roman or Canon law.

With the Church also the same centralisation of the powers of government went on. The King appointed his own bishops, he did not recognise their excommunications, unless they had been judged lawful and just in his own courts, he held that even the Pope himself must keep to his own sphere as lord over consciences, and as ultimate ruler in matters of ecclesiastical discipline. There must ever be a doubt as to the genuineness of the famous 'Pragmatic Sanction'<sup>1</sup> of St Louis. This document, as we have it, contains six articles levelled against the assumptions of Papal power. It forbade simony, restored free election to the chapters of cathedrals, regulated matters connected with the rights of prelates, benefices, and the like, and above all forbade all exactions or levies of money imposed by the Court of Rome, unless the grounds for such were recognised as 'reasonable, pious, very urgent, and indispensable, by the King and Church of France.' There can be no doubt that the King and his lawyers (whatever we may think of this document<sup>2</sup>) were quite prepared to show that they would not let the spiritual power encroach on the lay-government of the kingdom.

<sup>1</sup> This technical name is Byzantine in origin. The edicts of the Eastern Emperors were called Pragmatics. The term was used by Charles the Great.

<sup>2</sup> The chief arguments against the genuineness of the Pragmatic Sanction are, (1) that it is not alluded to by any historian or mentioned in any document till the reign of Louis XI, more than two centuries later, and (2) that it is most improbable that St Louis, regard being had to his character and his age, would ever have promulgated such an attack on the Papacy.

St. Louis reformed, among many other things, the coin of the realm. There was so much corruption and irregularity through the barons private mints, that the King's money soon came to pass current everywhere, to the direct advantage of the royal authority, to which the 'image and superscription' on his coins bore perpetual though silent witness. And lastly by help of Stephen Boileau, Provost of Paris, he compiled a book of trades, which formed for centuries the code of industrial laws and customs, and fostered the growth of civic liberties and corporations.

The crafty skill of Philip Augustus had made all ready for the growth of a great monarchy but it needed the genial rays of an heroic character to warm the soil and quicken the seed to life. St. Louis roused his nation to enthusiasm, reverence was paid him while he yet lived his very errors and misfortunes strengthened him in popular esteem, and made his task the easier. In addition to his great work of quieting feudal hostility while he destroyed the strongholds of feudal independence, he added largely to the actual domain of the crown.

In 1229 that part of the territories of the Count of Toulouse which lies between the right bank of the Rhone, the sea, and the Pyrenees, was made over to the crown by Raymond VII at the close of his disastrous struggle against the royal power.

In 1234, Chartres, Blois, and Sancerre were given up to him by Theobald of Champagne and Navarre.

In 1239 he purchased Macon in 1257 Perche was joined to the realm, in 1262 he obtained Arles, Forcalquier Foix, and Cahors. The rest of the South, west of the Rhone, was certain to fall to the crown in time. Normandy was definitely ceded by the English King.

In many ways he must be regarded as the true founder of French absolute monarchy and so far, the parent of many woes to his country. Still this was the only way in which France could emerge from chaos and become a nation. French ideas as to authority as to law, as to the relations of the Church to the State, are found in germ in this great patriarchal monarch It is largely due to him that popular liberties found no place in the growth of the French constitution

St Louis was regarded in his own day as the greatest King in Christendom The Hohenstaufen had fallen. the English King was a feeble creature, effectually checked by his barons, there was no prince to compare with the French monarch Matthew Paris, regarding him from afar with friendly eyes, as the bulwark against Papal ambition, says he is 'the most illustrious and wealthy of the kings of the earth,' and styles him 'King of Kings'

In later times, just as the English nation looked back to the days and laws of King Edward the Confessor, so did the French Kings look back to the justice and character of St Louis we find a letter by Charles VIII (A D 1497), who was desirous of reforming his kingdom, in which he seeks to know the ancient form in which his predecessors, and specially Monseigneur St Louis, were wont to proceed in hearing and giving audience to the poor folk<sup>1</sup> For long ages he was the patron saint of the French people, and his day, the anniversary of his death, was kept with great solemnity

These things did the King who could arouse the enthusiasm of Gibbon, whose virtues won a hearty word of goodwill even from Voltaire

<sup>1</sup> Quoted in Ducange's Second Dissertation on Joinville, at the end

CHAPTER IX

Philip III A D 1270—1285

WAR went on before Tunis for two months after the death of St. Louis, then, after two battles, the Crusaders made terms, very favourable for Charles of Anjou, and at once set sail for Europe. The ships were to meet at Trapani, where there should be a consultation about the future for Charles had his own designs, not on the Holy Land, but on Constantinople. But a great storm destroyed most of the ships the remainder made their way home.

Philip III, le Hardi, the Rash, who was eldest son of St. Louis, and succeeded him on the throne, made a melancholy journey back to France, bearing with him the bones of five of his kinsfolk—his saintly father his wife, who had died of an accident on horseback her babe, still-born, his uncle, Alphonse of Toulouse, and his uncle's wife the last of the great house of St. Gilles these five victims of the Crusade formed a gloomy procession before the new King as he returned to take possession of his kingdom. He was but a poor successor to his father He was unlearned, and could not read, he was unwise and weak a devout man, guided by the advice of his counselors one who led the life of a monk rather than of a prince Under such a man the monarchy might well have lost ground except that the throne was now surrounded by lawyers who had their own theory bound up with their own interests and did not allow the King's weakness to weaken royalty On the deaths of his uncle Alphonse of Toulouse and his wife, the whole of their domains fell in to the crown, and were secured by Philip, with the exception of the Agenois, claimed by Henry III of England under the treaty of 1259. The diocese of Toulouse, Querci, Rouergue, Poitou, Auvergne, and parts of Anjou and Saintonge, as well as the marquisate of Provence, came thus into the King's hands. This last-mentioned territory was in 'Imperial France', that is, on that border of ancient Gaul which held under the Empire. Thus begins the absorption of that district into France. This was, too, the last interference of Henry of England, for he died in 1272, and left his crown to Edward I, then gone on Crusade. As Edward returned he did homage to Philip 'for the lands which he was bound to hold of him,' reserving his own opinion as to debated points. As however he was much occupied with his wars in Wales and Scotland, he never took great part in continental questions.

We have reached the end of the Crusades. When the Christians dispersed, on their way home from Tunis, they agreed that they would meet again at the end of three years, to ease their consciences, burdened with the thought that they had ill fulfilled their crusading vow by deeds of war at Tunis instead of Jerusalem. That promise was not kept. Never again did Europe go forth in arms to wrest the holy places from the unbeliever. The federation of barons, who went together from every part of Europe, had given place to distinct and separate nations, whose clashing interests forbade them to join in any such common enterprise.

Instead of another Crusade, the chivalry of France rallied round Charles of Anjou, who threw his quiet nephew the King entirely into the shade. Charles, restless and ambitious, aimed at a kind of universal sovereignty. With one hand he would rule the Papacy, with the other would seize the diadem of Constantinople. Brave and treacherous, cold, cruel, blood-thirsty, he was well fitted to be a scourge of men, and inspired all around him with terror. Gregory X resisted him as anxiously as his forerunners had resisted the Hohenstaufen.

The Popes were always engaged in a struggle with one or other of the lay powers which overshadowed them. Sometimes it was Germany then France, then Spain theirs was no solid elevation no enthronement over the heads and in the hearts of mankind, but a position of unstable balance, bending now thus way now that and sometimes falling as we shall see with a tremendous crash. But in order to resist Charles of Anjou the Pope must have a lay champion and the Empire being vacant, he cast about for an Emperor. He found one in a simple Helvetian baron, a lord of small lands and little influence, but of tried courage, warlike skill, probity and sagacity—Rudolf of Habsburg. Him the electors choose as Emperor in 1273. With him the new order of the Empire begins. With the last race it had been the Holy Roman Empire henceforth it becomes rather the German Empire tending after a time largely to increase the influence of Austria, until at last it crumbles away under Napoleon's touch. At the very time when the Electors were offering the crown to Rudolf the Pope was on his way to Lyons to hold another Council in that frontier city. Thither came the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Greek Bishop of Nicaea, as well as representatives of all the great powers of Europe. The Greek churchmen chanted the Nicene Creed without omitting the Western interpolation<sup>1</sup> and unity seemed to be restored to Christendom amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of the assembled prelates (A.D. 1274). They did not see that Michael Palaeologus the Emperor had stooped so low, not because he was convinced, but because he trembled for a throne now visibly threatened by Charles. The union of Christendom lasted but a brief space, and was both interested and hollow.

There were also present Turkish envoys, asking for an alliance against the Mamelukes, who were growing formidable to all the East. The Princes of Europe took the cross, but never went Gregory died, and his great schemes perished with him

<sup>1</sup> That is, the word Filioque in the clause proceeding from the Father [and the Son], the point on which the East and West finally broke asunder.

That same year Henry of Navarre, Count of Champagne and Brie, died, leaving one daughter three years old Her mother, a French princess, carried the child to Philip's Court, where she was brought up till of age to marry one of the King's sons The Pope, who was applied to for a dispensation for this union, being unwilling to see France and Navarre in the same hands, yet fearing to refuse the King, granted the boon, naming in it not the King's eldest son Louis, but his second, Philip, who afterwards, by what is called the irony of history, was Philip IV, the tyrant over the Papal see Meanwhile, as guardian of the mother and child, Philip III took possession of the domains of the little heiress Navarre resisted, supported by the King of Castille, and Philip marched with such blind haste across the frontier that he acquired for himself the name of 'the Rash,' which otherwise scarcely suits his quiet character He was saved from ruin by the previous successes of his lieutenant, Robert of Artois, which enabled him to make a truce with the Castilian King The end of it was that Navarre was added to the French kingdom for a time.

France herself was tranquil during this reign, which offers little of interest The influence of the lawyers did not decrease, and in some smaller matters the crown encroached on the barons Thus a patent of nobility was made out (a thing hitherto unheard-of) for the King's goldsmith, Raoul, in 1275 the restriction was taken off, which forbade those who were not noble to acquire fiefs; the bourgeoisie of Paris was ennobled, which is as though the whole city were made a baron, and, lastly, all lawyers were created 'Chevaliers ès lois,' 'Knights of the Law,' and thus were placed on the ladder of nobility

The history of the King's favourite, Peter de la Brosse, gives us an insight into the jealousy which had sprung up between the barons and the Court Peter was a man of gentle birth, son of a small gentleman of Touraine, had filled some offices at Court under St. Louis, and had at last been made his chamberlain. Under Philip he became omnipotent as a favourite, and all men hated and courted him. He was present at all the King's councils, and whatever the barons might determine, if their advice did not commend itself to Peter it was flung to the winds. Naturally, he had enemies enough, but they could make no head against him till he had made a foe of the Queen. The details of their struggle are dim and probably false—what could the upstart expect at the hands of the chroniclers of the time? It is enough that the Queen and the barons together were too strong for him—though the conflict lasted more than two years, at last the favourite fell. His enemies became his judges, and made short work. He was tried, no one knows how or on what charges, condemned, and the next day hung, whereat the barons of France were greatly pleased. With him fell all his friends and kin. The King himself seems to have yielded with regret, but kings can sacrifice their favourites to their fears—the common people murmured at the judicial murder of the King's friend and Phillip le Bel afterwards restored to his heirs part of their forfeited goods.

Yet one more trait, and we have done with the internal affairs of this reign. When Robert, Count of Clermont, the King's youngest brother was knighted, Philip held a great tournament to celebrate the day. It was a direct violation of the usual rule of kingly conduct—for hitherto the kings had looked coldly on tournaments as fuel for feudal turbulence and pride. In the mêlée, the poor young prince in whose honour it was held was so stifled by his hot and heavy armour and the clouds of dust, and so shaken by the knocks he got that his brain was muddled and he fell into idleness for the rest of his days. Nevertheless he married the heiress of the Bourbon barony: and from one of his sons sprang the royal house of Bourbon. We may notice in passing that hereafter in war or mimicry of war the Kings become so strong that they are not afraid to call together the chivalry of their day. Their objection to tournaments passes away because they no longer represent feudal independence ; the kings are henceforward glad to give splendour to their courts by these brilliant displays.

Philip was little but the lieutenant of his uncle, Charles of Anjou ; and to this he owes the chief mishaps of his reign. For the Pope and the Eastern Emperor, Peter King of Aragon, and the Sicilian subjects of Charles, formed a secret league to destroy that hated prince. The league was kept together by John of Procida, a Calabrian refugee, an old friend of Frederick II, and Manfred, an ingenious physician and able politician, who passed through Europe in disguise, and brought the French prince's foes together. But Nicolas III, the centre of this great conspiracy, died (A. D. 1279), and Charles compelled the cardinals to elect as his successor Simon de Brie, a Frenchman, his creature, who took the name of Martin IV<sup>1</sup>. Relying on his help, and on that of Venice, Charles now thought the time come for his attack on Constantinople. His grand schemes embraced also the recovery of the Holy Land—he would be the one successful Crusader—and perhaps the subjugation of Egypt. But on the 30th of March, 1282, just as in the stillness of evening the vesper bells were calling men to prayer and rest, an accident, a French soldier's insolence, lit the train, and the whole discontent of Sicily exploded with terrific force. In these 'Sicilian Vespers' every Frenchman, man, woman or child, was massacred ; not one escaped. The crime of oppression bore its natural fruit in a terrible reaction of crime. Charles, arrested in his progress towards the East, turned his arms against his Sicilian subjects. a crowd of French chivalry, burning to avenge their kinsfolk, joined him, and laid siege to Messina. But John of Procida, ever prompt and ready in war as in intrigue, entered the city ; and Charles withdrew across the Strait to Calabria. Roger of Loria, another Ghibeline refugee from Italy, who commanded the Spanish fleet, destroyed a large part of the French ships, under the very eyes of Charles himself. And thus the French lost Sicily. In vain did Martin IV excommunicate Michael Palaeologus, and preach a crusade against Sicily and the King of Aragon. In vain did he offer the crown of Aragon to Philip of France. Roger de Loria swept from the sea the Provençal and Neapolitan fleet on board the latter he captured the son of Charles, who was in command, and had rashly made trial of strength with the Calabrian veteran. When Charles, next day one day too late sailing into the Bay of Naples with five-and-fifty galleys, learnt the folly and fate of his son he fell into a fury hung a hundred and fifty citizens of Naples, and was scarcely dissuaded from burning the city and ravaging the kingdom then through fatigue disappointment, despair his constitution gave way, and early in 1285 he died at Foggia a bad but a notable man of monstrous and cruel vices of an ambition almost heroic in its grasp

<sup>1</sup> He had been a canon of St Martin of Tours

His weaker kinsman, King Philip, burnt to take his revenge on Peter of Aragon he took the Oriflamme from St. Denis, and marched southward with a mighty host. He deemed that he was on Crusade and therefore when he had taken the town of Elna (or Helena) which barred the entry into the Pyrenees, he massacred all the inhabitants, hundreds of them even in the great church of the city. Then he crossed the mountains into Spain, and sat down before Gerona. The brave Aragonese rose against him their fleet destroyed his ships Gerona defended itself as Spanish cities can do and it was not till autumn that the King took the place. By that time he was in fact defeated. His fleet was half ruined his army worn out he could only turn his face homewards again. With difficulty he extricated himself from the Pyrenean defiles the remnant of his fleet was destroyed as it set sail out of the port of Roses. In great sorrow did the King return. From sorrow he fell into fever was carried in a litter as far as Perpignan and there died, being the third King of France to whom a siege had proved fatal. Eight days later the city of Gerona, the one fruit of such sacrifices and losses was recovered by Peter King of Aragon who also fell ill from exposure and died about a month after his antagonist.

Three sons survived King Philip Of these the younger had scanty apanages , for France could no longer be broken up into portions for younger sons · the eldest became King, and is well-known to history as Philip le Bel, or the Fair, as he is commonly called, the conqueror in a field on which so many had failed, the tamer of the Papacy

CHAPTER X

Philip IV le Bel. A D 1285.

PHILIP IV was seventeen years old when he came to the throne. It is not easy to draw the likeness of the youthful King, for there was then no man who had the heart to write the history of his times, and the records are singularly dim and dull. We know from his name that he was handsome, and it is unfortunate that his French title of le Bel was not rendered into English by the Handsome for the Fair does not fully represent the sense. It seems likely that he was tall, though this is uncertain<sup>1</sup>, the regularity of his features somehow gives us a sense of coldness his enemy, Bishop Saisset, said that he was no true King, but a handsome image alluding probably to his cold looks. He is figured full face on one of his coins, but so rudely that scarcely anything can be gathered from it, except that his face was regular his nose long and straight, his mouth smiling. From his seal<sup>2</sup> which was probably engraven soon after his accession, we can also gather that his features were good, his face oval, expression mild, his hair long and waving his attitude is easy and dignified. The pleasant mouth is not against his character, when it suited him he could be fascinating and bright, as we read in the account of his dealings with the people of Aquitaine, whom he wished to win from their English sympathies<sup>3</sup>. One thing seems clear he was taciturn and wore a look of pride, which made men shrink before him. 'This King was simple and sage, and spake but little proud was he as a lion when he looked on men<sup>1</sup>,' and again, his enemies said 'he was the fairest man in the world, and knows not how to do anything else but look at men<sup>2</sup>' In all this we get but little hold of him, he is a kind of abstraction, cold and impersonal, a hard expression of the new forces which are beginning to bear sway in the world. For Philip IV is the Prince of the Roman Law, the head of that cold system of which the letter crushes out the spirit. Lawyers surround his throne; many of them from the South, and therefore bred up in reverence for the Roman, as distinct from either Customary or Canon Law<sup>3</sup>. These cold and rigid men, who wielded this new force in Europe have been called, not amiss, 'the destroyers of the Middle Ages'. At least, their spirit, and the King whom they served and defended, were destructive of the older order of things. Before them the towers of feudalism went crumbling down, the proud Church bowed her head, for the Law was a two-edged sword, which smote down baron and Pope. Aristotle in the schools, and the Digest at court;—these were the newly-aroused spirits of Greece and Rome which began to awaken the sleepers of Christendom.

<sup>1</sup> In the Supplication du peuple de France au Roy Dupuy Preuves des Libertez de l'Église Gallicane (vol. 3 of Pithou's Libertez de l'Église Gallicane), pp. 133-134, Philip seems to be alluded to under the name of Sant-head and shoulders taller than the rest of the people.

As figured in the Tresor de Numismatique Delarochette, Paris, 1835.

<sup>2</sup> Chron. de S. Denis (A.D. 1303) Dom Bouquet Recueil, tom. 20. p. 675.

From his lawyers Philip learnt, a willing pupil, lessons of absolution and statecraft, they drew for him a clear line between things temporal and things spiritual. As the Pope tried to bring all under him by his authority over the sins of men, so did the King determine to draw the clergy under his power by their temporal character. It is round this point, the relations between the temporal and the spiritual, that the great struggle of this reign really turns.

This we see in Peter du Bois, a great royalist pamphleteer and lawyer. In 1308 he actually proposed to Philip that he should get himself elected Emperor as successor to Albert of Austria. He uses language respecting his King which bears a singular likeness to that used in the days of Henry VIII of England so strongly is he in favour of the independence of the civil power. He appears to have much assisted the King in framing his curious appeals to public opinion.

<sup>1</sup> 'Icest roy fu simple e sage e pou parlour, fier estoit, comme i lyon en regardeure.—Chron. abrégé de Guil. de Nangis

<sup>2</sup> 'Rex Franciæ, quod erat pulchrior homo mundi, et nihil aliud scit facere quam respicere homines'.—Histoire du Differend d'entre le Pape Boniface VIII et Philippe le Bel (Paris, 1655), p. 644.

<sup>3</sup> Thus the King's great lawyers, Nogaret and Plaisian, were both Albigenses.

This is the fitting moment also for the appearance of satire that special gift of the Gallic nature. At the King's court is seen Jean de Meung the poet of scepticism<sup>1</sup> who had been taught at Rome by Giles Colonna, and who was therefore a natural foe to the Guelfic Papacy. Satire is the usual comrade of despotism. The phrase a despotism tempered by epigrams is true of other times as well as of monarchical France in the eighteenth century. The age which welcomed Jean de Meung at court, saw also the vigorous satire of Jacopone da Todi these too were the days of Dante.

The history of this reign may be loosely divided into three periods —

- I. The unimportant and feeble time between the King's accession in 1285 and the year 1296
- II. The quarrel with Pope Boniface VIII, and the war with Flanders, A.D. 1296-1304
- III. The epoch of the Templars, A.D. 1304-1314

I. FROM A.D. 1285-1296

At the outset we find King Philip bargaining with his neighbour of Guenne and England, Edward I. He granted him the privilege of never being liable to forfeit the fiefs he held under the French crown, and paid him ten thousand livres for his old claim on Normandy, which Edward henceforth renounced.

War was kept up, in a languid way in Aragon and Sicily it gives us little or no insight into Philip's character or capacity except that we may perhaps discern some tenacity and stubbornness in him. The operations of the wars were insignificant, and the King preferred his lawyers at Paris to the field. Philip never shone in war there was no heat and enthusiasm in him for such sport

<sup>1</sup> Martin, Histoire des Français, 4 369.

Still these years doubtless prepared him for his work, and we see almost from the beginning signs that he and his advisers had taken a cool and clear view of their task. As early as 1287 the clergy were removed from the Parliament, and the law stood clear of the Church. The clergy were forbidden to administer justice in temporal matters, they could no longer fill the posts of mayors, sheriffs, or baillies

These offices, and all the administration of the kingdom, fell into the hands of the lawyers, the Parliament, now exclusively composed of laymen, and guided by legal minds, became the central machine of government. It was fixed at Paris (A. D. 1302), it protected Jews and heretics against the Inquisition, it forbade private war, it hindered the territorial growth of both clergy and noblesse. Thus the Law became the spring of action of the body politic; the Courts were all centralised in the Parliament (which, it must be remembered, was a legal, not a legislative body, registering and administering rather than passing laws) and although the Exchequer Court, a remnant of the old Norman liberties, remained at Rouen, and the 'Great Days' were still held at Troyes, and the liberties of Champagne were respected, yet in all these cases the special courts were presided over by members of the central body, the Parliament of Paris

And while these things were passing in France, tidings came from Palestine that the last stronghold of the Christians had fallen. 'Acre, the asylum of Christianity in those parts, by reason of her sins was destroyed by the foes of the faith, nor was there one among all the Christian powers that would help her in her distress'<sup>1</sup> This, which not long before would have roused Europe to a paroxysm of sorrow and zeal, now fell on careless ears. The age of the Crusades was over. The Pope was no longer the grand central figure of a combined and warlike Christendom, the nations were fast growing into well-

<sup>1</sup> Chron. of William of Nangis, sub ann. 1290

knot and independent societies, as they grew the influence of the Papacy must decline. The days of unreasoning piety and reckless waste were slowly passing away

This national growth engendered, as it went on, a new want—the want of money. Kings while they were little more than great feudal lords, depended for sustenance on their domains, for armies on their vassals. But as the machinery of a less simple form of civil life was created, the older sources dried up. The produce of the royal domain became utterly unequal to the calls on it—the service of the feudal lords and their retainers grew continually less satisfactory. We approach the days of a great civil service, and a standing army. The King's ordinances now passing current throughout the land, there go with them a host of officials to execute them and these men must be paid. Farmers of taxes also appear. Italians, who have the Lombard readiness with money. The evil of this method of levying taxation clings to France throughout her history and is hardly eradicated by the Revolution.

Philip was overwhelmed with this want of money, and became a monster of rapacity. He levied a tax so odious in its incidence that it won the old name of 'maltote' the 'ill-levied'. He defended the Jews and the Italians, using them as sponges to suck the wealth from the people, and squeezing them when full, into his treasure-house. The Jews were banished (not carrying away their wealth) then allowed to purchase permission to return then banished again. The thirteenth century had wrested away the power of arbitrary taxation from the barons the fourteenth century concentrated that power with grinding severity in the hands of an absolute King. The King seized all he could. Jews or Templars, Guenno or Flanders whatever could be turned into money was good alike. serfs were allowed to buy their freedom, privileges of towns were given for cash. the current coin was debased, then restored to its old value then again debased, and again raised. The King's sumptuary laws, by which he early showed the tendency of government in France to administer men paternally, were not merely a vexation, they tended, in some of their provisions, to bring grist to the royal mill. The King had strength enough even to plunder the noblesse itself under these hateful laws. In a word, it was a government without mercy, inhuman in its cold cruelty and rapacity

<sup>1</sup> This Maltote, exactio quam nominant malum tollam (William of Nangis), was levied in 1296. (Tollus is a Low Latin participle of tollō.)

This need and greed of money brought about that struggle between the King of France and the Pope, which forms the central and most important portion of this reign. Philip, looking everywhere for supplies, at last laid his hand on the property of the clergy, and included it in his scheme of taxation. Hence began a great struggle with the Papacy, which proved in the end a scandal to Christendom, and brought the supreme Pontiff down to the feet of the despotic King, living as his servant, no longer at Rome but in Avignon, where it seemed as though the proudest institution upon earth had become the humble minister to the monarch's pride.

II THE QUARREL WITH POPE BONIFACE VIII.

A.D. 1296--1304.

The Papacy had fallen much in men's regard, both positively and relatively. Positively, through a succession of weak pontiffs, and through the interested squabbles of the Conclave men had seen the Papal Chair vacant for years at a time, because the cardinals could not agree as to their choice, and their minds were no longer awe-stricken at the name and voice of the Pope, as of old, when he roused all Europe to a Crusade. And relatively also it had fallen, for while the Pope in the midst of all the jarring elements of Italian life was only one weak force among many, the neighbouring temporal powers had been gradually and steadily growing solid and strong, and there was no longer any question of such a contest as that between the Papacy and the Hohenstaufen

This weakness was much increased by the elevation of the simple hermit Peter Morrone to the papal throne. There had been a vacancy for more than two years, suddenly the cardinals, moved by one of those impulses which, through very weariness, sometimes affected them, cut the knot of their intrigues, and hailed the saintly hermit as their head. Unwillingly he left his retreat, and took the name of Celestin V. He soon proved himself incapable of dealing with his new duties, and after a few months, chiefly influenced (it is said) by the counsels and the pious frauds of Benedetto Gaetani, the ablest of the cardinals, he took Christendom by surprise, and abdicated in Advent 1294, resuming his plain hermit's dress, in hopes of being able to retire again to his mountain solitude. It was a new and strange thing, nor did it appear clear how a Pope could cease to be Pope. The opponents of his successor ever found this doubt a convenient weapon in the strife. The cardinals, anxious not again to commit such a mistake, before the year was out elected Benedetto Gaetani who ascended the pontifical throne with a firm and resolute step, and took the name of Boniface VIII (16 Jan. 1295). His unlucky predecessor was kept in honourable though galling confinement, whence death released him, to the great relief of Boniface, in 1296.

Benedetto Gaetani was by interest, by party and by bringing up, inclined towards the French alliance and in some sense, was influenced by the lawyer spirit of the age. It is his misfortune that he both failed in all his aims and was at the same time the object of malignant and unscrupulous attack. We know little of his character but from his enemies. That he was ambitious seems clear enough, he was not scrupulous in the means or the language he employed<sup>1</sup>, he was incapable of generosity towards a foe, he hated well, and was well hated in return. That his energy and ability extorted the admiration of his foes is also plain and he was clear from all low vices. He had no lack of grand conceptions of his high position and duties as head of Christendom, on the other hand he was altogether a priest in the narrowness with which he regarded the world around him. Although before his elevation he had been in kings' courts, and had mixed in the political movements of the time, he could not discern the tendencies of society, or make any allowance for the forces by which he was surrounded. He fought new foes with the old weapons, blunted by use and rusted by lapse of years. There was as great a difference herein, as there soon would be in the struggle of the old feudal world against the new engines of war, gunpowder and cannon, the voice of which was so soon to be heard on the battlefield.

<sup>1</sup> As when he alluded to the bodily infirmities of Peter Flotte, as Belial semivivens corpore, menteque totaliter excecatus. See below p. 369

Boniface was unfortunate in his character, his surroundings, and his times. He could not bend and yield, and spring up again, but stood, like some great oak of a past age, rigid and venerable, till the storm uprooted him. From the moment of his accession the clouds began to gather. The popular feeling throughout Italy was against him, the preaching orders, who swayed the opinion of the crowd, regarded him as their foe, and as the supplanter of their favourite saint, Pope Celestin. The nobles of Rome knew that he was their enemy, the great Colonna faction at the head of the anti-papal party was committed to a deadly struggle with him. He had the misfortune to be regarded as the friend of Charles of Valois, that hated usurper, whose vices were to a certain extent reflected on him, and in whose unpopularity he shared. And lastly, it was his doom to be pitted against his natural friend, the French King, and that King the tenacious, unscrupulous, proud Philip the Fair. He secured the hearty hatred of the rising and ambitious order of lawyers, in defeating him the Civil Law triumphed over the champion of the Canon Law, while some of his bitterest foes have seemed to after times to be the avenging spirits of the independence of thought that perished in those baleful fires which the Papal Inquisition, earlier in the century, had kindled in Southern France<sup>1</sup>

The King and the Pope thus being fundamentally at variance,

<sup>1</sup> The grandfather of Nogaret is said to have perished in the Albigensian persecutions

little was needed to begin the quarrel between them. And yet, on the surface their interests were at one. The Pope was Guelphic in bringing-up and sympathies, and by the traditions of the Holy See. He had persuaded King James of Aragon to give up Sicily to Charles the Lame, he held before the half-dazzled eyes of Charles of Valois the splendid prize of which the Latin princes often dreamed, the imperial crown of Constantinople, he forwarded in every way the interests of France and Italy

Yet from the moment that he interfered with the King things began to go wrong. He tried in 1295 to mediate between Philip and Edward I of England, they were both however very unwilling to receive him as arbitrator and guarded themselves by declaring that they were in no way subject to the Papal see as to their temporal affairs. Still more was Philip offended when the Pope ordered him to do justice to Guy of Flanders, and to release his daughter whom he held in prison as a hostage. In the beginning of the year 1296 Boniface had issued a Bull<sup>1</sup> entitled Clericis laicos, in which ecclesiastics were forbidden to pay taxes of any kind to the civil power except by permission of the apostolical see and all princes and potentates were warned that if they exacted such contributions from the clergy they became liable to excommunication. Though Philip was not named it was partly if not chiefly directed against him and he did not hesitate to reply. In August of the same year appeared a royal Ordinance<sup>2</sup> forbidding all persons of whatever condition or nation to export from the kingdom anything of value, gold and silver coined or not, jewels and precious stones, armour horses, and munitions of war except with the royal permission in writing. This document in its turn made no mention of the Pope, or of any difference of opinion none the less, all men knew to whom it referred. The Pope quickly rejoined, in the very next month he issued a Bull<sup>3</sup> entitled Ineffabilis amoris in which he declares that the prohibition of exports cannot possibly refer to clerical persons, and that it would be madness to lay hands on them. He warned the King to put away his counsellors for he had become aware of the forces, hostile to himself, which were impelling Philip: he displays emphatically his own kindness and good offices towards the King, and the dangers to France from the hostility of his neighbours the 'Kings of Rome, Spain, and England' He then goes on to enforce the 'Clericis laicos' Bull with fresh threats of penalties, while he also opens the door to a compromise, he does not object to the taxation of clergy for the defence and support of the realm, provided the Pope's consent be first had, and also explains that he does not forbid the King to exercise his rights over ecclesiastics in regard of the fiefs held by them under the crown, also he claims to judge between Kings 'in matter of sin' And he closes with a vague threat, that if the King will not amend these matters of his own good will, he must put out his hand 'to other and less usual remedies, however unwilling he may be to do so' Intentionally or not, the Pope sent this document to Philip by one who did nothing to soften the bad effect it produced Its haughtiness, its appeals to the King's fears, even the friendly but patronising tone which runs through most of it, were bitterness to the proud prince His advisers at once drew up a reply, a bold and vigorous assertion of the royal supremacy in things temporal. It opens with a phrase which would scarcely have been capable of proof 'Ere ever ecclesiastics existed, the King of France had the custody of his realm, and could make laws for its defence'<sup>1</sup> After this bold beginning, he sets forth the importance of the laity as well as of the clergy, the duty of the latter to contribute to the defence of the realm, the treasonable conduct of such as forbade them to do so, he then touches on his disagreement with his hegeman the King of England, and his neighbour the 'King of Germany', and ends by declaring that as an 'immense benefactor' to the Church he has a right to claim the Church's help against these his enemies

<sup>1</sup> Preuves de l'Histoire du Différend, etc., p. 14. (Dated omne ap S. Petrum Pontif. nostri anno 2)

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. p. 13. (Dated August 17 1296)

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. p. 13. (Dated September 21 1296.)

<sup>1</sup> Preuves de l'Histoire du Diff p 21 (No date)

As a next step the Pope sent his Nuncios, the Bishops of Albano and Palestrina, into France they were instructed to inform the King that the Pope had made and prolonged a truce between the conflicting princes and had pronounced an excommunication against anyone who broke it. Before the King read this letter he solemnly protested as follows. That the temporal government of his kingdom depended on himself alone nor had he any superior therein, and that he would not submit himself therein to any living person that he was determined to defend his rights and his realm with help of his friends, that this truce should be no hindrance thereto, while at the same time, in things spiritual he was ready to obey the orders of the Holy See as a devout son of the Church. The legates were then permitted to read the Papal brief<sup>1</sup> and to withdraw. Two months before this, the Pope had bidden his Nuncios excommunicate anyone who might stop them from exporting the money they had raised in France<sup>2</sup>.

The struggle of the Pope with the Colonna cardinals was at this time waxing hot and he found that even the Gallican clergy<sup>3</sup> were inclined to side with their king consequently feeling that he was not strong enough, for the moment, to persevere in his high tone to the end he now issued a fresh Bull<sup>4</sup> in which he declared,—and it is an amazing statement—that the Bull Clericus laicos was not meant to affect the kingdom of France. The King in his turn hastened to assure the Pontiff that he had never meant absolutely to forbid the export of the precious metals from the realm, and that he had made his proclamation only in the public interest. This seeming reconciliation was followed by an act which flattered the public feeling and pride of France. On the anniversary of his death Louis IX was solemnly canonised, and his remains were removed from St. Denis to the new church of Poissy built in his honour and dedicated to him as a new made Saint. More-

Preuves de l'Histoire du Duc. p. 27 (Dated April 20, 1297)

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. p. 25 (Dated February 7 1297)

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. p. 26 the Letter of the Archbishop of Rheims and his Suffragans.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid. p. 39. Noveritis nos. (Dated July 31 1297)

over, the French and English King being yet at variance, Boniface obtained their consent to his arbitration, on the understanding that he was to act as Benedetto Gaetani, that is, as a private person, not as Pope. And thus the Kings sought to save their rights, and the Pope trusted that it would in reality be impossible to separate the man from the Pontiff, and also that he might win the gratitude and goodwill of Philip. Through his arbitration, clearly favouring the French King, two-thirds of Aquitaine passed from Edward to France, and the sovereigns concluded a marriage-treaty Edward promising to espouse Margaret, the King's sister, and his son Edward, afterwards Edward II of England, being betrothed in 1303 to Isabelle, Philip daughter, whereby the seeds of the hundred years' war were sown.

But the friendship between Boniface and Philip was hollow. They occupied themselves in gathering strength for the coming struggle, in which each vowed to himself that he would crush the other or perish. A little before this time Philip had detached the Duke of Brittany from the English side, and had created him, as well as his cousin Robert of Artois, and Charles of Valois his brother, Peers of France. Thus he violated the old feudal principles, and showed himself no longer the 'first among his equals,' but a monarch bestowing on his subjects the high honour of being grouped in dignity around the throne. On the conclusion of the peace arranged by the Pope in his private character, the two Kings abandoned their allies each to the other. Edward wreaked his will on Wallace, Philip occupied Flanders. Guy of Dampierre was not strong enough to resist when his powerful supporters had left him, and, for a time, the kingdom of France touched the line of the Rhine<sup>1</sup>. And in 1299 Guy threw himself on Philip's mercy (as if there had ever been such a thing!), and was imprisoned in the Louvre, while the King caused the Parliament to declare that Flanders was formally joined to the crown, and rejoiced exceedingly at the thought that he had found a mine of wealth, from which he might draw inexhaustible supplies for his empty treasury. Around the throne were grouped the great lawyers, whose chief representatives were Peter Flotte and William of Nogaret, men who were now called Knights of the Law, a grotesque but significant title<sup>1</sup> the Colonnas were exiles in France, longing for the moment when the word should be given which would launch them against their mortal foe. All things were prepared for the strife, and thus the King stood firmly when the year 1300 came, and all seemed well with him. Treachery and rapacity had done their work, and he was now ready for the task he had set himself.

<sup>1</sup> William of Nangis, in Dom Bouquet, tom 20 p 581, says, 'concessum fuisse dicitur quod regnum Franciæ . usque ad Rhenum potentatis sua terminos dilataret'

And how fared it with Boniface? He, too seemed to have gathered strength. He had crushed the Colonnas, they had perished, or had fled to foreign lands. He had interfered with authority in the affairs of Scotland and Hungary. He had put Albert of Austria, King of the Romans, under ban<sup>2</sup>. And, lastly the year 1300 seemed to open with a revival of faith in Christendom, of faith centred on Rome and his own person. Never had crowds so devout flocked to the Eternal City. Men ceased to count them. but for a very abundant harvest that year there would have been a famine. Never were such countless gifts laid on the altars, never were the blessings of the Church received in return with such devout joy as in this year of Jubilee. It is said,—but one knows not with what truth, so false are all the writers who deal with his memory—that when messengers from Albert of Austria came to the Pope, Boniface met them with the crown on his head and a bare sword in his right hand and saluted them with the words, I, I am Caesar. I am the true Emperor<sup>3</sup>, and therefore supreme over all princes of the earth. Certain it is that from this time his claims grew more extreme, his language more violent. He seems to have been dazzled by the scene, and to have thought that what he saw proved that the Papacy still had its roots deep in the heart of the people.

<sup>1</sup> See above p. 349.

<sup>2</sup> The position of Boniface is well summed up in Milman's Latin Christianity bk. II chap. 9.

<sup>3</sup> He is even said to have used the words, all power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.

Soon after the close of the year of Jubilee the Pope named Bernard Saisset, Bishop of Pamiers, a city which he had but lately erected into an episcopal see, as his legate to the King's Court. It was an unlucky choice Saisset was a rash and violent man, instinct with the hereditary hatred of Languedoc for the French masters of the South. He did not hide his mind, and at the same time tried to rouse the Count of Foix and other Southerners to revolt against the King Wherefore the King set his lawyers on him, and had him arrested at Pamiers The King must have felt very sure of his ground, for he employed an ecclesiastic to take him prisoner His trial was pressed on, under the guidance of Peter Flotte<sup>1</sup>. In January 1301 came out a Bull in which the Pope spared no hard words towards the King, and endeavoured to stir up the slumbering enmity which existed between the North and South of France, by affirming 'that the Gallic people had ever been hostile to the Tolosan language, nor had done good to the men of Toulouse, but ever evil, and had bereft them of their property, and that the King himself did so' And this was presently followed by three several documents<sup>2</sup>, all of one date (December 5, 1301), the first of which summoned all ecclesiastics to Rome, and used unmeasured language as to the King's conduct, the second also summoned all Doctors of Theology and Masters of Canon Law to Rome, as though he would marshal the Church lawyers against those of the State, and the third was the famous Bull, entitled 'Ausculata fili' This Bull, which censured the King in no measured terms, and took up the position that the Pope was far above all

<sup>1</sup> Preuves de l'Histoire du Diff pp 621-662 It is said that Flotte was sent to Rome to insist on Saisset's condemnation, and had a stormy interview with the Pope The Pope is reported to have said, 'My power, the spiritual power, embraces and limits the temporal' To which Flotte made reply—'It may be so, but your power is verbal, while that of my King is real' The whole is probably a fiction

<sup>2</sup> Preuves de l'Histoire du Diff pp 48-54

kings, was read in all its harshness to Philip, the King, filled with scorn and anger at its audacity, had it solemnly burnt he banished from the kingdom the Nuncio who had brought it as well as the Bishop of Pamiers, thus putting an end to the lesser quarrel which had small importance by the side of the greater struggle now coming to its crisis.

It was probably at this moment (though the date is uncertain), that those two extraordinary documents, the Little Bull and its Answer were drawn up at Paris and circulated through France. No one will now defend the genuineness of the Little Bull, though there seems to be no doubt that it appeared about this time. The sharp brevity of the document is itself strong presumption against its genuineness as is also the fact that it is not among those Bulls which were afterwards annulled by Clement V. The two documents, each a few lines long were simply an appeal to public opinion in France—a strange appeal indicating whatever their influence might be that all the old reverence for the Papal name was dying out. The Little Bull itself bears the same date as the great Ausculta, fili Bull and may have been intended as a résumé of the claims set forth in it, it certainly gave emphatic expression to the Papal doctrine that the King was subject to the Pope in temporals as much as in spirituals. The mock reply was so coarse and brutal, that, had the tone of feeling not changed immensely in France, it would have been regarded as a blasphemy—as it was it passed without a protest. It opens thus

Philip to Boniface who makes himself out to be Sovereign Pontiff, little or no greeting. Be it known to thy supreme idiocy that we are subject to no man in things temporal and then echoing the close of the Little Bull, it ends with the words, Such as think otherwise we count to be fools and madmen.

Mens minds being thus prepared, the King took the bold step of throwing himself on the patriotism of the country and, in the April of 1302 called together the Estates of France that they might take cognisance of the quarrel. On the day for which they were summoned, 'the birthday of the nation,' as it has been pretentiously called, the Three Estates of France, the nobility, the clergy, and the burghers, met at Paris, and, sitting separately, considered the King's griefs. Thither came 'prelates, barons, chapters, conventual bodies, colleges, communities, and universities<sup>1</sup> of the cities of the realm, with masters in theology, and professors of either law, and other learned and grave persons of divers parts and realms<sup>2</sup>' Each body drew up an address to be forwarded to Rome. That of the towns was sure to be favourable enough to the royal side, the actual document is lost. The letters of the nobles and clergy are extant. That of the barons is addressed to the cardinals, and is couched in sharp rough terms, hinting that Boniface is an usurper seated on the Papal throne, and declaring that they do not seek redress of their griefs from the Pope but from their Lord the King. Very different in style and terms was the letter of the clergy, though in the main it was of like significance. Ecclesiastics were naturally much embarrassed by their position between the spiritual and the temporal powers. They applied for permission to obey the Papal summons to a council at Rome. The King and the barons refused their request, and they were made to know that if they went their goods would be liable to seizure—and seizure in Philip's time meant irreparable loss.

The Pope's reply, which was sent without delay (June 28, 1302), was gentle in tone, and again drew the old distinction, as to the subjection of the King to the Church, 'in matters of sin.' In a consistory held a little later he broke forth into violent language against Peter Flotte—'a man of Belial, a man half blind in body, and quite blind in soul,' and ended by a threat that he would, unless the King repented of his ways, 'chastise him like a child<sup>3</sup>.' The Pope knew not at that moment that he was already partly avenged of his enemies. The French had made themselves as hateful in Flanders as they had been in Sicily and a new 'Sicilian Vespers' had befallen them at Bruges<sup>1</sup>. Then Flanders burst into open revolt. The news of this mishap must have reached Paris a few days before the meeting of the States General and directly their work was done, the barons set forth, eager to punish the Flemish, and to sack their brimming cities. Peter Flotte went with them. Near Courtrai they came up with the Flemish footmen, a force of about twenty thousand, led by William of Juliers. This army of burghers and artisans knew that retreat was impossible, the French cavalry would have instantly cut them in pieces. So they boldly determined to face their oppressors, and took up a position behind a narrow canal, deep, with level banks, not seen at a little distance. Guy of Namur<sup>2</sup> and his nephew William of Juliers, while they waited, conferred knighthood on Peter Koning and forty leading citizens and then with their Belgian and German followers the two leaders sent their horses to the rear and made ready to fight afoot, on equal terms with the Flemish. Meanwhile the French knights, full of their accustomed vanity, recklessness and insubordination, put spurs to horse, making much dust, and coming on apace to crush the burgher folk they so despised. For haste and dust they saw nothing of the canal till it was too late to pull up, and in they went, then those behind pushed those before and followed them, till the flower of French chivalry lay a helpless heap, crushed and drowning in the mud. The Flemish men-at-arms crossed the water on either flank and fell on the disordered army. The rear fled in uttermost panic. Robert of Artois with his men alone tried to stay the fortunes of the day, but in vain. He fell, pierced with many wounds.

<sup>1</sup> These 'Universities' are the Communes of Southern cities, not the learned bodies

<sup>2</sup> The Continuator of William of Nangis, sub ann 1302

<sup>3</sup> Or, depose him like a groom, 'deponeremus Regem sicut unum garcionem' Regnaldus, sub ann 1302

The citizens, who for lack of arms and horses, could scarcely have stood against the barded chivalry, were brave enough on an equal field, and merciless. They spared no man, and knocked the barons and knights of France on the head like bullocks: the carnage was terrible; four thousand gilt spurs—some say even seven thousand—were hung up in Courtrai Cathedral<sup>1</sup> Thus perished the foremost men of France in a ditch. Terrible as this mishap seemed at the moment, it was not the King of France who was the loser. On the contrary, the death of so many lords of fiefs left him at leisure to pursue his plans for lifting the kingly power far above feudalism. The turbulent noblesse, which had thus ruined itself by careless insubordination<sup>2</sup>, was now no match for the cold King with his men of law. Boniface, however, hearing this, rejoiced. He did not discern the ultimate meaning of it, and thought that he might now take his enemy in his weakness. The bishops thought the same. Forty-five of them, on the news of the disaster, set forth for Rome. The King, who marched into Flanders with a strong army, found himself unable to make head against the insurgents, and ‘returned to France without any glory’<sup>3</sup>. From the other end of the realm came tidings of the revolt of Bordeaux, and the English King seemed likely to interfere.

<sup>1</sup> March 24, 1302

<sup>2</sup> Guy of Namur was nephew of the imprisoned Count, Guy of Dampierre and was fighting on his behalf.

And now at Rome the famous decretal, ‘Unam Sanctam’, was proclaimed before the assembled bishops (18th Nov. 1302), in it the claims of the Papacy were asserted in unmeasured terms. It forms the high-water mark of Papal pretensions; declares that the spiritual power ought to judge the temporal, while God alone can judge the spiritual. It was followed by a general excommunication of all who should lay hands on or despoil those who might go to Rome, a threat evidently intended for the protection of the forty-five French bishops. For a moment Philip seemed to lose confidence: his reply

<sup>1</sup> Eighty years later Charles VI saw these trophies, and massacred the grandchildren of the victors of the Day of the Spurs.

<sup>2</sup> We have seen before, at the battle of Mansourah, how undisciplined were these gallant lords of France.

<sup>3</sup> Continuator of William of Nangis, sub ann. 1302.

<sup>4</sup> Preuves du Diff. p. 54.

was timid, apologetic, weak. The Pope saw it, and hastened to strike his last blow. He summoned the King to speak out more clearly and amend the past, he threatened him with excommunication and the deposition that was understood to follow in its train (13th April, 1303). But, before this terrible Bull had left Rome, the King had recovered heart. He had (12th March 1303) again called together his Parliament, from which a great ordinance was issued, for the reformation of the realm. The proclamation was well received everywhere. Liberty was sold to serfs nobility to citizens. Nogaret also appeared with a series of charges against the Pope, in which he lays down four great points (1) that Boniface was no Pope but one who came in by another way (alluding to the abdication of Pope Celestin) (2) that he was a heretic, (3) a simoniacal person (4) a man of horrible crimes and vices. These are the usual charges, the commonplaces of a faithless and unscrupulous age, and they seem to have rested on no foundation. Yet they doubtless had some weight.

When the Bull of Excommunication reached France it was seized, its bearer imprisoned, the goods of the forty five prelates confiscated themselves cited to appear for judgment. The Inquisition was attacked and forbidden to act. The neutrality of Edward I was bought by the cession of Guienne. The Parliament was again called on in June to hear an entirely new and still more violent series of charges, drawn up by Plaisan, knight and lord of Vezenoble who was backed by all the power of the nobles. And next, the King declared that he appealed from all the bulls of Boniface to a General Council, and to the Pope who should be elected in his stead. even the high clergy of France supported this appeal. Nogaret was at this time in Italy. he was instructed to lodge the appeal with Boniface, and to make it public in Rome. The Pope who was at Anagni his native place, for the summer heats, rejoined by fixing the 8th of September as the day on which France would be laid under Interdict and her King declared to be excommunicated.

Nogaret now laid his plans with Sciarra Colonna, the most turbulent of Italians, the family foe of Boniface, who burnt to avenge his fathers on the aged Pontiff. Several hundred soldiers were hired, led by Rinaldi da Supino, the captain of Ferentino, the neighbour-town and, after Italian fashion, the rival to Anagni. On the morning of the 7th of September the conspirators entered Anagni, its captain, Arnulfi, had been bought by French gold. Instead of resisting, Arnulfi allowed the people to sack the cardinals' houses and the Papal treasure. Boniface, undefended, fell into the hands of his foes. He showed a firmness and dignity worthy of his position and character. Colonna would fain have slain him at once, had not Nogaret interposed. He is said to have struck the old man in the face with his mailed hand till the blood came<sup>1</sup>. Nogaret also heaped abuse on him. They allowed none of his attendants to be with him. He was set on a horse, with his face to the tail, and so carried to prison. For two days he neither ate nor drank, for fear of poison. Then the people of Anagni could bear it no longer, they rose and drove out the soldiers, and delivered the aged Pontiff. The Romans too had tidings of the outrage, and sent out their militia to bring him safely back. His return was a triumphal march. Even then he found the French party in the ascendant in Rome, and was again almost a prisoner. This was more than he could bear. Worn out with weight of years, with the terrible trials of the last few days, and the privations he had suffered, on this last mortification he gave way, and died<sup>2</sup>. Strange and malignant tales were told of his last moments. The horrors which were thought to people monkish brains alone, seemed now to have found place in the minds of hard cold lawyers. They grouped portents round his deathbed, they declared that he died furious, without the last consolations of the faith. Nor did the hatred of his foes leave him even there, for years his memory was pursued with bitter zeal by the King and his lawyers—it was part of their ghastly triumph that they should also seek to destroy the character of the dead.

<sup>1</sup> Chron. de S. Denis

<sup>2</sup> At the age of eighty-six.

Ambitious, unforgiving untrue, the great Pope had been withal a noble figure he was the last champion of the ages of chivalry fighting to the death against the new life of a new age. And from his fall dates the true beginning of the medieval monarchy, that absolute Kingship of which France has given to Europe the first and the grandest specimen, and from which France has also freed herself with the convulsions of a revolution, and the risks of an imperial despotism. The Papal dream of universal monarchy crumbled to the ground, and left the nations to work out their destinies after their kind.

The cardinals elected an able and good man, Benedict XI as Pope. He began his reign prudently and firmly, and it seemed as if he might be destined to repair the breaches made by the terrible contest we have just depicted. But, even as he was preparing his measures to defend the memory of Boniface, when he had reigned but nine months, he suddenly sickened and died. All men deemed that he had perished by poison.

Meanwhile King Philip had won in Flanders the sterile victory of Mons-en-Puelle (A.D. 1304) finding then that the Flemings were raising another army with all the obstinacy of the race he gave up the struggle and made peace recognising the independence of Flanders, and retaining only his feudal lordship. The eldest son of Count Guy did him homage and Flanders, with the exception of two or three frontier towns, passed away from France.

In truth the interests of the King lay in another direction. He had discovered that he must keep a steady hand on the Papacy or it might yet work him woe and he laid his plans to that end. The unexpected death of Benedict XI now gave him his opportunity. The Conclave was evenly balanced, and nine months slipped by without an election. The Guelfic Gaetani the friends and relations of Boniface neutralised the Ghibelline Colonnas, who were the friends of France. At last the Colonnas proposed that the Gaetani party should nominate three, not of their own number as candidates, one of whom they promised to elect within forty days. They consented, and picked out three prelates, known friends of their party and foes to Philip. The Colonnas then sent the three names to the King, advising him to make terms with Bertrand de Goth, Archbishop of Bordeaux, a subject of the English King and foe to the French, and to choose him as Pope. The King sought an interview with the Archbishop, and hung before the Gascon's dazzled eyes the grand prize, promising it to him on certain conditions. Let us name them as they are handed down to us, without saying whether they are matters of fact, or were invented after the career of the Pontiff had shown that he was somehow tied down to the King. They say he agreed (1) to reconcile the King with the Church, (2) to absolve the King's agents, (3) to grant him a tithe on the property of the clergy of France for five years, (4) to reinstate the Colonnas, and to make some French cardinals, to be named by the King, (5) to censure the conduct of Boniface—it is said that he also agreed to a sixth condition, the terms of which have never been revealed; some have thought it referred to his residence in Avignon, others to the destruction of the Templars, others to a promise of the imperial crown for Charles of Valois. To all these things is Bertram said to have bound himself by solemn oath and hostages given—and thereupon, within the forty days, he was duly elected Pope, and took the name of Clement V. The cardinals were summoned to Lyons for the consecration, they came unwillingly, knowing that the wily King had duped them. The new Pope was consecrated in the Church of St Just, in the Castle at Lyons, which part of the city then belonged to France; and, after the ceremony, he mounted on horseback, with the King at his bridle. Outside the castle gate Philip gave up the rein to the Counts of Valois and Evreux, and to the Duke of Brittany—fortunately for him, for a high wall, brought down by the weight of the crowd that thronged it, fell on the procession. The new-made Pope was thrown from his horse, his tiara broken, the Duke of Brittany and one of the Pope's brothers were killed on the spot, the Count of Valois severely wounded; many others suffered. Thus gloomily opened the new era of the Papacy in which, as Walsingham says, the Church was judged by Pope and King like the Lord between Herod and Pilate. The King held the Pontiff captive in France the Pope revenged himself by passing from city to city with a following of courtiers, who ate up the land, and caused grievous scandal by their shameless lives the Pope not less shameless than the rest. The Church was even more degraded and humiliated by this spectacle of luxury and sin, than by the manifest subjection of the Pontiff. Even Philip himself had to interfere, it seemed as though his prisoner was like to eat up all the wealth in the land.

And now Clement began to pay the price of his elevation. He cancelled the obnoxious Bulls, the King's instruments were pardoned after a time even Nogaret, though reluctantly Nine French cardinals were made, so as to secure the King's influence in the Conclave some of them men who had been professors of civil law in order to make weight against the Canonists In the spring time of 1307 the King met the Pope at Poitiers, on pretence of arranging for a crusade to place Charles of Valois on the throne of Constantinople, and to recover the Holy City the true object of the meeting was to press on the Pope the condemnation of the memory of Boniface and the overthrow of the Templars. As to the former, Clement escaped by referring the matter to a council to be held at Vienne on the Rhone as to the Templars, proof was demanded of their crimes and thus the Pontiff hoped to win a little time. In the former case he escaped from being compelled to act. To have condemned Boniface as a false Pope would have been to render null all his acts, to make his cardinals no cardinals their election of himself no election, himself no Pope The whole fabric of the Church seemed to be shaken and men remembered the broken wall of Lyons, and the Pontiff fallen in the dust.

III. THE EPOCH OF THE TEMPLARS, A.D 1304-1314

The Templars he could not save from the fearful doom which awaited the order.

In 1118 nine knights took possession of a house near the Temple at Jerusalem, and called themselves its Knights Defenders. They lived on alms, in simple poverty, following the usual vows of chastity, purity, humility. They wore a white cloak with a red cross on it their dress and rules were fixed at the Synod of Troyes. Gifts soon rolled in upon them, land and goods. Ere long their numbers began to increase swiftly, their wealth more swiftly still, till their income rivalled that of kings. With wealth came luxury and pride. When the Holy Land fell completely into Mahomedan hands on the loss of Acre in 1291, they abandoned the hopeless task, and settled in Cyprus. By the end of the thirteenth century they had almost all returned to Europe. They were peculiarly strong and wealthy in France—the strength and wealth were alike dangerous to them. In Paris they built their fortress, the Temple, over against the King's palace of the Louvre, and in that stronghold the King himself had once to take refuge from the angry Parisian mob, exasperated by his heavy extortions. During the life and death struggle with the Papacy, the order had not taken the side of the Church against the sovereign, for their wealth had held them down. Philip, however, knew no gratitude, and they were doomed. A powerful and secret society endangered the safety of the state. their wealth was a sore temptation there was no lack of rumours. Dark tales came out respecting the habits of the order, tales exaggerated and blackened by the diseased imagination of the age. Popular proverbs, those ominous straws of public opinion, were heard in different lands, hinting at dark vices and crimes. Doubtless the vows of the order, imposed on unruly natures, led to grievous sins against the first laws of moral life. And there was more than this there were strange rumours of terrible infidelity and blasphemy, and men were prepared to believe everything

So no one seemed to be amazed when, in October, 1307 the King made a sudden coup d'état, arrested all the Templars in France on the same day and seized their goods. The Temple at Paris with the Grand Master fell into his hands. Their property was presently placed in the custody of the Pope's nuncios in France, the knights were kept in dark and dismal prisons. Their trial was long and tedious. Two hundred and thirty-one knights were examined, with all the brutality that examination then meant, the Pope also took the depositions of more than seventy. From these examinations what can we learn?

All means were used—some were tortured, others threatened, others tempted with promises of immunity<sup>1</sup>. They made confession accordingly and the ghastly catalogue of their professed ill-doings may be read in the history of the trial. Who shall say what truth there was in it all? Probably little or none. Many confessed and then recanted their confession. The golden image with eyes of glowing carbuncle which they worshipped—the trampling and spitting on the crucifix—the names of Galla and Baphomet—the hideous practices of the initiation,—all these things pass before us, in the dim uncertainty like some horrible procession of the vices in hell. What the truth was will never be known—the order may have contracted some eastern habits and introduced some eastern ceremonies, probably also the moral condition of the knights was low. At any rate, enough was said, true or false, for the King's purposes and he urged the Pope definitely to condemn the order. Clement hesitated, temporised, even fled more than once disguised from Poitiers towards Bordeaux. But the wily King was prepared even for this and he was discovered and brought back. He had weighted himself with several mule-loads of treasure which he could not bring himself to leave in the King's clutches, and these impeded his flight—otherwise he might have escaped. In 1309 the King at last allowed him to leave Poitiers: he turned his face southwards, and travelled slowly as far as Avignon. There, in a city destined hereafter to belong to the Holy See the wretched Pope, to whom the King absolutely refused permission to return to Rome, deemed that he had won a little independence, and established his court. Here the Papacy abode, in the grasp of France, for seventy years. Who could resist the name, which seemed so well to suit it, 'the Babylonish Captivity'?

<sup>1</sup> See Dupuy Procès des Templiers, p. 161

The trial of Boniface went on at Avignon, Nogaret and other lawyers insisting on his condemnation, they urged that his body should be exhumed and burnt as that of a heretic. This affair, however, was again suffered to stand over while the trial of the Templars was pressed on.

The knights made a dignified defence in these last moments of their history; they did not flinch either at the terrible prospect before them, or through memory of the tortures which they had undergone. Public opinion, in and out of France, began to stir against the barbarous treatment they had received, they were no longer proud and wealthy princes, but suffering martyrs, showing bravery and a firm front against the cruelties of the King and his lawyers. Marigni, Philip's minister and friend, and the King himself, were embarrassed by the number and firmness of their victims, by the sight of Europe looking on aghast, by the murmurs of the people. Marigni suggested that men who had confessed and recanted might be treated as relapsed heretics, such being the law of the Inquisition, (what irony was here!) and accordingly in 1310 an enclosure was made at Paris, within which fifty-nine Templars perished miserably by fire. Others were burnt later at Sens.

The King, not being sure of the Council summoned to meet at Vienne, at last consented to abandon his vindictive attack on the memory of Boniface, and Clement, in return, declared that the King and his counsellors had been actuated by excellent motives in all their conduct towards the late Pope: finally he promised that the Order of the Templars should be definitely dissolved. The King and Pope worked on the feeble Council, until in March 1312 the abolition of the order was formally decreed, and its chief property its lands and buildings, were given over to the Knights of St. John, to be used for the recovery of the Holy Land, which thing, says the Supplementor to William of Nangis, 'came not to pass, but rather the endowment did but make them worse than before. The chief part of the spoil, as might be well believed, never left the King's hands. One more tragedy, and then all was over. The four heads of the order were still at Paris, prisoners—Jacques de Molai Grand Master Guy of Anvergne the Master of Normandy and two more. The Pope had reserved their fate in his own hands, and sent a commission to Paris, who were enjoined once more to hear the confession of these dignitaries, and then to condemn them to perpetual captivity. But at the last moment the Grand Master and Guy publicly retracted their forced confessions, and declared themselves and the order guiltless of all the abominable charges laid against them. Philip was filled with devouring rage. Without further trial or judgment he ordered them to be led that night to the island in the Seine<sup>1</sup> there they were fastened to the stake and burnt.

Philip's dark reign was now drawing to a close and the last year was the darkest of all. The wives of his three sons were accused of loose lives. Jeanne of Burgundy with whom Philip of Poitiers expected to receive the heritage of Franche-Comté was spared, doubtless the prospect of losing this fair province weighed with the King but the two others, Margaret, Queen of Navarre, and Blanche wife of Charles, were condemned to languish out the miserable term of their lives in close prison. Their lovers were put to death, with every conceivable detail of cruelty.

The nation could abide it no longer. Nobles and burghers made league together, the King's oppressions touched them all his cold cruelty was a disgrace to them all We see in this last year of Philip's reign a first confederation in France against the crushing weight of royal tyranny, and at the head of the document drawn up by the two orders, we read the venerable name of the Seneschal of Champagne, the aged Sire of Joinville, now hard on a hundred years old It was as if the shade of St. Louis came forth to rebuke his unworthy grandson

<sup>1</sup> Where now the statue of Henri IV stands. Martin, Histoire des Français, 4. 305, note.

Philip was amazed and overwhelmed, an accident out hunting shook his health, anxiety forbade his recovery, and in November 1314 he expired at Fontainebleau, at the early age of forty-six years. Yet he had seemed to have reigned an age It was like the red setting of a hot and angry sun amidst banks of tempestuous cloud

His reign saw some additions to the French territory. In 1286 Edward I of England ceded Le Quercy, in 1292 Bigorre fell in by a legal decision, in 1295 Valenciennes at one edge of the realm, and Montpellier at the other, were incorporated in France<sup>1</sup>. the greatest accession of all was that of the 'second city of France,' Lyons, which was absorbed into the kingdom in 1312 That city had had many woers the Emperor, the Archbishop, the Chapter, and the King of France, (to say nothing of the Count of Forez and the civic authorities,) all had rights over her, and in the midst of their rival suzerainties she had maintained a kind of independence But in this year (A D 1312) a quarrel broke out between the two banks of the Rhone, between the archbishop and the citizens; the French garrison of St Just fomenting their quarrels At last archbishop and burghers made peace, and together attacked the King's folk Whereon Louis le Hutin, the King's eldest son, was sent against them with a strong army, and the place gave way The archbishop was sent to Paris, and made submission and thus Lyons once more became a Gallic city

It is needless to draw the odious character of the King It can be seen in his every act, in the whole chronicle of his reign.

<sup>1</sup> Some put these additions in the year 1349

CHAPTER XI

The Three Sons of Philip le Bel, A.D. 1314-1328

I LOUIS X THE QUARRELSOME, A.D. 1314-1316

PHILIP died in the beginning of a strong reaction against absolutism and his eldest son, Louis le Hutin, the Quarrelsome, the Wrangler twenty five years old, was a mere child in sense, unfit to cope with this new difficulty. A thriftless and frivolous person, he was little fit to rule over France, his father's kingdom, and Navarre, which he held by right of his mother; he thought only of amusement in tournament and court, and left the business of the realm to his uncle Charles of Valois.

Now Charles of Valois, ambitious, turbulent and empty, was only too ready to be the instrument of the reaction. Did this not mean vengeance on the man who had stood in his way? Enguerrand of Marigni, the other King only a poor Norman gentleman by birth, who had wielded the power of the realm while Charles was chasing bubbles over Europe, and on whom accordingly the ill will of the past reign had fallen, was seized and tried at the Temple by the young King himself, Charles acting the part of accuser with urgent malignity.<sup>1</sup> The fallen minister was not allowed to defend himself even the wish of Louis that he should be banished was set aside, he was hung, like a thief, with great indignity His death was the signal that the feudal interests had recovered the ascendancy. The noblesse, following its fatal instincts, forthwith broke its ranks; each man seeking the old lawless independency, with no care of public liberties, nor of anything save its seignorial courts and private wars, and trial by battle. And thus the aristocracy of France missed its opportunity. It might have moved side by side with the nobles of England. The moment the pressure of Philip's strong hand was off them they abandoned their league with the burghers, and sought only to return to their congenial state of chaos. The appeal to the 'constitutions of St. Louis' were in many mouths it was a good cry, though the meaning now attached to those words would never have been allowed by the good King, for those who used them wanted nothing but the dissolution of the kingdom. No wonder if even the folly of Louis X grew alarmed. Monarchy was reduced to great weakness, concession followed concession, the nobles seemed likely to leave him nothing but the shadow of power.

<sup>1</sup> Johannes de S. Victore, in Dom Bouquet, tom. 31 p. 660, where there is a hostile account of the last days of the minister. The anonymous continuator of this chronicle tells us that when Charles was on his death-bed he had great repentance for the death of Enguerrand de Marigni; and at a dole given after his death this was said to the poor: Pray for Monseigneur Enguerrand and for M. Charles, thus putting Marigni's name before that of the prince.—Continuation de la Chronique de Jean de S. Victoire, Dom Bouquet, tom. 31 636.

Then came out one of those documents which seem like lightning-flashes in the darkness. The King was forced to seek support, and the lawyer-spirit, though for the moment checked, was far from vanquished. The legists clearly modelled this ordinance on the Roman Law, and it is notable as containing a first distinct declaration of that principle which afterwards became the guiding line of the constitutional changes in France, the principle that 'every man according to the law of nature ought to be born free<sup>1</sup>'. It was but a step to add the words 'and equal'. Still it would seem that the King's aim was little beyond the desire to open a new vein of contribution. For this act, after its grand opening, sinks down into a mere permission to serfs to purchase their freedom for good and solid considerations.

He wanted cash to fight the Flemings with, he did all in his power to destroy commerce, by those foolish regulations which we so often meet with by taxing the merchants, forbidding all dealings with the Flemish, &c. He went on campaign as far as the Lys, there the heavy rains conquered him and he withdrew again to France, not without much inconvenience and some disgrace<sup>1</sup>. In this year too, and the next (A.D. 1315, 1316), great distress and famine fell on France. And in the midst of all this weakness and misery the King at Vincennes, as if he had been a boy played at ball and got very hot, then indiscreetly went down into a cold cellar and drank wine without stint, whereof the coldness penetrated to his vitals, and he took to his bed and died in June 1316<sup>2</sup> leaving one daughter Jeanne, and his Queen with child.

<sup>1</sup> Ord des Rois, I, p 583, July 1315 'Comme selon le droit de nature chacun doit naistre franc'

And now arose a great question who should succeed to the throne? If the Queen bore a son the matter would settle itself. If a daughter, would Jeanne become Queen, or would the crown pass to Philip of Poitiers the late King's brother. The barons of France at once seized on the reins of government, and the royal power seemed for the moment suspended. But Philip returned from Lyons, where he had been making a Pope John XXII, a worldly immoral creature of the French crown. The barons named him Regent of France and Navarre till the Queen should have a child. If that child was a boy, that then Philip should still be Regent for eighteen years, if the babe was a girl, then the two princesses should take Navarre Champagne and Brie abandoning all claim to France and Philip should be proclaimed King. This was not to be carried out till they were of age to act, when, if they refused to give up their claim on the French throne, right should be done them therein. In that case, Navarre and Champagne would not longer be secured to them. Philip, in the interval, was to act as governor of all, France, Navarre and Champagne<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> E. Hor. Chronicon Bernardi Galtonis, Dom. Bouquet, tom. 21 p. 725.

<sup>2</sup> Johannes de S. Victore, Dom. Bouquet, tom. 21 p. 663.

<sup>3</sup> Hallam, Middle Ages, chap. 1 p. 1 (vol. 1 pp. 41, 42; ed. 1846).

The question could not thus be settled without some debate. If women could everywhere succeed to fiefs, and if the crowns of Europe were, in theory, fiefs of the Empire, then surely a queen might sit on the French throne. On the other hand, it was felt that this powerful monarchy, the lord even of the Papacy, could not really be under feudal subjection to the Empire, and that the question must be settled by other considerations. One would have thought that the barons would take care that the regency should continue, and the power of the crown be weakened by being placed on a woman's brow.

II PHILIP V, 'LE LONG,' OR 'THE TALL' A.D 1316-1322.

The Queen bore a son, who was named John, but in seven days he died. Then Philip, holding that this boy by being born freed him from the barons' engagement, and by dying had found him his opportunity, broke faith at once with his defenceless niece, hastened to Rheims, filled the Cathedral with his own followers, and compelled the archbishop to consecrate him King. Thence he returned to Paris, assembled the citizens, and, in the presence of a great concourse of barons and notables of the realm, declared that no female could succeed to the crown of France<sup>1</sup>.

Thus began the so-called Salic Law of France, through the determined violence of an unscrupulous man. The lawyers round the throne, seeking to give to the act of might the sanction of right, bethought them of that passage in the law of the Salian Franks which declares 'That no part or-heritage of Salic land can fall to a woman<sup>2</sup>,' and it is from this that the law obtained the name of 'the Salic Law.'

Great and obvious as were the advantages of a male succession in earlier times, it may be a question whether France was the happier for the series of Queen Regents which it entailed, or for the exclusion of that sex which in certain conditions of society seems to be especially fitted for the throne. England, at least, need not regret her freedom from this law. The Queens of England take rank among the noblest and wisest of her sovereigns and in our days a Queen has reigned during the happiest period of our country's history.

<sup>1</sup> The continuator to Nangis, p. 222. Hallam doubts this statement.

<sup>2</sup> The text of this law (tit. 42 § 6) runs thus: 'De terra vero Salica nulla portio hereditatis mulieri veniat, sed ad virilem sexum tota terrae hereditas perveniat.' Or in the Pactum Legis Salicae, tit. 6 § 2 § 6, 'De terra vero Salica in mulierem nulla portio hereditatis transit, sed hoc virilis sexus adquirit. h. e. filii in ipsa hereditate succedunt.'

Thus Philip V surnamed le Long the Tall, seized the throne. His short reign was dark and evil. There is no lack of ordinances and activity but society was plunged too deep in evils of old growth to be cured. The Franciscans, who had already shown signs of passing away from the orthodox creed, now attacked the flagrant vices of the Pope and his court, and preached a Gospel of the Holy Ghost, and a return to the primitive simplicity of the early Church. Persecution at once set in and though the people took their side, the order had at last to place itself under the shield of Louis of Bavaria, whom the Pope refused to recognise.

The angry and down-trodden people, excited by the friars, rose with great violence, demanding to be led to the Holy Land. They committed the usual excesses pillaged churches and castles, and fell on the Jews and were suppressed without difficulty. Horrid rumours of magic now filled the air the lepers, a race by themselves, were accused of sorcery and of poisoning wells in order that all men might become lepers like themselves. They were seized, and slain, or burnt, or shut up for life in lazar-houses. Then came the Jews turn they were attacked by every one as confederates of the lepers many of them too were burnt, and their wealth taken for a prey<sup>1</sup>

And then the King having worked this woe, was smitten with death in the year 1322 at the early age of thirty

<sup>1</sup> Johannes a S. Victore, Dom Bouquet, tom. 21 p. 673.

III CHARLES IV, 'THE FAIR.' A D. 1322-1328.

Philip V had made a law against his brother's daughters, now his brothers used that law against his daughters; his four girls were set aside, and the Count of La Marche, the youngest of the three sons of Philip le Bel, was crowned as Charles IV, 'the Fair'

His reign was brief and unimportant the direct line of the Capetian Kings was dying out in obscurity There were a few ordinances; one or two illustrate the still growing power of the lawyers; some slight hostilities take place in the South against the English in Guenne, there is an ambitious but unimportant demonstration against Louis of Bavaria, who despised the Papal excommunication, and set up as Antipope a Franciscan friar, who, following the tradition of his order, called himself the 'Pope of the Poor' And now the strange feebleness which had brought the others to their graves, smote Charles the Fair in 1328 He called Philip of Valois to his bedside, appointed him guardian to his Queen, and, if she bore a son, then also of the boy: if it were a girl, then 'the twelve peers of France and the high barons should consult as to the succession, and give the crown to him who had the right thereto'<sup>1</sup> The child was a girl 'And thus, in less than thirteen years, perished all the noble and fair lineage of the Fair King, whereat all marvelled much but God knoweth the cause thereof, not we'<sup>2</sup>.

So ended the last son of Philip the Fair smitten, so public rumour held, even as his father and his brothers had been smitten, by the curse of the dying Templars

Then the barons, joining with 'the notables of Paris and the good towns,' considered who should be made King It lay between Philip, Count of Valois, first cousin of the three last

<sup>1</sup> Froissart, chap 49 (ed Lettenhove, I, c 3, p 10)

<sup>2</sup> 'Et ainsinc toute la noble lignie et belle du Biau roy trespassa en moins de xiii ans, dont tnt orent grant merveille, mès Diex scet la cause, laquelle nous ne savons'—Continuation de la Chron de Jean de S Victoire, Dom Bouquet, tom 21, p 688

Kings son of Charles, younger brother of Philip le Bel, on one side and on the other side Edward III of England, who was the son of Isabelle of France Philip le Bel's daughter<sup>1</sup>

They decided against Edward of England on these grounds, to which there seems no reply

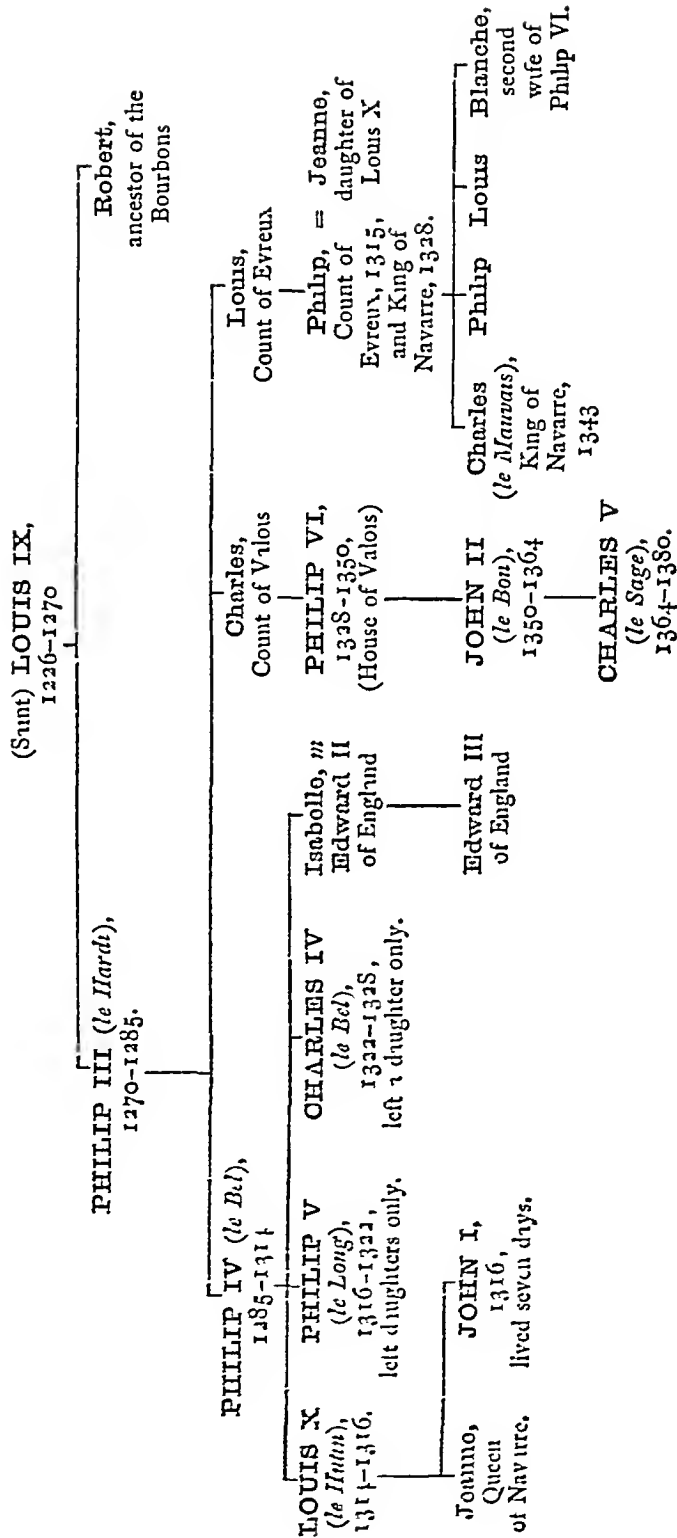

By the 'Salic Law' Isabelle and her heirs were excluded from the succession, and even supposing the Salic Law not to exist, then there stood before him Jeanne, Queen of Navarre, daughter of Louis X, three daughters of Philip IV and one of Charles the Fair. If however he urged his distinction that, 'though females could not succeed, their male issue could, this would also be of no avail to him for, in that case, Charles 'the Bad, Count of Evreux, son of Jeanne, the daughter of Louis X, had a claim to the throne at least as good as that of Edward of England. Therefore they gave the crown to Philip of Valois and a new line of sovereigns dates from this moment<sup>2</sup>

We bid farewell with regret to the direct line which produced princes so great as Hugh Capet, Louis VI, St. Louis, and Philip IV. They had reigned in and illustrated the ages of chivalry now gone by. They had given form and consistency to the kingdom, and had laid the foundations of that great monarchy of which France is justly proud for the monarchy at last was identified with France herself and, with France, did much to shape the destinies of modern Europe

<sup>1</sup> It is not quite clear whether Edward made any formal claim to either the regency or the throne. Froissart (ed. Lettenhove 1 c. 41 pp. 127-128) says, Fu bien nouvelle de Edouwart le jone rol d'Engleterre, fil de sa serour mais la querelle fut debatue et point longnement soustenue, car li douze per de France dissent et encore dient que la couronne de France est de si noble condition qu'elle ne puet venir par nulle secession à femelle ne à fil de femelle.

<sup>2</sup> See Genealogical Chart on next page.

TABLE XII.—THE SUCCESSION TO THE FRENCH THRONE.

BOOK IV.

MONARCHY AND FEUDALISM.

PERIOD OF THE 'HUNDRED YEARS WAR'

A. D. 1328-1455

CHAPTER I

The Period of the 'Hundred Years War.'

Philip of Valois, newly elected King of France, was at this time thirty-five years of age. He was a great feudal lord, and the barons doubtless deemed that they had ruled out of their peers to the throne, and that he would not fulfil them. But they mistook their man; for Philip had neither generosity nor justice in him. Cruel and violent, he turned his hand against those who had supported him, as soon as he could stand alone. In his youth he had been rash and hot in tourney and adventure; when he came to man's estate he was still hasty and headstrong; and, worse still, he listened greedily to evil counsel, and preferred it to good<sup>1</sup>. The three lords, the Counts of Namault, Guy of Blois, and Robert of Artois, who had married Philip's three sisters, had taken great pains to win the consent of the barons, and so he was chosen King, and crowned at Rheims with due solemnity. At the same time he promised his cousin, Louis of Flanders, that he would never enter Paris till he had beaten down the pride of the Flemings, who were now in full revolt against their senseless count. So he sent forth his summons at once gathered a great host of feudal lords, who rejoiced in the thought of Flemish spoil, and marched to Arras, and thence onwards into Flanders. He pitched his tent under the hill of Cassel with the fairest and greatest host in the world around him. The Flemish, under Claus Dennequin, lay on the hill-top thence they came down all unawares in three columns on the French camp in the evening and surprised the King at supper and all but took him. The French soon recovered from the surprise for God would not consent that lords should be discomfited by such ruffraff<sup>1</sup> they slew the Flemish Captain Dennequin, and of the rest but few escaped<sup>2</sup>, for they deigned not to flee, so stubborn were those despised weavers of Flanders. This little battle, with its great carnage of Flemish sufficed to lay all Flanders at the feet of its count. They all swore homage anew to him and the King having fulfilled his promise, thanked and dismissed his host, and, accompanied by the King of Bohemia and the King of Navarre entered Paris with great pomp and there held high state and show with his Queen who, it may be added, was a woman not likely to lead the King into good ways<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> 'Chis rois Philippes, en son jone temps, avoit esté uns rustes et pour-sivoit joustes et tournois, mais il creoit leperement fol conseil, et, en son vir, il fu cruels et hausters, Chis rois fist en son temps mainte hastive justice'—Laitenrove) I, c. 13, p. 135.

Thus the opening of the reign was successful and splendid. The feudal lords were full of goodwill for one who had shown himself ready to wipe out the old stain of their disgrace at Courtrai and in whom they innocently thought they saw the triumph of their interests his cousins reigned in Naples and Hungary a group of lesser kings, Bohemia, Navarre Majorca, Scotland, gave lustre to his throne even the youthful King of

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), i c. 42 p. 133.

They went down 16,000 strong and left 13,000 dead on the field.

<sup>2</sup> Trop male et périlleuse fu celle roine de France, et aussi elle morut de male mort. — Froissart (Lettenhove), i c. 43 p. 135.

England did not venture to refuse his homage for Guenne and Ponthieu. With ordinary good faith and ability, Philip might have strengthened and bettered his kingdom, and have averted the evils impending over it. But he had no wisdom, and his reign was the great beginning of woes for his people.

When the French King and the twelve peers, in the fair church of Amiens, met the English King with his barons and prelates, it is said that Edward refused to put his hands into Philip's hands, and did homage only with mouth and word<sup>1</sup>; and that he declared that he was willing to swear it 'so far forth as he was holden,' that he must refer matters in dispute to his Parliament at Westminster; and that he could not do anything which it forbade<sup>2</sup>. The French King did not press the boy either, as Froissart says, because he was keen to go to the Crusade<sup>3</sup>, and to take Edward with him in his train, or because he thought that any act of homage whatever was so much gain, so far as it might seem finally to close the question as to Edward's right to the succession. A Parliament was then duly held in England on the homage question, which was discussed till 1331, at the end of that time the King was advised to write a letter under his great seal, acknowledging his duty to do homage 'such as he ought to do'<sup>4</sup>. Edward followed it up by a hasty visit to Paris, during which all the difficulties between the two sovereigns, uncle and nephew, seemed to be smoothed away.

Not long after this Robert of Artois, grandson of that Count of Artois who had perished at Courtrai, the King's brother-in-law, and 'the man of all the world who had most helped the King to attain to the crown and heritage,' thought that his time for repayment was come, and submitted to Philip his old claim to his grandsire's inheritance. This domain had been left by the old count to his daughter; and the claims of Robert, as

<sup>1</sup> 'De bouce et de parole tant seullement'—Froissart (Lettenhove), 1, c 45, p 142

<sup>2</sup> Ibid

<sup>3</sup> Philip took the Cross in 1337, but did not go, partly, because of the imminent war with England, partly, because the Pope would not promise him the imperial crown and certain other demands he made

<sup>4</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), 1, c 46, pp 144, 145.

nearest male heir had been defeated by the interested views of the sons of Philip le Bel. Philip of Valois was as little willing to listen to him as his predecessors had been and the lawyers declared the documents he produced to be false. He was also accused of using poison to rid himself of his aunt Mahaut and her daughters, who were in possession of the fiefs. Things went so ill with him that he fled to Brussels there he was accused of having used magical arts to procure the King's death—the great fear of the age was magic, as we shall see a little later, in the days of Jeanne Darc. He was banished, his goods confiscated, his accomplices were caught and executed. He did not deem himself safe till he had placed the Channel between himself and Philip. As a refugee he was well received by Edward, and fanned the young King's ambition and discontent (A.D. 1334). We shall often see, during this period, how easy it was to pass from one court to the other the language spoken in both was nearly the same and there was little or no sense of dishonour connected with a change of allegiance.

Thus did royalty backed by the lawyers, follow its old course smiting down the opposition of the feudal nobles thus did the King lay the foundations of that illwill which hindered him in his struggles against England. And not content with this, he devised measures which tampered with the coin of the realm, and by vexatious restrictions interfered with (and in fact almost stopped) the course of trade throughout France. Thus he alienated the merchants and burghers, and at the same time dried up the sources of his revenue<sup>1</sup>. Nothing tended so much to equalise the two competitors for the French throne as the harmony between all classes which had grown up in England, and the discord which prevailed in France.

In this way Philip of Valois made ready to meet the dangers of the great Hundred Years War which was so soon to break forth upon his shores.

<sup>1</sup> See the note to Lettenhove's Froissart, 1 p. 177 in which the popular discontent is described.

It is time we sketched the rise of the great rival of Philip, Edward III of England.

At almost the same moment England and France became alike the scenes of a feudal reaction. To England, in 1326, Isabelle of France had come back with her young son, had been welcomed by the barons and bishops, the feudal nobility in Church and State, had overthrown and slain, by their help, the unhappy Edward II and his minion De Spenser; and the kingdom, as we have seen in the young King's appeal to parliament, had fallen almost entirely under the guidance of the feudal lords and the good cities. In France, in 1328, from different causes, the succession to the French throne had been placed in the hands of the great French nobles, who elected the nearest heir, certainly, but still one of their own number.

Here however the parallel ends: the two princes followed very different lines, Philip, a despot, in the midst of a turbulent and ill-affected feudalism, Edward, a popular sovereign, arousing his people to a fresh sense of their national existence, adopting the national language at court, attaching to himself all classes, finding a sphere for the bravery of his nobles, for the constancy and quickness of his yeomen, even for the wildness of his Welsh and Irish followers. In developing the resources of their two countries the two princes again followed opposite lines. Edward threw open his ports to all comers, welcomed them, gave them a home, while Philip continued the old vexatious and ruinous policy of Philip le Bel. Commerce ceased to pass through France: new routes, by Flanders and Germany, or by the Straits of Gibraltar, brought the wealth of the East to the shores of Britain. The incessant fluctuation of the value of coin in France, the uncertainty as to weights and measures; the known rapacity of the Court, all these things strangled trade<sup>1</sup>. In every way, as the wealth and strength of England grew, that of France waned. There is some truth in the saying, that 'the secret of the battles of Crécy and Poitiers lies in the counting houses of London, Bordeaux<sup>1</sup>, Bruges. Soon after his accession, Edward III married Philippa of Hainault, 'a lady tall and straight, wise and gleesome, humble and pious, liberal, courteous, and all her days adorned and decked with every noble virtue, beloved of God and man and while she lived the realm of England had favour prosperity, honour and all good adventures, nor did ever famine or hard times come there all the days of her reign<sup>2</sup>. Through her influence, and the natural tendencies of the times there was close relation between England and the Low Countries.

<sup>1</sup> Michelet, Histoire de France, livre 6, chap. 1.

Flanders, in one sense lies between England and France and has ever been a battlefield between the two nations. At this time she was commercially dependent on the former for England supplied her swarming cities with their wool, and these cities, which were her strength, ever gravitated, when rightly advised towards an English alliance. On the other hand she was attached by feudal relations to France, and her noblesse therefore chose, on the whole, the French side she was destined naturally enough to be the scene on which the great struggle should begin. Louis, Count of Flanders, in constant feud with the stiff backed burghers lived mostly at Paris, in a state of half-expulsion. In 1336 Philip pursuing his usual policy persuaded him to arrest the English merchants in Flanders. Edward retaliated by stopping the whole export of wool. And as the wool was all-important to the Flemish, the measure, while it roused them to wish for a French war<sup>3</sup>, threw the Flemish cities into Edward's hands. Jacquemart van Arteveld of Ghent, then rising to the perilous height of his popularity persuaded the men of Bruges and Ypres, in spite of the civic jealousy between Bruges and Ghent, to join with him in banishing their hated Count, and took steps to make an English alliance Edward, prudent beyond his years, seemed to fear a war, and appealed to the Pope for mediation but Philip was bent on fighting; demanded that Robert of Artois, then a refugee in England, should be given up, and got ready for the struggle He entered into communications with the Scots; beginning that long chain of alliances which long connected France with Scotland in a common hostility to England It is curious to note that Edward found in Brittany a faint counterpart to Scotland; a disaffected neighbour-land, which he could use to harass his antagonist.

<sup>1</sup> Bordeaux at this time was an English entrepôt.

<sup>2</sup> Frobenart (Leitenhove), I c. 38 p. 113 and c. 36, p. 113. He can never mention her except in terms of affection and admiration.

The Woolstack in the House of Lords bears witness to the early importance of the wool-growing trade of England. This wool famine of 1337 drove many skilled artisans to seek refuge in England where they could get at the wool. These Flemings did much to advance England's manufacturing greatness.

At the moment when Edward is wavering between peace and war, it may be well to consider the strength of the two parties in this great struggle of one hundred and sixteen years, in which the brilliant prize was twice won and twice lost by the English; and in which throughout its earlier scenes the splendour of decaying feudalism casts a glamour over our eyes, till we can scarcely see the truth The age was fortunate also in Froissart its chronicler, the unrivalled painter of his stirring days No more vivid writer, no truer poet, has ever lived than the Treasurer of Chimay To him chivalry owes very much of its popularity with later times He draws with a graphic pen the picturesque bravery and blazonry, the fluttering pennons and trappings, the grand figures and daring feats of arms, till we are only too glad to forget how hollow all is, and how England won her victories by means of her sturdy commonplace yeomen, while chivalrous France was in a state of desolate barbarism, her people sunk in misery We scarcely hear the sound of those new engines of war, which with terrible voice were beginning to proclaim the downfall of the Middle Ages, cannon, the great leveller, smiting mail-clad baron and trembling serf with an equal fate Armour and castle-walls were soon to be proved no longer impregnable

And what had Edward to encourage him in his great enterprise? He set himself to the task of conquering and holding a great and solid kingdom, on the border of which indeed were independent principdoms, as Brittany, Burgundy Guenne but which was recognised as the home of a most warlike and spirited nobility, a country full of great and fenced cities, a kingdom which gave laws to the fallen Papacy its humble henchman, and which had no small influence on the German Empire which had grouped round its throne a circle of minor princes and kings. What was it that brought the enterprise so near success, and redeemed King Edward from the charge of presumptuous folly, though it could not prove him wise?

The answer is to be found in the contrast between the two countries. England, though far weaker in men at arms, was still at ease and compact. Wales and Ireland were at rest, Scotland was not hard to curb. The King was popular and had something of that genius which grasps at new methods and wins the first advantage from them. There is no doubt that, whether he used cannon at Crécy or not, Edward made early and important use of the new discovery of gunpowder<sup>1</sup>. The barons were closely united to the nation by interest and feeling and among them were great and brilliant soldiers above all, the independent yeomen, skilled to draw the bow in dally pastime, resolute sturdy, strong limbed, sure of eye and hand, a free and gallant race were found to be the best soldiers of the age and proved their prowess in many bloody fields. It was a race, as Froissart tells us, 'exceeding fierce in war and hot of temper and spirit a race, whose heat never brought confusion, nor was their spirit rashness. Behind them stood the burghers of the great merchant-cities whose wealth the King could employ on a war which in its outset seemed to them destined to draw closer their relations with their chief customers the Flemings. In a word, national life had made great progress in England, and was the strength of the war movement. In France, on the other hand, though some steps had been taken towards unity, the classes of society were still far apart. The barons were turbulent and undisciplined, vain and brave to rashness: there was no middle class, except in Paris and a few large cities—nothing at all answering to the English yeomen, the bulk of the people were serfs. The King and his advisers were unwise, rash, ignorant, his army a horde of independent chiefs, each with his own following, each doing his own will. Thus were the two parties somewhat balanced. We shall also see that fortune as well as valour gave the English the advantages they won, and all but enforced that claim which might have made the English Kings the lords of France, and might also have reduced England to the position of a dependency of the mainland kingdom.

<sup>1</sup> In a splendid but unfinished MS. (now in the Library of Christ Church, Oxford), written and illuminated by Walter de Millemete, a royal chaplain, bearing date of the year 1326, and presented to Edward III at his accession, there is a picture of a man in armour firing cannon on a stand the field-piece being apparently about four feet long, bottle-shaped (like a Dahlgren gun), and being employed, significantly enough, to batter in the gate of a fortress.

This great war may well be divided into five periods. The first ends with the Peace of Breigny in 1360 (A D 1337-1360), and includes the great days of Crécy and Poitiers, as well as the taking of Calais: the second runs to the death of Charles the Wise in 1380, these are the days of Du Guesclin, and the English reverses. The third begins with the renewal of the war under Henry V of England, and ends with the Regency of the Duke of Bedford at Paris, including the field of Azincourt and the Treaty of Troyes (A D 1415-1422). The fourth is the epoch of Jeanne Darc, and ends with the second establishment of the English at Paris (A D 1428-1431) and the fifth and last runs on to the final expulsion of the English after the Battle of Castillon in 1453. Thus, though it is not uncommonly called 'the Hundred Years War,' the struggle really extended over a period of a hundred and sixteen years.

CHAPTER II

The Hundred Years War', Period I A.D. 1337-1360.

I A.D. 1337-1347

NEITHER the busy tongue of Robert of Artois, nor Edward's dissatisfaction as to his exclusion from the French throne would have pushed the English King into war had Philip of France not shown a clear determination to drive his rival to the last step. He interfered with the English trade with Flanders he abetted Robert Bruce in Scotland he raised claims on Guienne, he seems to have had a strong personal hatred for the English and their King. The Count of Flanders had directed from Paris the blockade of the Flemish ports, a force full 6000 strong lay in the Isle of Cadzand, and let no ship pass by. At last Edward on the appeal of Jaquemart van Arteveld and the men of Ghent and Bruges, sent in November 1337 a strong fleet, under the Earl of Derby who easily drove the Flemish knights out of the island. There for the first time, the superiority of the English longbow was felt.

There arose strong battle and fierce and the crossbowmen drew their best, but the English made nothing of it, for the archers are far swifter to draw than are the crossbowmen<sup>1</sup>. So the blockade was swept away and the war began. Yet the King's defiance or declaration of war was delayed till the year 1339.

The opening of the Flemish markets brought on at once a more friendly feeling between the cities and England and Van Arteveld did all he could to strengthen this alliance of

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), 1 c. 72 p. 220.

England came on as far as to the Oise burning and harrying the land and so they drew together till they were but two leagues apart. Then all thought that there would be a battle and in either army men were knighted notably Sir John Chandos by the English King. The two armies were drawn out in fighting array the English, though far weaker in numbers, were admirably posted. The French therefore prudently forbore to assault them, for success must have cost much and defeat would have been wellnigh ruin. They saw also that the English King was not likely to begin the fight, and that they had all to lose by action and all to gain by waiting as indeed fell out. For Edward, seeing himself over matched, and trusting little to his half hearted Flemish friends, fell back into Hainault disbanded his host, and retired to Brussels. Here a Parliament of all the cities and lords of Flanders was held they called on the King seeing they were under obligation of faith and oath and liability to fine, and to the Pope's sentence, if they made war on the King of France, to take on himself the name of King of France, and to quarter the arms of France with those of England. Then they could obey him as their true King and would gladly make war on Philip of Valois as a pretender. The King consented and the style and title of King of France with the lilies on the royal shield, remained to the Kings of England for centuries, the empty memorials of an ill founded claim the useless token of a ruinous strife.

This done, Edward returned to England landing at the mouth of the Orwell, and riding through Essex to town. He was received with gladness though the Londoners were very jealous of the commercial privileges he had found himself obliged to grant the Flemish merchants. In fact, the King bought his Flemish alliances at a high rate and they were worth little or nothing to him. Jaquemart van Arteveld only was staunch he lost his life through his English tendencies the barons of Flanders leant on France the cities were thoroughly selfish and untrustworthy.

The French king also dismissed his whole army and set himself to strengthen his navy in the Channel. He gathered a large fleet of Normans, Picards, and Genoese, under the Genoese Barbarera, the treasurer Balucet, and Sir Hugh Quierès, and sent them to cruise along the English coast, where they made descents on the Isle of Wight, and threatened the seaport towns from Dover to Dartmouth<sup>1</sup>

So ended the campaign of 1339 and yet the winter brought no rest, for the French harassed the northern frontier ceaselessly, and even took and burnt Chimay, which belonged to John of Hainault, and Aspre, which was in the land of William of Hainault, his nephew. These insults, which were as impolitic as they were useless, threw these princes into the arms of Edward. When the abbot of Crespy carried to Phillip letters of defiance from the Hainault princes, who were backed by the goodwill of all the Low Country provinces, the hasty King took no heed, but called his cousin an outrageous fool, who was planning how to have all his country burnt<sup>2</sup>. And thus he alienated one of his best supporters. The Hainaulters made reprisals on Aubenton and the villages around, and then the Count dismissed his men, passed into England, and concluded a close alliance with Edward. Meanwhile John of France, King Philip's son, Duke of Normandy, carried on the war, and from his headquarters at Tournay spoiled and burnt the land. The Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, whom Edward had left in Ghent, fell into an ambush near Lille and were taken, on the other hand, the Duke of Normandy was repulsed from Le Quesnoy, where cannon on the walls taught him a new lesson in warfare. The French King used yet one more weapon. he brought his Avignon Pope to bear on the Flemings, and laid the country under interdict. The Flemings wrote to England, begging Edward to send them priests in plenty, to carry on the services of the Church. and in June, 1340, Edward set sail from London with a fine fleet, well manned, and filled with his best soldiers, carrying also no less than three hundred priests, who despised the Papal interdict, and were crossing the sea in answer to the prayer of the Flemings.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), I, c 91, p 284

<sup>2</sup> Froissart, c 101, p 281 (Lettenhove, c 95, p 20)

The French fleet took up its station between Blankenberg and Sluys, well knowing that the English King would desire to land there. Froissart gives the number of ships at full two hundred, with forty thousand men, among them conspicuous for size was the Christopher a big merchantman they had captured in the winter from the English. Edward came sailing over sea with about a hundred and twenty ships, and had on board four thousand men-at arms and twelve thousand archers. They knew not that the French were awaiting them, but when they drew near to Blankenberg they discerned the masts of ships thick as a forest before them<sup>1</sup>. They cast anchor and waited for the tide, then, with one ship full of men-at arms between every two ships manned with archers, they bore down on the foe. 'Beauty was it and great pleasure to behold these banners and strange blazonry of arms, and the Normans showed themselves right willing to fight, for they raised anchor, hoisted sail, and came forth to meet the English, with the great Christopher in the van<sup>2</sup>. When they met, loud was the clamour down came all sails the English recognised their old friend the Christopher, and greatly desired to recover her. So they hemmed her in, and the bowmen shooting after their wont, strongly and swiftly, soon overbore the Genoese archers<sup>3</sup> who manned her, they boarded and took her with great triumph. The battle was hot and sharp and lasted from eight to five and great feats of arms were done on either hand, for good as were Normans and Genoese, the English were still more at home on the sea. 'for they were good seamen, says Froissart, they are made for it, and nourished up thereon, and take great pains therewith. And their King in the flower of his youth, spared not himself but adventured himself in the battle as much as the boldest of his knights he sailed in a ship that was 'strong and fair, built, wrought, and timbered at Sandwich', armed and adorned with banners and pennons rich and fair, with the arms of France and England quartered, and on her mast-head a great silver-gilt crown, which shone and flamed in the sun—a royal sight. Moreover the Christopher, now manned with English archers, did great execution. The ships were all cramped together, and knights fought as if they had been ashore. At last the English won the day, and few of their foes escaped, the French were driven back on Sluys, and could get neither out nor in. For the Flemings came on them, and slew as many on land as had fallen at sea, they also had taken part in the battle from the shore from the beginning to the end with much bravery. It is said that thirty thousand in all perished, most of them Frenchmen. Barbanera was among the slain in the battle, Hugh Querès was beheaded on his ship's bulwark, so that his head fell into the sea, Bahuet, 'for that he was a thief and robber on the seas,' was run up to a mast and hanged. Thus ended the great sea-fight of Sluys. It is said that when tidings came to Paris, none dared to tell the hasty King the bad news, till a court-fool bethought him to cry out that the English were cowards and when the King asked why? he replied, 'because they did not dare to jump boldly into the sea, as our brave French and Normans did,'—and so the King learnt what a mishap had befallen him<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), t. c. 111 p. 338.— Des mas qui drécolent contre mont, ce sambloit un grans bois.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid., p. 339.

<sup>3</sup> The Genoese archers, and their Captain Ilarbanera were political refugees, to whom Philip of France had granted asylum.

For centuries after this day the English remained undisputed masters of the Channel. One blow sufficed to sweep away the naval force of France<sup>2</sup>.

When tidings of this great disaster reached the French army,

<sup>1</sup> Walsingham, p 134

<sup>2</sup> I have followed Froissart's account (ed Lettenhove), which differs in many respects from that of other historians. They all make Barbanera escape, following the chronicle of S Denis and Villani, II c 120. All agree that one chief cause of the disaster was the blunder of lying close in shore at Sluys, so as to be hemmed in, and unable to use their superior numbers. The French historians excuse the defeat by saying that the ships were commanded by men who had never been at sea. <sup>A</sup> the <sup>the</sup> <sup>men</sup> <sup>cruising</sup> all the winter.

lying then before Thun l'Évêque, the King and the nobles seemed to think but little of it. They reflected 'that these Normans were but pirates, who allowed no fish to be sent up to the inland, and besides, the French King has gained two hundred thousand florins by their death—for he owed them four months pay<sup>1</sup>—and they would never come back to claim it. And so they comforted themselves. But Edward came ashore at Sluys with all his men his archers, and his three hundred priests, and was received with joy by the Flemings thence to Ghent, where lay Queen Philippa, who had just borne him a son, John<sup>2</sup> they met with great gladness, like folk who loved each other hugely

In spite of this fair outset, the campaign came to very little. Edward laid siege to Tournay and could not take it. Robert of Artois made a diversion against St. Omer and failed with heavy loss. The French again were stronger in the field, and the King of England found no firm support in his allies. A truce, first for one year then lengthened to two was agreed on and he returned to England without doing any feat of arms. So ended his second campaign.

Up to this point the war had gone in the main against Edward. It is true he had crushed the French naval power—the sea was completely open to him—but this was all. He had shown himself unequal to Philip in the open field—had failed in the siege of Tournay—the French, treating him by a fair inference as a vassal revolting from his lord had declared him to have forfeited his fiefs in Guienne which they seized—lastly from the other side Douglas, disguised as a charcoal burner had captured Edinburgh Castle, the King's strongest place in Scotland.

Now however there came a turn in affairs. Hitherto the English had had two points of entrance into France—the side of Flanders, and Guienne. Flanders they had tried—it was near and convenient for landing and harbourage—but experience had shown the King that not much beyond a heavy drain of money, was likely to follow from his German and Flemish alliances. It seems however to have been preferred to Ponthieu, which was in Edward's hands, because of the connexion it permitted with the allies. To Guenne, on the other hand, it was a long and dangerous voyage, and though Bordeaux provided excellent harbourage, a force landing there would be very far away from the centre of the French kingdom. But now a third and in all ways most desirable door was opened into the very heart of France.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), i. c. 113, p. 314

<sup>2</sup> John of Ghent or Gaunt, afterwards Duke of Lancaster

In 1341 John of Brittany died childless<sup>1</sup>. His brother Guy had died before him, leaving one daughter, Jeanne, who had married Charles, Count of Blois: his half-brother, John of Montfort, was still living. To whom should the great fief fall? By the older custom the elder brother's daughter should have succeeded, but the Salic Law had shaken all the rules of inheritance, and John of Montfort claimed the duchy to the exclusion of the female line. There was first an appeal to the lawyers, who failed to settle it, when political questions entered in. Charles of Blois was King Philip's nephew, and the Parliament at Paris naturally decreed that the inheritance was his. But John of Montfort crossed the Channel, and came to Edward, promising to recognise him as King of France and suzerain of Brittany, if he would help him, and the King willingly agreed.

Then began a picturesque and oppressive war between the two claimants. Charles of Blois, with John of Normandy<sup>2</sup>, besieged Nantes where John of Montfort lay. Charles, 'the terrible saint, who had pity neither on himself nor on any other<sup>1</sup> and John 'the Good' were inhuman enough to behead thirty Breton knights, who had fallen into their hands, and to sling their heads into the beleaguered town. The place took the hint, and opened its gates. John of Montfort was taken, and sent to Paris, Philip cast him into prison. This was far from ending the struggle the noble Countess of Montfort put on her husband's armour, and became the head and soul of the war. Yet she lost Rennes, her chief city and was shut up in Hennebon, whither she had retreated, in order to be within reach of her English allies. Here she bore herself stoutly and held her own till help came across the sea, and the siege was raised. She has won a fair place among the illustrious women of France as though she would prove the folly of the Salic Law. About this time perished Robert of Artois, stormy petrel of the hundred years war in a skirmish near Vannes. The English King late in autumn, came over into Brittany, and John of Normandy gathered a great host to meet him. But though Edward's force was small (being only one-fourth of the French) he always knew how to post himself on ground which made up for his weakness, and the Duke hesitated to attack him, the Papal Legate interfered, and early in 1343 a truce was agreed to which should last till the Michaelmas of 1346.

<sup>1</sup> TABLE XIII THE BRETON PEDIGREE

<sup>2</sup> King Philip's son, afterwards

Thus Edward's first attempt on the side of Brittany ended in nothing nor did he seem more likely to make good his claim here, than when he had leant on the support of the half-hearted Flemish lords and uncertain Flemish cities these cities ere long showed signally how little they could be trusted for Ghent, resenting Van Arteveld's plan that the young Prince of Wales should become their Duke, hastily rose up against their chief and murdered him (A.D. 1345).

Meanwhile, the rash folly of King Philip of France gave Edward an advantage he could hardly have foreseen. Not only did he grievously burden the country by a ruinous fiscal policy and bring it to revolt and famine, but he determined

<sup>1</sup> Michelet, 2. p. 309 (ed. 1852)

Thence he threatened Rouen, but the place was too strong and he marched on up the left bank of the Seine to Poissy while his foraging parties burnt even Saint Cloud and Boulogne, and came up almost to Paris gates. Philip was in some peril, his main army being in the South, still, he had with him a strong force of Genoese archers soldiers also from Germany with the refugee 'priests' King Charles of Luxemburg and his father the blind old King of Bohemia, and the Duke of Lorraine soon poured in to his aid, and he found himself at the head of a large army although it was loose of texture and under no control. With this force he left Paris, where he was certainly not too safe, and took up his quarters at St. Denis, ready to observe the movements of the English King.

To the French King Edward's movements must have seemed very uncertain. He might be intending merely to do mischief, and to fall back on Normandy. Or he might aim at the sudden capture of Paris, which the Parisians expected<sup>1</sup> or he might be meditating some bolder step. He had friends in plenty in Burgundy, was he going thither to strengthen their friendship?<sup>2</sup> or lastly he might aim at a junction with the Flemish, who were besieging Béthune. Edward kept up this uncertainty. He lay at Poissy, restoring the bridge over the Seine, the piers of which had not been destroyed meanwhile, as we have said, his scouts were pushed up close to Paris, burning as they went and, according to one account, the French King rode southwards through Paris, down the Orléans road, where he learnt at last that Edward had blinded his eyes with the smoke of those burning villages, and had quietly crossed the Seine at Poissy. Thence the English rashly offered to reconquer England, as their ancestors had done on condition that they should divide it among themselves. This paper he sent to England, where it was read in the churches, and helped to fan the national feeling in favour of the war. The document was doubtless a forgery.

They murmured much when the king went out to St. Denis.

Froissart (Lettenhove), 3 c. 214 p. 222: Disoient li autres qui respondoient a ce pourpos: Il font passer en Bourgogne qui ne lor ira autrement au-devant.

struck northward, King Edward here showing great lack of sagacity in war for he could keep up no communications, and had foes before and behind. By chance he fell in with and scattered the burghers of Amiens, who were hastening to defend their King<sup>1</sup>, then he passed through the Beauvoisin, followed by Philip with all his forces<sup>2</sup>, about a day's journey behind, while the difficult river Somme, with all its bridges either broken down or strongly fortified, lay right before him. King Edward's marshals, whom he had sent out to look at the river, returned and told him there was no point at which he could get across 'whereat the King began to muse and to be sad' 'And his people rode on pensive and melancholy, talking to one another, how and where they might get over the Somme, for right well they knew that the French King and his people were following them hot foot in great force<sup>3</sup>.' And the French King, in close pursuit, thought he had the English in a corner, and hoped to starve them between the Somme and the sea, in a country where, if they fought it must have been at great disadvantage. And in truth the fortunes of the English army were trembling in the balance, when there came a squire and told the King that a little lower down the river, he might get across with safety when the tide was out. Where the Somme comes near the sea, it widens out, growing at the same time shallower, so that at low water it could be crossed with ease at a ford then called Blanche-Taque<sup>4</sup>. The need was so great that the King caught at the chance. He broke up from his quarters early in the morning, and before dinner-time the King of France entered the place where Edward had spent the night, and found great store of English bread, and 'meat on the spit,' whereof they ate. There Philip, who thought he had caught the English and had them safely,

<sup>1</sup> This shows that they did not much expect to see Edward on that side, or they would not have bared Amiens of her defenders

<sup>2</sup> Some said 200,000 strong

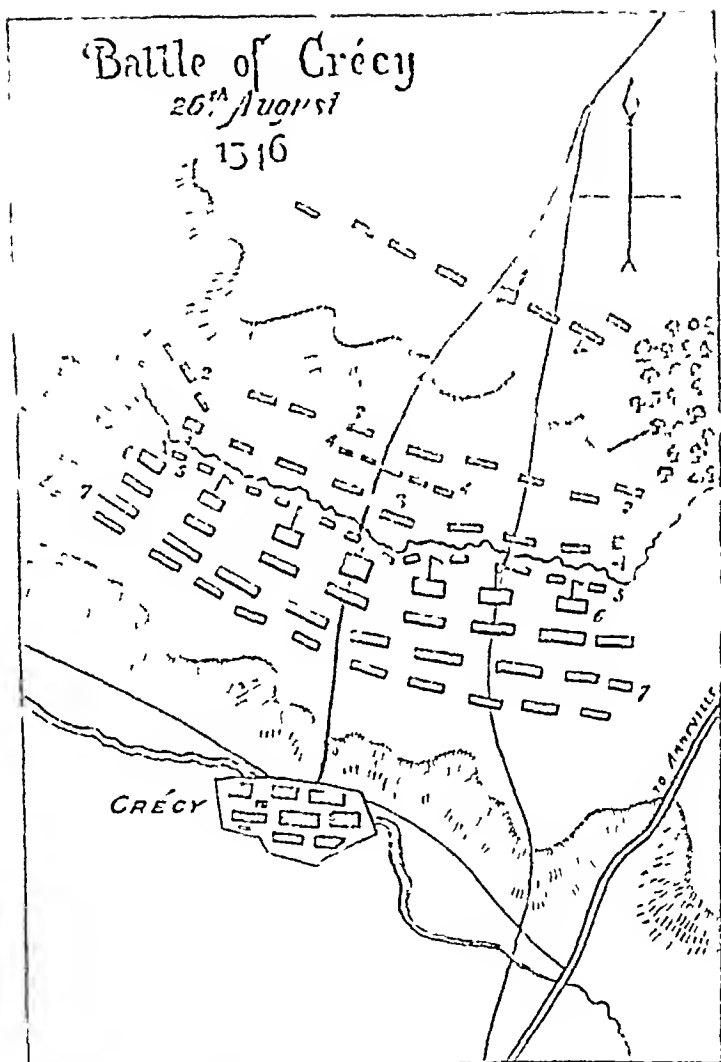

<sup>3</sup> From the Anon Chronicler of Valenciennes (MS de l'Arsenal, fol 194)

<sup>4</sup> White gravel, 'blanche marne'

These people are ours, even before the fight began. Then as they drew nearer the English rose to their feet, quietly and orderly, and the Prince's battle made a gallant show, for they knew that they would bear the brunt of the day. The French King, when he saw this, was stirred in his hasty blood<sup>2</sup> for much he hated those English, he forgot all good advice and had put the Genoese to the fore and begin the fight. The crossbowmen demurred. Their bows were slack, they had had orders to rest the night, they were weary, and when the Count of Alençon heard their murmuring he cried out, 'consider what rascals these are to be burdened with! They are useless but to eat at table, they will be more hindrance than help to us. Then came on a summer storm as they were thus debating, sudden and sharp with thunder and lightning and drenching rain, which made their bowstrings give while the English accustomed to a far wetter climate than these Italians, hid their strings under their coats, and kept them dry. The storm passed over as quickly as it came and the slanting evening sun shone clear and bright, full in the faces of the French who were attacking from the east. At last the Genoese advanced crying and singing loud—to frighten the English, but the English took no heed to it<sup>3</sup>—and shooting with their crossbows. Then the English archers took one step forwards, and drew on them, and the Genoese, who had never met with archers like these, were soon utterly discomfited for the arrows flew like snow. They turned to flee. The French King and Alençon, when they saw how ill they fought, bade their men cut them down. So they were slain by the English archers before and the French behind, till they fell in a great heap midway between the hosts. And thus the confusion grew worse and worse. The French army rolled its waves wildly against the Prince's battle men thought he was like to be overwhelmed, and begged Edward to send him help. But the King, who saw all from his hillside had no

Le roy Philippe estolt bien hastif homme.—Chron. published by M. Luce, p. 16.

<sup>2</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), 2 c. 224, p. 250, Pour les Anglois establi mais les Anglois n'en firent compte.

From Spruner's Atlas

- |  |  |                         |
|--|--|-------------------------|
| 1 Edward III                           | 2 The Earls of Northampton and Arundel |                         |
| 3 The Prince of Wales.                 | 4 Welsh and Irishry                    | 5. Genoese Crossbowmen. |
| 6. The Counts of Alençon and Flanders. |  | 7 Phillip VI's Battle.  |

fear for the boy, and left him to fight it out, thus keeping his strong reserve, the 'third battle,' altogether untouched. The whole of the fighting fell on the first and second lines. The blind King of Bohemia begged his knights lead him into the heart of the fray—they tied themselves together by their horses' reins, and rode in, like madmen, upon sudden death; which met them forthwith. Thus they struggled and were entangled, and fell down in heaps. The Gaelic kerns from Ireland and Wales, with their long knives, knowing nothing of the speech in which the fallen gentleman cried for mercy, gave no quarter, and slew all they seized. At last the French King drew away reluctantly, almost forced to it by John of Hamnault, and the summer night fell, ending the carnage. The English lighted torches, and searched the field, while King Edward came down from his windmill and embraced his fair son<sup>1</sup>. Philip, accompanied by only four of his Barons<sup>2</sup>, and the tattered remnant of his army, recoiled as far as Amiens, so heavy had been the blow; and the English, after piously burying the French chivalry, moved leisurely back to Calais. Such was the famous battle of Crécy, a battle, which has no proper history, being only a confused attack on a fixed position<sup>3</sup>. It was the pendant to Mansourah and Courtrai, another instance of the overweening pride and vanity of the French feudal lords, and <sup>1</sup> It is commonly said that Edward knighted the Prince after Crécy, as a fact, he knighted him on landing at La Hogue. The error has perhaps come from Froissart's use of the phrase 'le prince son fils, si l'accolla et bausa'—(Ed Buchon), 2, c 294, p 374.

<sup>2</sup> Froissart (Bnchon), 2, c 292, p 369 'se partit le roi Phelippe tont déconforté, il y avoit bien raison, lui cinquième de barons tant seulement'

<sup>3</sup> It is usual to attribute much of the French disaster at Crécy to the use of cannon by the English. But this is extremely doubtful. Only one authority mentions it, Villani, (tom 12, cc 65, 66), who died two years after this date. Froissart is quite silent about it, and so are the other chroniclers of the time. Villani was far off, and probably got his account from the Genoese archers, while Froissart heard both sides, especially the English. Against the cannon are (1) the balance of authority, (2) the improbability of King Edward's having been able to carry such weapons of war (though they were doubtless small and light at first) in his hasty retreat, and across the Somme, in the face of the enemy, (3) the possibility that Villani misunderstood some account of the thunderstorm for the use of these new weapons.

of the ill feeling which existed between classes<sup>1</sup>. But most of all it shows the difference in structure between the two nations. France still so incoherent and turbulently feudal. England already compact, with a stout middle class of freemen, the famous bow-drawing yeomen. In the French army were the unlucky Genoese mercenaries, who had no interest in this quarrel, and who were despised, distrusted, and ill used by the overbearing noblesse. There were the undisciplined levies of the cities, who increased the confusion, adding nothing to the strength of the attack<sup>2</sup>. There were the serfs from every part, mere slaves, worth nothing in war. Lastly there were the barons, great and small, brave, impetuous, ungovernable, who rushed heedlessly on their ruin, and perished fighting like blind heroes. On the other hand one feels that the English army represented a formed nation, centred round its head. The king in the prime of his years, riding round on his hackney, encouraging his men and getting back their cheery replies. The quiet self reliance of the little army. The skill and prudence of the yeomen, with their longbows, used on many a village green and in the woodland glades of England, the hearty helpfulness of the barons and doughty knights, clustered round the boy prince at the post of danger in the van,—these are the sufficient reasons why the French army was swiftly ruined in those evening hours on the 26th of August, 1346.

Phillip fell back, first to Amiens, then to Paris having disbanded his army. He had before called home his son John<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Lettenhove), 2 c. 185 p. 159, gives us a gloomy account of the state of feeling in France in 1343, only three years before Crécy: L'orgueil et la négligence estoient si grandes en l'ostel dou roi Philippe, pour ce temps, que on ne faisoit compte de tels choses, ne del aller ne del envoyer et pour le temps d'adoot il n'avoient estoient si mal payet en France que nuls estrangers ne s'i traioit volontiers pour demander aides, ne ovi par eilement chil dou roialme.

Froissart (Lettenhove), 2 c. 223, p. 246: Là ot sus les camps a grant peuple de communauté des chités et bonnes villes de France que tout estoit là reversé et les chemins tous couvers entre Avesille et Crechli, et plus de ens vint mille de ces bons hommes, quant ils se veirent sus les camps, traissent lors espées et escryèrent: A la mort, ces traitours Englois! Ja mais piés a en retournera en Engleterre.

The siege of Aiguillon was raised about a week before the day of Crécy.

so leaving the English masters of the South, and the Earl of Derby, having heard tidings of Crécy, rode northwards as far as to Poitiers, which city he took without difficulty, and stayed there several days; 'and longer he might have held it, had he wished, for no man came to challenge his right, but all the land as far as the Loire trembled before the English'.<sup>1</sup> The diversion also on the side of Scotland failed signally. Queen Philippa advanced to Newcastle-on-Tyne, and her army met David the Scottish King at Neville's-Cross, in Durham, where he was defeated and taken prisoner.

Meanwhile Edward settled himself down before Calais, for that city was the best landing-place the English could have, moreover, during these last years, in which the French ships had been so active and so vexatious along the English coasts, Calais had been a very scourge of English commerce, and the home of a harassing privateer warfare, which had led to angry and cruel reprisals. The siege was therefore popular in England. The King built for his army a complete wooden town—the 'Villeneuve la Hardie'<sup>2</sup>—and spared no pains to make the position as strong as possible, holding Calais in his firm grasp, first by land, then by the harbour-entrances, until famine reigned within. All through the winter of 1346 went on the unflinching blockade; all through the spring, till midsummer was past, and yet no help came from Paris. At last, in July, King Philip with a strong relieving army appeared on the Sangate Hill, between Calais and Wissant. But what could he do? There were four ways of getting into Calais, or of getting at King Edward. The sea-passage was completely blocked, the approach by the downs from the South was commanded by the English ships and the army, so that no man could pass by; to the North lay a great host of Flemish, who stood firm to the English, and barred that way; and lastly, the one approach from the inland was by a causeway through the marshes, and over the bridge of Nieulay and this causeway was held by the Earl of Derby who had left Guienne to join his King. Philip looked and looked, and the more he saw the less he liked the prospect of an assault. He tried other ways. He sent the two legates of his pope, who found they could make no impression on Edward. Philip then proposed that the English King should meet him in open field the offer was absurd, and Edward told him that he would not give up his certainty for the chances of a fight. At last Philip withdrew to Amiens and the citizens knew that their fate was sealed. We all know the fair tale of the devotion of Eustache de S. Pierre and his brother burghers how they came into Edward's camp with bare heads and feet, in their shirts, with halters round their necks and how the King was unmoved by the petitions of his courtiers, till Queen Philippa, strongest and gentlest of women, came and won their lives from the angry victor<sup>1</sup>. Eustace afterwards received conspicuous marks of favour from the English King.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 2, c 303, p 403

<sup>2</sup> We have returns from which it appears that there were about 30,000 men in Edward's camp

The French inhabitants were all sent out, and made their way to Amiens and elsewhere, though many of them before long found their way back again to their old homes, and the city was re-peopled with English traders, who made it the mart for their wool, tin, lead, and other goods. Thus did Calais become English, and continued such for full two hundred years.

II. FROM THE TRUCE OF 1347 TO THE BATTLE OF POITIERS,

A.D. 1356

The fall of Calais closed the first period of the war. As yet all had gone amiss with Philip. He had suffered a great defeat in the field had lost Calais before his very eyes, had withdrawn from the struggle in Guienne, leaving all Southern France at the mercy of his rivals. Flanders became more decidedly English, in Brittany the French party was ruined the Scottish King was a prisoner. It was time to stand still and get breath. England also was exhausted by the cost and drain of the siege, and a ten months' truce was readily agreed to.

<sup>1</sup> This beautiful tale is found in Froissart's pages (c. 321), and has been strongly suspected of being a poetic rendering of some very simple transactions.

But, while the two nations were thus recovering breath, an enemy worse than war was slowly drawing near. From Egypt, perhaps from still farther East, perhaps from the centres of Mahometan faith and pilgrimage, then doubtless as now centres of infection, came rolling over Europe the dark cloud of pestilence—the Black Death. First it smote Italy, where Boccaccio has immortalised it in the ghastly selfishness of his 'Decamerone,' and where three fifths of the people of Florence perished, among whom was John Villani the historian, thence it passed into Provence, in 1347, where Narbonne was ruined for ever, and Avignon lost three-fourths of her population, where Petrarch's Laura was snatched away from her happy home; then northward to Paris, in 1348, where no man's life was safe, and many were smitten even in the King's court. The tale of dead amounted sometimes to more than eight hundred in a day; the charities of life disappeared, the priests fled, the monks and friars and some heroic sisterhoods alone defied the last enemy, and threw in their lot with the stricken. The usual accompaniments of pestilence appeared—men were hardened and grew careless; or became mystics, as in Germany<sup>1</sup>; or they wreaked their panic on the unlucky Jews, who were accused of witchcraft, and who perished wretchedly by thousands<sup>2</sup>. The scourge reached England also, though not quite so severely, and, by the end of 1349, it had worn itself out.

This plague lit up the darkness of the Church, and men saw how corrupt it had become. Clement VI, the Avignon Pope, was sunk deep in debauchery<sup>3</sup>, the clergy were little better, only in the religious orders did any religion and humanity survive. France, vexed with heavy imposts and foolish restrictions on trade, suffering also from the effects of war and devoid of any true national feeling or aims, had sunk very low even chivalry, the natural growth of France was perishing by its own weight<sup>1</sup>. In one respect only did the kingdom seem to gain two valuable districts were added to the crown in Philip's reign. In 1349 Humbert, Dauphin of Vienne, resigned his domains, in order to become a Carmelite, and the district was bought by Philip. He ceded it to Charles, eldest son of John of Normandy his grandson, who took the name of the Dauphin, which afterwards became the established title of the eldest son of the King of France. About the same time Philip bought from James of Aragon last King of Majorca, the district and city of Montpellier. To pay for these acquisitions the value of the coin was changed again and again and offices, titles, pardons, nobility began to be put up for sale this miserable source of income cursed France as long as the monarchy lasted.

<sup>1</sup> These were the days of Tauler and of the Flagellants.

<sup>2</sup> The Continuator of William of Nangis is our authority here (p. 110). Froissart had no care to describe the 'grands apertises d'armes' of the Black Death, and dismisses it in three lines. He had no eyes for mankind in general, only for kings and knights.

<sup>3</sup> 'Molto cavalleresco, poco religioso.'—M. Villani, 3 c. 43.

Philip, now about fifty eight years old, married again a lovely maiden of eighteen, Blanche of Navarre. But his health was gone and in 1350 he died, leaving the crown to his son John of Normandy 'John le Bon.

Thus ended a dark and melancholy reign. All things seemed to be evil in France. These were days of oppression, war, pestilence, faithlessness in King and people, days of shame and distress.

Nor was the new King likely to be helpful. 'Le Bon' does not mean 'the Good'. It is the epithet of one prodigal, extravagant, foolish, the good fellow of those who were debased enough to take his gifts. To be gay, courteous, and liberal to imitate, in fact, John of Bohemia, his kinsman, who had perished so madly at Crécy, far from his own country, which he had abandoned that he might amuse himself at the Court of Paris<sup>1</sup> —this seems to have been the ideal of King John. A man very like his father, King Philip, and like him on his worse side he was passionate in every sense, violent and cruel, self-indulgent, ignorant, rash, proud. you have in King John 'le Bon' the most unhappy character that could have come to the throne at such a moment. A cool wise head might perhaps have drawn France out of her difficulties, King John only thrust her deeper down. To him she owes the day of Poitiers, and the humiliating peace of Bretigny.

<sup>1</sup> At this very time, 1349 (though Froissart says 1344), Edward III instituted the Order of the Garter at Windsor so grouping around himself the chief men of England. Chivalry was surely passing away when it began to need the help of such institutions, it was becoming a piece of royal furniture and began to have least of life when it had most apparent heavity.

Between King John 'the Good' of France, and King Charles 'the Bad' of Navarre, the country had evil days. Still Charles 'the Bad,' the French King's kinsman<sup>2</sup>, was by far the better man of the two, nobler in thought and acts, and of a higher type. He had eloquence and winning manners, he was ambitious, intriguing, often false, restless for action, and not too particular as to whether its end were evil or good. When Charles the Dauphin (afterwards Charles V, 'the Wise,') became Duke of Normandy, he entered into friendly relations with Charles of Navarre, who, with many friends and followers, ventured to come to a banquet at Rouen, and was then and there surprised and taken by King John (A D 1356) he did not hesitate to treat Charles shamefully, casting him into prison in the Louvre, the Count of Harcourt and some others, who were taken with him, were at once beheaded behind Rouen castle walls. It is not known whether or not father and son had concerted this surprise beforehand. Philip of Navarre and Godfrey of Harcourt escaped, crossed over to England, and were welcomed by Edward, who was only too glad to promise them speedy and effectual help.

The truce between the Kings had had but little reality. King John did nothing to allay the growing ill-feeling. his warlike measures were weak and unsuccessful; he attempted Calais, but was foiled, Guines threw itself into the arms of England; slight hostilities were kept up in Guenne; war never ceased between the two parties in Brittany, the school which bred the great captain of the next period, Du Guesclin. France was restless and miserable, the English King, who had felt little of the woes, and had enjoyed much of the excitement, of war, was eager to begin again each successive act of King John laid him more open to the English attack. Edward had already sent three expeditions out to the three vulnerable points of France on the western side. In 1355 he had himself landed at Calais, but was recalled to quiet Scotland; he sent Charles of Navarre to Cherbourg, and the Duke of Lancaster lay on the frontiers of Brittany, and lastly, the Prince of Wales sailed down to Bordeaux, and thence harried all the south unhindered, as far as Narbonne itself, returning back to Guenne for the winter months. In the next year, the English made ready for something more than a mere war of excursions.

<sup>1</sup> Martin, Histoire de France, tom 5, p 120

<sup>2</sup> See the Genealogical Table on the next page.

TABLE XIV -- THE RELATIONSHIPS OF THE VALOIS PRINCES

In the early summer of 1356 the Black Prince took the field with a small army, not more than from eight to ten thousand men<sup>1</sup>, the most part not English, and rode into the Rouergue, Auvergne, and the Limousin, meeting no resistance, sacking and taking all they found, and so upwards to the Loire. Doubtless the opposition with which the Estates of the 'Langue d'Oil' had but just met King John, made it very hard for him to set an army afoot. The Estates, weary of long exactions, refused to vote him supplies without concessions; by the mouth of Etienne Marcel, Provost of the Merchants of Paris, the head of the bourgeoisie of the capital, they demanded rights of session, of control, of levy, and of taxation. They seemed likely to take up the same ground which had already been successfully occupied by the English Parliament. But it was only for a moment the parallel cannot be carried on seriously between the progress of the English Constitution and the fitful efforts of the French Estates.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon), xxviii<sup>me</sup> addition 3, p 155 'Avec deux mille hommes d'armes et six mille archers, parmi les brigands' (i.e. besides the light-armed mercenaries).

The French King was lying before Breteuil with a strong force, when news of the Prince's northward ride came to him. He hastily granted the garrison of the town easy terms, and they withdrew to Cherbourg then he marched to Paris, and summoned all his nobles and fief holders to a rendezvous on the borders of Blois and Touraine. He himself moved southwards as far as Chartres. The Black Prince threatened Bourges and Issoudun, failing to take either city, then he marched to Vierzon, a large town of no strength, and took it, here he found what he sorely needed, wine and food in plenty. While he lay here he heard that King John was at Chartres with all France at his back, and that the passages of the Loire were occupied. So he broke up, and turned his face towards Bordeaux, at once abandoning any plan he may have had of joining the Earl of Lancaster in Normandy. King John hastening to overtake him, actually overshot the English army, and placed himself across the Prince's line of retreat. Thus he had the English utterly in his power a little patience and prudence, and he might have avenged himself almost without loss on the invading army by capturing both it and its brilliant captain. But, unfortunately for France John the Good' was possessed with chivalrous ideas, which prompted him to do exactly the wrong thing.

The Black Prince, seeing his retreat cut off stood at bay in a strong position at Maupertuis near Poitiers. It was a rough hill side, covered with vineyards cut up by hedges, and also sprinkled with low scrub. Nothing could be better for defence the chivalry of France, whose overwhelming weight would have been irresistible on the plain, were of no avail on such a hillside and there was plenty of cover to delight sharpshooters who knew their work. The only point of attack from the front was a narrow and hollow way liable to a converging fire, which would grow more severe the farther the enemy penetrated, for the cheeks of the ravine commanded the whole of the roadway.

Battle of Poitiers,
19 September,
1356.

On the level ground atop lay the main English force every available point was crowded with archers, the narrow way had high hedge-crowned banks. Underneath lay the 50,000 Frenchmen, 'the flower of their chivalry,' all feudal, no city levies this time. The King was there, with his four sons, his brother, and a crowd of great princes and barons. Had they been content to wait, and watch vigilantly, the Black Prince would have been starved, and must have laid down his arms. This, however, was not their idea, nor the idea of that age. So they got them ready to assault the Prince's formidable position, to give themselves the utmost disadvantage arising from useless numbers, and to give him the means of taking the greatest possible advantage of his ground, where every man of his little force was available. Before the assault took place the Papal Legate interposed, and obtained a truce for twenty-four hours. The Black Prince, knowing well his peril, was willing to treat on terms honourable to France. unconditional surrender was the only thing King John would listen to. This would have been as bad as a lost battle, what could they do but refuse? better die in arms than suffer imprisonment, starvation, and perhaps a shameful death. So they set themselves to use the remainder of the day's truce in strengthening their position, an ambushade was quietly posted on the left flank of the one possible line of attack. Next morning, the 19th of September, 1356, the French army was moved forwards in the van came two marshals, Audenham and Clermont, with three hundred men-at-arms, on swift warhorses, behind them were the Germans of Saarbrück and Nassau, then the Duke of Orleans in command of the first line of battle, Charles, Duke of Normandy, the King's eldest son, was with the second, and lastly the King, surrounded by nineteen knights all wearing his dress, that he might be the safer in the fight<sup>1</sup> before him fluttered the Oriflamme. With heedless courage the vanguard dashed at the centre of the English position, for such were the King's orders. They rode full speed along the narrow roadway up the hill side, between the thick hedges but the hill was steep, and the archers flanking it shot fast and well. A few only struggled to the top these were easily overthrown.<sup>1</sup> The rest were rolled back in wild confusion on the Duke of Normandy's line, and broke their order at this moment the English ambuscade fell on their left flank. Then when the Black Prince saw that the Duke's battle was shaking and beginning to open, he bade his men mount quickly and rode down into the midst, with loud cries of St. George and Guenene. Pushing on cheerily he fell upon the Constable of France, the Duke of Athens, the English archers, keeping pace afoot with the horse men, supported them shooting so swiftly and well that the French and Germans were speedily put to flight. Then Charles, the Dauphin with his two brothers, put spurs to their horses, and fled headlong from the field there followed them full eight hundred lances, the prime of the French army who might well have upheld the fortune of the day. It was a pitiful beginning for the young Prince who would so soon be called to fill his father's place. The first and second lines of battle were thus utterly scattered, almost in a moment some riding hither and thither off the field, in panic others driven back under the walls of Poitiers, where the English garrison took great store of negociable prisoners for at that time prisoners meant ransom. The King perhaps remembering the mishap of Crécy now ordered all his line to dismount and fight afoot. And then for the first time a stand was made, and something worthy of the name of a battle began. The French were still largely superior in force at the beginning they had been seven to one<sup>1</sup> and the advantage of the ground was no longer with the English. But the Prince of Wales pressed ever forwards, with Sir John Chandos at his side, who bore himself so loyally that he never thought that day of prisoners, but kept on saying to the Prince Sire ride onwards, God is with you the day is yours! And the Prince who aimed at all perfectness of honour, rode on wards, with his banner before him, succouring his people whenever he saw them scattering or unsteady, and proving himself a right good knight<sup>1</sup>. Thus the English force fell, like an iron bar, on the soft mass of the French army, which had but little coherence, after the manner of a great fendal levy; and this swift onset, with the Prince riding manfully in the van, like the point of the bar, scattered them hither and thither, and decided the fortunes of the day. The Dukes of Bourbon and Athens perished, with many another of noble name, among them the Bishop of Châlons in Champagne. the French gave back, till they were stayed by the walls of Poitiers. King John was now in the very thick of it and with his own hands did many feats of arms, defending himself manfully with a battle-axe<sup>2</sup>. By his side, Philip, his youngest son, afterwards Duke of Burgundy, founder of the second line of that house, who here earned for himself the name of 'le Hard,' the Bold. for though but a child, he stood gallantly by his father, warding off the blows that rained thickly on him. The rout was too complete to be stayed by their gallantry. The gates of Poitiers were firmly shut, there was a great slaughter under the walls. Round the King himself the fight was stubborn, many of his bodyguard were taken or slain. Geoffrey de Chagny, who bore the Oriflamme, went down. and the King was hemmed in, all men being eager to take so great a prize. Through the crowd came shouldering a man of huge stature, Denis of Mortbeque, a knight of St Omer, when he got up to the King he prayed him in good French to surrender. The King then asked for 'his cousin, the Prince of Wales': and Denis promised that if he would yield he would see him safely to the Prince. the King agreed. Thus he was taken, and with him Philip and his little son. Then arose around him a great debate between English and Gascons, all claiming to have taken him. they tore him away from Denis, and for a moment he was in great peril. At last two barons, seeing the turmoil, rode up, and hearing that it was the French King, they spurred their horses, forcing their way into the angry crowd, and rescued him from their clutches. Then he was treated with high respect, and led to the Prince of Wales, who bowed low to the ground before one who in the hierarchy of princes was his superior—he paid him all honour—sent for wine and spices, and served them to him with his own hands. And thus King John, who one day before had held the English, as he thought, securely in his grasp, now found himself, broken and wounded, a prisoner in their hands.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 3, c 351, p. 186, 'vingtiè ses parements.'

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Dochon), 3. c. 260. p. 210, Les François estoient bien de gens d'armes sept contre un.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 3, c 361, p 216.

<sup>2</sup> Ib. c. 364.

Thus went the great day of Mauvertuis—or, as it is more commonly called by us of Poitiers.

Great was the carnage among the French—they left eleven thousand on the field, of whom nearly two thousand five hundred<sup>1</sup> were men of noble birth, while nearly a hundred barons, and full two thousand men-at-arms, to say nothing of lesser folk, were prisoners. They were so many that the victors scarcely knew what to do with them—they fixed their ransom as quickly as they could, and then let them go free on their word. The Prince, with the huge booty gathered in his expedition, and with the richest prize of all, King John and his little son, at once fell back to Bordeaux. The French army melted away like snow in spring such feudal nobles as had escaped wandering home crestfallen—the lawless and now lordless men-at-arms spreading over the land like a pestilence. A two years truce was struck between England and France—and Edward at once carried his captives over to London. There King John found a fellow King in durance, David Bruce, King of Scots, who had now for eleven years been in King Edward's hands.

The years between Poitiers and the peace of Bretigny were indeed dark and evil for France. The nobles were utterly shattered, from Mansourab to Courtrai, from Courtrai, to Crécy from Crécy to Poitiers, they had, within a century proved by their turbulent vanity that they were unable to stand against the times. Their power was much weakened, and, far worse, all France could see that weakness—the nobles who returned from the battle were so hated and abused by the Communes, that they scarcely could venture to set foot in any of the good towns<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In exact numbers, 2,436. See the careful list given in Buchon's note to Froissart, 3, c. 364, p. 224.

III ÉTIENNE MARCEL AND THE BOURGEOISIE OF PARIS. A. D. 1356-1360.

The four years from Poitiers (A. D. 1356) to the peace of Breigny (A. D. 1360), years of disaster, are relieved by the greatness of one man, Étienne Marcel, Provost of the Traders of Paris. No man has been more unfortunate while he lived circumstances were against him, for he struggled in vain for his country, became entangled in intrigues, committed crimes which were also blunders, and perished by the hand of the city he loved and served. After his death, history was also against him, the chroniclers, with Froissart at their head, were ignorantly and violently prejudiced against him. One contemporary writer only, the second continuer of William of Nangis, a poor friar of Paris, eye-witness of many scenes of that time<sup>2</sup>, writes of Marcel in a friendly spirit. He had no prejudice against the burghers, was no hanger-on at courts, like Froissart, and he had with his own eyes seen Marcel, and knew what strength and worth were in him.

Even before Poitiers the chivalry of France had lost their credit in men's eyes. 'Pride and dissoluteness flourished among many nobles and men-at-arms' their dress was sumptuous and scandalous, with gilt and silvered belts and precious stones, and all manner of luxury. 'At this time they wore brave birds' plumes in their hats, giving themselves up without stint to fleshly lusts and sports and games by night and day, so that the people grieved greatly when they saw the money levied from them for war wasted so uselessly<sup>3</sup>.' And again, after Poitiers, this feeling grew stronger still: royalty and chivalry seemed to have fallen at once and together from their high estate. In the attempt to make a firm government by the Three Estates<sup>1</sup> at Paris very few nobles joined, 'and those who came were either very young or were dishonoured. Everything went amiss in the realm bands of lawless soldiery ranged the land, no man cared for his brother the nobles repaid contempt with contempt, they neglected their King a prisoner and their people in their defeat they oppressed and robbed their rustics, took no thought for the defence of their country trod underfoot or carried off the chattels of men. Above all, it was clear that the Lord Regent took no heed at all' Then began the whole land of France to fall into grief and confusion of spirit, for it had neither defender nor guardian.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 3, c. 372, p. 253.

<sup>2</sup> The second Continuator Willelmus de Nangis (in D'Achery, Spicil. tom. II pp. 785-920) speaks of himself 'Ego frater quidam prout in parte vidi et audivi,' and again, where Edward III, before Crècy, threatened Paris, he says, 'Omnes hos eventus, ut in pluribus, vidi ego qui hæc scripsi.' His part of the chronicle begins with A. D. 1340.

<sup>3</sup> Continuator secundus W. de Nangis, sub 1340.

A few good towns, that is, towns girt with wall and ditch were saved from the terrors which befell the defenceless country men. Paris safest of all, was crowded by countryfolk driven in by stress, and wellnigh starved even monks and nuns came in for not even were the houses of God safe unless they were within the walls of some good town.

Thus, with the annihilation of the kingly authority the downfall of the nobles and the misery of the country districts, the cities, and specially Paris, became more and more important. In them alone survived security and some shadow of good government. Directly the Dauphin returned to Paris he convoked the States-General the nobles, as we have seen were few the clergy numerous the commons strong and resolute. The nobles, not yet weaned from the dark traditions of their order still eager to fight and pillage, and to be paid for it by the industry of the land, clamoured for war and subsidies the clergy and commons made common cause, and, under the leadership of the Archbishop of Rheims and of Étienne Marcel the Provost, demanded delay No conclusion was come to the release of Charles of Navarre, now a prisoner at Arleux in the Courtrai country was insisted on and the Estates broke up after sitting less than three weeks. Meanwhile, the fortifications of Paris were pushed on; chains stretched, ditches dug, many fair houses outside the walls demolished, steps taken, in a word, to make the capital a bulwark and a rallying-point for the nation.

<sup>1</sup> Ordonnances des Rois, 3. 47

<sup>2</sup> Continuator secundus, p. 818.

Étienne Marcel was not likely to leave things in chaos without an effort. His name may possibly have been a corruption of the name of that great Roman family, the Marcelli, whose representatives had not then died out of Italy. If so, he retained in Paris some of the old Italian spirit of civic life, and dreamed of making Paris the Rome of France. But his plans did not involve an abolition of the royal authority. He laboured hard and long to reconcile Charles the Dauphin and Charles of Navarre. It was not till he had made the former his irreconcilable enemy, that he threw himself into the hands of the 'bad King.'

Charles 'le Sage,' 'the Wise,' called by the misfortunes of his country to act as Regent of France, was very foolish in his young days, very cowardly and self-indulgent. His health was wretched, he had suffered from some mysterious malady in which he had lost hair and nails, and 'became as dry as a stick.' Though but nineteen years old, he was weak, pale, mean-looking, lantern-jawed<sup>1</sup>, wanting in courage, and, instead, full of cunning, clear of aim, tenacious, cold, unfaltering in carrying out his ends. He was surrounded by a knot of nobles, and was in fact in their hands. There is no truth for France in the saying that royalty allied itself to the burghers to countepoise the noblesse, the Kings used either, and distrusted both. If they had to choose between the two forces, their tendency would certainly be to incline towards the barons.

There was old dislike and distrust between the royal party and the cities, and from the beginning Charles of Navarre had supported the good towns in resisting the King's demands. He also, thanks to his charming manners, which go so far in a prince, and almost do instead of virtues, had won Bishop Lecocq of Laon to his side. The Bishop of Laon was a lea' ' ' man among the clergy, no wonder therefore that the second and third Estates joined in the demand that Charles should be let out of prison at Arleux, no wonder that when they found the Dauphin unmanageable, they turned to Navarre as their last hope.

<sup>1</sup> Michelet, 6, c. 3, p. 366

When Charles the Dauphin had dismissed the Estates of 1356 he set off on a bootless mission to Metz—it was, in fact simply his pretext for getting rid of counsellors who were too independent. To Metz came envoys from the Emperor from the Pope, and from the English King. Nothing came of the meeting except rumours which reached Paris as to the Dauphin's brave doings, his feasting and shows. When he came back, bringing no treaty of peace, the city rose in anger against him. During his untimely absence things had gone worse and the debasement of the coin was renewed in spite of the burghers' protest. No sooner did they hear that the Dauphin insisted on his depreciated money than they flew to arms, by their corporations. The Dauphin's counsellors fled for their lives, and he gave way. He agreed that the debased coin should not be forced on the people, that the Three Estates should meet where they would, that he would dismiss, and, if possible, bring to justice, the seven high officers denounced by the Estates. Thus Paris, with Marcel, a man of 'a severe and noble countenance' at her head gave to the state some semblance of constitutional life. Happy for her could she have maintained it! The Estates met at once—under Marcel and Bishop Lecocq they set themselves to carry out the resolutions come to at the session of the previous autumn. They had then agreed—

1 To assert the equality of all under taxation from the King to the peasant.

2 To name collectors of revenue to check and control if possible the extravagance of the Court.

3 To make these collectors independent even of the King. They also forbade the depreciation of the coin of the realm.

This sévère et belle figure is to be seen in an illumination of the assassination of the Dauphin's favourites, in a copy of the Grandes Chroniques which belonged to Charles V himself.

and decreed that all men of whatever rank might arm as a kind of national guard.

Charles the Dauphin was forced, unwillingly, and meditating ill-faith, to ratify these decrees. Some hope of good government sprang up. The Committee of Thirty-six, appointed out of the Estates to help in governing the land bereft of its King, were vigorous and vigilant. They made a truce for two years with the English, King John was carried over from Bordeaux to London, and just before his departure he sent envoys to Paris to forbid the execution of the agreement between his son and the Estates. Henceforth the King and his son are on one side, and Marcel with Paris at his back, with some uncertain countenance from the clergy, on the other side. The noble example set by the capital was not followed or understood elsewhere. She stood almost alone. All the nobles, and the bulk of the clergy, vexed to see the chief power in the hands of the Third Estate, withdrew from the city: they mostly betook themselves to the Dauphin, and helped him against the citizens. The authority of the Thirty-six was first weakened, then brought to an end, the Dauphin declared that he would rule alone. even Bishop Lecocq withdrew to Laon.

The times were critical for Marcel, everything pointed to a restoration of the old corrupt government, a renewal of extravagance, the neglect of national defenses, a royal anarchy. Then the Provost, in a secret meeting with his few trusty friends, the officers of the city, Bishop Lecocq, the Baron of Picquigni, and a few deputies of good towns (for all had not fallen away from Paris), decided on compassing the release of Charles of Navarre, in hopes that his influence might be a counterpoise to that of the Dauphin. They seem to have thought that he might some day found a new dynasty in France, connected with the old noblesse and the King's family, and at the same time resting on, and grateful to the Third Estate and to Paris, willing therefore to grant to France some constitutional government, the blessings of a firm rule, and the assuagement of the worst ills under which the land was groaning. Picquigni undertook the task of freeing the King of Navarre, and did it so well that he was got out of prison without difficulty or bloodshed<sup>1</sup>. Charles went first to Amiens, thence to Paris, with a safe-conduct granted most reluctantly by the Dauphin. The bishop of Paris met him on the road, and brought him in with triumph; he and Lecocq of Laon were almost the only prelates who stood by the civic party. All Paris rejoiced, but the deputies of the good towns of Champagne and Burgundy, fearful of committing themselves, withdrew hastily from the city. Distrust and coolness existed already between the towns which ought to have had one common interest. Paris at the first was not cast down by their desertion, for she thought she had in Charles of Navarre, fascinating, clever and wronged, a prince who would free her from the incompetence and ill faith of their Kings, and would foster her growing liberties. And so next day all the city was astir—above ten thousand burghers, scholars, prelates, clerks, in the Pré-aux-Clercs, the Clerks Park, just outside the walls of the Abbey of St. German des Prés, there the King of Navarre climbed up on a kind of hustings against the abbey walls, and, after the manner of the age, preached<sup>2</sup> to the crowd. He took for his text the words: The righteous Lord loveth righteousness: his countenance doth behold the upright<sup>3</sup>. That all might be in keeping, he began in Latin, but soon that he might creep into his hearers' hearts, he changed speech, and ended in French. He laid before them his wrongs, spoke of his desire to live and die for the defence of France, referred to his royal lineage and relation to the crown, which was nearer than that of King Edward III of England<sup>4</sup>. He spake right courteously and wisely, says Froissart, and his words were gladly heard and much approved: men shed tears as they

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon) 3. p. 289.

<sup>2</sup> Incepit predicare, or as Froissart (Buchon), 3. c. 384 p. 291 scizc et là prêcha et remontra.

<sup>3</sup> Ps. 117 (Vulgate 10. 8). This preaching of leading men, as of the Dauphin at the Halles, or Marcel at St Jacques, is curious in the hands of laymen. It was the common way of opening Parliament, and was also the best way of appealing to public opinion.

See Genealogical Table, p. 424.

Taken chiefly from Viollet le Duc.

- |                          |                           |                        |                              |                                |
|--------------------------|---------------------------|------------------------|------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| 1. S Lazare.             | 2. Palace of King Robert. | 3. The Temple.         | 4. The Halles.               | 5. The Louvre.                 |
| 6. The Tour de Bois.     | 7. The Law Courts         | 8. The Grand Châtelet. | 9. Notre Dame                | 10. The Palais des Tournelles. |
| 11. Bastille S. Antoine. | 12. The Petit Châtelet.   | 13. S Genevieve.       | 14. The Tour de Nesle.       | 15. The Clos du Chardonnet.    |
| 16. Hôtel d Armagnac     | 17. Hotel de Ville.       | 18. Hôtel de Bourgogne | 19. Cimetière des Innocents. |                                | listened, the impression made was deep and fruitful. Next day Mareel waited on the Dauphin Charles, and urged him to be reconciled with Navarre, and to give him his rights. This was promised, in form at least, his castles and towns were to be restored, and burial granted to his luckless adherents of Rouen, whose bones still hung bleaching on the gibbet. the question of an indemnity in money or lands was deferred for the present. Had Marcel been a mere intriguer, we can hardly imagine that he would have tried honestly to bring the Dauphin and the King of Navarre to terms, yet he certainly seems to have done this in good faith. His plan probably was to make the two princes balance one another, hoping that Paris might so be left free to expand. or at this time he, may have thought that Charles of Navarre was honestly minded to befriend the city, and to help in bringing in good government, and that his influence would be greater as a friend than as a foe to the Dauphin. Whatever was his thought, there can be no doubt he acted in thorough good faith at this time, filled with a patriotic desire to relieve the sufferings of France, and seeking not his own advancement, but her welfare. But he was foredoomed to failure. His instruments were princes, and there was no trust to be put in them. Charles of Navarre, 'the Bad,' found that Charles the Dauphin, 'the Wise,' took no active steps to carry out the understanding come to by Mareel's intervention. the strong places were not given up, their captains declared that they held them for King John, and would yield them up only on his order. And so war began again. Philip of Navarre, Charles's brother, had never made peace, but had kept up a kind of brigand-war, with such bands of men as he could gather together. Even when Navarre was under the walls of Paris he had refused to lay down arms, saying, in the true spirit of a French noble of that age, that he would not enter the town, for 'in a Commune there was nothing certain and determined on, save the determination to disgrace everything<sup>1</sup>.' The Dauphin also threw off disguise,

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 3, c 384, p 292 'Disoit q' ... (n'avoit

he rode with five or six of his favourites to the Halles, and there 'preached to the Parisians in his turn assured them of his goodwill, told them he was gathering troops to fight their foes, accused Marcel and the popular party of keeping the supplies for their own use. He went on in the old way gathered troops, and issued fresh orders for the debasement of coin. Paris under the Provost's orders rose again to resist him they took arms, and wore a 'revolutionary cap, parti-coloured, blue and red. The towns round Paris, which were almost alone in recognising the importance of the work the capital was trying to do also rose and donned the Provost's cap and colours.

Now came a shameful act, and it is almost impossible to make out what was the cloud on Marcel's judgment which led to it. He perhaps thought that, the Dauphin being a timid man a scene of violence in his presence would at once free him from his evil counsellors, and throw him under the influence of terror into the Provost's arms. He may also have calculated on committing the city to acts from which it could not recede. His own account of it afterwards (as the Provost himself in my hearing says the continuer of Nangis, and that of many others confessed) was that the Dauphin had often promised redress, and had done nothing and that the citizens held that he was hindered therein by the corrupt nobles around him —which though true enough, was but a poor justification for so great a crime. Whatever his idea, the Provost did not understand the tenacious duplicity of the young Prince's character. It was agreed that Marcel, with some armed citizens should enter the Dauphin's quarters, while the city militia stood under arms, ready to support him. Charles the Dauphin had with him the Marshals of Champagne and Normandy, and a great company of knights nobles, and prelates. No sooner had Marcel entered his chamber than he sharply addressed him<sup>1</sup>

nul arrêt certain, fors pour tout honneur —a sentiment which the courtly Canon clearly approves.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 3, c. 382 p. 237 Moulst agreement.

and bade him take heed to the business of the country, so that it might no longer be spoilt and harried by free companies. The Dauphin replied he would gladly do it, but that he was kept penniless, and could not, that they who took the money ought to defend the land, meaning by this the Provost and the citizens. Words began to run high, Marcel made a sign, and the men at his back drew and fell on the marshals, slaying them then and there — so close were they to the Prince that his robe was all bedabbled with their blood. He thought his hour too was come, and fell abjectly at Marcel's feet, praying for life. The Provost placed the civic cap on his head, and bade him be without fear. The corpses of the marshals were thrown out to the people. Thus the revolution seemed to be accomplished, and for a time the Provost became the actual head of government. He sat as President of the 'Thirty-six,' and organised similar bodies to govern the provinces, he bought a house on the 'Place de Grève,' called 'the House on Pillars,' and there established the headquarters of the municipal government. Thus he is the true founder of the Parisian Hôtel de Ville, the 'Palace of the Parisian People,' destined to be the scene of many stirring and tragical acts in the later history of the French nation.

For a time all seemed to work well. The Dauphin was cowed, Navarre returned to Paris, and was reconciled to him. But the revolution of Paris could not command sympathy and sequence in France, not even did the other great cities, in any number, come to the Provost's help<sup>2</sup> on the contrary, ill-will broke out; the towns were jealous of the capital, the Estates, when they met, were jealous of Marcel, even in Paris herself factions sprang up.

In order to counterbalance the Provost's power, the Dauphin was named Regent of the realm (March 1358), and seizing his opportunity escaped from his half-captivity at Paris and fled to Meaux. When the Provincial Estates met, as usual, to hear the Report of the States-General, they were found to be divided in opinion: those of Vermandois, Champagne, Anvergne, Dauphiné, Languedoc, declared for the Regent, promising him help. Thus the murder of the marshals only made the breach the wider. The Regent summoned the States-General to remove to Compiègne: some obeyed, some did not: there were two bodies in session, each claiming to represent France.

<sup>1</sup> Martin, Histoire des Français, tom 5, p 187 (note).

<sup>2</sup> Amiens, Rouen, Beauvais, Laon, Senlis, and a few more, took the blue and red — Martin, Histoire des Français, tom 5, p 189.

There was nothing left for Marcel but to consolidate such power as he had. He stormed the Louvre, fortified Paris, hired mercenaries. The Dauphin's army cut off the city's supplies: he sent an offer to pardon all with the exception of ten or twelve, nay even of five or six, and these he did not intend to put to death. Marcel's influence was still strong enough to persuade the Parisians to reject this proposal. But though they stood by him yet a growing ill will appeared, until he saw that he must get help from without: so he sent messengers to Charles of Navarre, who came at once. It was a fruitless attempt: for he was as little at heart a friend to Paris as the Regent was, with whom we find him almost immediately treating: evidently prepared, if he got such terms as he cared for to betray the city into the hands of the royal party.

A diversion from another side now came to the Provost's aid. The miseries of France weighed more and more heavily on the peasantry, and none regarded them. They stood apart from the cities, knowing little of them and having but small sympathy with them: the nobles despised them and robbed them of their substance or their labour. And now another evil fell on them: the country was overrun with free lances and no man's wealth, honour or life was his own. The Archpriest<sup>1</sup> a knight of Vergnes ravaged Provence and put the Pope at Avignon in deadly fear: so much so that he was as respectfully received as if he had been the King's son, and had banquets with the Pope and pardon for his sins. Another great troop lay between Paris and Orleans so that no one could pass through that district or dwell there: these were headed by one Griffith, a Welshman. In Normandy a third rout, under Robert Knolles, worked their will on town and castle, none withstanding them. At last the peasantry (May 1358), weary of their woes<sup>1</sup>, rose up to work their own revenge and rum. They began in the Beauvais country, and there fell on the nobles, attacking and destroying castles, and slaying their inmates: it was the old unvarying story. They made themselves a kind of king, a man of Clermont in the Beauvoisin, named Wilham Callet. Froissart imagines that the name 'Jacques Bonhomme' meant a particular person, a leader in these risings. Froissart however had no accurate knowledge of the peasant and his ways. Jacques Bonhomme was the common nickname, the 'Giles' or 'Hodge' of France, the name of the peasant generally, and from it such risings as this of 1358 came to be called the 'Jacquerie,' or the disturbances of the 'Jacques'<sup>2</sup>. The nobles were soon out against them, and the whole land was full of anarchy. Princes and nobles, angry peasants with their 'iron-shod sticks and knives,' free-lances, English bands of pillagers, all made up a scene of utter confusion: 'cultivation ceased, commerce ceased, security was at an end'<sup>3</sup>. The burghers of Paris and Meaux sent a force to help the peasants, who were besieging the fortress at Meaux, held by the nobles; these were suddenly attacked and routed by the Captal de Buch and the Count de Foix, 'then on their return from Prussia'<sup>4</sup>. The King of Navarre also fell on them, took by stratagem their leader Callet, tortured and hanged him. In six weeks the fire was quenched in blood.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Duchon), 3, cc. 380, 381.

Then the Dauphin was strong enough to draw his lines round Paris: the nobles having put down the peasants now turned against the cities. The people of Senlis won a surprise from them, which had no influence on the general fortunes of

<sup>1</sup> Continuator secundus Willelmi de Nangis in D'Achery, Spicil. 3, p. 119.

<sup>2</sup> The true origin of the name was well-known to the honest second continuer of William of Nangis, 3, p. 114, he wrote without prejudice, and with his eyes open.

<sup>3</sup> La Vallee, 2, 45.

<sup>4</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 3, c. 387, p. 299.

the struggle. The Regent lay before the gate of St. Antoine, holding the two rivers, Seine and Marne, and thus strangling and starving Paris. The King of Navarre not satisfied with Marcel's offers of the treasures of the city and the title of Captain of the kingdom, deeming also that he was now within reach of the actual crown of France, began to treat with the Regent. The Parisians and he, not trusting one another much were glad to part company. The King of Navarre sage and subtle, saw that things could not long go on as they were between those of Paris and the Regent, and not much trusting to the commons of Paris, left the city with great courtesy and came to St Denis<sup>1</sup>. There he stayed expecting the end. The two princes lay over against Paris for some weeks, meantime drawing somewhat together. At last, by means of the Queen Jeanne the Archbishop of Sens and others, they came to terms of peace. At this moment came secret messages from the Provost of the Traders to the King of Navarre. Marcel was in the utmost straits. Paris was penniless, famine-stricken. The burghers were suspicious almost hostile. He had no soldiers, and little hold on the citizens. They had compelled him to invite the Regent to return to Paris, and to join them in ejecting the English and the King of Navarre's men. The Regent, had he been generous, might then perhaps have healed the wounds of France. But he replied that he would never re-enter Paris while the murderer of the marshals lived. Then, as a last step—he must have felt it to be almost a hopeless one—Marcel called on Charles of Navarre to come back, offered to give him entry into the city by night, to crush with his aid all opposition and to proclaim him King of France at the Hôtel de Ville. Charles listened gladly. He seemed to touch the goal of his ambition. He took his measures well, and came quietly down to the St. Antoine gate where Marcel was to open to him. The Provost however was watched and his plans known. When with fifty or sixty of his followers he went down at midnight to seize the gates, one of the sheriffs of the city, by name Maillart, with some partisans of the royal side, fell on him, and killed him on the spot. They then rode through the town, shouting the royalist war-cry: the city was paralysed. The Dauphin, three days later, entered Paris, and took grim vengeance on his enemies. Thus perished this ill-starred attempt to build up France on civic liberties, and thus fell Étienne Marcel, the one man who with happier fortunes might have rescued France from the miseries before her.

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Bachon) 3, c. 389, p. 305.

This attempt to govern France from Paris, in many of its features so like the modern revolutions of that city, failed because there was no civic strength in France, nor any yeoman-class in country places, nor any great patriotic churchmen to keep alive the belief in the nation's life, nor any popular party among the nobles, nor any true germs of parliamentary government. Experience had shown at Ghent, when Jacquemart van Arteveld perished, that the burgher-nature was not broad or strong enough to rule over a nation, or indeed to rule itself: and if it failed there, far less hope for it in Paris. All this while the country was racked with the agony of private war and hostile interests. All industry, confidence, and unity were at an end. Marcel's attempt, foredoomed to fail, was, in spite of errors and its great crime, the murder of the marshals, a brave and a loyal effort to stem anarchy and to restore good government. It did but teach the Dauphin greater circumspection, a more wary cruelty, and more cunning skill in carrying out his plans for reducing France still further under the royal power.

The King of Navarre, baffled even as he sprang to seize his prey, fell back to Normandy: thence he made war on the Regent, returning in force, and ravaging the banks of the Seine, occupying Meudon, and doing the Parisians no small mischief, for no supplies could reach them from above or below. He took into his pay most of the free companies of the time.

Meanwhile, the Dauphin fell on his foes in Paris: these were the Days of Terror of that revolution—terror from the royal, not from the republican, side. When he felt that he had destroyed all opposition there, he moved on one step farther, he made peace with Charles of Navarre, buying him off on easy terms, and, after his wont, cherishing vengeance against him in his heart. No man ever knew so well how to dissemble.

IV THE TREATY OF BRETAGNY A.D. 1360

News came that King John in England had agreed to terms of peace ceding to Edward all the conquests his father had made, also Calais and Boulogne, with a large sum of money. But the Regent, who had used his father's name to evade his promises to Charles of Navarre found it quite easy to refuse such terms as these. He was now friendly with Navarre, and asked his advice. That King suggested that the States-General should be consulted and the Regent, in spite of his dislike for that body called them together in order that he might have the support of the nation in refusing to be bound by his father's word. Few came in answer to his summons the times were so bad and the ways so unsettled. Those who appeared deemed the treaty too hard, and replied with one voice that they would rather go on enduring their great evil and misery than see the noble kingdom of France thus diminished and wronged and that King John must abide yet awhile in England. When this message of the Estates reached London King John was much enraged and said "Ha, Charles, fair son you have been listening to the King of Navarre who deceives you, and would deceive sixty such as you!"

Edward thereon declared the truce broken. The free companies, hitherto ravaging France in the name of the King of Navarre, now ranged themselves under the King of England's banner. Truce or no truce the woes of France never ceased it was the ceaseless scourging of medieval demons. The Regent prudently garrisoned the strong places in his power and determined to risk nothing in the open field he knew that no done daily by the free companies, while it abrank away insensibly but surely. With this conviction forced on him, he reluctantly agreed to treat for peace. French and English met at the village of Breigny les Chartrea, about two leagues from Chartrea. On the 8th of May 1360 the treaty was signed and peace declared. King John, or those who spoke for him said truly that it was done, 'not only for our deliverance but also to escape the perdition and ruin of our realm and good people of France'<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Dechoy), 3, c. 419, p. 404.

The terms of peace were these —

- 1 King Edward III renounced his claim to the French throne
- 2 He gave up the old possessions of the House of Anjou north of the Loire
- 3 On the other hand, he was secured in the sovereignty of Gienne and Gascony including the Agénois, Périgord Rouergue, Querci, and Bigorre.
- 4 Poitou, Saintonge, La Rochelle the Angoulême country the Limousin, Montreuil-sur Mer Calais, Guines, with their dependencies and Ponthieu, were secured in full to Edward.
- 5 The Counts of Foix, Armagnac, Comminges, Périgord, Isle Jourdain, the Viscount of Limoges, and all lords of the Pyrenees, and barons of Aquitaine were to renounce the French and accept the English suzerainty
- 6 The inheritance of Eleanor was to come intact to her descendents, free from all feudal duties towards France
- 7 King John's ransom was fixed at three million crowns, or francs of gold, payable in six yearly instalments. The King to be free after the first payment, due guarantee for the rest having been provided.
- 8 King Edward promised to give up all the fortresses which his subjects, adherents, or allies held in those districts which were left to the French throne.

<sup>1</sup> Ordonnances des Rois, 3, p. 434.

9 France gave up the Scottish alliance, and England the Flemish

The Pope, Innocent VI, was invited to confirm the oaths of the high contracting parties with the utmost solemnity and sanction.

This treaty, which indicates the weakness of France, and left her in fact smaller than she had been in the days of Philip Augustus, was received in Paris and elsewhere with transports of joy—such was the misery and dejection into which the proud nation had fallen. We may close the record of this period with the words in which King John, after his return, in an Ordinance relating to sundry fiscal matters, alluded to the sorrows of his land ‘By the space of four years and over have we and this our people ever sustained and suffered many ills, discomfitures, and griefs, for as these grew daily worse and worse, tidings came to us how that the people of our realm were divided, and were slaying and destroying each other, and giving themselves up to rebellion and disobedience, and were committing divers horrible and enormous crimes, such as made it plain that had such things gone on, our realm and people would have been utterly destroyed, with perdition of all they had’ Wherefore, all this considered, he had made the aforesaid peace, ‘for we have found that in our realm there have been many divisions and rebellions, robbery, pillage, arson, larcemes, seizures, violence, oppression, exactions, extortions, and many other cruel misdeeds and excesses, justice ill administered, many new taxes levied, and much seizing, carrying off, and putting to ransom of personages, stores, horses, beasts, and other goods, whereby all industry is at end<sup>1</sup>’ What further picture of the state of France is needed after this proclamation of her King?

<sup>1</sup> Ordonnances des Rois, 3, p 434.

CHAPTER III

The Deeds of Charles V, 'the Wise' A.D. 1360-1380

I. AS REGENT A.D. 1360-1364

KING EDWARD soon carried his army back to England. John was sent, under charge of the Prince of Wales from Dover to Calais, there to remain in English keeping till the first part of his ransom should be paid. Small hope was there of gathering in four months, the time named, so large a sum from wretched France. But fortune came to the rescue. Galeazzo Visconti, Lord of Milan, chief of the Italian civic tyrants, wishing to secure his lordship as a hereditary principedom, be-thought himself of an alliance with the royal family of France and offered to purchase for six hundred thousand florins of gold the hand of Isabelle, daughter of King John for his son, John Galeazzo. The bargain was struck, the money paid and the foundation laid for future interference and troubles between France and Northern Italy. The immediate result was the release of King John. He returned to Paris, and, under the prudent guidance of his long headed son, seemed likely to govern well. Reforms in finance a fixed money standard, a decree against private wars, apparently promised well for the desolate land. Unfortunately the evils of the time were aggravated by pestilence of which the Queen of France and her two children by her first marriage perished and thus the younger branch of the earlier Capets became extinct. The King of France thrusting aside the King of Navarre whose hereditary claim to the province was better than his own, went down to Dijon, and took possession of the titles and lands of the Duke of Burgundy<sup>1</sup> And then, directly he had won this fine territory for France, he threw it away again He bestowed the duchy and peerage of Burgundy on his fourth son, Philip, so delaying for a long time the union of that fair province with the kingdom, and laying the foundation of the Burgundian power

Of all the curses of France, that of the free companies, the very worst, remained unabated They ranged unchecked, one of them, the 'Great Company,' swollen to the size of an army, ravaged Burgundy King John called together the feudal lords of that district, and gave battle to the freebooters at Brignais, where he was routed with great loss It was another heavy blow to feudalism, proving its impotence against the more regular forces of warfare The Great Company, unopposed, now streamed over all the rich lands of the Saone and Rhone King John, still guided by the old spirit of feudalism, which had worked him so much woe, wished to drain the country of these roving bands by leading them in crusade to the East But the time for this was past, and, indeed, his attention was soon called elsewhere One of the royal princes, the Duke of Anjou, escaped from Calais, where he was a hostage for the King, and, careless of all claims of honour, refused to return into captivity Then John, partly moved by his sense of what was due from him as King, partly, perhaps, seeing that his son was a better ruler than he, partly, no doubt, contrasting the desolation of France with the gay court of Edward of England<sup>2</sup>, asked for a safe-conduct, placed the regency again in the hand of Charles, and turned his back on Paris for ever He was splendidly received by Edward, and feasts and shows, while the crowned heads round the board chatted lightly and

<sup>1</sup> Franche-Comté and Artois went to the Dowager Countess of Flanders, daughter of Philip the Long and of Jeanne of Burgundy, who was daughter of the great Countess Mahaut The counties of Boulogne and Auvergne passed to John of Boulogne

<sup>2</sup> The honest second Continuator of Nangis says so expressly, declaring that he returned to England 'causa joci'

gally of crusades<sup>1</sup>, rewarded him for his return to a nominal captivity. But, in the midst of this festival, these pleasant talks about future travel and excitement, the grim hand which spoils so many plans beckoned to the King of France and he died, three months after his return to England<sup>2</sup>.

II. CHARLES V AS KING, A.D. 1364-1369

France, to whom King John was little more than a name, and to whom the Regent Charles was a sickly youth but rarely seen, took no interest in the death of the one or the accession of the other. It was some time before she became aware that she had come into the hand of a master. Everything had long tended to depress the feudal noblesse. King Charles 'the Wise' was the instrument exactly suited to raise the tottering monarchy on the ruins of the feudal power. His reign is of the highest importance to those who endeavour to trace out the growth of the absolute monarchy in France.

Of his wretched health and looks we have spoken<sup>3</sup>. It should be added here that his necessarily sedentary and quiet life cut him off from all the sports and jousts of the barons; he saw little of them, and what little he saw he disliked. His infirmities proved to be his strength, they kept him from all those feudal sympathies which would have hindered him in doing his life's work. They also turned his mind towards learning. He passed through the courses of study then known an apt and eager scholar. Religious he was and learned, yet not a monk on the throne. To read in Latin and French to know something of mathematics as then studied, of astrology, alchemy, theology, to gather round him well known learned clerks and philosophers seeking science to collect books and lay the foundations of the great library of Paris<sup>1</sup>, to listen to grave moralities, or noble deeds of olden history, or 'divers fair tales from Holy Writ,'—these were the occupations of the sickly King Rumour, half-malevolent, half-marvelling, gave him credit for dark doings in the secret chambers of his palace, his silent, unscrupulous course, his life unlike the then-known royal life, the singular success of his reign,—all these things gathered round the character of the sage King, and, striking men's imaginations with a sense of contrast between his quiet life and his fortunes, gave a special meaning to his name 'the Wise,' and endowed him with gifts which seemed in no sense human. In much of his character he bears striking resemblance to Philip II of Spain, that closet-King, so ceaselessly industrious, so silent and active, so determined, so mysterious.

<sup>1</sup> The Kings of Denmark and Scotland were there in order to discuss the subject.

<sup>2</sup> His funeral rites were done in St. Paul's; his body was afterwards transferred to Paris, and buried with much solemnity at St. Denis.

<sup>3</sup> See above, p. 435.

Morally cold, prudent, long-waiting, he lost nothing by passion or by haste, his shrewdness divined the future,—this was his astrology, his patience, and freedom from the trammels of the 'point of honour,' enabled him to prepare for that future, and reap his harvest in it. His famous saying, quoted by Christine de Pisan<sup>2</sup>, expresses the great principle of his reign, 'Lordship is more than glory<sup>3</sup>', the substance of power, not the show of it, was what he sought and won.

He reformed the coin of the realm, so taking away the chief grievance of the burghers, he found in one man, Du Guesclin, the instrument with which to recast and reform the war-power of his age. Hitherto, war had been one of the sports of the noble, the ruin of the land, the penury of the peasant, Du Guesclin made it a serious affair, and taught the French that hard-hitting and determined style which more than a century later amazed and shocked the Italians when they came into collision with the fighting men of Charles the Eighth.

<sup>1</sup> He placed nine hundred MSS in three fair chambers of the Louvre.

<sup>2</sup> Christine de Pisan, who was daughter of the King's astrologer, wrote a panegyric on Charles. It is of but small historic value. In 2, c 26, she gives us insight into his unscrupulousness. 'Circumstances,' he said, 'make things good or bad, this way cloaked, 'tis virtue, that way, 'tis vice. To know how to dissemble with the perverse is right good sense.'

<sup>3</sup> Martin, Histoire de France, 5, p 242.

And so this is the period of two great reforms in finance and in war—Du Guesclin in the battlefield, in the secret chamber Charles—these were the two powers with which France won back all she had lost—no wonder that she has transformed the soldier into a hero of chivalry and romance, the King into a miracle of magical and hidden wisdom.

And yet she misjudged both these great men. Charles was simply cold—prudent, patient, with one fixed idea—namely that it was bad to fight pitched battles (like that ill-starred field of Politiers, whence he had fled so early and so ill) when, at the small cost of ruin to wretched country folk, an invading army might be made to wear and waste itself away. Little magic, and little heart—that is what was wanted in him who should plan and coldly carry out such a war policy as this. This policy baffled Edward III, and led to Breigny—it led too to all the revival of the French power. And Du Guesclin, a hard, angry fighting man was in all things unchivalrous. He cared for and treated tenderly the poor folk, never doing them intentional wrong, he was a captain not of feudal knights but of free companies, himself a free-lance. He was the man who overthrew the old feudal service and heralded the age of mercenaries, which in its turn led the way to the ages of standing armies. No man had less of chivalry and romance as those things were then understood—fighting was his life and delight—fighting in earnest, with his short powerful frame, all knit up for the combat, his heavy features bright kindled with the joy of battle. The English armies had done much to ruin feudal chivalry—Du Guesclin wellnigh destroyed it, while at the same time he also wellnigh destroyed the English hosts.

Son of a Breton gentleman poor and of small estate Du Guesclin was short and ugly a marvel of strength and utterly fearless—rude also of bearing ignorant, of small capacity, and that not developed—he had great natural cunning that half-savage quality—was full of ruse and trick in war—he was contemptuous towards the high noblesse, but gentle to the poor and generous to his friends

It is said that on the day of King John's death, Charles beheaded eight-and-twenty burghers of Paris, the last victims of their ill-starred attempt at civic liberty. They were said to have been in communication with Charles of Navarre. That shifty prince was at open war with the Regent, and had raised large forces, composed of free-lances under the Captal de Buch.

Against these the King sent other such, a like force of mercenaries, led by Du Guesclin, already the most renowned of all the captains of freebooters. The two armies, from five to six thousand on either side, met at Cocherel, and the Captal after a hard day was utterly beaten, and taken. The war lasted yet a year, then the King of Navarre made peace, gave up Mantes, Meulan, and Longueville, and received in exchange the far-off border town of Montpellier<sup>1</sup>. The King gave Du Guesclin the county of Longueville, on condition that he should rid the kingdom of these free-lance companies, but the warrior was a free-lance himself, and did but aggravate the evil with his Breton followers. In self-defence cities, villages, houses, girt themselves with bulwarks, churches became fortresses. We may see still in the battlemented towers of fourteenth-century churches the evidences of this evil time.

Meanwhile, the old Breton feud between the Montforts and their English friends on the one side, and Charles of Blois, with his French supporters on the other, went dimly on, till Du Guesclin thought well to mix himself up in the fray. Charles V gave him pay for men, he collected a force and set out, marching westward, till at Auray near the Morbihan coast he fell in with Sir John Chandos, with an English force and some armed adventurers. Du Guesclin had far the larger body of men, the English were well posted on a hill whence the French tried in vain to dislodge them. Sir Hugh Calverley with a reserve force came up so swiftly that he secured the victory to the English. This battle ended the war. Charles of Blois fell, Du Guesclin was made prisoner, the army was destroyed. All the Breton towns opened their gates to the triumphant Montforts. The treaty of Guérande was signed and gave them the duchy of Brittany.

<sup>1</sup> There is a characteristic account of the way in which Charles V tried to evade his part of the treaty. First the King of Navarre had sealed it with a small private seal, this he objected to. He then sealed it with a big official seal, and the King professed that he thought it not valid because it was broken in the transit.

Charles V was powerless. He recognised the treaty and received the homage of John of Montfort for the duchy. The French people worshipped Charles of Blois as a saint, miracles at his tomb were reported and believed<sup>1</sup>, the Holy See was asked to canonise him. But though the French King supported the petition, the Montforts had interest enough at Avignon to neutralise the attempt and Charles remained, like St. Hugh of Lincoln a popular not a Papal or official saint.

The free companies were still the scourge of France, but their day was coming to an end. An attempt to send them by Metz into Germany in order that they might follow the Emperor on crusade to Egypt, failed. They came back from the German frontier all the greedier for pillage. Then Charles V who watched the English power with unflinching jealousy espied a weak place in the armour of his rivals. Castille was in the hands of Pedro the Cruel a monster in human form, who was on friendly terms with the Black Prince in Aquitaine. Henry of Trastamare, Pedro's bastard brother was eager to avenge himself and wrest the crown from the ruffian's hands, all Castille looked kindly on the claimant. Charles got Du Guesclin free by paying his ransom to Chandos, and gave him funds to raise another host of adventurers. The brigands flocked like vultures to his standard. Many who had served under the English now joined the French. It was all one to them. Even Sir Hugh Calverley himself came into the French camp. The army led by Du Guesclin took the road to Avignon where they extorted from Pope Urban V full indulgence for their sins and a large sum of money When the Pope heard their demand, he said that other sinners coming for absolution brought money to pay for it, these demanded both forgiveness and gold It was irregular, but it was ill arguing with free-lances, who might sack the Papal city and take its treasures, if they would So Du Guesclin got his will finding afterwards that the Pope had made the citizens of Avignon provide the money, he returned it all to them, and compelled Urban to pay it again out of the Papal treasury This time the Pope recovered it by a tax on the clergy

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Duchon), 3, c. 511 p. 269

Du Guesclin, thus reinforced, marched into Aragon, and was helped by Pedro the Ceremonious, King of that land, a prince nearly, if not quite, as great a ruffian as Pedro of Castille No effectual resistance could be made to the French. Pedro the Cruel fled at last into Aquitaine and took refuge with the Black Prince, Henry of Trastamare was crowned King at Burgos, Du Guesclin made Constable of Spain; his adventurers streamed back into France, richer, not less rapacious

As yet all was under cover, there was no open war between Don Pedro and Charles, though all knew that Charles had pushed him from his throne, there was no sign that the treaty of Bretigny was in danger, no hint that the English rule in France was drawing to an end yet it was for this that the 'pedant in his closet' at Paris was steadily and silently working Meanwhile English Edward gathered up his force, the brigands, of late the soldiers of Henry, now crowded round Pedro the Cruel; there was to be more fighting, more booty Embarrassed by their numbers the Black Prince dismissed the Gascons in his pay, saying he had no need of them, a step which angered his subjects, and seems to have been the beginning of the ill-feeling which sprang up between the English and the southerners But at present it was unnoticed. The Black Prince crossed into Spain, fought and won a great battle at Najara (A D 1367) on a tributary of the Ebro, where Du Guesclin was again taken prisoner again his stubborn and ignorant courage left him to fight and rage and be taken, when he ought to have covered the retreat of his men. And thus Henry lost for a time the throne of Castille. Pedro, now again proclaimed King neglected the Gascons and English who had won the prize for him, fever and other maladies set in, half the host perished the Black Prince himself when he withdrew into Aquitaine to defend it against Henry of Trastamare carried with him the seeds of the disorder which saddened his last years. He came back to discontented subjects, with the stain on his escutcheon of having lent himself to replace on the throne of Castille one of the vilest of mankind. From that time the fate of the English possessions in France was sealed.

The Black Prince saw what was beneath the turmoil, the secret energy and influence of the sorcerer the friend of Jews the odiously learned King of France and he warned his father Edward III, weary of war and old before his time was unwilling to believe it, he treated his hostages well, was contented that the instalments of the ransom continued to be paid, and shut his eyes to the signs of the coming storm. The Black Prince found himself surrounded by new dangers—by the ill will of his Gascon and Aquitanian subjects—and was very unwise in dealing with them. He claimed a heavy aid from them, and treated them imperiously, doubtless made irritable by sickness.

France at last found herself delivered from the grievous burden of the free companies. Many had perished in Spain, the rest passed into Italy where they found a rich land and a ready market for their arms. They took sides, as they were paid, for and against the Visconti at Milan they enrolled themselves as a foreign legion under the cross keys, and restored to the Pope the States of the Church which had wellnigh slipped out of his grasp. Even Urban V thought he might put a stop to the scandal of the Avignon captivity under their protection and in spite of the opposition of Charles V went down to Marseilles with his court whence he sailed for Italy and, after some days, entered Rome<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Continuator secundus W. de Nangis, p. 139, col. 2.

Thus France was solaced, and the long-broken industries of life revived. The King busied himself with internal reforms, for he had the true French spirit, the desire to administer his kingdom, to be the fountain of law and justice, to centralise everything round himself. At last the time came that he could safely throw off the disguise of years. With characteristic subtilty of mind, he set his lawyers and Universities to pick holes in the Treaty of Bretigny, and to find frivolous pretexts for a war, the true justification of which lay solely in its patriotism. In July, 1368, he offered Henry of Trastamare terms of open alliance, he no longer veiled his help, unavowed indeed but open to all eyes, against the English. He listened to the complaints of the Aquitanians, and found with them that the acts of the Black Prince were unbearable, he sent defiance to King Edward, summoning him to Paris to defend himself against the complaints of the prelates, barons, knights and communes of the Marches of Gascony and others who had taken refuge at his court. Edward scornfully replied he would appear, but with helm on head, and sixty thousand men at his foot though his words were brave, his strength was gone from him, and he was destined to do no more feats of arms. The French King silently prepared for war, favoured by the Black Prince's illness, and the reluctance of Edward III to believe in the evil.

The spring of 1369 saw the end of Pedro the Cruel. Defeated by Henry at Montiel, he was taken prisoner, and brought into the camp of Du Guesclin. There he met his brother, and all the hatred of years burst forth. From hard words they came to blows, they closed, and fell struggling on the ground. Pedro was uppermost, and got his dagger out to stab his brother, then Du Guesclin caught him by the leg, and turned him over, so that Henry lay above, and he, seizing the opportunity, smote Pedro to the heart. So in a disgraceful brawl, Du Guesclin looking on and helping, perished this monster of cruelty. With him perished also the hopes of the English party. Tidings of it reached Paris, and doubtless encouraged Charles to take the final step. And thus the mistake made by the Black Prince, when he supported Pedro, though he must have known of the enormities of his character and reign, now recoiled on the English with fearful violence.

III. THE HUNDRED YEARS WAR, PERIOD II.

CHARLES V MAKES WAR ON ENGLAND, A.D. 1369-1380

In April, 1369, Charles, the story runs, in order to pour contempt on both his English foes and the French chivalry, sent a varlet of the scullery to England with a declaration of war. A senseless insult, unless he meant to show the King that his policy was to fight him without the help of the feudal lords, whom he had so firmly and successfully depressed.

On the very day on which he declared war, he began war surprised the English at Abbeville, and took that city and St. Valéry that very day within a week all Ponthieu was recovered. The States-General were convoked, to sanction the step already taken the French clergy nothing loth, were bidden to preach the war Querci, led by the Bishop of Cahors, revolted at once. The Aquitanians felt that they were suspected by the Black Prince and soon deserved that suspicion. Fortune seemed to have deserted King Edward. An army was gathered in Normandy under Philip Duke of Burgundy, who, thanks to the able intrigues of Charles, and the complaisance of the Pope<sup>1</sup>, had just secured as his bride Margaret, heiress of Flanders, in spite of the opposition of Edward, who desired her hand for his son, Edmund Earl of Cambridge. Philip was stationed at Rouen, with strict orders not to risk a battle. His army came face to face with a small Anglo-Flemish force, under the Duke of Lancaster, though he was seven times as strong, the King's orders were peremptory and he was obliged to fall back. The Duke of Lancaster untouched, retired on Calais, did some small ravages on his way, and returned to England

<sup>1</sup> Edward of England and Philip of Burgundy were of the same degree of relationship with Margaret. But the Papal scruples, which were fatal to the suit of the Englishman, were forgotten when the Frenchman came forward.

It would be useless to trace out the obscure wars of this period. it is enough to state the results. The English hold on France was so slight and so precarious, that it was shaken off almost without an effort. The Duke of Burgundy in Northern France, those of Anjou and Berry to the South, gave way at once before the Black Prince with his English. There was no attempt at fighting. The well-known captain, Robert Knolles, pushed on from Calais, and set fire to the villages round Paris. These things were as nothing to the impassive King, he let the English weary themselves as before, they raged without resistance and without results.

The Black Prince, worn out with suffering, closed his brilliant career amid the smoking ruins of burnt and ravaged Limoges. From his litter, he saw the massacre he had commanded, passing slowly down the streets ghastly with corpses of warriors and women. From this last act of war—the summary of war's evils, and a blot on his glory for ever—he returned to Bordeaux, gloomy and sick, from Bordeaux he crossed to England, where he languished out the sad remainder of his days.

At last, when the long-expected moment came, Charles called Du Guesclin to him, and created him Constable of France, and thus the poor gentleman of Brittany took rank above the highest in the realm—another of the King's conquests won for monarchy over the feudal forces around him. The Constable went forth at once, caught the English at Pont-Vallain, and drove them before him into Brittany, and thus they were cleared away.

In Aquitaine the new governor, the Earl of Pembroke, could not even land. He was attacked by Henry of Castille off Rochelle with a far superior force of ships and boats, and a two-days' battle took place. Rochelle refused to succour the English, who in the end were overwhelmed. Pembroke was made prisoner, the whole fleet sunk or taken, the treasure-ship, carrying pay for the Gascon army went to the bottom (June 1372). This was the death blow to the English ascendancy in the South.

Poitou threw herself into Du Guesclin's arms, Poitiers itself was taken the Capital de Buch and Percy were surprised and made prisoners. La Rochelle drove out the English garrison first making good terms for herself with the French King.<sup>1</sup> The Constable swept, almost without loss, across Poitou, the Angoumois and Saintonge.

In Thouars lay almost all the Poitevin nobles of the English side there Du Guesclin laid siege to them. They agreed to an armistice if not helped from England before the end of November they would capitulate. Du Guesclin fortified his position round the town, and waited so long. The English King and even the Black Prince, with the army intended to land at Calais, took ship at Southampton. But the autumn gales were on them, for nine weeks they struggled in vain against this new foe. The day for the capitulation of Thouars came while they were still at sea and the old King at last gave orders to steer back to the English shore. He landed again at Southampton<sup>2</sup> and the effort had failed. Never was there King of France, said he, who wore so little armour, yet never was there one who has given me so much to do.<sup>3</sup>

Thus he summed up the character of the French King's warfare and it was by these means that Poitou was entirely lost to the English.

Next, Charles set himself to punish Montfort the Duke of Brittany for his English sympathies. In a very short time nothing was left to the English party there except Brest, Auray and Derval. The first of these was besieged. It was, however, succoured by the Earl of Salisbury who offered battle to

These were, that (1) They should raise the castle which had often been a grievance to them (2) They should never be separated by marriage treaty or otherwise from France; (3) They should regulate their own coinage (4) They should never be subjected to any taxation except of their free-will.

Oct 1372

<sup>1</sup> Froissart (Buchon) 6, c. 672 p. 22.

France, and would then have gradually been assimilated with the kingdom. On the contrary, Charles paid little attention to local prejudice, and, with that cold unimaginative nature of his, trampled underfoot the local liberties, consequently, the last years of his reign saw his great work in France not consolidated but imperilled.

He set himself to confiscate Brittany. That Duchy, so free and high-spirited, was now without a head. John of Montfort had been expelled by the wave of opposition to the English, and no one was put in his place. Charles was not content to do what was prudent, by reinstating the Blois family in the Duchy; a step which would have bound Brittany, retaining its feudal relations to its own chief, by strong ties of gratitude and need to the French throne. He wished rather to absorb the Duchy, and abolish its ancient liberties. In vain did Jeanne, the widow of Charles of Blois, protest and remonstrate, Charles secured the neutrality of Du Guesclin and Clisson, who let their allegiance to him outweigh their patriotism, and then, in December 1378, declared the Duchy united to the crown.

These great Breton soldiers, Du Guesclin, Clisson, Rohan, true freebooting captains they had driven out the English, had re-established serfage and heavy taxation they sold themselves and their country to the timid King. Though her natural leaders thus deserted her, Brittany did not lose her anger broke forth at once; in the early summer of 1380 the whole Breton people were in full revolt. John appeared, welcomed by an united and enthusiastic people. The royal forces made no progress, for the royal battles, did not suit this case. When Englishmen, tiring their weary course across France, they could not perish by their own weight, suffering the loss of the land bereft of prudence; against a vigorous resistance 'little warfare' was of no avail. The distrustful, remembering that Du Guesclin had deserted him, and he in turn, not easy in his position, he be so?—and feeling himself ill-placed in silent death. Though a great soldier for those days, and in some respects a noble character he lacked opportunity for real greatness, he was brilliant with the brilliancy of fireworks, transitory like them and wasteful. A year later the old King Edward also passed away days of change are coming, a new era in English history begins.

The English would gladly have renewed the truce had not Charles been too wary for that. He at once sent the Castilian fleet, which had done him such good service at La Rochelle, to ravage the English coasts. It was unopposed. By sea and land the quiet King was alike supreme. His armies entered Picardy and Guenne there was no one to withstand them. The English efforts to relieve the King of Navarre who for all his ruses, was hard pressed by the Castilians, were but partly successful. Charles the Bad was between the upper and nether millstones of Charles the Wise, who ground down his French possessions, and Don Juan, son of Henry of Castille who attacked his Spanish territories. Though succoured by the English he had to make a lame peace with the Castilian King.

The English also attacked St. Malo fruitlessly except in so far as they drew Du Guesclin and the Duke of Berri away from their close siege of Bordeaux. No battle was fought, Charles being still faithful to his policy, the English could make no impression on St. Malo and were forced to reembark.

On the whole, by sea and land, the English were completely overmatched and the year 1378 saw Charles V successful on every side he seemed likely to be able to rescue all France from foreign interference, and to administer a newborn kingdom with Ordinances, arbitrary no doubt, but in the actual condition of the age and country clearly sagacious and suitable.

He pushed his concentrating tendencies too far. The outlying districts, Flanders, Brittany Languedoc, never French, but called on to choose between Paris and London, might, with prudent and gentle handling have become firmly united to

France; and would then have gradually been assimilated with the kingdom. On the contrary, Charles paid little attention to local prejudice, and, with that cold unimaginative nature of his, trampled underfoot the local liberties, consequently, the last years of his reign saw his great work in France not consolidated but imperilled.

He set himself to confiscate Brittany. That Duchy, so free and high-spirited, was now without a head. John of Montfort had been expelled by the wave of opposition to the English, and no one was put in his place. Charles was not content to do what was prudent, by reinstating the Blois family in the Duchy, a step which would have bound Brittany, retaining its feudal relations to its own chief, by strong ties of gratitude and need to the French throne. He wished rather to absorb the Duchy, and abolish its ancient liberties. In vain did Jeanne, the widow of Charles of Blois, protest and remonstrate, Charles secured the neutrality of Du Guesclin and Clisson, who let their allegiance to him outweigh their patriotism, and then, in December 1378, declared the Duchy united to the crown.

These great Breton soldiers, Du Guesclin, Clisson, Rohan, were true freebooting captains. They had driven out the English faction, had re-established serfage and heavy taxation. They now sold themselves and their country to the timid King. Yet, though her natural leaders thus deserted her, Brittany did not hesitate: her anger broke forth at once; in the early summer of 1379 the whole Breton people were in full revolt. John of Montfort reappeared, welcomed by an united and enthusiastic people. The royal forces made no progress, for the royal war-formula, 'no battles,' did not suit this case. When Englishmen were dragging their weary course across France, they were wisely left 'to perish by their own weight,' suffering the doom of 'violence bereft of prudence'; against a vigorous national uprising this 'little warfare' was of no avail. The King became angry, distrustful; remembering that he was a Breton, he suspected him: and he said in his mind,—how should he be so?—and for between Brittany on one side and his master on the other, begged leave to be gone and, getting leave, sent to the King an angry message with his Constable's sword, and set forth for Castille. A reconciliation, of a kind, took place and he consented on his way to reduce some English holding fortresses in the South. Accordingly he sat down before a little place, Château Randon, on the frontiers of Languedoc, and there fell ill and died (July, 1380). So passed away the free-lance hero of a dark age in half-discredit with his King at a time when a greater man would have risked still more discredit for his native land. But these were evil days for soldiers and the spirit of patriotism was distracted by cross-interests. Du Guesclin worthily receives honour from France, for he was a notable instrument in her building up—this is the only praise we can give him—no other true glory or greatness belongs to the fierce-tempered Breton. They brought his body back to the North, and laid it among the tombs of the Kings in St. Denis, hard by the resting place which Charles, with the sickly imagination of an invalid, had built for himself while he yet lived and a never-dying lamp burnt for ages over his grave.

Meanwhile troubles broke out in North and South. Flanders was torn with civil war of the burghers against the nobles, headed by their Count Louis. Charles V when Louis in his strait applied to him, refused him help. He would not now move a finger in the cause of the nobles, though with them he had triumphed over Paris—and thus too even though he knew well that the burghers were attached to England, and that the cause of the nobles was, so far his own. He seems to have based his refusal on personal grounds—Louis, he said, is the proudest prince alive, I would gladly bring him to reason. This was only the pretext—the principle on which he acted was his old and fixed rule of lowering the power of the great nobles.

And lastly in these same years, 1378–1380 the Duke of Anjou being sent by the King into Languedoc, had found there as he thought, a fine field for his dangerous ambition and had treated that fair province as his own private domain. He crushed the inhabitants under his feet, his subsidies were huge, he violated the privileges of the cities, treated all except the noblesse with contempt. At last their cry reached the King's ears, and he, finding them pushed to the end of their forbearance, recalled the Duke of Anjou, who was at the moment intriguing with his friend Pope Clement VII at Avignon, and sent down commissioners to inquire into abuses and to reform them. He eventually gave the charge of Languedoc to the Count of Foix, a most popular Southern lord, and this danger to the crown was averted.

Nor was France proper altogether at rest. The royal exactions rendered the population uneasy. In 1379 the King was obliged to suspend all his fiscal officers, and to give the cities some control over their taxation<sup>1</sup>. In all things Charles showed himself rather a great proprietor than a great prince. The sufferings of his country never seemed to affect him till they expressed themselves in a falling-off of the royal revenues. Then he bestirred himself;—as a landlord, not as a King<sup>2</sup>.

In the midst of these dark signs of a task half done, came to the King his summons to lay down the sceptre. His physician had told him, early in life, that when the abscess under his arm closed he must prepare to die, death would be upon him within a fortnight. and now, early in September, 1380, the sign came. Charles arranged his affairs calmly, as befitted the 'sage' King, sent for two of his brothers, the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy, with the Duke of Bourbon, his Queen's brother, leaving unsummoned the ambitious and unscrupulous Anjou. To them he commended his little son Charles, now only twelve years old, light of character, and one who needed prudent governors. he bade them make Clisson Constable in the room of Du Guesclin, he lamented greatly the heavy aids with which he had grieved and crushed the poor folk of France.

<sup>1</sup> Ordonnances des Rois, tom 6, p 440

<sup>2</sup> Martin, Histoire des Français, tom 5, p. 327 'Le roi n'étant, dans sa manière habituelle de penser et de vivre, que le plus grand propriétaire de son royaume, S Louis est peut être le seul de nos vieux rois qui ait vu les choses de plus haut'—Cp. Ordonnances des Rois, tom 6, pp 464, 467.

And having made them this too late confession of the harshness of his rule, he devoutly resigned the weary burden of his life and crown into the hands of Him who had laid them on him.

So died King Charles the Fifth, the Sage

There is something fascinating about this sickly King so unlike all before him, at once weaker and stronger than they. We see him in his youth flying like a crane from the field of Poitiers, with a following of horsemen who led by a brave man, might have stemmed the 'onward ride' of the Black Prince. Then we see him grovelling at the feet of Marcel, abjectly begging his life, we note his companions, noble and frivolous—and what a prospect for France when this poor creature becomes King! Add to this his terrible illness, soon after his coronation<sup>1</sup> and then compare his accession with that of his lively, handsome son Charles the Sixth—who would have said that the one would leave his kingdom enlarged at peace the other drag it down to the lowest depth of humiliation?

But when Charles V became King unknown qualities emerged. He is silent, hidden from sight. From his secret places he rules by occult power. The feudal world around him loses sight of him has no influence with him. He studiously depresses the great nobles, does all by means of new men the 'Marmousets' as the feudal lords contemptuously call them or he employs his brothers, the Princes of the Lilles, whose ambition and rude health he satisfies and employs now here now there. His cold temperament cares for no man's sufferings he has little love for any one except Du Guesclin. His tenacity outwears his enemies, reduces his domestic burdens, enables him to smother any latent desire for liberty in France brings his finances into good order avoiding the disastrous ignorance of his forerunners fiscal policy he restores confidence and in dustry, he enlarges the borders of his kingdom Yet so secretly and silently, so unlike the clatter of that false chivalry with which men's ears were still filled, that the world was fain to account for his power by occult causes. he was over-learned, a magician, a practiser of forbidden arts The truth was, he was a shrewd lawyer<sup>1</sup>, patient, unscrupulous, sagacious, and he knew his times. He saw that the day of chivalry was past, that the old forces of the world were wearing themselves out, he knew that by waiting he could outstay them Their life was all action and glory; he denied them the stirring excitement of battle, and quietly wearied them out This is the secret of his success

<sup>1</sup> Depuis le temps de son couronnement luy estant en fleur de jeunesse et une très griève et longue maladie, à quel cause luy vint se de scay mais tout en fu affoiblis et debilitéz, que toute sa vie demoura très pale et très malgre et sa complexion moult dangereuse de fièvres et froidures d'estomac. —Christine de Pisan, 2 c. 10.

We have a minute account of his daily life from Christine<sup>2</sup> it was thus After dressing, he received his chaplain, with whom he recited Breviary and Hours Then at 8 a m he heard Mass in his chapel, after which he gave audience to rich and poor alike Then, on Council days, to the Council, then talk, after the business done, with the lords of the blood or the bishops. By 10 a m breakfast was ready: simple food, washed down with good wine much diluted, music playing the while Then conference with any prince or ambassador who might be at Court, questions propounded, discussed, solved, letters signed, gifts and offices granted This all done, he withdrew and rested, taking sleep for about an hour Refreshed, he amused himself with his private friends, using simple relaxations for the sake of his health and this till vespers Then, in summer, he would stroll in his garden, and, if at St Pol, the Queen and children would sometimes come too, and he would speak to the women, and ask after the well-being of the children In the winter he sat and heard one read, now Holy Writ, now the 'Gesta Romanorum,' or Moralities, or Philosophy, till supper, which was early and light. After the meal, he fenced a little with his comrades, and so betimes to bed It is a quiet feeble life, strictly by rule, without energy or enterprise or much of interest, except when he pleased himself with his fine collections of jewels, for which he had a great love. He wearily did his work as a ruler saying with a sigh, that government was 'more burden than glory, —' plus charge que gloire.'

<sup>1</sup> As the Duke of Lancaster called him.

<sup>2</sup> Christine de Pisan, I, c 16

He was also a great lover of architecture and engineering, and built not a few noble castles and churches, such as the chapel at Vincennes, and the great abbey of St. Ouen at Rouen. The Bastille dates from his day, he projected the canal between the Seine and Loire. He loved learning and the learned, his reign saw translations of the Bible,—then of Aristotle, next in authority—then of St. Augustine and of Luvy and he gathered together the germs of the great Library at Paris.

His public and striking acts are few. He did much for good government in detail, his administrative and civil ordinances bear the mark of a mind steeped in law especially in Roman Law. He made the Parliament of Paris permanent, treating it as a high Law Court, and placed it significantly in the old palace of St. Louis. He ordained that the majority of the Kings of France should be fixed at the age of thirteen<sup>1</sup> and very wisely separated the regency from the tutorship of a minor King, so that the Regent should never have the personal charge of the King as well as that of the kingdom. His Ordinances show no small favour to the higher bourgeoisie, it is not uncommon to find him granting nobility to the Provost and Sheriffs of a city as in 1372 to those of Poitiers, and in 1377 to those of Paris. His Ordinances for the cities had as an obvious aim first to detach them (as in the cases of La Rochelle and Poitiers) from the English cause, and secondly to raise them up against the feudal noblesse. We may note also that he overthrew many fencible castles, under pretext that they might prove serviceable to the English. In fact he succeeded in bereaving the nobles of many of their sovereign prerogatives and in concentrating on himself the whole legislative power. They retained their powers of administration and war the time would come when the Monarchy would absorb these also<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This law held good till the Revolution.

<sup>2</sup> Duruy Histoire de France, 2 421

One more trait. Though it is true that Charles confirmed his brother in the Duchy of Burgundy,—finding the thing in fact done when he came to the throne,—he took good care that no more limbs should be torn away from France as provisions for younger sons. There exists an Ordinance from his hand which forbids all such concessions of sovereign fiefs in the future, and fixes the provision for princes of the blood in the form of revenues and titles. Thus while with one hand he helped to found the great ducal house of Burgundy, with the other he secured the unity of the French kingdom. Henceforth France has but three great fiefs on her flanks. Guenne, the chief scene of these Anglo-French wars, Burgundy, destined to rise almost to the rank of a kingdom in the coming time, and Brittany, whose stubborn Armoricans would be the last to bow the head before the crown of France<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> La Vallée, 2, pp 56, 57.

CHAPTER IV

Charles VI A.D. 1380-1422.

I. THE GREAT SCHISM.

ONE of the last public acts of Charles V was the creation of the 'Great Schism of the West, which divided Europe into two new camps—that of the Clementines, or of those who recognised Pope Clement VII, and that of the Urbanists, who paid allegiance to Urban VI. Though the latter claimant had apparently the stronger and better cause, the French King did not hesitate to throw his weight into the opposite scale. And from that moment (A.D. 1378) for many years raged this great struggle between Pope and Pope, to the scandal of Christendom. The policy of France respecting the Popes, which was characterised by their captivity at Avignon, the want of moral character and of a true sense of responsibility and the persistent resistance to all reform shewn by the Popes, led naturally to this deplorable sight, this duel in which the greatest names and the greatest ideas in Christendom, were pitilessly dragged through the dust.

The last quarter of the fourteenth century was a very bad time throughout Europe. Everywhere there was ferment and restlessness, there were sudden uprisings from below ill managed and abortive, yet capable of shaking still more the crazy feudal fabric. Everywhere the feeling was the same—in Italy the Fraticelli the Vaudois, the Turlupins 'the Society of the Poor the Beggars, in Germany, in France the Jacquene

the followers of Wickliffe and John Ball in England—all expressed the same discontent Froissart, who watched it from the feudal castle-wall, opines that it sprang 'from the great ease and abundance of goods in which the common folk then lived' He also finds it quite natural that the 'common folk should till the lands of the gentleman, gather in his harvest, lead it to his grange, store it, thrash and winnow it, and, as his servile duty, cut the hay, make it, stack it, and do all such like eorvices' But the unreasonable people<sup>1</sup> appealed to things unheard of, to God's order in the world, to Adam and Eve, complained that they were kept like beasts, not like men, and even went so far as to demand wages for their work

At the same time the faithless Papacy at Avignon was the mother of all horrid crimes and vices, slave to its own passions and to France. The conclave was entirely under French influences, one Pope after another bowed before the French King This however could not always continue, and at last Urban V, in spite of all the efforts of Charles V and the French party at Avignon, broke loose in 1367, and returned to Rome. The Emperor Charles IV held his stirrup at his entry, rejoicing to think that his turn of influence might be coming. Cardinal Albornoze had subdued the Romagna, Umbria, and the Mareh of Aneona it looked as if the Papacy might come back and reseate itself in its temporal principedom Yet Urban soon slipped back again to Avignon, where he died in 1370 His successor, Gregory XI, moved chiefly by St. Catherine of Siena, whose influence over him was unbounded, risked his personal safety, and also eseapecd to Rome Italy was now fast turning against France; and when in 1378 Gregory XI died, the Roman populace, dreading above all things another Avignon Pope, showed so ominous a temper, that the sixteen cardinals, of whom eleven were French, were compelled, much against their will, to elect an Italian, the Bishop of Bari, as Pope. He took the name of Urban VI The conclave, even while it elected him, made protest that it was acting under compulsion; and when the stern severity of the new Pope became plain to them, when no one seemed safe from violence, when even the cardinals of his own party were seized, and (so the tale ran) cast into the sea, they were terrified at the master they had given themselves, and withdrew to Anagni, in order to be near Naples. They called to their aid the Gascon and Breton brigands who were still roving about Italy they wrote to Charles V and made terms with him they declared the Papal See vacant, and proceeded to a new election. This time their choice fell on Robert of Geneva, a man who did not belong to one of the powerful nations he had led freebooters into Italy and was now but thirty-six years old. He took the name of Clement VII. Charles V of France, the kingdoms of Scotland, Naples, and Castille, recognised him at once. On the other hand Urban was acknowledged by Northern Italy by Germany England, Holland, Navarre, and most of the northern states of Europe. Thus was all Christendom split asunder by the 'Great Schism' between the aged Urban VI, the stern, disinterested, and violent Italian Pope and the youthful Clement VII the supple and dissolute French Pope.

<sup>1</sup> 'Les méchants gens'—Froissart (Bucl

The duration of the schism is reckoned by some at forty, by others at seventy-eight years. The Church herself was never quite clear as to the rights of the question, it got itself mixed up with many cross issues. It destroyed the idea of the theocratic monarchy, it struck a heavy blow at the old faith, and prepared men for the Reformation. It was a great scandal in Christendom, this house divided against itself. The Popes fired hulls point blank at one another, they distracted Europe with the sight of their selfishness, and seemed bent on proving the impotence of their most tremendous ecclesiastical weapons.

At first the vigour of Urban carried all before him. He drove Clement out of Naples and compelled him to take refuge at Avignon then, with help of Charles of Durazzo one of the Angevin claimants to the throne of Naples, he took that city, and put its unhappy Queen Joanna to death.

II THE EARLY YEARS OF THE KING. A.D. 1380-1392.

So things stood, when Charles V died, leaving his throne to the handsome boy<sup>1</sup>, now nearly twelve years old, whose reign was so disastrous to the state, so sad for himself. Just before the sage King died, he had commended his little son to the dukes his brothers, Berri and Burgundy, and to Bourbon, the Queen's brother. 'All my trust,' said he, 'is in you; the child is young and fickle-minded, and great need there is he should be guided and governed by good teaching' Ill did they fulfil the trust! Berri was occupied with his pleasures and his extortions in the South, Burgundy was busy securing the great fief of Flanders, and founding a powerful dominion to the north and east of France, Bourbon was an amiable and worthy man, gentle and of small influence, and lastly, the Duke of Anjou, whom Charles had not called to his bedside, was rapacious and selfish, vehemently ambitious, and full of schemes for winning the throne of Naples.

The times looked dark in Church and State. On the thrones of France and England sat children, each surrounded by a group of dishonest and selfish princes of the blood—drunken Wenceslaus abused the Empire—the state of the Papacy we have seen. There was neither dignity in high places nor contentment among the people. The English troubles were social<sup>2</sup>, and more agricultural than civic. The French movements were political springing from the ideas of the burghers of a few great cities, in sympathy with the Flemish towns. There was but little harmony between them and the peasantry.

Never was there greater need of a wise prince than when light-headed Charles VI was called on to take his father's place. Unfortunately, he had not a single quality likely to be useful to his people, except it were his good-nature. He docs not seem to have been cruel of disposition. Juvenal des Ursins says that at Courtrai he tried to prevent the murder, fire and pillage. He also calls him benign and gentle<sup>1</sup> Fickle minded, fond of pomp and pleasure, he disliked the duties of a ruler and craved for fresh excitements. When his father shortly before his death, had given him leave to choose among his exquisite jewels, the lad passed them all by and took instead a little helmet he hung a little suit of armour like a child's toy at his bed-head all tended to show that expeditions or court games, movement, excitement, self indulgence, were the needs of the boy king and in these his uncles, the Princes of the Lilies, gladly indulged him, for thus he would most surely become unfit to exert his own authority against theirs.

<sup>1</sup> Christine, 2, c. 15, says he was tall, handsome, and well-built, 'souverainement bel de corps et de viaire (visage), grant des corps, plus que les commune hommes, bien formé, et de beaux membres.'

<sup>2</sup> Wat Tyle's insurrection took place in 1381.

By an Ordinance of 1374<sup>2</sup> Charles V had fixed the age of his successors majority at thirteen, hoping thereby to free his son from the uncles he died unfortunately two years before the boy reached even that early age. In 1375 he had given the regency to his eldest brother the Duke of Anjou, afterwards (probably discerning his character better) he tried to keep him out of it altogether. The tutelage he entrusted to the Queen his wife, to his third brother the Duke of Burgundy and his brother in-law the Duke of Bourbon. The regency was to have no authority over Paris, Senlis, Melun, or the Duchy of Normandy, which were to be governed by a council of prelates, barons, members of the Parliament, and six burghers of the city of Paris.

Of these Princes of the Lilies, the Duke of Burgundy, Philip le Hardi, had married Margaret, heiress to the Count of Flanders, whence he had the immediate expectation of Flanders, the wealthiest district in Christendom<sup>3</sup> together with Brabant Artois, and other places of note.

<sup>1</sup> J Juvenal des Ursins, ann 1383 avoit grand sens et entendement, et estoit très belle personne et benigne et douce. The great Chronicle de France describes the King as seeking to save the citizens, combien que le roy eust fait crier qu'on ny trust personne et que on ne fit desplaire a nuluy toute voies, en despit de la bataille de Courtray les gens de guerre faerent pre-que tous ceulx de la ville. —Chron. de France, tom. 2, p. 45.

<sup>2</sup> Ordonnances des Rois, tom 6 p. 26.

<sup>3</sup> La plus noble, riche et grant qui soit en Crestienté. —Christine. 2 13.

Anjou, the worst of the brothers, was greedy and ambitious, he it was who stole the jewels Charles V had collected. He scented out and seized the bars of treasure hidden in the walls of Melun Castle, and intended as a reserve for the use of the young King. Having got this wealth, he determined to win with it Naples and Sicily, the glittering prize which dazzled him and lured him to destruction. That he was thus attracted out of France, and furnished with the means of making his way in Italy, was perhaps the best thing that could have happened. The money was not altogether ill laid out.

Berri, who presently took the command of the South of France, was incapable as a ruler, extortionate, unjust, he oppressed his people scandalously.

These selfish Princes of the Lilies quarrelled at once. Anjou, through the great lawyer Jean des Marests, claimed both regency and tutelage. The Chancellor, Peter d'Orgemont, for the Dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, claimed that the King should be at once consecrated, and that there should be no regency, alleging the express wishes of the late King. The dispute came to arbitration. It was agreed that Anjou should be Regent, but only till the King's consecration, and that he should have as his own all the treasure, plate, jewelry, and furniture of Charles V. His hopes of Naples made him acquiesce in this award. There was established a great council, in which sat the four Dukes, and with them twelve councillors, whom they chose. The King's consecration at Rheims followed at once, Oliver Clisson was made Constable of France, the Dukes divided the charge of the kingdom as they thought best. Burgundy had Normandy and Picardy, Berri went south to Languedoc, ruling there and in part of Aquitaine, having full regalian rights over nearly one-third of the kingdom. Anjou was President of the Council, and had control of finance, Burgundy and Bourbon set themselves over the King's education.

Just at this moment Ghent sounded her war-note. Philip van Arteveld headed the revolt of the burghers against feudalism, in his struggle with Louis de Male, Count of Bruges, and feudal lord of Ghent and in the battle of Bruges (A.D. 1382) won the independence of his city. At the same time Paris had revolted, and had compelled the King's advisers to lighten the burden of taxation for thirty thousand armed citizens were not to be trifled with. Rouen also revolted, and set up a draper as their civic king him the Dukes presently overthrew. The States-General were refractory, the provincial States disaffected. The feudal party, the nobles of France, saw clearly that the triumph of the cities would be their loss, and they urged the boy King to make war on the citizens of Flanders. Nor was he loth to take the field. Philip van Arteveld appealed to England but, though the Urbanist churchmen of England wished to aid their friends the Flemings against the Clementine French, and though the English cities were not altogether unwilling to stand by Ghent, succour came reluctantly and too late. The English nobility like the French, saw that their interests were not on the side of the towns. Consequently the campaign of the French chivalry against Ghent was little more than a military excursion. A great part of the civic forces were engaged in the siege of Oudenarde with the remainder, men of plentiful goodwill but small knowledge of war, Philip van Arteveld marched out against the French. Froissart tells us that he was no skilful general, being more fit to fish with a worm as he used to do on the bridges of Ghent, than to command armies and probably the contemplative citizen was better in the council-chamber than in the field. Certainly at Roosebek there was but little strategy. The citizens tied themselves together we are told, and advanced in a solid body on the French. But though they made some impression on the centre, the two wings of the French army lapped round their flanks, where they were defenceless. They stood and were massacred 'soon there was a long and high heap of slaughtered Flemings, and, for so great a battle and so many dead, never flowed so little blood—some were knocked down with clubs and maces numbers were stifled in the crush and lay dead without a wound. It is said that 26 000 perished the whole of the Ghent battalion, with Van Arteveld at its head, was destroyed, and the war was in fact ended with one blow. Had King Charles pushed on, he might have brought all to a very speedy close. Flanders was crushed, the siege of Oudenarde raised, Bruges threw open her gates, Ghent left her walls undefended for three days. The King wished to see the body of the great burgher whom he had so signally overthrown and they sought it among the dead. There he lay, under a heap of his faithful Flemings, crushed and stifled to death. The prisoner, who found and pointed out the body, was so overwhelmed with grief, that he tore open his wounds, refusing to live now that his chief was dead. The body was displayed before the King, and then, it is said, was hung on a gallows-tree<sup>1</sup>. 'And this,' says Froissart, 'was the last end of Philip d'Arteveld'<sup>2</sup>. Thence they turned to Courtrai, took it, sacked it, and burnt it down. The townfolk were slaughtered in crowds, the wretched remainder dragged into servitude. The Duke of Burgundy carried away the fine town-clock, and set it up in his good city of Dijon. Thus was 'the Day of the Spurs' avenged.

And it was, in truth, a great triumph of the noblesse over the cities. Paris was the first to feel it. The King came back with great pomp of arms, the burghers' offer of honours at his entry was contemptuously refused. The gates were torn down, the barriers broken, the Bastille at the Porte St Antoine strengthened. The city was treated as a fallen foe, and heavily taxed<sup>3</sup>. The same was also done at Rheims, Châlons, Troyes, Sens, Orléans. There was also a strong reaction against the lawyers and the 'new men,' the 'Marmousets', Des Marests, the aged and faithful servant of so many Kings, now fell, nor did he escape the scaffold<sup>4</sup>. There was no little judicial murder, no small squeezing of the rich. Terror and oppressive taxation fell on

<sup>1</sup> It is also said that the King kicked the body as it lay. But this rests on the very slightest authority, that of a MS chronicle at Oudenarde, cited by M. de Reiffenberg.

<sup>2</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 8, c. 198, p. 354.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. 8, c. 204, p. 387.

<sup>4</sup> Possibly his having supported the Duke of Anjou was partly the cause of his fall.

the intelligent and industrious classes. In all ways the triumph of the nobles seemed to be complete.

It was in vain that a strong force of English under the warlike Bishop of Norwich was sent to Calais to support the Urbanist cause, to give the English nobles a chance of emulating the feudal glory won by the French at Roosebek, and to express, at the same time the popular sympathy with the burghers of Ghent. None of their leaders showed strategy or wisdom if we except Sir Hugh Calverley a true warrior of the sterner type, whose voice they never listened to. They took Dunkirk, overran West Flanders as far as Sluys, laid siege to Ypres. Then Charles VI rode northward again with a great host, and the English, overmatched, gave way point by point, until they were forced back into Calais.

Then came negotiations and a truce, in which the men of Ghent were included, was signed in January 1384. At the same time the burghers old foe Louis de Male, Count of Flanders perished by an obscure death, probably in a brawl with the Duke of Berry. Flanders then fell into the hands of Philip the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, who had it in right of Margaret his wife. He was wise and conciliatory restored the Flemish liberties, and 'was himself more a Fleming than a Lily prince. And thus the foundations of the great Burgundian dukedom, stretching in a curve from the sea round all the northern and much of the eastern frontier of France, were securely laid.

While Burgundy was thus fruitfully based in the North, Louis of Anjou pursued his own plans to the South, and brought them to a very different issue. He crossed the Alps in 1385 styling himself King of Sicily and passed, with no small loss of men, through Italy. Charles of Naples his rival for the kingdom, withdrew all provisions, so that men and beasts were starved. In vain did Anjou assert his claim as adopted son of Queen Joanna. In vain did he challenge Charles to come out and fight. Like his namesake Charles V of France the King of Naples was sufficiently cool to watch quietly the daily weakening of his antagonist. Thus, Anjou, being before Barletta, in which town Charles was lying, drew out his forces and offered battle 'The French were well enough armed, but very scantily dressed, the King himself wore a linen coat, painted to represent armour' Then Charles of Naples, who had promised 'to see him in the field,' marched out of one of the city-gates, and, having thus raised the hopes of the French, who languished for want of a battle, and having fulfilled his promise to the letter, he marched back into the city by another gate 'King Louis seeing himself thus mocked, and in such straits, with his men all dying fast, determined to be gone and to return home But of his wrath and displeasure he died

. They put him in a coffin of lead, with such obsequies as they could muster. and then, noble or not noble, they made for home afoot with great difficulty, each staff in hand, and sore pity it was to see them And thus all the chivalry and help King Louis had had from France was lost. A fair example for princes not to undertake such enterprises, if they do not well know how to carry them out<sup>1</sup> And thus disappeared the most covetous, unscrupulous, and ambitious of the brothers

In this same year the King was married to Isabelle of Bavaria, a lad of sixteen years to a pretty child of fourteen She was destined, for all her fair innocence, to be the scourge of France

Next year (A D 1386) the King and his uncles declared war on Richard II, proposing to cross the Channel and invade England<sup>2</sup> The preparations were enormous, the rendezvous at Sluys There were collected nine hundred ships<sup>3</sup>, and a wooden town was constructed, which was to be carried over and built up as a fortress on the English shore There were knights and squires in crowds, archers and lesser folk without count. The burden fell on the people, great taxes were levied, and with strictness. So severe was it, that a great part of the people fled the land 'the exaction was so sharp, that it took all one was worth<sup>1</sup> Meanwhile all waited for the Duke of Berri but he made good cheer as he wrote to the King and lived joyously without moving. The autumn came, rough equinoctial weather set in, the Channel was not safe, and the whole thing failed. All the ships either perished at sea, or were taken by the English the wooden town was given to the Duke of Burgundy, the King went back to Paris. So ended this great effort, 'which did more harm to France than ten years of actual war would have done'<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> J Juvenal des Ursins, A 1385

<sup>2</sup> Froissart (Buchon), 8, c 206

<sup>3</sup> Froissart says fourteen hundred

And yet Clisson was eager in the spring of next year to collect his forces again. But he was hindered by the Duke of Brittany (who was suspected of English leanings) and an expedition into the Ardennes and to Luxemburg in the direction of Germany was planned and undertaken. This too was a wretched failure. The army was starved the wreck of it slunk home in disgrace.

These things all tended to make the Regency of the Dukes very unpopular. Men, as usual cherished the fond thought that the young King was good and kindly, and not responsible for these mishaps. And, consequently there was great joy in France when, at Rheims, in 1388 the King acting under advice of the prelates, but chiefly of the Cardinal of Laon, took on himself the charges of the government, and dismissed his uncles 'right well and graciously with many thanks for the trouble and toil they had had with him and the realm'<sup>3</sup> And they went, Berri into Languedoc, Burgundy to his lands and lordships, both ill content, with anger at heart. Before long the Cardinal died suddenly, and they were suspected of having poisoned him<sup>4</sup> The King at once chose his counsellors from the Marmousets, who had been the advisers of his father—such as Oliver Clisson, Constable of France, the Lord de la Rivière and Nougant. The burdens of Paris were lightened, and Juvenal des Ursins, father of the chronicler was made Provost. Clisson the Constable was in high honour with the King

<sup>1</sup> Juvenal des Ursins, A. 1386.

<sup>2</sup> Martin, Histoire de France, 5, p. 459.    <sup>3</sup> Juvenal des Ursins, A. 1388.

<sup>4</sup> Juvenal. Il fut ouvert, et trouva-on les poisons.

At first there was an attempt to govern well. the new ministers were active, intelligent, prudent The King made circuit of Languedoc in 1390, and deposed the shameless Duke of Bern But it was only a gleam of light, soon to be clouded over by the thick darkness of his madness Though not without kindly impulses, Charles had no self-control, he plunged into all kinds of excess, and undermined a feeble constitution and intellect. So he drifted on for a while, ever counselled by the 'Marmousets,' allowing them to govern, and never halting in his own round of wasteful and dissolute pleasures.

III THE KING'S MADNESS A D 1392-1415.

In the summer of 1392 came a great change One Peter Craon, servant to the Duke of Orleans, the King's brother, was dismissed from court He imagined that Oliver Clisson, with whom he had had high words, was the cause of his disgrace, watching for an opportunity, he attacked the Constable by night with twenty armed men, and left him for dead The King, who was passionately fond of his great soldier, heard the news as he was going to rest He hastened out, and found the Constable recovering his senses, though sorely wounded. Clisson told him who had done the cowardly deed, and then and there the King vowed vengeance on the assassin. The Constable recovered, but Charles was none the less determined to punish Craon, who had fled for protection to the Duke of Brittany Then the King, on advice of his friends, and against the will of his uncles, gathered an army, and, as soon as the Constable could sit on a horse again, set out for the West. It was in August Charles was not in good health, his debaucheries had shaken him, he was feverish, light-headed, men noticed a change in his manner and speech, and his physicians advised him not to go out in such hot weather He would not listen The royal Dukes, though much opposed to the expedition, followed in his train One hot afternoon, as he was riding in his armour westward in the burning sun, he was startled by a wild-looking man, who seized his bridle and forbade him to go on for he was betrayed to his enemies' For the moment he seemed to pay no heed, and rode on. But in the heat of the day one of the two pages who rode behind him dozed, and dozing, let the spear be carried clatter down on the steel cap of his brother page. The sound roused the King, he yelled out 'Treason,' and, drawing his sword, fell on his escort, and, chasing them to and fro killed four ere he could be stayed. When they got him down, he lay on the ground as one dead. They carried him back to his quarters. The physicians came, and they too judged he was gone. The common people came also, and wept, and lamented. 'Sore was it to see their tears and mourning' After a while he recovered his health, though not his senses. He knew no one but the Duchess of Orleans, whom he called 'his fair sister' he even denied his own identity' The people thought him bewitched.

Burgundy and Berry at once seized the government the Duke of Orleans, the King's brother was put aside. This was the first sign of the coming civil discord between the parties of the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans which forms the chief part of the history of France during this desolate time. The King's friends escaped as best they could Clisson made for his castle in Brittany John of Montagu fled to Avignon, Nougant and others were imprisoned in the Bastille. The luckless King was left in charge of his wife who from being idle and pleasure loving sank into scandalous debauchery and tore France in pieces by her vices. Unfortunately for France and for himself the King's malady was found to be intermittent lasting usually from June to January and leaving him more or less sane during the spring months. Consequently, the Dukes were regarded as only the King's agents. They sheltered themselves behind his name his personal popularity and the pity felt for him, they got his assent to their baleful measures

<sup>1</sup> J. Juvenal des Ursins, A. 1392

Ne cognoissoit personne quelconque tant qui luy mesmes se des-cognoissoit, et disoit que ce n'estoit il pas. — Chron. de France 3. p. 69.

they left the state in unrest. The people trusted that the King would again awake to sanity, and hailed his half-lucid intervals with joy and hope. It was sad to see his feeble endeavours to govern when he was better, still more sad to watch him sinking back into madness. He was always aware that the fit was coming on again; and then 'it was most piteous to hear his regrets, as he invoked and called on God's favour, and our Lady and divers saints' Once he bade the Duke of Burgundy take away his knife; for he said, with tears, that he would rather die than be so tormented<sup>1</sup> 'If any of this company,' said he, 'are causes of my sufferings, I conjure them, in the name of Christ, to torment me no more, but kill me outright' (July, 1397)

In his lucid times the King seems to have tried honestly to put an end to the scandals of the Great Schism<sup>2</sup>. There were two plans suggested (1) the 'way of cession,' that both Popes should abdicate, and a third be elected in their place, (2) 'the way of compromise,' that there should be a general Council called, at which both parties should be present (or at least should be summoned), and that the judgment of the Council should be held to be binding on all. The University of Paris, which had declared against the King's former counsellors, was now rising to the position of the recognised organ of opinion in the realm, joining with the civic authorities, she had made her mind known in remonstrance or advice; had appealed with the voice of a lawyer, not of a churchman, to the high principles of justice, humanity, and duty, had striven to keep alive some sense of right and wrong in days in which religion had fallen so low as to become the unscrupulous partisan of this or that unworthy Pope. To the University the King appealed for her opinion on the Schism. Each Master sent in his own reply. there were, it is said, 'ten thousand opinions'; and the University also sent her Orator, Nicolas de Clemangis, a man of much eloquence, many ideas and no principles, to court. He addressed the King at length. He threw doubts on the infallibility of Councils, he proposed that the University should temper the one-sidedness of the bishops in Council by a due admixture of doctors in theology and law. He also wrote a book on the corrupt state of the Church. He seemed likely to be a Church reformer, a forerunner of Luther, this however was not to be for he had no true depth, and was content to become the mere secretary of one of the rival Popes. Little help then did the King really get from him. Still there seemed a chance of a solution from another quarter. The Avignon Pope died. King Richard of England, now friendly with the French court, was also eager to bring the quarrel to an end, so that two at least of the old opponents were at one. Still nothing was effected. another Avignon Pope, Benedict XIII, was elected. the evil was unabated.

<sup>1</sup> Histoire de Charles VI, by the anonymous Monk of St. Denis

<sup>2</sup> 'Infinita scandala procedebant ex radice nephandissimi scismatis in Ecclesia videntis'—Chron Kar VI lib 1, c 3

When in 1396 King Richard of England met the French King between Ardres and Calais one of the important matters discussed was this of the Schism. The two princes determined to act in concert, both supporting the 'way of cession, and agreeing to compel the Avignon Pope to abdicate. The Germans also accepted the same solution, and the chief lay powers seemed to be quite agreed. But there was no chance with Benedict XIII. he stood out firmly for himself. Why should he abolish himself for the good of Christendom? Why should men now expect self-denial from a Vicar of Christ? The Gallican Church withdrew (A.D. 1398) from her allegiance to him, and had a dream of asserting her ancient liberties. Avignon was besieged—what form of pressure was omitted? But Benedict held grimly to his 'Apostolic seat, and beat off the assailants. The siege was raised. He doubtless received covert help at least encouragement, from Spain and also from the Duke of Orleans party. For Orleans, with South French instincts and interests, supported Benedict, while the Burgundians with their North French and Germanic sympathies were for 'the way of cession.

Richard II of England, in 1396, made a truce for twenty-eight years with France; ceded Cherbourg to the King of Navarre, and Brest to the Duke of Brittany, to the great disgust of the English people, and was affianced to Isabelle, the little daughter of the French King. For a brief space a little light falls on the picture. But the King soon sank back into dissolute courses, and thence into madness; and though he had lucid times in the summer, and a still clearer period about Christmas, he never again was fit to take charge of affairs. Meanwhile the court amused itself: the Queen and the Dukes spent all they could extort from the wretched people on their scandalous pleasures. 'though there was no war, aids and money were ever levied from the people.' There was no proper Regency, the court was torn asunder by the two great factions. At the head of the one was the Duke of Burgundy, who drew most of his strength from the North and East of France, partly also even from Germany and England, for after the revolution of 1399, when Richard of England was deposed by his cousin of Lancaster, the Duke was friendly towards Henry IV. In the matter of the Schism the Burgundians urged the 'way of cession', in politics they affected at least some popular sympathies. At the head of the other party was the Duke of Orleans, supported by the wretched Queen. The Orleanists had their strength in the South of France; they upheld the Avignon Pope, and represented the aristocratic elements of French society, they were at this time very unpopular and extravagant. They nursed the opposition to Henry IV in England.

The Burgundians were probably the stronger, they had a more distinct policy, more powerful friends, a more compact territory to fall back on, their territory was also strong in position, as it lay between France and Germany, having ties to both, it seemed not unlikely to become the arbiter between them. The Burgundians, however, suffered a terrible blow in 1396, when John, the Duke's son (who afterwards succeeded him as John the Fearless), led a harebrained crusade against Bajazet the Ottoman Sultan, who was pressing Hungary, and threatened to stable his horse in St. Peter's at Rome. The Christians, with true feudal impetuosity, ignorance, and thoughtlessness, refused the counsels of the Hungarian King Sigismund, and fell victims to their enemies at Nicopohs. It was the old tale the feudal chivalry wasted its strength and breath on the first foe who appeared, with great heat they beat back the Ottoman scouts, and then, disordered and spent, found themselves opposed to Bajazet's real army, the splendid janizaries, fresh, cool, disciplined. They all fell on the field, or were made prisoners. Bajazet had all his captives put to death excepting John of Nevers, the future duke and eighty nobles, whom he saved that they might be ransomed. It is said that ten thousand of them so perished. The battle of Nicopolis was a fearful blow to the Burgundians. They were weakened by their losses, and crushed with debt for the recovery of the captives. On the other hand, the Duke of Burgundy gained by supporting Henry of Lancaster in the revolution which overthrew King Richard of England in 1399, and laid the foundations of that friendship with the Lancastrian house which was so formidable to France during the next century. Thus for the moment, in England and France alike the aristocracy seemed to triumph over royalty. Paris was garrisoned with the troops of the two Dukes in 1401, 1402. England had also just seen the overthrow of royalty by aristocracy. Yet, whether triumphant or defeated, the forces of the aristocratic parties were ever eating themselves away and preparing for that ascendancy of monarchy which the next age was destined to see.

Meanwhile the wretched King to whom the French people clung with a touching and simple hopefulness, calling him the well beloved, and waiting for his recovery and the golden days it should bring, lingered on in a miserable condition, amused, as it could best be compassed, with shows and entertainments. This is said to have been the time at which the game of cards was first brought into vogue in France though it had been known in the days of Philip of Valois and, in connexion with it, came the first hint of printing, block-printing of the rude figures with which the cards were adorned. It was at this time also that the great Mysteries, the origin of the French drama, were first acted in Paris by citizens, who formed themselves into a guild for that purpose.

The people, in spite of all, seem to have somewhat bettered their condition during these years; agriculture advanced the true wealth of France has ever lain in her fields, and in the patient, thrifty cultivation of them by her peasantry.<sup>1</sup>

It will not repay us to enter in detail into any account of the years during which France was a prey to rival princes and factions. These were miserable years, when the leaders of parties were selfish and depraved, without principles or patriotism. On one side were the Burgundians, on the other the Orleans party, afterwards nicknamed the Armagnacs.<sup>2</sup> Every party had a nickname, sign of a degraded political and moral life. Cabochians<sup>3</sup>, Armagnacs, Urbanists, Clementines, the names indicated persons more or less badly prominent, round whom raged the waters of intestine strife. While the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans head the parties, those of Berry and Bourbon try to trim the balance between them, or to bring them from time to time to a hollow peace. Thus, in 1402, we find such an accord, made but to be broken, then the poor King, awaking somewhat from his loathsome madness, and doubtless influenced by his Queen, named the Duke of Orleans regent of the realm. Forthwith Burgundy, Berry, and Bourbon resisted. Orleans, whose one idea of government was the extortion of money by foolish and oppressive taxation, had to yield before the popularity of Burgundy, who stood forth, once and again, as champion of the oppressed taxpayer.

In this same year Henry of England married the Duchess of Brittany, thus alarming the French, and Orleans, glad of a pretext for standing out as the exponent of French national feelings, defied England, and declared that he would avenge poor King Richard. Orleans, however, was a man of low moral life great words, small action, and nothing came of it till 1406 when there was a feeble and abortive attempt at war.

<sup>1</sup> Martin, Histoire de France, 5, p. 469

<sup>2</sup> See below, p. 495

<sup>3</sup> Ibid.

In 1404 Philip Duke of Burgundy died leaving his great territories and the inheritance of his quarrel to John the Fearless (Jean sans Peur) his eldest son. John was a young man of irresolute character and much ambition, little fitted to face the difficulties of his position, though he thoroughly understood what that position was. He hated Louis, Duke of Orleans, who on his side despised and had wronged him, he took up the popular resistance to wasteful expenditure and shameless taxation, he kept up good relations with England.

At first, however Orleans seemed likely to prevail. Burgundy thought it wise to retire to his own states for a time. But he soon came back with an army (A.D. 1405) and Berry and Bourbon rallied to him so as to balance the great influence of Orleans. Each party had an army in the district round Paris, and a collision seemed imminent. The Duke of Berry, however acted as peace-maker and an open explosion was averted. In this same year the Queen and her brother Louis Duke of Bavaria, tried to carry off the Dauphin and the children of the Duke of Burgundy as hostages to Pouilly. They were detained by a heavy storm, and tidings of the attempt came to Burgundy who was lodged at the Louvre. He at once took horse, and rode after them full speed and so well he rode that he caught them up took the lads out of their hands, and brought them back to Paris, to the great joy of all the people.<sup>1</sup> The Duke now thought it time to make his manifesto to the Parisians in it he said that he had interfered for four reasons

1. For the sake of the King's government, and to bring about the recovery of his health. 2. To do justice in the realm, wherein were committed infinite ill-doings. 3. To improve the Royal Domain by good administration, for its revenues were naught, and it was in a ruined state. 4. In order to assemble the Three Estates, and to advise with them touching the government. And he went on to show that those who had the government before had spoiled and wasted everything. No small vexation and disgust was felt by the Queen and the Duke of Orleans at this, and at the fact that Burgundy had with him in Paris eight hundred men-at-arms, and that the burghers also surrounded him with weapons in their hands. They came as far as to the wood of Vincennes, and there lay watching for an opportunity. Burgundy called up his German allies, the Duke of Austria, the Count of Würtemberg, the Duke of Savoy and the Prince of Orange, there came also men of Holland and Zealand, of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault. He appointed the Duke of Berry Captain of Paris, restored the street-chains and the defences at the gates. In the face of this vigour the other side gave way. The Queen and the Duke of Orleans came into Paris, and the Duke of Burgundy was acknowledged to be at the head of affairs, 'many fair ordinances were issued, but they lasted not.'

<sup>1</sup> J. Journal des Ursins, A. 1405.

In this year (A D 1405) Margaret of Burgundy died. She was the founder of a kingdom in all but name. Through her was built up the great Burgundian dukedom, which comprised Flanders, Artois, Franche-Comté, and Ducal Burgundy.

There was a kind of suspicious peace between the parties for a few months, but as they kept up, out of sight, a great deal of gnarring and grudging, it was agreed that the two dukes should each take force, and march against the English, Orleans to the South, Burgundy to the North. The former only played at war, he had neither civic nor military virtue; and did but waste money and men in scandalous pomps to the neglect of his duty, after a while making his way back to the pleasant vices of Paris. Burgundy, marching against Calais, acted more respectably, and fared no better, he was ill-supplied with stores and money, and, winter coming on, he recognised that Calais was too strong for him, raised the siege, disbanded his force, and also made for Paris. The Duke of Berry, as usual, stood between the irritated princes, and flattered himself that he had at last brought them to terms of friendship. They swore peace and amity, and even heard mass and received the communion together (Nov 26 1407) but on the Wednesday next following, one Raoul d'Octonville, a Burgundian partisan, fell on Orleans, as he returned from visiting the Queen, and murdered him. The Duke did not shrink from taking the crime on himself, avowed it to Louis of Anjou and the Duke of Berry, and then (on the advice of the latter) took horse and rode off to his own dominions.

And how was this foul deed received? Paris was in ecstasies of joy, Flanders also and Burgundy approved, the Duke saw that he might safely return to Paris he came and was received with transports of enthusiasm. The Church, in the person of Jean Petit, accepted the act and apologised for it: for the Duke was dear to the clergy of Paris as being against the Schism, and against Pope Benedict. Even the thin voice of poor King Charles, as of a shadow from the other world, was heard absolving him from any evil consequences. He felt, he declared, no wrath against the Duke for the murder of his brother. The widowed Duchess of Orleans alone,—who had little cause to think well of her husband,—made her voice heard against the murderer, and for the rights of her young sons. So low had morality fallen in this bad age.

It would be vain to trace the minute and inglorious features of the struggle which then ensued. At first the party of the young Duke of Orleans had the upper hand, and Burgundy was called away to quell revolt at Liège when he came back victorious, the Queen who was now Regent, fled with the King the Dauphin and her party, first to Gien thence to Tours. In the spring the quarrel was patched up, and the King came back to Paris. About the same time another element of European confusion seemed likely to be brought to an end. The Council of Pisa met (A.D. 1409), and the Cardinals of both parties agreed to abandon their masters the Council declared both Popes to be heretics, excommunicated and deposed them, and forthwith elected another Alexander V to fill the vacant throne. Their authority being set at naught by the two previous Popes, the 'way of cession failed, in not securing the consent of those who had to cede, and forthwith there were three Popes instead of two—the Avignon Pope Benedict being recognised by Spain; the Roman Pope Gregory by Italy, and the new or Pisan Pope Alexander by the rest of Europe

The next year saw a new league of princes against the arbitrary rule of Burgundy—These were Berri, the Orleans princes, Bourbon, the Duke of Brittany, and Bernard, Count of Armagnac, father-in-law of the Duke of Orleans, a southern prince of great vigour, who brought the Gascon free-lances to the help of the princes, and became the real head of the party—They have taken their historic name of 'Armagnacs' from him—These princes now issued a long manifesto to France, claiming to have reason and justice on their side—The Duke of Burgundy had to bow before this new coalition, and though he gathered together his forces from Brabant, Picardy, and Lorraine, he thought it prudent to come to terms with his opponents in a convention called the Treaty of Bicêtre—It was no true peace—only such a breathing-time as the irreconcilable parties thought needful now and then

In 1411 war broke out again. Burgundy, it was believed, made terms with the King of England<sup>1</sup>—at any rate negotiations with him soon became part of the recognised politics of the time—But for the moment Burgundy received much more effectual help from Paris herself—While it was felt that the Armagnacs were completely the noblesse-party, which also showed a tendency to become more and more the national party, it was seen that the Burgundians were allied to the burgher-party in Flanders and Paris—And though opinion was much divided at Paris, still for the time it was very loudly pronounced in favour of the northern Duke—Now however rose up a new domination in the city, that of the Butchers, the Cabochians, as they were called, from the name of one Caboche, a flayer of cattle, and chief butcher-leader—Under this rough and vigorous party, entirely devoted to the Burgundians, Paris showed a resolute front against the nobles. The King and Dauphin were constrained to side with them, adopting the cross in the form in which St. Andrew, not our Lord, was crucified, and the 'chaperon blanc, the symbols of the Burgundians. Much violence was done to the partisans of the other side, and (as is usual at such times) to harmless rich folk, it was only needful to call such an one an Armagnac, then all fell on him, killed him, and took his goods. Though the Armagnacs came up to Paris and besieged it from South and North, they made no farther progress. They fortified the villages round, notably St. Cloud, where they were attacked and worsted by the Burgundians, who took the place and slew many of them. They then abandoned St. Denis, which they had also occupied and fell back to the South. Early in 1412 the King decided to take the field in person against the princes, being specially enraged against the Duke of Berri whom he besieged in Bourges. The English to trim the parties, and keep up this wretched civil war now sent help to the Armagnacs. It was all in vain after terrible privations, famine, camp-fever and all the rest of the usual story Berri, much battered, made his submission, and a peace was patched up at Auxerre, which the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy signified to their soldiers by the strange feat of both riding on one horse. The treaty made Burgundy for the moment lord of France, while it threw the Dauphin, a dissolute vicious lad, into the hands of the Armagnacs. The Cabochians ruled supreme in Paris, led by their captain Helon de Jacquville, a knight of Beauce, who in fact governed all things<sup>1</sup> Paris and Ghent made common cause again it was a pale reflexion of the better days of Étienne Marcel.

<sup>1</sup> 'Et estoit commune renommée que dès lors eurent alliance le roy d'Angleterre et le duc de Bourgogne.'—J. Juvenal des Ursins, A. 1411

This period was made illustrious by a certain famous state paper usually called the Cabochian Ordinance which appeared in 1413. The States-General had been convoked, Church, Noblesse and Good Towns and those who came busied themselves over the griefs and troubles of the land. Then came forth this Ordinance<sup>1</sup>, a singular monument, and one not to be forgotten, when we are told, as ever in the chronicles, of the brutality of the butchers. It proves conclusively that theirs was no mere 'marrow-bone and cleaver' rule: it shows that their ideas of good government were infinitely higher than those of the princes who were regarded as the natural rulers of France. We must not forget, however, that the Ordinance was the work not of the brute force of Paris, but of her brain, the doctors and jurists, who were always far in advance of all others, even of the clergy. We read that in this year a notable doctor in theology of great repute, John Jarson (Gerson) spake evil of the dominant party, so that they greatly desired to take him, he escaped into the high vaults of Notre Dame, and there lay hid, while his house was pillaged. This Gerson is one of the reputed authors of the famous treatise De Imitatione Christi.

<sup>1</sup> J. Juvenal des Ursins, politically opposed to them, says, À la fin d'avril se mirent ens plus fort que devant meschantes gens, trippiers, bouchiers, et escorcheurs, pelletiers, comaturlers, et autres pauvres gens de bas estat, qui faisoient de très inhumaines, détestables et desbonnestes besongnes. (A. 1413.)

After all, the Cabochian Ordinance bore no fruits of its wisdom, for in the autumn it was abrogated. The city was weary of the domination of the butchers, with its mixture, which seems almost inevitable in France, of just ideas and lawless action, of noble sentiments and wise utterances joined to pillage and judicial murder. The citizens, headed by John Juvenal des Ursins, father of the historian, called in the Armagnacs, who gladly came and easily overthrew the Cabochians. John the Fearless, Duke of Burgundy, who seems to have lost all his nerve and decision, fled headlong into Flanders, and for a time his greatness waned, his good fortune seeming to have deserted him. The Armagnacs made the Duke of Berry Captain of Paris, 'and,' says Juvenal, 'he rode through the city, and men saw him very gladly, people said it was a very different chivalry from that of Jacquesville and the Cabochians.' Thus said

<sup>1</sup> See Michelet 4, p 248. This Ordinance was in reality a great code in ten chapters, which were intended to regulate all the government of France. The subjects are (1) The Royal Domain, (2) Coin of the Realm, (3) Taxation, (4) War-chest, (5) The 'Chambre des Comptes,' or Exchequer, (6) The Parliaments, (7) Justice, (8) The 'Chancellerie,' or Foreign Office, (9) Water rights and Forestry, (10) Gendarmerie.

Juvenal, whose father had headed the civic party against the butchers, and doubtless the riding of the Duke with his noble company was far more gallant and showy than that of the Cabochian leaders. It may be doubted whether after all the change was a great gain.

The Duke of Burgundy made some considerable effort to replace himself, but without success. He got into St. Denis, and the King entirely in the hands of the Armagnacs declared him his mortal enemy. They now felt strong enough to attack Duke John on the north and east. They drove his party out of Compiègne, Soissons, Noyon, Laon they drove the Duke himself as far as to Liège. There he had to make such terms as he best might with the Armagnacs and the King and the treaty of Arras was signed in September 1414.

In 1410 Pope Alexander V had died, leaving the Church in uttermost confusion. He was succeeded by John XXIII Benedict XIII still ruled at Perpignan, Gregory XII at Rome and the triple schism became yearly more and more scandalous. In 1414, in concert with Sigismund, King of Romans and Emperor-elect, John XXIII was induced to convoke a General Council at Constance. Thither came he, the Emperor-elect, the envoys of both the Anti popes, a crowd of dignified clergy the ambassadors of all Christian States of the West, the Electors, many German barons. It was said that a hundred thousand strangers were there. Significant symptoms of the growth of national life in Europe appeared. Sigismund proclaimed himself 'above grammar'; that is, contemptuous towards the old universal tongue of Latin Christendom, the outward symbol of the imperial unity of the Church the Council was divided into nations, the German Italian, French, English, and (after a time) the Spanish. John XXIII, odious to all for his vices and crimes fled to Fribourg where he was under the protection of Frederick of Austria. Thither Sigismund pursued him conquered

<sup>1</sup> He is said to have replied to one who desired to correct a grammatical error in his utterances at Constance, Ego sum Rex Romanus et super Grammaticam.

Frederick, and brought the Pope back to Constance. The head and moving intellect of the Council was Gerson, whom we have seen hidden in the upper vaults of Notre Dame. He it was who led the Council to make the significant declaration that it was superior to the Papacy, and authoritative over all Christendom. We need not enter into details of the trial and deposition of John, the legitimate Pope, an act which seemed to justify in the eyes of the world the high pretensions of the Council. The Pope accepted the sentence, and solemnly descended from his lofty throne. Gregory XII did the same, Benedict XIII resisted, and was deposed: and to signalise the reunion of Christendom, John Huss, the Bohemian reformer, the eloquent foe of the corrupt priesthood, the man whose opinions were so clearly opposed to that outburst of clerical and conciliar power which had but just asserted its supremacy even over the Papacy, was arraigned, condemned and burnt. Then the Council elected a new Pope, Martin V, who undertook to work with it for the reform of the Church. No sooner was he Pope than he concluded a Concordat with each of the nations, and forthwith broke up the Council. The time for reform was not yet come.

Meanwhile, at Paris, the Dauphin ruled supreme, and gave himself up to debauchery. He little recked what a cloud was gathering in the West, to shake him from his scandalous life, he cared little for the growing force, which was so soon to drag him out to see with his own eyes the downfall of his country.

CHAPTER V

The Third Period of the Hundred Years War

A.D. 1415-1422

WHEN in 1413 the young Henry V succeeded to his father's throne, the Red Rose had already taken firm root in the soil. All things pointed him out as likely to play an important part in history, his vigour and severity of character his industry in study<sup>1</sup> his kindliness, even the lively faults of his youth, denoted a prince who would seek for stirring deeds when he came to be King. What troubles met him, what conspiracies beset him, on the threshold of his reign and how he overcame them, how his attention was called at the Parliament of Leicester to the possessions of the clergy how Archbishop Chichele, to distract his mind from the confiscation of the goods of the Church, pointed out the advantages of a war with France and gained his point with ease all this is often told to the student of English history. The high-spirited young king did not forget the insulting message and present sent him by the foolish Dauphin soon after his accession<sup>2</sup> nor could he fail to see the tempting opportunity offered by the intestine troubles of France the madness of her sovereign and the hare brained debauchery of the Dauphin and he sent over an offer to conclude peace with France on the

He was a student at Queen College in Oxford where a very interesting portrait of him is preserved.

<sup>1</sup> Redman's History of Henry V. A.D. 1414. Visum est Carolo Gallie Dolphino legatos ad nobilissimum principem mittere; quorum inepta ac plane insidiosa, nec inter senos unquam nominanda, legat o non inuria Anglorum regis animum ira inflammavit. He had sent the young king a present of pretty balls from Paris, as a plaything for a child; and this Henry much resented.

basis of the treaty of Bretigny, with the startling addition that he himself should marry Catherine, daughter of Charles VI<sup>1</sup>, and that she should bring with her, as dowry, Normandy, Maine, Anjou, and a large sum of money. These terms were too hard even for dejected France, in reply Charles offered Henry the hand of Catherine, with Aquitaine and a considerable dowry. This again was refused, and war came on. In August 1415 Henry set sail from Southampton, after having crushed the great conspiracy of Lord Scroop, and safely entered the Seine, there he landed on the right bank of the river, near Harfleur, a town which stands as the doorway into Normandy. The town was invested at once, Henry had with him six thousand men-at-arms, and twenty thousand archers.

And how did the French Court receive the news of this formidable invasion? The English lay five weeks besieging Harfleur they suffered fearfully from dysentery and camp-fever, a large part of the King's forces returned to England, weary or sick. A very little energy would have wrecked the whole expedition, a few hundred men pushed boldly forward would have relieved the Sire d'Estoutville, who held Harfleur, and then there would have been nothing for the English but to set sail again for Southampton. But nothing was done at Paris. The King, who had at the time a lucid interval, took indeed the Oriflamme at St Denis, and came out as far as to Vernon. But instead of acting, the two parties in France only negotiated with each other, and squabbled over old feuds. Thus we find in Juvénal des Ursins a long account of the contention between the Duke of Burgundy's ambassadors at Paris, and the famous theologian Gerson, who had persuaded the Council of Constance to condemn John Petit, a member of the University of Paris, for having maintained that Burgundy was justified in causing the death of the Duke of Orleans. The paper drawn up by Gerson is dated August 1415, the very moment at which Henry was sitting down before Harfleur. And though the Marshal of France, Boucicault, pushed down to Lillebonne and even came in sight of the English near Harfleur, he was not in sufficient force, and fell back without accomplishing anything. The next week he had to receive the remnants of the French garrison, who worn out with siege and waiting had capitulated to the English.

<sup>1</sup> Henry was at the same time cleverly amusing the Duke of Burgundy, and sowing distrust (if that were needed) between him and the Armagnac Princes, by another proposal, namely that he should take to wife another Catherine, daughter of John the Fearless. Rymer's Foedera, tom 9, p 136

King Henry's force was now much reduced<sup>1</sup> he had probably not more than two thousand men-at-arms, and about thirteen thousand archers—some say more some less. With this force any prudent general would either have secured himself in Harfleur and awaited the spring or would have left a strong force there returning straight to England. But the inexperienced young King wished to ride through France like his fathers and therefore broke up from Harfleur and made northwards for Calais. At first he kept near the sea, hoping to pass the Somme, as King Edward had done, near its mouth. And the French leaving Rouen marched parallel with him due north to Abbeville. They had broken down the bridges, and destroyed all the provender and victual they could.

The French were a great host of nobles, and very presumptuous, as indeed they had some ground for being seeing that King Henry seemed to be caught in a snare. They refused to allow the Burgundians (with exception of two of the Duke's brothers) to be with them. Great numbers of burghers from Paris and other cities wished to join them but they vilipended and despised them<sup>2</sup> as they had before done at Courtrai and elsewhere. At the time the report ran that the English were so straitened that they offered to give up

<sup>1</sup> Elmham in his Metrical Chronicle l. 384-386 says —

Illic vix nonaginta pilla fuere sibi.

Millia vix quinque remanent simul ardententes

Quotidie numerus fit minor inde sibi

But J. Juvenal des Ursins says the King left a good garrison in Harfleur and then 'se partit, accompagné de quelque quatre mille hommes d'armes, et bien de seize à dix huit mille archers, à pied, et autres combattans' — J. Juvenal des Ursins, A. 1415 edited by Michaud, 2 p. 518) Sumner says 2000 men-at-arms, and 13,000 archers. These figures may be near the truth.

<sup>2</sup> J. Juvenal des Ursins, A. 1415

Harfleur for a free passage through to Calais, and that the nobles refused it. It is said that the Marshal Boucicault, and the Constable d'Albret, the men who best understood the matter, were for accepting the terms, but that the Princes would not hear of it. So King Henry went on first through the Pays de Caux to Fécamp, thence to Arques, where long after Henry of Navarre did great deeds of arms, thence to Eu, and so to the mouth of the Somme. Could he cross at Blanche-Taque, like King Edward, there might have been a second Crécy,—but Blanche-Taque was too well guarded that day, and he had to strike inland. So doing he somewhere crossed the path of the French host. He found the bridges at Abbeville broken, and had to push farther up the Somme even than Amiens. 'Bridges and causeways are broken everywhere, the pomp of the French grows and swells. The King has scarce eight days' food, the French destroy farms, wine, and food. They sought to weary the people out with hunger and thirst<sup>1</sup>' The French nobles had not sufficient energy in vexing the struggling army, which laboured on, hungry and weary, under the autumnal rains. The English passed Corbie, burnt Nesle, and then, the Somme having become shallower, they found two narrow causeways leading to a ford. Here they got over unmolested, and turned their faces once more towards Calais. The Dukes of Bourbon and Orleans now lay between the English and that city. The King passed Peronne, pushed steadily on, crossed a small stream then called the 'Swerdys<sup>2</sup>,' now the Ternoise, and then beheld in front of him the broad hosts of his enemies. They were in great force, and posted at a well-chosen point, barring his further progress towards Calais. There King Henry halted. He had a wood on either hand, and on his right flank a rising ground, covered with trees, in which he placed archers. The French were also between the woods, across the line of the valley, which was ploughed land, and soft. There the armies lay that night; and it rained hard. Next day early (October 25, 1415) they drew out their lines. The game of war was entirely in the hands of the French, they had only to wait and let the handful of English attack, and beat them back, or hang on their flanks, surrounding watching alarming cutting off, and the fall of Harfleur would have been avenged without a battle. But they could not resist the excitement of an assault the Duke of Berri alone seems to have been anxious as to the result. He would not allow either the King or the Dauphin to be there.

<sup>1</sup> So says Elmham's doggrel Chronicle Cap. 26

<sup>2</sup> 'Fluvius Gladiorum' is Elmham's rendering Cap. 35

Better said he, to lose a battle only than to lose a battle and a King. Nor indeed were the Dukes of Berri, Brittany or Burgundy present. Still, though Charles and the Princes were absent, almost all the nobles and great men of France were there. It was a great host, cramped in a narrow space where their numbers were of small avail. It is said there were sixty thousand of them perhaps there were some ten to twelve thousand English. The French were in three lines, in the first the battles of Bourbon and Orleans, behind them the Dukes of Bar and Alençon, and in the rear Dammartin, and others. Their van lay at the little village of Azincourt. On the other side King Henry set his compact body of footmen in the centre with his few men in armour and the bowmen flanking them to right and left, and feeling the two woods. As the French had not enterprise enough to turn their flank, a piece of simple generalship which with their large force would have been easy the position as a defensive one, was strong and good and the English had strengthened their front with a rough palisade. Between them and the French host was the soft ploughed land deep from the heavy rains the day was warm and fine. The battle was begun by the French whose cavalry was told off to ride forward, and attack the English archers. This they did, and behind them followed heavy armed soldiers. The mud was deep, and clung to them their weight made them sink in up to the thick part of their legs. So the advance was slow and disorderly men and horses slipping and sticking. When 1415.

Estoient en terre molle jusques au gros des jambes, says Juvenal.

Battle of Azincourt.

25th October,

From Spruner's Atlas

- |                                   |                             |                   |
|-----------------------------------|-----------------------------|-------------------|
| 1 Henry V                         | 2 English men at arms       | 3 English archers |
| 4. Dukes of Bourbon and Orleans.  | 5 Dukes of Bar and Alençon. |                   |
| 6 Dammartin, Marle and Falkenberg |                             |                   |

they got near the palisade behind which the archers lay, the English began that sharp swift shooting the French knew of old. The horses offered a broad aim, and were at once stung into confusion, the wounded animals turned and carried their riders into the ranks of the infantry behind, throwing them into panic, those who got up to the paling were hot and spent, begrimed and breathless, dazzled by the sun. Then the light-armed English stepped gaily down, and fell on the French host, entangled in the mud. Small resistance was made, except by the Duke of Alençon, who perished in the battle, and who won the praises of both sides for his gallantry. 'The noise,' says Juvenal, 'was as if men were hammering on many anvils,'—so thick and fast fell the English blows on the helms and corslets of the French. They fell in heaps; the nobles lay one on another; many were stifled, the rest slain or taken. There was not much quarter given, and yet the number of prisoners was great. Towards the latter part of the day, a report spread that the Duke of Brittany had come in with a great force, and the French rallied. Even this turned to their misfortune; for the English, who were much encumbered with prisoners, now killed many of them. Of the English the Duke of York and the young Duke of Suffolk perished, beside them 'scarcely thirty more'<sup>1</sup>. On the other side there fell the Archbishop of Sens, 'who was little lamented, for that he was out of his place'<sup>2</sup>, as was true enough. Three dukes perished, Brabant, Alençon, Bar, six counts, the Constable of France, d'Albret, ninety-two barons, a thousand men-at-arms, five hundred nobles, and seven thousand<sup>3</sup> of lesser note<sup>4</sup>. Nor

<sup>1</sup> Elmham (cap 38). But Sismondi says the English lost 1600

<sup>2</sup> J. Juvenal des Ursins (A. 1415), p. 521

<sup>3</sup> Sismondi says 10,000, of whom nearly 8000 were of gentle birth

<sup>4</sup> These figures, &c., are from Elmham's Metrical History of Henry V.

'Præsul, tresque Duces, Comites sex et—minus octo—

Centum Barones, mille ruunt equites,

Necnon quingenti procerum,* que* millia septem

Tres capti Comites sunt, duo jure Duces,

Atque Marescallus Francorum, nobilis ille

Burcicaldus, ibi redditus ense datur

Sunt capti plures in centenis generosi'—Cap 39 were the prisoners less notable the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, three counts, Boucicault, the Marshal of France together with many hundreds more. Thus King Henry found his passage free to the North, and as his force was scarcely large enough to guard his prisoners, he burnt much of the booty and marched direct to Guines, and thence to Calais. He crossed the Channel, and made a splendid entry into his good city of London in November

Meanwhile, in France this great and crowning misfortune of the nobles was a heavy blow to the Armagnac party. At Paris many rejoiced 'the Armagnacs being discomfited, now Burgundy would come to the top'. Still they struggled for the possession of the King and the government. The Duke of Berri brought the King into Paris, and hastily threw up defences. The Count of Armagnac with a good force of Gascons came up with speed from the South, was named Constable of France and Captain-general of the kingdom, with control over the finance. Burgundy judged it wiser not to attack the city and drew back into Flanders. And now the Dauphin a worn out libertine, died having killed himself by debauch. The King's next son, John was a firm friend to Burgundy and showed signs of determination which frightened the Armagnacs. He died suddenly opportunely men said, with show of reason, that he was poisoned. The next son, Charles, a lad of fourteen, was altogether Armagnac in feeling. He attacked the Queen for her scandalous life, and had her exiled to Tours. The Duke of Bern died. The Count of Armagnac was now sole head of his party ruling vigorously and ill. Paris was held in a firm grasp heavily taxed, suspiciously watched rigorously punished.

The Duke of Burgundy once more declared himself head of the popular party. Entered Picardy threatened Paris, though in vain. He then went southwards, taking or receiving many cities into his allegiance. He found the Queen at Troyes whither she had fled from Tours and made alliance with her proclaiming her Regent. She declared the acts of the Armagnacs to be illegal, declared the Parliament at Paris to be dissolved, and established another at Poitiers. There were now two distinct governments in France. Paris was uneasy under the severe handling of her masters, and in 1418 a conspiracy against them was successful. One of the gates was opened to the Burgundians; the town was taken, the Armagnacs massacred. The Constable was captured, so too was the poor King, whom they led through the streets that he might seem to sanction the insurrection. The Cabochians reappeared,—those terrible butchers. Charles, the Dauphin, whom the Armagnac captain of Paris had carried into the Bastille for safety, hardly got away with his friends, and carried on a feeble war from Poitiers. The Burgundians, having no chief,—for the Duke was in the North,—worked their savage will on their opponents. The number of victims was over two thousand, among them the Count of Armagnac, the head of the Orleanist party, and their one man of ability. The Duke of Burgundy hastened up, and did his best to moderate the fury of his followers. But that indecision and want of energy which had marked his career of late, made his interference of little avail. Nor did he do anything to heal the sore wounds of France, or to defend her against her outer foe. For while the parties were locked in this deadly embrace, Henry of England (after long delay) had again descended (A D 1417) on the coast of Normandy. He marched inland. The Dukes of Anjou, Brittany, and Burgundy, signed treaties of neutrality with him, for their respective states, leaving France to perish as she might. The Armagnacs could not leave Paris for fear of that outbreak which so soon took place. When Paris had given herself over to the Burgundians, her chance of resistance to the English was still less. and Henry quietly sat down before Rouen. The strange feebleness, which turned the name of John the 'Fearless' into sarcasm, now showed itself again. The Duke dared nothing to relieve the town, and after near three months of siege and starving, Rouen fell into the hands of the English. The news of this great blow seemed to scare the French factions to their senses. Burgundy was willing to give up his ambition to wear the crown of France, the Dauphin was desirous of coming to terms with his father the King, in order to secure his own succession to the throne. Negotiations followed even then the old jealousies made them very slow. Meanwhile the danger pressed, Henry had reached and taken Pontoise and was threatening Paris. The Dauphin, too lightly listening to his depraved and stupid courtiers (we must remember that he was still a boy), invited the Duke of Burgundy to an interview on the bridge of Montreuil. There the Duke was foully massacred by Tanneguy Duchâtel, one of the chiefs of the Orleanist party, as he knelt at the Dauphin's feet (A.D. 1419). This was for the time a death-blow to France. The Duke had certainly been anxious to make peace, to resist the pretensions of Henry but this scandalous and foolish crime made all reconciliation impossible for it substituted a young and ambitious man for an old and wearied one. Paris was deeply moved the young Duke Philip, then aged twenty three at once began a fierce and vigorous war against the Armagnacs. People began to say in Paris that Henry of England was far better than the Dauphin and his hated crew. They declared that if Henry sat on the French throne England would naturally soon become an outlying province of France, and that their country would be more glorious than ever, and, also it was thought that as Henry was about to marry Catherine of France, he would be almost as near in relation to the throne as any of the reigning family while, if the Valois remained thereon any peace with the English King must be bought by the dismemberment of France. Moreover the folly of the Dauphin's friends at this critical moment, by betraying the Duke of Brittany into captivity and treating him basely when in their power also roused against him all the hot storm of which the Breton nature is capable. Everything seemed to show that the Dauphin was utterly incapable of reigning and taught men to think that when the poor mad king was gone, even worse things were in store for them. Negotiations were now opened. The Queen, whose breach with the Armagnacs was irreparable, joined the young Duke of Burgundy, they made a truce with Henry, as did also the city of Paris, carefully excluding the Dauphin, Henry found things very easily arranged for him by them, and the Treaty of Troyes was signed on the 21st of May, 1420

Therein it was agreed—

- 1 That the English King should cease, for the while, to bear the title of King of France.
- 2 That the King of England should have, in lieu, the name of Regent and heir of France
- 3 Also he promised to maintain the French Parliament in its privileges, the privileges of the peers, nobles, cities, communes, and individuals, and all the laws and customs of the realm of France
4. Also he promised to do his best to restore to the French King all cities, castles, &c that had revolted from him, 'being on the side called that of the Dauphin and of Armagnac'
5. Also that Normandy and all parts and cities conquered by King Henry should be restored to France so soon as Henry succeeded to the throne of France
- 6 That on the next vacancy to the throne of France, Henry of England should succeed, that the two crowns should be for ever united, and that each realm should be under its own laws and government, and that neither should be in any way subject to the other
- 7 That Henry of England should forthwith espouse Catherine, daughter of the King of France

The treaty was signed May 21, and Catherine was wedded to the King on June 2, at Troyes, the next day the Kings of France, England, Scotland<sup>1</sup>, and the Duke of Burgundy, with many other men of note, rode forth to subdue such cities in the

<sup>1</sup> The Scottish King, James I, had been taken prisoner in 1406 by the English

North as were still in the obedience of the Dauphin. And first they came to Sens, which at once opened its gates, then to Montereau, then to Mehun, where stout resistance was made for it held out four months and then was only won by famine. The King of England got back early in Advent to Paris, and there kept Christmas, to the great joy of the citizens.

Thus was Northern France, for the while, subdued under the hand of the English and Burgundians, their power reached no farther than the Loire. All to the southward of that line, so often the limit of invasion remained faithful to the Dauphin and the real French party—the Armagnacs—won from their misfortunes the great advantage of being recognised as the true representatives of the national feeling. And now there were 'two Kings of France, the King of Paris, and the King of Bourges. On the one side was the Northern half of France, headquarters of the old Burgundian party and so far dis severed from the South that it seemed likely to become a separate kingdom—a success too dearly bought by the overshadowing help of the English—on the other side was the South of France, with the Dauphin at its head, supported by Scottish help, and by the Lombards. The Southerners, who hitherto had felt no love for the house of Valois—now became aware that that house was destined to lead them in their new part of national champions. Thus the very misfortunes of France helped to weld the two halves of the kingdom into one.

King Henry ruled in Paris with stern equity and justice there was more order than had been known for years.

He returned to England at the end of the year taking with him his bride, and laid the Treaty of Troyes, which had already been accepted by the Three Estates of France—or such shadow of them as could be got together—before the English Parliament. Great was the splendour and joy of his return—he rode from city to city throughout the land, expounding his great and gallant deeds and adding that, to bring matters to an end, he needed two things, money and men.<sup>1</sup> Which was true; for while he was absent from France, things made little progress the Duke of Clarence, his brother, whom he had left in command, was killed in the battle of Baugé, a serious check to the English —there they encountered the impetuous haste of the French steadied by the coolness of a body of Scots, who had come over to help their old allies the French against their old foes the English They then took the offensive, and laid siege to Chartres There King Henry, who had crossed with all speed from England, coming on them, forced them to raise the siege He drove the French before him, and pushed on as far as to the Loire, so as to threaten Orleans, there he was stayed by the camp-fever, inevitable scourge of medieval armies.

<sup>1</sup> Monstrelet.

In the midst of all Henry V fell ill at Vincennes, and there died on the last day of August, 1422, at the age of thirty-four he left behind him one little son, born the November before, and christened Henry 'He had been of high and great courage, valiant in arms, prudent, sage, great in justice, who without respect of persons did right as readily for small as for great he was feared and revered of all his relations, subjects, and neighbours,' so says Juvenal des Ursins<sup>1</sup>, who felt no good will towards the English His obseques were performed in St Denis, and afterwards his body was carried home, and buried in Westminster Abbey The Duke of Bedford, his brother, escorted the coffin to England, then returned quickly to France, and took the title of 'Regent of the kingdom of France for his nephew Henry' Some weeks later died the saddest of French Kings, the much afflicted Charles VI He had reigned for forty-two years long he had been but a name, a shadow His voice, heard at rare intervals on some piteous occasion, was as if it came from the tomb. it usually had a plaintive gentleness, a touch of sad forgiveness in it 'In his days,' says Juvenal des Ursins, 'he was pitiful, gentle, and benign to his people, serving and loving God, a great giver of alms. The people called him 'Charles the Well beloved' clinging to him with a touching helplessness. Their attachment to the crazy King shows how oppressive the princes were—he at least did them no harm. The manner of his burying was forlorn—no Prince of the blood walked behind, even the Duke of Burgundy, who could have come, took no trouble to be there. Only the Parisians seem to have lamented him. That same Duke of Bedford who but seven weeks before had closed the eyes of his brother King Henry V, attended his funeral in the great church of St. Denis. There after due service sung the Anglo-French cried out, Long live King Henry of France and England! and shouted Noel as though God Himself had come down from heaven.<sup>2</sup> And the Dauphin, far away when he heard of his father's death, made such lamentation as he could—and when he reached Mehun in Berri, was proclaimed King in the chapel there.

<sup>1</sup> Juvenal des Ursins, Histoire de Charles VI (A 1422), p 567.

There was a grand work before him—he was no longer a partisan chief no longer a secondary character in the midst of a knot of turbulent nobles, any one of whom, like the Count of Armagnac, could overshadow him—he was no longer in the uncertain position of a son opposed to his mother, and, in appearance at least, to the crown—he had suddenly been raised to be the head of the national cause, and was the legitimate and true King of France. He had a fair prospect of being able to rally all Frenchmen round him—even in the North there were crowds who would welcome him—the South was all at his feet. But there was on him some of the gloom of his father's life—he was listless, quiet, fond of hunting—he let others fight for him—little caring how they fared—pushed on by them with no effort of his own he triumphed and secured his throne. In this he was perhaps fortunate—others could do for him what he could scarcely have done for himself. A lazy kindly good-looking prince—he never took up arms with heart, and had no fancy for war. If he could do without it<sup>1</sup>. The reaction round him, the freedom of action which he allowed to all, the uprising of popular sentiment; the play of superstition round the strange and noble figure of Jeanne Darc,—these things, and the feebleness of the English in France, all worked in his favour, and brought the long English wars into a new and more hopeful phase. The English hold on France was feeble indeed, it really depended entirely on the Burgundian alliance. No sooner was that withdrawn than their power melted away. Not the triumphs of Jeanne Darc, but the alienation of Burgundy brought to a close the unnatural domination of the English. They had altogether lost the South—their power to the east and north of Paris was very limited. Make a triangle whose apex shall be Paris, one side the river Seine, another side a line from Paris to the coast at Calais, and its base the sea,—and you will have the whole of the district which was really under the English. For a strong power doubtless it would have been a formidable wedge, driven into the very heart of the kingdom, but England at this time was not a strong power, and was in reality standing on the defensive in France. That Paris should have been the point of the English wedge was a proof, if any were needed, how bad is its position as capital of France<sup>2</sup>.

Memoires de Pierre de Fenin (A. 1422): Mout fut le roy Charles ame de son peuple toute sa vie, et pour ce on le nommoit Charles-le-Bien Ame

<sup>2</sup> Juvenal des Urans, Histoire de Charles VI (A. 1422), p. 269.

<sup>1</sup> Pierre de Fenin (A. 1422) 'Estoit de sa personne moult bel prince et bien parleur a toutes personnes, et estoit pitieux envers povres gens, mais il ne s'armoist mie volentiers et n'avoit point chier la guerre, s'il s'en eust peu passer'. But he was ill-shapen of body, being very short in the legs, and is said to have resumed the long robe worn by Philip VI, in order to conceal this deformity.

<sup>2</sup> French geographers struggle hard to prove that Paris is the true centre point of France.

CHAPTER VI

The 'Hundred Years War' Period II A.D. 1422-1431

THE AGE OF JEANNE DARC

I TO THE SIEGE OF ORLEANS. A.D. 1422-1429

THE reign of Charles VII had opened gloomily for the national party whose fortunes were low and hopes almost extinct. The help of the Scots such as the Douglas, or Buchan Constable of France, with their wild gillies, was but a small set-off against the close alliance between Bedford and the Duke of Burgundy and the young King himself had none of that heroism which creates success out of failure and is greatest in evil days. That quality was to be found for France in a dreamy country girl of Champagne. She alone had the genius of perfect simplicity for hers was perfect unity of aim united with high courage and self sacrifice. There are moments in history when unreasoning courage moving straight forward is irresistible it pierces through the show and array of strength opposed to it and proves, as is so often true that there is no real force behind the walls and towers looked strong and imposing but there was no stout heart within the breach once made the conquest was assured. Such was the condition of the English power in Northern France And yet at the outset Charles made no effort, and went aimlessly on, as though doomed to ruin. Two defeats one at Crevant, near Auxerre in 1423 the other at Verneuil not far from Fiteux in 1424 seemed to seal the fate of Northern France At Verneuil the slaughter of the hanging nobles was very great the Scots perished almost to a man, Douglas and Buchan fell, the Duke of Alençon was taken Charles seemed utterly careless with their characteristic love of nicknames the French called him 'the King of Bourges' Still, even now, things were beginning to mend the King, by marrying Mary of Anjou, won over that great house, and with it also Lorraine, the Count of Foix recognised him as his sovereign Brittany was gained by the gift of the Constable's sword to Arthur de Richemont, who 'made himself French'<sup>1</sup> moreover, Richemont's wife was sister to the Duke of Burgundy, and her influence went in the direction of a reconciliation between the Orleanists and the Burgundians lastly, Charles, by banishing the Armagnac party from Court, made that reconciliation possible

And on the other side there were signs that the northern league with England was giving way While Bedford, Regent of France, was very careful to satisfy the Burgundians, and to avoid every risk of arousing their jealousies, Gloucester, Regent of England, whose position as leader of the noblesse party made him indifferent as to what became of Bedford, the representative of royalty, showed no such desire for conciliation He had unlawfully married the Countess of Hainault, who brought him the lands on the low seaboard, Holland, Zealand, Friesland, together with some claims on Brabant So formidable a neighbour at once roused the ill-will of the Lord of Burgundy and Flanders A private war broke out between them, which augured ill for the harmony between English and Burgundians

Yet the state of France was fearful From King to peasant all were alike miserable The open land from the Loire to the Somme was a desert overgrown with wood and thickets, wolves fought over the corpses in the burial-grounds of Paris, towns were distracted by parties, villages destroyed, the highways ceased, churches were polluted and sacked, castles burnt, commerce at a stand, tillage unknown. In the midst of all this ruin and despair—as a strange commentary on the age—sprang up the wildest superstitions, the most incongruous practices. Then was seen the Danse Macabre<sup>1</sup> in the Cemetery of the Innocents at Paris, which was crammed with pestilential dead the citizen of Paris, to whom we owe our vivid insight into the state of France, writing of 1421 and probably glancing at this ghastly entertainment says that for fourteen or fifteen years had the dolorous dance of history gone on. Then too sprang up wild rumours, portents prodigies the prosaic fifteenth century was profoundly moved by strange and deep imaginings it was willing to believe all miracles it seemed to yearn after a deliverer for misery as well as joy has its own poetry.

<sup>1</sup> 'Se fist Francois,' that is, he paid homage to the King

And now the English deemed that the time was come for a forward movement after some hesitation Bedford bade the Earl of Salisbury lay siege to Orleans (A.D. 1428). The earl undertook the task gladly and thoroughly. He first reduced all the strongholds on the right bank of the Loire crushing the French party to the north of the river he also crossed over and took the towns which lay on the left bank within that curve of the stream on which Orleans stands. And by October 1428 he actually sat down before the city with a mixed force English and Burgundians about ten thousand men. The Loire first runs towards the north and north-east, till it reaches a point not more than sixty miles from Paris, almost due south of the capital. There it turns and tends south west and west, till it comes down to the sea. At its northernmost point, on the right bank of the river with a tête-à-pont and suburb across the water lies Orleans, natural centre of the midland district of France the key to the South and last bulwark of the national party. If Orleans fell the fortunes of Charles VII could scarcely recover the blow. Salisbury having secured his ground to the south, first attacked the city from that the weaker side fortifying himself in the smoking ruins of the church of the Augustinians and in the southern suburb.

<sup>1</sup> The Danse Macabre is, in fact, the Teuhtlacalli of Cermán some traces of which the grim humour tragically reflected the miseries of 1429.

which had been burnt by the citizens as being too wide and too much exposed for defence. Thence he attacked the boulevard, and took it, the French retiring to the Tournelles, a work defending the bridge, of which they broke down some arches, and lifted the drawbridge. The English next assaulted the Tournelles, taking them in flank from the river-bed, the water being unusually low, and on a Sunday they captured that fortress. There they established Sir William Glansdale, who repaired its breaches, and for safety broke down the southernmost arch of the bridge, so that no assault could come from the other side. Also he planted his artillery so as to command the city and the bridge. The time was come for a regular siege of the city itself: the English held the river above and below, the country to the north was all theirs. Glansdale was strongly entrenched to the south, the main army lay in the forts to the north of the town. Salisbury, in order to get a view of the place and neighbourhood, climbed with Glansdale to the top of the Tournelles,—while there he was mortally wounded by a shot from the city. They carried him to Meung, on the Loire, as secretly as they could, and there he died: he had been a brave soldier and valiant, no better in all England, said his sorrowing friends. This great mishap changed the siege from a series of assaults to a blockade. The Tournelles were the key to the English position: the outer bulwark at St Augustine's commanded the water-way, and thirteen 'bastides,' or forts, built by the besiegers, encircled the city. In February 1429 an attempt to stop the English supplies was defeated at Bouvray, in the famous 'Day of the Herrings'. The English at first had stood on the defensive, inside a park of wagons, laden with herrings and other provender. Though much galled by the fire of the French culverns, they were not tempted to venture out. But the Scots in the French army were too eager to fight, and attacked the encampment: in the confusion the English sallied forth and routed them: the French fled back to Orleans, Dunois, the Bastard of Orleans, was badly wounded, the Constable of Scotland was killed, as were also some two or three hundred men at-arms. So ended this great effort. Next, the citizens, being hard pressed and deserted by the leading nobles, the Count of Clermont the Archbishop of Rheims, and others, turned towards the Duke of Burgundy. They offered to yield to him. The temptation was too strong for the Duke, who was already not hearty in the cause. He went to Bedford, and begged him to raise the siege. But Bedford would not beat the bush that others might catch the birds and refused. Thereon the Duke of Burgundy withdrew all his forces, Burgundians, Picards, and men of Champagne where the English power was much weakened. It was at this moment of discouragement that there came rumours of a virgin a prophetess, who had promised the French King to raise the siege and the besiegers courage already tried by a winter in camp and by the defection of the Burgundians gave place to gloomy forebodings. They knew too that they had not men enough to take the city though they might have enough to hold the garrison in check, and to keep up the blockade.

The peril to France the danger to her last bulwark, was nearly past. For now appeared Jeanne Darc one of the noble figures of history who had no private ambitions or aims knew nothing of courts and desired only to save her country.

II JEANNE DARC. A.D. 1429-1431

Domremy birthplace of Jeanne Darc<sup>1</sup> is a village lying in a tongue of land which belonging to Champagne runs between Bar Toul, and Lorraine. It had always been French and opposed to the Burgundians always Armagnac. It had all the warm feelings of a frontier place. It had lately been sacked by the Burgundians (A.D. 1428) and Jeanne herself no doubt had seen with the acute feelings of a sensitive girl her ravaged home and the desecration of the village church she so much <sup>1</sup> This appears, on the whole to be the right spelling. There are some in Jeanne of Arc there being no such village near Bar Toul as the family being peasants. On her trial she said her name was Jeanne L'Archevêque.

loved Here she had grown up, actively engaged in tending her father's cattle, able to ride and use a weapon at need Left much alone, she brooded with an imaginative temper and religious warmth over the sorrows of her country, the wrongs of her King These things, under the peculiar conditions of her young life, projected themselves into actual visions, voices, portents<sup>1</sup> She became a dreamer, an enthusiast The St Michael she had seen painted on the church wall showed himself to her enraptured gaze St Catherine and St Marguerite, objects of her simple devotion, appeared and spoke with her. she embraced them, she wept when they receded from her gaze And all pointed the same way she must go forth and deliver Charles, and lead him to be crowned and recognised as undoubted King of France At last she could bear it no longer, and, though but seventeen years old<sup>2</sup>, persuaded her uncle to go to Vaucouleurs, the neighbouring town, which held for the King, and to ask Robert of Baudricourt, who commanded there, to help her to get to Court The uncle's mission failed The rough soldier told him to slap<sup>3</sup> the silly girl, and send her back to her rustic duties. But Jeanne, undaunted, set out to plead her own cause, she was of a rather short figure, strongly built, dressed in rough red stuff, peasant-fashion The Lord of Baudricourt at first treated her with scorn but so gentle was she, so simple of manners, so decorous, so full of noble unworldly ideas; and her replies were so quick and yet so modest, so graphic, so persuasive, that the belief of all the country side was fixed on her, till Baudricourt was fain at last to give way, and to forward her to the Dauphin at Chinon

<sup>1</sup> There can be no doubt that Jeanne Darc was under the influence of one of the forms of hysteria, which has so often produced strange theological results in young French girls But the specialty of her case is that this hysterical condition, which so commonly leads to torpor, to long trances and fasts, in her case was combined with an amazing power of vigorous exertion,—results of a strong constitution, and of her active life as a shepherdess at Domremy

<sup>2</sup> Before her judges, in the spring of 1431, she said she was nearly nineteen, so that she must now have been under eighteen

<sup>3</sup> 'Da illi colaphos,' he said.

One person found her a horse, another a suit of man's clothes she cut short her long black hair, and so set forth. The road was perilous, bands of robbers and free lances infested it but Jeanne's exalted spirit feared no hindrance by the way, 'my brothers of paradise, she said, tell me to go.

And so she arrived unscathed at Chinon. There in that corrupt Court, two opposite powers were struggling for the mastery. On the one side were the King's unworthy favourites La Tremouille and the rest, who were jealous of the Process of the blood, despised the French people and kept up relations with the Duke of Burgundy they represented, in fact the anti national party. On the other hand was Yolande of Aragon, the King's mother in law whose one thought was how to gather together the fragments of French power around the King and to resist the English. She represented the old Armagnac, now the national party. Yolande politic and sagacious seems at once to have divined the importance of this strange appearance — of this enthusiast of the people behind whom lay all the forces of devotion and superstition and who was already arousing the popular hopes. She thought it well to miss no chance of awakening this feeling and of using it, if possible, as a help in this time of need. For need there was, with Orleans almost strangled and fainting with the young monarch steeped in careless ease with Northern France entirely in the grip of the English.

Jeanne met with nothing but ill will and incredulity from the favourites who are said even to have tried to carry her off by ambush and when she had reached Chinon, still they kept her from the young King's presence accusing her of madness or of sorcery. But Yolande supported her envoys too from Orleans calling for help came opportunely to the Court. After long delays Jeanne's simple persistence prevailed she was admitted to the King's presence. It is said that he dismissed her and stood among the courtiers and that she went straight to him and, in spite of his denials, saluted him. In Chanson de Jeanne it is you and none other. There she stood, as the Chanson says tells us, 'a poor little shepherdess,' 'the most simple shepherdess one ever could see<sup>1</sup>,' who could neither read nor write. We have two descriptions of her from eye-witnesses, one as she appeared at this moment; the other a little later. She was 'of moderate stature, of a rustic countenance'; not beautiful at all, but honest-faced, as one accustomed to simple living in the open air she was very strongly built; her hair was black, now cut short, her voice had the great charm of soft low music; her manners were pleasant<sup>2</sup>. Above all, she carried conviction with her. So firmly she believed, so nearly she trod on the verge of the prophetic and miraculous, that in that uncritical age she was irresistible friend and foe alike bowed before her. Her noble sentiments, pure and exalted, were like a revelation to distracted France, and even awed the corrupt and hostile Court into respect. The popular feeling rose very fast. In every trial her replies were triumphant. Having singled out the 'gentle Dauphin,' she whispered that in his ear which at once brought conviction to his heart. Before hostile churchmen her replies were so simple, so direct, so overwhelming, that they were glad to abandon all resistance. With the matrons, who were sent to enquire into her character, she won her way by gentle simplicity and unity of purpose. All, ere long, were of one mind, or seemed so: her good sense, her fearlessness before prince or priest, her instinct of truth, her forward-moving energy, overbore all opposition. 'There is no need of more words,' she said to the wearisome theologians of Poitiers, 'this is not the hour to talk but to act.' And so at last she was commissioned to relieve Orleans.

One might have thought the King would have hastened thither himself: that seems never to have occurred to him. He remained at Chinon, amusing himself after his idle luxurious sort, and left Jeanne Darc and Orleans to settle the affair with the English as they could.

<sup>1</sup> 'Une pauvre petite bergerette,' and 'la plus simple bergere qu'on voit onques.'

<sup>2</sup> So says Philip de Bergamo, who lived in the latter half of the century, in his book De claris mulieribus. He got his information from an Italian who had been eye-witness of this scene. The phrase 'facie rusticana' coupled with the absolute silence of the chronicles on the point disposed at once of the French descriptions of her beauty: the French historian could not refrain from such heightening of the picture, as might be got from painting their heroine with all the conventional charms.

Forth she rode, as a warrior on a great black horse dressed all in white armour save her head which was bare, and with an axe in hand. Prophecy second sight, marvels, attended her. She sent messengers to the church at Fierbois for a sword which lay behind the altar, on the blade of which were five crosses. The messengers looked found it, and brought it with them.

The relieving force was headed by the Duke of Alençon one of the nationalist party as became a Prince of the blood he was one of her firmest friends. Her march was like a triumph wherever she came she was saluted as a deliverer. In the van went a company of priests who chanted the Veni Creator the soldiers marched behind re-echoing the strain. On their wild natures the religious fervour acted vehemently. They drove out all unclean persons they confessed themselves they set themselves right with God they did no violence by the way. It was an army of enthusiasts with that strange irresistible power such movements have at the outset. Cromwell's men were never more Godfearing.

From near Orleans she dictated a letter to the English strange imperious, full of a singular confidence and simplicity. She bids them begone or she will come and make them go. And when they did not obey, she came. As her little army drew near the English already panic stricken abandoned one of their forts and, withdrawing to right and left let her pass through quite unmolested. They probably knew they were not strong enough to resist her. Thus as she said God at the request of St. Louis and St. Charles the Great the two popular royal saints, had pity on the city of Orleans. All the citizens came forth to meet her great was their joy great the revival of their courage. She rode straight to the cathedral and there returned thanks to God. (April 29 1429)

And the English were as much disheartened. They were between coarse abuse and cowardly flight the worst qualities of the race came out. The Duke of Bedford himself, writing to England, acknowledged the discouragement. 'Alle thung there prospered for you til the tyme of the sieg of Orleans, taken in hand, God knoweth by what advis. At the which tyme after the adventure fallen to the person of my Cousin of Silisbury, whom God assoille, there felle, by the Hand of God, as it seemeth, a greet strook upon your People that was assembled there in grete nombre, caused in grete partie, as I trowe, of lakke of sad beleve [want of firm faith] and of an unlevesulle [unbelieving] doubte that thei hadde of a Disciple and lyme [limb] of the Feende called the Pucelle, that used fals enchauntments and sorcerie'. And this feeling spread even into England. We find two Royal Proclamations on the occasion of the young King's starting for Paris from London to be crowned. From both of these documents we learn that men-at-arms and even captains had hid themselves and remained in London, for fear of her, 'terrified at the incantations of the Pucelle'.

Here then lay the secret of her success. It was no magic, no special intervention, no prophetic foresight, but the irresistible forward movement of a perfectly fearless spirit, which calculated no chances, felt no doubts, knew what it desired, and firmly believing in a divine mission moved on serenely towards its aim. He who has unwavering belief will never lack followers and Jeanne Darc was fortunate not only in inspiring confidence, but also in striking terror. This sudden accession of energy to the one side, and diminution of the power of resistance on the other, came at a time when the forces of attack had spent themselves, when assault had given place to blockade, when the besiegers were growing weary of the tedious winter, and when they had just seen the Burgundians march away in anger. The outer ring of blockade was weakened, just at the time when the inner circle the besieged city received a new impulse, and began to act on the offensive. Add to this the superstitious confidence in the one army, and the superstitious terrors in the other and we have an easy solution of the wonderful way in which the English power crumbled to dust before the sacred banner of the Maid of Orleans.

<sup>1</sup> Rymer, Foedera, tom 10, p 408, ed 1727.

<sup>2</sup> May 3, 1431, and Dec 12, 1431. Singularly enough, the latter of these documents was issued some months after the death of the Marq of Orleans. Dunois in his deposition says that 'before the Pucelle arrived two hundred English would put to flight eight hundred or a thousand of the King's men, but after her coming four or five hundred Frenchmen drove back the whole power of the English and shut them up in their own works'.

Yet all was not easy for her. Those who had so long and so bravely defended the city were not willing to yield the command at once to a maiden of eighteen years. Something of the same dislike to her which showed itself at Court, showed itself in the council of the chiefs within the beleaguered city. They hid their plans from her or they refused to listen to her advice and her prayers. The first thing we read of her at Orleans is that on the night after her entry shouts and sounds of war roused her from sleep, and told her that a sortie was going on. She hastily called for her horse—dressed, armed, mounted, and then galloped down the paved way so fiercely that the sparks sprang from her charger's hoofs and she went as straight for the fighting ground as if she had known the way before. From that moment to the raising of the siege she was always in the van—many might follow her or few wounded once and again, her high heart carried her back into the battle—she never looked behind, always forwards—and her spirit entered into her men at arms. At first she shuddered at the sight of blood—at least of French blood—and at a later time she told her judges that she loved her banner forty times more than her sword—for the banner bore on it the forms of the two saints whom she had talked with and the sacred words Jhesus Maria, and was to her the symbol of her divine mission and power—whereas her sword was nothing but a bloodthirsty weapon. I ever carried that standard myself she says, when attacking the enemy for fear lest I should slay any man. And yet she had some goodwill towards the blade—it was a good sword she said, fit to give good blows and good clouts.<sup>1</sup> It is a touching element in her character, this contrast of her purity in the midst of the gross soldiery, of her straightforward simplicity among insincere courtiers and churchmen; of her tenderness and reluctance to shed blood, among the cruel deeds of war

<sup>1</sup> Trial of Jeanne Darc 27 Feb. 1430: Étoit une bonne espée de grant propre à donner de bons coups et de bons porteurs.

The enthusiasm of soldiers and citizens soon proved too strong for the unwilling chiefs. On the 2nd of May she rode out to see all the English fortifications, on the 4th she brought in plentiful supplies sent by Bourges, Angers, Tours, and other cities, while the English looked sullenly on from their forts, the same day she assaulted and took, after a stout resistance, the Bastille of St Loup, burnt and rased it, and carried its spoil into the city. Next day was Ascension Day, and the chief captains, the Bastard of Orleans, the Marshal de Rays, the rough knight La Hire, a Scot named Kennedy, and others, took counsel with Jeanne, she was for instant action, exhorting them to strike while the panic lasted, and to assault the Bastille St. Laurence<sup>1</sup> at once. It was agreed, however, to attack the lines to the south of the river, where the English were weakest, and where, if the blockade were raised, communication would at once be opened with those districts which were most favourable to the French side.

The whole of Ascension Day was given up to busy preparations. Next morning betimes they crossed the river near St. Loup (the taking of which had opened their way), being about four thousand strong they took by assault St Jean le Blanc, the garrison of which retired to a little island in the Loire. Before the main body of French had got over the river, Jeanne pushed on up to the Augustinians' works; the scanty troop with her, finding itself unsupported, was seized with panic and fled, even she slowly withdrew. Out came the English soldiers to press their advantage, mocking her and using scurrilous and filthy speech after their low way. Hearing this, she grew angry and turned about, and with La Hire her best and roughest captain<sup>2</sup> fell on them. Panic-stricken, they fled headlong to their works, the sight of her noble rage was enough. Seizing the happy moment, she stormed the Augustinians fort, delivered a number of prisoners she found there and burnt it to the ground. In the assault she had been wounded by a caltrop but she took no heed to her pain.

<sup>1</sup> The Bastille St. Laurence answered to that of St. Loup, being at the other end of the chain of northern forts it was close to the river below the city, and defended a bridge which the English had thrown across the Loire, as a link between their northern and southern positions. See map on p 519

The English were fain to evacuate the bastide St. Privé which still remained to them, and to carry all their force, except the garrison in the Tournelles, across to the north bank of the Loire. They broke their bridge behind them concentrated themselves on the strong position of the Tournelles which lay in the river forming the tête-du-pont to Orleans on the south. It had been enlarged and fortified by Glansdale with a bulwark and other works. Here they stood on the defensive and presented still a formidable front.

On the Saturday at dawn the whole force of the French crossed the river above the city and vigorously attacked the bulwark before the bridge. Here was a fierce struggle and Jeanne was sorely wounded in the neck and shoulder by an arrow. The captain and chief men drew her away and advised that the assault should be stayed till next day. But Jeanne encouraged them with many and fair words, and after no little difficulty they were persuaded to renew the attack. Then she turned aside, and prayed and after that she bade him who carried her banner move forward till it touched the English works. After a little while he turned and said to her Jeanne it touches now to which she replied, 'All is yours now enter in, and they pushed forward bravely to the assault. Meanwhile those within the city seeing that the attack was renewed laid planks unobserved from pier to pier of the broken bridge and so came over and joined in the assault. So fierce it was that the English were forced to yield. Then there was a great carnage they tried to escape from the bulwark into the Tournelles, but few succeeded, the rest perished for the bridge suddenly broke, as Glansdale and several of the chief men were passing over it, and all were thrown into the stream and swept away<sup>1</sup>. As many as five hundred men-at-arms were killed or drowned. The Tournelles were now hotly assaulted and, after a sharp struggle, taken by the Pucelle many English captains and knights of name were slain. The utter ruin of their blockade was now apparent to the besiegers and on the Sunday morning they abandoned their bastilles on the north side, and drew out all their force in order of battle. The French did the same, and so they stood over against one another a full hour. But neither army struck the first blow, and at the end of that time the English quietly defiled off the ground and marched in good order, with banners flying, up-stream to Meung-sur-Loire, and thence to Jargeau.

He had great trouble with his tongue for Jeanne would allow no oaths, and he could hardly speak without one. He got over the difficulty by inventing a new oath, and swearing innocently by his staff; this satisfied both him and her.

The French chiefs very properly wished to press and harass the retreating force, but Jeanne, who saw her great object, the relief of Orleans, accomplished, and who had little of the instinct of real generalship, did not care to push on, and told them they would have the English another time, and therewith she led the French back to rest in Orleans, leaving her dispirited and broken foe to retire at his leisure.

And thus the siege, which had lasted since the October before (Oct. 12, 1428), was raised only eight days after Jeanne had made her entry into the town. She came in by night on Friday the 29th of April on the 8th of May, the Sunday week after, she saw the English turn their backs for ever on the rescued city.

Though she would not pursue the English, still she did not linger over her triumph, next day she rode out of the city, amid the tears of joy and humble gratitude of the devoted citizens, and set herself to the other half of her destined task, the coronation of the King at Rheims.

<sup>1</sup> An eye-witness says it was a great discouragement to the English, and equal loss to the valiant French, who might have had large profit for their ransom.

The King sent the Duke of Alençon with a strong force to meet and join her numbers of men-at arms flocked to his banner eager to see the said Pucelle who they held, was come from God, and to fight with her against the enemy<sup>1</sup> The combined forces laid siege to Jargeau, whither the English had retired, and within eight days took it, and in it the Earl of Suffolk and others, many English being slain. Then came news that Talbot was marching speedily to succour his country men, and Jeanne, who now was eagerly consulted, advised that he should be attacked at once. This was done at Patay where the English were utterly overthrown, and Talbot himself taken. The country all round at once declared for the French side. Jeanne hastened on to Sully on the Loire, La Tremouille a castle, where the idle King was dreaming away these critical and stirring days. Perhaps of all men in France he was the least eager for the coronation. The favourite hating Jeanne and desiring only his own indolent amusement with the King succeeded in defeating one of the objects Jeanne had greatly at heart, the reconciliation between the King and the Constable de Richemont, who had won for him the battle of Patay Richemont retired to the west of France and there loyally served his country by making independent war on the national foe.

The Court also wished to stay quietly where they were till the men-at-arms had cleared the valley of the Loire of the English, holding it not prudent to leave so many enemies behind them especially as their way through Champagne was also likely to be beset. But Jeanne, supported by the whole people and the army prevailed. The King set forth, first to Gien, where he gathered force thence eastward and northward by Auxerre and St. Florentin to Troyes, which was held by the English. Here they lay six days besieging the place and lacking food they held a council of war without summoning Jeanne and all but agreed to retire she however, being called in at the last, induced them to wait two days. Then she got on horseback, and called together men-at-arms, with fagots, ladders, and all things for an assault. And the citizens, seeing this, before the actual attack, came out in terror and opened their gates. Thus the last difficulty was over; and the King came safe to Rheims, where he was crowned with great pomp by the Archbishop, Jeanne standing by, holding the royal standard,—‘and she, right joyous that at her exhortation, by her counsel and diligence, she had led her lord to be anointed and consecrated, now admonished him to render thanks to God for the blessing of his coronation and for the fair victories He had granted him <sup>1</sup>.’

<sup>1</sup> Histoire abrégée Bachelon, tom 34

So far then her mission was fulfilled. It is said <sup>2</sup> that a little later she told the Count of Dunois that she would be glad were they to carry her back to her father and mother, that she might tend their sheep and oxen, and do as she had been wont to do. Weary of the false world of courts, the fierce life of camps, she may have felt that yearning for peace and peaceful works which comes at times to every noble character. Now that she had established her King as King, now that she had checked the advance of the English, she may not improbably have longed to lay down arms and turn her back on greatness and glory. But it was not so to be. Her name was all powerful, her influence at its highest. The English still were masters of Northern France almost up to the gates of Rheims. And, indeed, it is doubtful whether she ever seriously desired to be dismissed. Her constant prophecy had been that the English would be driven utterly out of the land, she thought herself destined to cast them forth; she must have become aware of her great importance for France. She may have had misgivings, and may have felt that her strength, as she said, ‘was not given her for long’, she may have dimly foreseen the end; but she never flinched from her task or dreamed of saving herself, went serenely on in her great mission, till it was cut short by treachery and the unforgiving foe. For the present all was bright before her. The fear of her had fallen on all we have seen how English captains and men hid themselves in London rather than accompany their little King to his crowning over sea. we learn from all sides how she had attracted all men's eyes. The 'Sibyl of France' was a miracle to them all. They sent to France to inquire, one of the Visconti begged her to restore him to his lordship in Milan, she was appealed to to say which was the true Pope, it was believed that she would first eject the English, then restore the faith that she would rennite the Hussites to the Church, crush the Saracen, and save the menaced capital of Eastern Christendom. The thought of this great enterprise gleams through her strange letters to the Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy. Her influence grew day by day, noble knights laid down their own devices and adopted hers, medals were struck bearing her effigy and were worn on every neck, portraits and roughly made statues of her were solemnly placed in churches. she is the Judith of the time, 'God has saved his people by the hand of a woman'. In her lifetime a simple maiden of eighteen, she becomes a popular saint of the Church, second to none, ranking below the Holy Virgin alone.

<sup>1</sup> Histoire abrégée, Buchon, tom. 34.

<sup>2</sup> Chronique de la Pucelle, c 59. Deposition of the Count de Dunois Procès, 3, p 101

And why then did she not at once move on to finish her great work?

The sad answer is that the Court which she had saved already hated her, and was in conspiracy against her. Without this, even the high ability, firmness and sagacity of Bedford would scarcely have availed. Bedford had urged the Cardinal of Winchester his uncle to bring over a body of troops, destined nominally for the Crusade and with them Henry VI in order that Paris might be secured, and the little English King be shown a child of nine as the rival of the careless Charles. He had also again drawn closer to the Burgundians, and already meditated placing Paris in their hands. The Court gave him time enough to recover the blows dealt him at Orleans and

<sup>1</sup> See the Collect introduced in her honour into the offices. Procs. 5 p. 104

Rheims. La Tremouille, the King's evil spirit, and others his familiars, especially Regnauld, the scandalous Archbishop of Chartres, entered into a conspiracy, in which the King himself joined, to neutralise, if possible, all the force of the national movement. It is a strange sight, this King conspiring against himself! The unworthy trio interfered with the forward movement of the army, above all things, they dreaded the prospect of any success against Paris, the favourable moments were lost, the English soldiery were allowed to recover courage, a short truce was agreed on. Bedford next sent a defiance to Charles, and came out to meet him. The French were eager to fight, but the wary Regent would not risk all on a battle. He withdrew, after having encouraged his men to look on the Maid of Orleans face to face, and Charles, instead of following him up, also drew back to Compiègne. Many cities declared for the King, among them Beauvais, which ejected its unworthy bishop, Peter Cauchon, who was destined soon to make for himself a name of eternal infamy.

Jeanne, after five days wasted at Compiègne, could bear it no longer. She mounted horse, and, followed by all who would, disregarding the King and his crew of minions, rode through Senlis to St Denis, which at once threw open its gates. Life came back to the army, now that the King was left behind. Partisans sprang up on every side. Four chief fortresses of Normandy were surprised, among them Château Gaillard, Richeumont, whom the King had scorned, loyally seconded the forward movement, threatening Evreux, the English communications were in the greatest danger. The Normans welcomed the French. Bedford was compelled to fall back to Rouen, leaving in Paris only a weak garrison. The King, instead of striking, busied himself with treaties with Philip of Burgundy. The Duke was to get Compiègne, a truce for the cities north of the Seine was to be signed; the Duke in return vaguely promising to open the gates of Paris to the King. Thus Charles and La Tremouille hoped to recover the capital, without having to thank the heroine of France for it. Alençon, who was still friendly to Jeanne, urged the King to come on. He came as far as Senlis, and there stayed,—at last he very reluctantly entered St. Denis. The assault of Paris was fixed for the very next day, but in spite of the Pucelle's utmost endeavour the attack failed, not without some suspicion of treachery. She was but ill-supported throughout by the chiefs, the King never left St. Denis. Checked by the second ditch, which was deep with water she held firmly to such advantage as she had gained, and, in spite of a ceaseless shower of missiles, was not dislodged till night at last, not long before midnight, she was led away by her friends. For the first time she had failed.

That night, says Martin<sup>1</sup>, there was joy in the Council of the King of France at St. Denis, as much as in that of the English Regent in Paris. The next day she would have renewed the assault, not without good hopes of success. But her king forbade it, and actually broke down the bridge of St. Denis, lest she could cross the Seine and attack from the other side.

Thus the King's treason against himself succeeded. The army withdrew. Alençon was sent into Normandy to be away from the Pucelle's influence. Do what she would, her power was neutralised every opportunity lost, every success abandoned. At last, wearied out, she left the camp, and returned to Compiègne. There, in a great sortie, she was cut off by the Burgundians. Her flag was taken she was dragged from her horse and captured by an archer and the Bastard of Wandomme, an Artesian. There is no ground for supposing that she was betrayed by the commandant of the city or that the gates were closed against her. Her fearless confidence alone was fatal to her.

But now that she is in the hands of the Burgundians—will she be delivered over to the English?

No man had pity on her. The King and his crew of favourites made no sign, the Archbishop of Rheims denounced her the clergy of the English party followed his leading.

<sup>1</sup> Histoire des Français, tom. 6. 214.

the University of Paris, utterly incapable of discerning her heroism, clamoured that she should be handed over to the Holy Office, the Inquisition claimed her as its victim. Political needs were seconded by theological hatred. If they had murdered her as a political captive, the act would have been so gross and abhorrent to all men, that it would have aroused against them the indignation of Europe. They decided therefore to raise the cry of heresy and sorcery. The Cardinal of Winchester employed the ejected Bishop of Beauvais, Cauchon, as his instrument. He had had much practice in Canon Law, had supported the Burgundian interests at Constance against Gerson<sup>1</sup>, had sat in judgment on Armagnac priests, and was known to be an ambitious, unscrupulous partisan. The congenial task, the hope of revenge on those who had caused his ejection from Beauvais, and the promise of the Archbishopric of Rouen then vacant, were quite enough to make him a safe and eager tool of English vengeance.

It was chiefly through Cauchon's activity that the Duke of Burgundy at last delivered up Jeanne to her English foes. He sold her to them, in fact, for ten thousand francs of gold. Hitherto she had been in honourable captivity at a castle near Cambrai, in the hands of the wife and aunt of John of Luxemburg. They yielded her up with tears and vain protests. She was sent first to Arras, in Burgundian territory, thence to Crotoy, where the English received her. Meanwhile the national party had relieved Compiègne, and had all but driven the Burgundians out of Champagne. The English, hearing this, conceived that so long as Jeanne lived, her influence, her will, would thwart and defeat them. Her death was more and more desired. In December 1430 she was taken to Rouen, where she was imprisoned in irons, with grievous indignities. She was kept there as a prisoner of war, guarded by rough soldiers throughout her trial, although she was accused of ecclesiastical crimes, and ought to have been placed in the hands of the

<sup>1</sup> It is worthy of notice that this great doctor of the Orleanist or national party was devoted to Jeanne

Church. As it was, she underwent the torments of both Church and State.

It would be vain to give the details of the trial. The proper forms were carefully attended to<sup>1</sup> no haste appeared. The President Cauchon might show heat at times but generally he let the trial follow its course. The conclusion was foregone. Among the judges there was but one Englishman. Though Bedford and Winchester might pull the strings, Englishmen were not the instruments of the great crime. The trial lingered on three months,—months of exquisite torture<sup>2</sup>. At last she was handed over to the secular arm for punishment. No actual sentence was passed on her, but all knew what the end must be. At first she lamented, Rouen, Rouen, shall I then die here? In the heart of the young maid—she was scarcely nineteen—life was so strong and yet to be so soon and so painfully stifled on the pile. There, in the street of Rouen she made her martyr-end piously simply and right bravely to the very last. Her persecutors were brutal also to the end. Her ashes were scattered in the Seine, lest her body should work miracles in behalf of France, and rouse the dejected energies of the people.

How shall we divide the shame of this worst act of a dark age? The chief blame shall fall on Charles VII King of France, who made all her efforts vain, and who in fact, betrayed her while she was so long a prisoner he never lifted a finger to save her. Next come the fanatical churchmen, the Frenchmen of the English side, the willing instruments then the Burgundians, who had not chivalry enough to refuse to sell her for a paltry sum, though they knew she was passing from their hands to all indignity and to a fearful death, then the English leaders, who out of sight directed all, because their hard-hearted policy seemed to them to demand her as a victim. Nor can we altogether acquit from blame the

<sup>1</sup> A Dominican friar who stood stoutly by the victim to the end, clarius satis observabant iudices ordines juris.

<sup>2</sup> February 21 to May 25 1431

French people, who looked on without a voice. Nothing is so striking as the utter silence with which all France watched the long dreary trial, the cruel examinations, the shameful imprisonment, the bitter death. In front of all this darkness the noble figure of the heroine of France stands out in amazing beauty against the background of treachery, meanness, cruelty, and smoke of devouring fire. In all she is lifted far above her countrymen and her age, in all she is perfect in her simplicity, piety, self-devotion. She stands alone on the page of history.

CHAPTER VII.

The Fifth Period of the 'Hundred Years War Expulsion of the English A.D. 1431-1453

ENGLAND showed herself determined to accept the shame of this outrage on mankind. Two letters were written, one (8th June) to the Pope and Princes of Christendom the other (28th June) to the Bishops, Dukes, Counts, Barons, and Communes of France. They both declare the death of the Pucelle to have been intended as a blow to Charles VII, the capital foe of the King of England, and that her heroism had been flat rebellion against Holy Church, and had been punished accordingly. France would not listen to such pale justification. The popular feeling soon expressed itself clearly. Shadowy persons arose declaring themselves to be the Maid of Orleans miraculously saved from the burning pile they received considerable credit from the people. The reaction against the English calumnies was universal and strong. If to them Jeanne was an impostor a limb of Satan, a witch a sorceress to the French people she was a true prophetess, a daughter of God a heroine, a saint, a martyr. Her judges were pointed out in the streets with the finger of scorn and cursed by the passers-by the popular hatred supplied what the Bishop of Beauvais had long lost, or never had, the stings of conscience. He prospered, and got the wages of his crime, the Archbishopric of Rouen. And then, as the people expected, his end came soon. He died suddenly under the hands—if not by the hands—of his barber. The people welcomed with joy his speedy death, and that of several other chief agents in the trial, as the vengeance of God. They saw God's hand, too, in the death of the Regent Bedford, four years later (A D 1435) Whatever might have been the value of such indications in troublesome times, when sudden and violent deaths were rife, certainly nothing ever prospered afterwards with the English in France

And yet the Regent did what he could to get advantage out of the death of Jeanne Dare He had the little King of England crowned and consecrated in Notre Dame (December 17, 1431) as King of France Already it was too late. Philip of Burgundy became weary of an alliance, to which he had agreed only for his own ends. He came to think he could secure his aims better by coming to terms with the young French King: active negotiations went on between them Bedford felt that if he left him, all was lost Even at the crowning of Henry VI in Paris the citizens looked on gloomily. the English occupation had lost the goodwill even of its own partisans The death of the sister of the Duke of Burgundy, Bedford's wife, in 1432, still farther severed the English and Burgundians.

The war dragged on its weary indecisive course, but one good omen for the French cause occurred. The great noblesse had perished in the war there remained only three parties, the lesser and newer nobles, captains, knights; the royal princes, and the King and his favourites. The struggle lay between this newer noblesse and the Court, and we have seen how obstinately Charles VII refused to be reconciled with its representative the Constable Richemont, in the days when that brave and loyal soldier would have been of the utmost value to him Now Richemont avenged himself. With help of the Count of Clermont (soon after Duke of Bourbon<sup>1</sup>), and some other warlike chiefs, he surprised and carried off La Tremouille. The King, with characteristic indolence, made no effort to save his favourite, perhaps he was even rather weary of his supremacy Richemont now took the chief command, and swept the English out of Maine. An obscure party war went on between the Dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, ending in a conference to which Richemont was admitted. Burgundy agreed (A.D. 1434) that if Henry VI refused the offers of Charles VII he would abandon him entirely his price was to be the cession of Amiens, Ponthieu, and some other small places in the North.

<sup>1</sup> Grandfather of Francis I.

Next year (5th August, 1435) a Congress met at Arras. Not for many years had so great an assembly been gathered together. The Church presided, in the persons of two cardinals. The Cardinal Bishop of Winchester headed the representatives of England the Duke of Bourbon those of France. Burgundy was there, Richemont, and other men of name. The Emperor sent ambassadors, as also did many European states. The Council of Basel, then sitting sent the Cardinal of Santa Croce who had with him in his train Aeneas Silvius, afterwards Pope Pius II. Crowds of lesser personages thronged the city. All Europe took profound interest in a Congress which, men hoped would end the great scandals of Christendom.

The discussions were long and intricate. The French at last offered to cede Normandy and Aquitaine as fiefs of the English crown, if the English sovereign in his turn would cease to claim the crown of France. The English refused the Congress was broken up. Then Burgundy remembered his promise to Charles, and, after some hesitation—for he was bound by solemn oaths to England—he signed the treaty of Arras (21st Sept. 1435) and came over to the French side. On condition that Auxerre Macon Peronne, Montdidier and the towns on the Somme (the last might be bought back by France) should be ceded to him, and that he should be released from all feudal homage (in his own person not in his successors) he recognised Charles VII as King of France. Philip sold his alliance dearly at such a moment it was worth any price.

Yet more disastrous to the English than this defection of their ally this healing of the great breach between Burgundian and Armagnac, was the death of the great Duke of Bedford the Regent of France. He expired at Rouen a few days after receiving tidings of the treaty of Arras (14th Sept 1435) He was the only man capable of stemming the rising tide of the fortunes of France; a man of many high virtues and great sagacity; the one man who could rise above the petty party strife of England At a most critical moment the English in France found themselves without a chief.

Paris, seeing the Burgundian standards side by side with the royal, and having no love for the English occupation,—except so far as it meant for her the supremacy of the Burgundian party,—opened her gates to the Constable In April 1436 the royal army marched into the city A full amnesty was granted; a wise clemency ruled in the King's counsels The English, who had retired to the Bastille, capitulated, on condition that they and their partisans might go away free They turned their backs on Paris, leaving the two parties in the city united in transports of joy Charles VII after a while made his entry into the capital; he did but look coldly on the miseries of the city, no ordinance, no measure of relief signalled his visit; he went as he had come.

The indolence of the French monarch, and his deep repugnance for war and men of war, was seconded by an equal want of ability in the English King Henry VI as he grew up showed no capacity an easy temper and simple manners made him a quiet tool in the hands of whatever party might obtain possession of him, he was utterly unfit to prosecute a war in France. the English people too were heartily weary of it Consequently, for some years (from 1436 to 1449) the long war languished

During this period the great Council of Basle was sitting (A.D. 1431-1449), in which the claim of Councils to be supreme was loudly asserted The bishops of the national side in France flocked in great numbers, the Council took a warm interest in the Treaty of Arras The fathers won the uncertain allegiance of Philip the Good, by ruling that the Burgundian ambassadors should take precedence of those of the electors of Germany, and of all princes who were not of royal dignity Thus the Duke of Burgundy was formally declared to be greater than any feudal lord not a king but more powerful than many a crowned head.

In 1438 Charles VII summoned a national Council at Bourges. There they drew up what is called the Pragmatic Sanction, a document composed of a number of the decrees of the Council, re-echoing its views as to the quarrel with the Papacy and asserting the liberties of the Gallican clergy and their close alliance with the crown. It limited the power of the Papacy over Church preferments, forbade appeals to Rome stopped the annates. The significance of the document was increased by the promulgation of it under royal authority as an Ordinance it seemed as if the Gallican Church would regard the King as her head to the detriment of the Pope.

And now the lazy King seemed to shake off his indolence he appeared at last to take some interest in his own kingdom. There was an obscure struggle at Court between the favourites and the great lords on one side, and the noble Constable of France and the men of burgher origin in the Council on the other side. At the head of their war power was Richemont at the head of their domestic power was that upright and wealthy merchant Jacques Cœur. No worthier representative of the merchant class has ever lived. To him is due whatever of financial prosperity now began to dawn on France. He found means to hire troops of adventurers, still far too numerous and handy for war or pillage and forwarded them to the Constable. The King no longer resisted and, after the taking of Meaux by the war party Richemont was well received at Paris by the Court, and took a great share in arranging a most important movement. This was nothing less than the convocation of the States-General of the Langue d'Oil at Orleans. The place of meeting was significant and the time. The assembly was one of high dignity and worth great numbers of the best men of the realm were there.

Then was fully discussed the great plague of the realm—'the petty war of adventurers, écorcheurs, or brigands who preyed on France, and all agreed that this must be suppressed. Nothing had inflicted so much misery on France, so long, so wearing, and so persistent. It was agreed also that finance should be remodelled, and a permanent tax was established, to be employed in the payment of a Standing Army. The year 1439 gives us, in fact, the beginning of that great system of regular armies which have gone on growing in size from that day to this, till at last they threaten to devour the vitals of society. These two things, the Standing Army and the fixed taxation, form an epoch in French history.

A royal edict (2nd Nov), levelled against the ruffians who disgraced and ruined France, followed at once. The Ordinance, which decreed a levée en masse and struck at once at the noble and lawless adventurer, is worthy of note as a step towards that consolidation of the royal power on the ruins of all liberty which marked the next reign, the reign of Louis XI. The appointment of officers was centred in the King, he alone could fix the number of soldiers to be on foot, he took to himself the right of levying taxes without the consent of the Estates. Here were the chief ingredients of French absolutism. The revolution promised to be complete.

And the great noblesse saw it so they at once began to move, they now discovered that the King was corrupt, debauched, careless, incompetent, they declared that the young Dauphin, Louis, now nearly seventeen years old, ought to be invested with the government. The great lords and the leaders of the independent soldiery, threatened alike, formed a general conspiracy they left the Court, and all retired into Poitou. The young Dauphin, who already showed some signs of capacity and vigour, was carried off by them, and willingly became their tool and head. He was supported by Dunois, the Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon, and many others of note. But now Charles VII showed himself a new man. Against this 'Praguerie'<sup>1</sup> he displayed courage, resources, coolness. He gathered together what force he could. Richemont and the Count of

<sup>1</sup> So called by allusion to the " "

Maine stood firmly by him, many bands of free lances took regular service and pay under him. With a few hundred men he at once marched against the insurgents as he went, the cities and country declared in his favour the Praguerie found itself powerless. The nobles appealed for asylum to the Duke of Burgundy and he, though head of the feudal nobles of the age, refused to shelter them. They were fain to make their peace with the King. The Dauphin submitted, he was graciously received, pardoned, and sent, that he might be far off and occupied, to govern Dauphiny.

The Duke of Orleans, prisoner in England since Azincourt, was now set free, and roused for a moment the flagging hopes of the nobles for he allied himself closely with Burgundy and retired gloomily to his territories. A meeting of the princes and high nobles under his presidency at Nevers issued a manifesto attacking the King's government, his heavy taxes his continued war. King Charles replied with so sound a state-paper that all France was satisfied that the nobles were in the wrong and declared in favour of the royal power. The nobles yielded, and submitted to the King, the Praguerie was at an end.

Charles now displayed a similar activity in war. He crushed the lawless adventurers in Champagne not without some side blows at the noblesse many of whom, in fact, were nothing but noble free lances. Then he pushed westward from Paris and attacked Pontoise. Here the English were in force and it was not till after a most critical struggle that the King carried that important place (A.D. 1441). All through the next year he waged pitiless war against the freebooters he was in Gascony down to the feet of the Pyrenees then back to Northern France where the English were attempting Dieppe. The Dauphin now did good service to France first at Dieppe where he forced the English to raise their siege next in the Ronerque where the Count of Armagnac, reversing the policy of his name had allied himself with Henry VI of England, and was troubling all the South. He was captured by a characteristic piece of treachery—the Dauphin was already showing signs of his future craft—and Armagnac was occupied by French troops. A truce with England for two years followed (A.D. 1444–1446). In England the war-party, headed by Gloucester, had been losing ground. The Cardinal of Winchester, who led the peace-party, won the confidence of the feeble King, and succeeded in arranging a marriage for him with Margaret of Anjou, daughter of the famed René, the witty, artistic prince, the adventurer in many lands, lively, liberal, dear to all who fell under his influence. His daughter was in some respects like him, though of a far stronger build of character; she was lovely and learned; and, in 1445, she became Queen of England.

The King and the Dauphin employed this two years' time in drawing off the free-lances, the wandering marauders. The King led an army into Lorraine, to conquer the 'three Bishoprics,' as they afterwards were called, Metz, Toul, and Verdun, the Dauphin set out for Switzerland. It was a great thing to relieve the country of these unruly adventurers; for while they remained no prosperity could return. The Dauphin was delighted to command them—he was as restless, as fond of war and adventure, as his father was of peace. In all, they led out of the land some fifty thousand men.

The Dauphin directed his steps to Basel, where the relics of the great Council were still sitting. They dispersed at his approach. Not so the Swiss. A body of about sixteen hundred men came out to meet him. At first they drove back the French horse in confusion; but afterwards, in rashly attempting to cross the river Birsche in face of the enemy, they were overwhelmed and crushed. Five hundred of them, who had made good their retreat as far as to the cemetery just outside the walls of Basel, were there besieged, and, resisting with terrible bravery, perished to a man.

So great was the astonishment and even the terror that his victory roused in the Dauphin's breast, that he thought well to treat at once with the men of Basel—he was too sagacious to commit himself to the wild and difficult land beyond—if the Swiss could do such things in the low country near Basel, what would they not achieve among their mountains and passes? And so he made peace with them and turned aside into Alsatia, where there was much more booty and far less resistance. War was threatened by the Emperor Frederick III. Charles, who had taken Verdun, and was besieging Metz with the other army thought it not advisable to press matters to a rupture. Metz retained its independence, as did also Verdun and Toul on payment of considerable fines. The French adventurers withdrew into France. Their numbers, it was noted with satisfaction, had been reduced by half.

The great Ordinance of Orleans was now carried out. The army was placed on a permanent footing though in reduced numbers, fifteen hundred lances in fifteen companies formed the nucleus of the French army of the future. Each lance signified six men—the man-at-arms himself three bowmen, a page, and a light armed soldier all mounted. So that each of these fifteen companies formed a cavalry regiment of six hundred men. The King carefully appointed fifteen captains, men not too young nor of the great noblesse, their districts were appointed them, they chose the best equipped and properest men out of the free companies,—and there was great ambition to be chosen and when this was done the remainder the non elect, were bidden go home to their own countries, and return to honest work, to abstain from pillage and oppression, or it would be the worse for them. And we find that within a fortnight the whole of these turbulent members of society had been absorbed and were gone. Thus ended the old lawless warfare of baronial days, thus began the new and organised warfare of the great monarchies of Europe. These companies mark also the beginning of those periods of history, rightly called modern in which the idea of a balance of power has been central. The power of each state was naturally much dependent on, and calculated by the drilled and armed force it could bring into the field.

The companies, thus spread over all the face of France proved of great service in the restoration of prosperity. Their discipline was severe, their conduct admirable. They formed a powerful police, themselves withdrawn from the side of disorder, and transferred to that of good government; they protected the people, made agriculture possible, encouraged the revival of commerce. France was amazed and grateful: it seemed a time of enchantment and blessing.

Nor did the King rest here. other Ordinances, bearing on the military organisation of France, followed. Each parish of fifty hearths was ordered to keep a 'free archer,' one of its inhabitants, who should be ready to join the King's army, as a paid soldier, at need. Another Ordinance settled the manner of the military service of the noblesse, and provided for their regular payment by the State. Round his own person Charles grouped those trusty Scottish fighting-men who, under John Stewart d'Aubigné, had served the crown so well, and who now formed the nucleus of this new standing army<sup>1</sup>. It was reckoned that these men, the free archers, and the fifteen companies, would form an army of at least eighty thousand men. No complaint or resistance arose. Here was the framework of absolute monarchy, but the actual King was too fond of ease and luxury to be an oppressor. He lived quietly among his favourites, and let the land recover as it would. Perhaps the most fortunate part of the character of Charles, as far as France was concerned, was his acquiescence (not always a willing one) in the victories won for him by others. Never was monarch 'better served' never did any less deserve his proud title of 'the Victorious.'

The Dauphin's discontent had not been satisfied by his little inroad into Switzerland, he again intrigued against his father, and tried to revive the extinct embers of the Praguerie. Above all, he hated the King's mistress, the well-known Agnes Sorel, to whom has been attributed the change in Charles from indolent neglect of his country to vigorous action and beneficent legislation. Though her influence probably was good, so far as it went, what really worked the change was the overthrow of the old favourites and the substitution in their room of upright soldiers like Richemont, and prudent statesmen like Jacques Cœur. It is their hand that we see in field and council. The King detected the dealings of the Dauphin with the noblesse and the young Prince withdrew to his government in Dauphiny where he ruled with intelligence and success. All the elements of the character which afterwards had so great influence on France were already showing themselves, on a smaller scale indeed, but with unmistakeable clearness and capacity for good and evil. He took part in the affairs of Italy and of the Church. Partly through his influence, more through the ability of the new Pope, Nicholas V the Council of Basel was at last finally dissolved. The antipope Felix withdrew and the great Schism was at an end (A.D. 1449). The Church seemed to have recovered her unity the cry for reform which had echoed through the halls of Basel died away without effect yet two generations must come and go ere the need of that reform becomes clear to the great monk of Wittenberg and through him to all the world.

<sup>1</sup> See vol. II p. 9

And now the last scene of the long war begins. The old forces are worn out, the old quarrels come to an end a great change impends over Europe. In 1449 some English adventurers had descended on the Breton coasts. The Duke of Brittany appealed to the French King for help and many barons went in answer to the call. Henry VI, alarmed, called on the French to observe the truce, to prolong it Charles on the other hand, saw that his time was come he refused, and ordered Dunois to march into Normandy.

Talbot and the Duke of Somerset who commanded there had been left almost without men or supplies or money. The French carried all before them. In Brittany and Normandy alike, city after city opened its gates, and welcomed the French as deliverers. Even in Rouen whither Talbot and Somerset had gathered in all their forces, the citizens were not to be denied. They let in the French, and the English were powerless to resist. They yielded, and were allowed to retreat to England.

on payment of a fine. Charles made triumphal entry into the town. Thence onwards to the seaboard Harfleur and Honfleur were taken, Somerset fell back to Caen. A strong reinforcement from Cherbourg, which marched to join him, was out-generaled and brought to bay at Formigny. There the Count of Clermont attacked them. He was beaten off, but he had given Richemont time to come up, and a second battle took place, ending in the absolute defeat of the English forces. They had been about six thousand strong, and are said to have lost more than half their men.

Now Normandy was altogether lost. The united French army besieged and took Caen. Falaise and Cherbourg were the last English strongholds; they too fell. And thus the thirty-one years of occupation ended.

Borne on the rising tide of power and popularity Charles wisely determined to finish the work. The English government had been as remiss as the French had been active. Margaret of Anjou, unpopular in England, and opposed by the Duke of York, was powerless to help the garrisons of Normandy and Guienne.

The French army was organised, and, flushed with success, marched under Dunois into Guienne from the North, while the Counts of Armagnac and Albret entered it from the South. No serious resistance was possible. Place after place threw open its gates, and after a march, which was little but a military parade, Dunois entered Bordeaux in triumph. Bayonne resisted and was besieged, after a couple of months the last stronghold of the English power in the South fell (August, 1451).

The end, however, had not yet quite come. Two strong interests bound Guienne to England: first, the feudal nobles dreaded the centralising influences of France, and were connected by old ties to the Court and noblesse of England; and secondly, the commercial relations between the two countries were close and profitable. England was a great consumer of the 'Bordeaux' wines: that city owed all its prosperity to England the taxation was less severe, the interference of government less serious, than it would be under the French kingdom. And to all this may be added the old blood jealousy between Southern and Northern France, between the Euskarian and the Gallic tribes. So when the aged Talbot was sent over with five thousand men to recover Guenne, his success, for the moment, was complete. He was welcomed at Bordeaux as a saviour the whole territory declared at once and warmly for England.

Charles VII was alarmed he made terms with his troublesome son (who had offered to reconquer Guenne for him) and with the Duke of Savoy, that son's father-in-law and marched with all his force towards Guenne, wintering in the country just to the north of it. The river Dordogne, an affluent of the Garonne for a short distance separates Guenne from Périgord and on this short piece stands the town and stronghold of Castillon, commanding the river's course. The army sat down in form before the place in July 1453, throwing up entrenchments to defend the artillery. Thither came Talbot with a strong force, to dislodge them. He stormed an old abbey in which a body of eight hundred free archers lay, and soon after, hearing a rumour that the French were abandoning their fortified camp, he hastened up, only to find his enemy tranquilly awaiting him. The old soldier's blood was up he would listen to no prudent counsel he did not remember the French blunder on the Day of the Herrings, but pushed his men straight at the works. They came on with the coolest bravery even planting Talbot's banner at the foot of the palisades after an hour's struggle they found their efforts vain, and fell into disorder the French sallied out at the right moment a ball struck Talbot's horse and brought him and his rider down his trusted friends, his two sons, some sturdy barons and knights made stand over his prostrate body till all perished together. So ended the long and stormy career of the man who had lived through three quarters of the Hundred Years War and had taken part in it since first he bore arms. He was eighty years old. His death

And who was the better for that war? Not France, which was reduced to misery and starvation, while feudal anarchy was being commuted for the beginnings of a monarchical absolutism, the curse of France for centuries, not England, for while she won much barren glory on the fields of Crécy Poitiers, Azincourt, she learnt no enabling lesson from the struggle, nor added to her material prosperity. On the other hand, the civil war its partial result, though terrible in immediate character and effects, enabled the commonalty of England to grow into its more modern form. The best thing for England was the fact that the war ended as it did for it compelled the English to regard their home-affairs as all-important, and enabled them to compete on favourable terms with their own nobles, who no longer enjoyed the double support of foreign war and half foreign baronial friends. On the other side, France likewise owes the war some gratitude, for it enabled her to become one nation, to have common interests from North to South, to grow compact, to take her place as a strong instead of a weak power at the council board of Europe. We must not forget that this was purchased at the price of centralised government, absence of public opinion, uniformity of absolutism.

Two state trials form a fitting close to this period. The first was that of the King's faithful servant Jacques Cœur the merchant prince, whose wise counsels, ready expedients, and well-filled purse had largely helped to bring things to a successful issue he was too rich and too powerful. In him the nobles saw the burgher-prince of the days to come. They hated his wealth, his artistic splendour his enlightened ideas, even his readiness to help his generous spirit. They felt that shame which springs up in aristocratic souls, when they receive favours from one who is really their superior but whom they insist on regarding as below them. And therefore, after a scandalous trial he was abandoned to their vengeance by the heartless King whose indifference did not here coincide with his own interests. After many and romantic adventures he succeeded in escaping from their hands. His friends were many and they rescued him. He reached

Rome, where all his foreign wealth, which faithful agents had protected, still remained to him: soon after, commanding a papal expedition by sea against the Turks, he fell ill and died at Chio.

The other trial was that of the rehabilitation of the Maid of Orleans. The King, who had treated her so ill while she lived, now made her tardy amends. Her devotion for France was recognised, her martyrdom acknowledged, and she took worthy place among those who had contributed most towards the glory and building-up of the French nation.

Two things outside France require notice.

First, the final subjection of the powerful and turbulent cities of Flanders to the authority of the Duke of Burgundy, a marked stage in the onward march of that ambitious house, and, in the more peaceful development of wealth and intelligence, a preparation for the part these cities would have to play in European history a century later. This subjection took place when in 1452 Philip the Good beat down the whole forces of their representative city Ghent on the bloody field of Gavre.

And secondly, this was the time of the ever-famous conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, an event which by itself alone marks the middle of the fifteenth century as a great era in European history. In 1453 Mahomet II, after a siege of forty-nine days, planted the Crescent over the Cross on the pinnacles of the ancient city, which had for years almost alone represented the last relics of the Eastern Empire. Then fell, with a crash, the last successor of the Eastern Cæsars. Then broke asunder that hollow union of Churches with which the East had vainly tried to buy the succour of the West. Then came westwards in crowds the learned men, the priceless manuscripts, the taste for classical lore, which had so long been protected and neglected in the Eastern capital. Borne like ripe seeds on the winds of heaven, they fell into a soil prepared by years of silent and unconscious culture, and there they took root, and shot up, and bore fruit, in the learning, the speculation, the artistic glories of the Renaissance.

In the period we have just passed through, there is nothing on which the eye can rest with pleasure Europe is restless the old forms of thought are fading away old institutions crumbling we are already in transition between the middle ages and modern times. History is a record of monstrous horrors, the feudal man-at arms has become a robber, a common highwayman, on his way into his later condition, the modern soldier. The peasant, never of much account in France, is mentioned only when famine, pestilence, or disturbance sprung of despair arrests the contemptuous and unwilling regard of the chronicler. Agriculture goes backwards commerce fails for cities and country are alike too weary either to produce or to consume much. Cities stagnant, fields matted with brambles attest the material exhaustion of the age. It is a time too of moral decadence no good example in the King's Court a subservient and worldly clergy in high places feudal lords without honour or chivalry Learning cannot lift her head the literary annals of the time are almost a blank, so far as France is concerned. We find translations of earlier romances and tales, the dregs of feudalism part also of the interminable Roman de la Rose belongs to this period together with the still more wearisome imitations of it. A few poems there are of a higher cast, two prince poets have left us their thoughts in verse the Duke of Orleans, whose long captivity in England gives to his poems a very pleasant tinge of real character while at the same time they are remarkable for finish of style, and the other far below his cousin in power and poetical genius, René the adventurer the King of Sicily. Among the arts architecture alone shows some life, some of those lofty choirs the fragile beauty of which still astonishes us while their flamboyant decorations fret rather than satisfy the eye, date from this period. The windows are still being filled with the wonderful combinations of colour which are the envy of those who in our day try to rival them. Domestic architecture rises with the beautiful home which the great citizen Jacques Cœur built in the largeness of his heart at Bourges, where it still stands complete in painting France has no artist in this period to compete with the great Flemish painters the Van Eycks who did so much to improve oil-painting, or with Hemling and others, whose works illustrate the splendour of the Burgundian Court. The roll of great names in France is brief and meagre. When there is a noble character, a Jeanne Darc, a Jacques Cœur, a Constable of Richemont, France shows herself unworthy to possess so great a treasure: in all we discern the feeble endings of an age. And not in France only. All Europe stands still expecting change, desiring the new order, vaguely looking forwards towards the great discoveries, and the great men, destined to make the next century so different from this, and to impel society far on in the path of change, by the growth of new ideas, the progress of material comfort, the security of domestic life, the outburst of power in many directions. Thus we stand at the end of many things. This half-century saw the power of the Teutonic knights destroyed (1410) on the field of Tannenberg. It saw the end of the older feudal-royalty in England, and of the older nobility with it, it saw in the person of the Duke of Burgundy the last struggle of feudalism begun, though not ended. It saw the dark sea of Islam closing over the last ruins of the Greek Empire. It saw the failure of great councils; the discredit of a schism-vexed Papacy, the vain attempts at reform. All these things crowd our pages during this period, and under the surface we are aware of strong currents flowing in new directions, of changes, religious and political, rapidly approaching. France begins to concentrate power in the hands of a despotic and heartless King, a process which she continues for many a day, she builds up an army, she catches and crystallises the native Gallie love of war and glory. At the moment of which we are speaking, she waits for a sovereign of whom she has already caught a glimpse, he will be a hard master over her, as cold as Charles VII, more false, if possible to fraud and force, of restless untiring energy and subtle skill, who will crush down the independence of her great nobles, and will transform her into a compact and coherent monarchy.

---

INDEX.

A

Aachen, see Aix-la-Chapelle
 'Aaron,' King of Persia, 130
 Abbeville, the French cross the Somme at, 412
 Abd-el-Rahman defeated at Poitiers,
 102
 Abélard, his philosophy, 260
 Absolutism, French, its foundation laid, 545, 549
 Acre, taken from the Christians, 357.
 Adalberon of Laon crowns Hugh Capet, 178, betrays Charles of Lorraine to Hugh, 193
 Adalhard spoke the 'Lingua Romana
 Rustica,' 161
 Adhemar, Bp of Puy, organises the First Crusade, 215, does not live to see its success, 222
 Adrian, Emperor, 44.
 Adrian I, Pope, calls in Charles the Great, 125
 Aduatici, enslaved by Caesar, 30
 Aeduans, Gallic tribe, 23, attacked by Germans and Sequanians, 25, resist Helvetians, 28, recover supremacy, 29, attack Belgae, ib, revolt from Rome, 30, revolt
 under Sacrovir 40
 Aegidius, defends the Empire in Gaul, 62, assassinated, ib
 Aetius, a Scythian, 60, resists Etzel, 61, at battle of Châlons, ib, assassinated, 62
 Agriculture, very rude, 187

Aigues Mortes, St Louis sails from,
 330
 Aix-la-Chapelle, seat of Austrasian Court, 97, Charles the Great palace at, 116, Charles hunts near,
 132, is buried there, ib
 Akbar compared with Charles the Great, 142
 Alan of Brittany, a leader in the First Crusade, 211
 Alaric II, the Goth, 64, 68
 'Alauda,' the Gallic legion, why so called, 34
 Albigenses, the, 298, their tenets,
 299, a new Crusade against them,
 314, headed by Louis VIII, 317, fails, ib, their end, 327
 Albert of Austria, under Papal ban, 366
 Albertus Magnus, at Paris, 341
 Albret, D', Constable of France,
 503, perished at Azincourt, 507
 Alcuin, friend of Charles the Great,
 119
 Alençon, William the Bastard at, 203
 Alençon, Count of, at Crécy, 414
 Alençon, Duke of, falls at Azincourt, 504, 507
 Alençon, Duke of, taken at Verneuil,
 517, one of the 'nationalist' party, 526, escorts Jeanne Darc to Orleans, ib., sent to help her after the siege, 532, her firm friend, 535, 536, sent away by the Court,
ib, supports the Praguerie, 545

- Alexia, early centre of Gallic worship, 14 described, 33; last standpoint of Vereingetorix, &
- Alexander V Pope, 494; dies, 498.
- Alexius, the Emperor alarmed at the Crusades, 220 gets the Crusaders over the Bosphorus, 222 attacked by Bohemond, 227
- Alfonso, King of Galicia, does homage to Charles the Great, 130.
- Alfred, King compared with Charles the Great, 142 his resistance to the Norsemans, 172
- Al Hakim, Khalif of Egypt, 217
- Alice, Queen of Louis VII, 2, 1 278.
- Alix, daughter of Louis VII. 280.
- Allemani, 46 50 driven back by Julian, 54; attack Gaul, 69 defeated at Zulpich, &; attacked by Austrasian Franks, 82.
- Allemanika, a new kingdom for Charles the Bald, 154.
- Allobroges their district, 22.
- Alodial lands, 76, 124 origin of term, & note tendency to convert them into benefices, 144 their importance ceases, 163
- Alphonse, brother of St Louis, 325.
- Alphonse of Toulouse, last of the house of Saint Gilles, 346 his territory falls to France, 347
- Amarry of Jerusalem, 140
- Amarry of Montfort, 306.
- Ambiorix, chief of Eboracæ, 31
- Ambrose, St., a Gaul, 53; protests against persecution, 56 fosters monasticism, 63
- Ambrosian chant supplanted by Gregorian, 119.
- Amiens falls to Phillip Augustus, 2, 8.
- Amilianus Marcellinus serves under Julian, 54 quoted &
- Anagni, Boniface VIII taken at, 373.
- Anastasius, Byzantine Emperor makes Hlodowig Consul, 72
- Andelot, treaty of (A.D. 881), 88
- Anjou, home of, declares, 281
- Anjou, Louis, Duke of, enters Guenue, 465 mismanages Langoedoc, 468 not summoned to Charles death-bed, 469; claims the Regency 478; steals the money 479 is bribed out of the Regency & styles himself King of Sicily 482 his wretched failure and end, 483
- Anne of Russia, 203.
- Ansgar first missionary to Sweden, Abp. of Hamburg, 171
- Antioch, taken by the Crusaders, 223 battle of, &
- Antonines, the, 44.
- Antructions, 49, 83.
- Apanages, the time of, post 383.
- Aquæ Sextiæ (Aix in Provence), founded, 23.
- Aquella, battle of, 56.
- Aquons, St. Thomas, at Paris, 341
- Aquitaine, Theodorik has possessions in, 8; Hlotair also, &; hates the Franks, 114; kingdom of, 125; its higher civilisation, & under Hlodwig the Pious, & 124, 151 its limits, to the Ebro, 127 under Charles the Great, 134, Gallo-Romans in, 145; formed into a separate kingdom by Hlodwig the Pious, 153 under Pippen II, 163 in Hugh Capet's days, 186 loses its formal independence, 228
- Aquitania, province of, 38; the Second, ceded to Visigoths, 60.
- Aquitaniæ, the, 9, 10, 26; war of Charles the Great with, 124 at the Court of Paris in Robert's days, 198 regarded as effeminate &; suspected by the Black Prince, 462.
- Arabs, their Empire, 102 fill Southern France, & sack Bordeaux, 103 crushed at Poitiers, &
- Arar (Saone), Cæsar defeats Helvetians on, 28
- Arbogast, Frankish Prince, is virtual Emperor 55; assassinated Valentinian, &
- Arch-Priest, the, a leader of free-lances, 444.
- Arch-Druid the, 16
- Architecture advances under Dagobert, 93; loved by Charles the Great 121 is developed from Norman to French style, 219; advanced by Charles V 472 flourishes under Charles VII, 516.

- Ardennes, the, 30
- Arranism, the day of, 52, thrust back by Gallican Church, ib, held by Goths, 64
- Aristocracy, struggles with Monarchy, 85, in France, discredited, 433
- Aristotle, comes into Europe through Provence 300, his writings translated under Charles V, 472
- Arivostus, brings Germans over the Rhine, 25, attacked by Cæsar, 28
- Arles recolonised, 37, southern capital, 62, kingdom of, founded, 166
- Armagnac, the Count of, a great leader, 495, is made Constable of France, 508, sole head of his party, ib, killed by the Burgundians, 509
- Armagnac, Count of, reverses his family policy, 546, joins Henry VI, ib
- Armagnacs and Burgundians, first symptom of, 486, the parties contrasted, 489, Armagnacs grow into a national party, 495, make no impression on Paris, 496, much weakened by Azincourt, 508, the national or southern party, 512, their breach with the Burgundians at last healed, 542
- Armorica, 9, overrun by Romans, 30, recolonised with Britons, 55, is called Brittany, ib, a land apart, 62, under Hildebert, 81.
- American Republic, the, 58
- Army, the, under the Austrasian Princes, becomes all-important, 98, how kept up by Charles Martel, 101, under Charles the Great, 135, 136, a rude form of standing army, 273, standing, established by Charles VII, 545, 549
- Arnold of Amaury, head of the Albigensian Crusade, 300, abbot of Cîteaux, ib, makes the famous reply at Beziers, 'Kill them all,' &c., 302, is Abp of Narbonne, 304
- Arnulf, Bp of Metz, 89
- Arnulf, King of Germany, 169, supports Charles the Simple, ib
- Arnulf, nephew of Karl of Lorraine. Abp of Rheims, 191, betrays Hugh, 192, deposed, 193
- Argues, Henry V at, 503
- Arras, Congress of, 512, comes to nothing, ib, Treaty of, ib subject of discussion at the Council of Basle, 513.
- Arras, Treaty of, 498
- Arteveld, Jacquemart van, 396, appeals to Edward III 400, loses his life by his English sympathies, 402, murdered by the men of Ghent, 408
- Arteveld, Philip van, raises Ghent against Louis de Male, 479, slain at Roosbeek, 480, 481.
- Arthur of Brittany, 278, his birth, 280, declared Geoffrey's heir by Richard of England, 282, taken up by Philip, 285 deserted by him, ib, taken by John, and disappears, 288
- Arvernians, Gallic tribe, 23, revolt from Rome under Vercingetorix, 32
- Ascalon, battle of, 224
- Assassination, rise in the Empire, 61, 62
- Assemblies, National, under Charles the Great, 135, 136
- Assises of Jerusalem, 237, of the High Court, 239, of the Burgher Court, ib, du coup apparent, 240, de Basse Cour, 241
- Astronomy studied by Charles the Great, 119
- Ataulf the Visigoth, 59, his high dreams, ib
- Ataulf, King of Lombards, attacks Rome, 112, a second time, 114
- Athelstan, King of England, 176
- Athens, Duke of, Constable of France, 450
- Attila, see Etzel.
- Aubin, St., de Cormer, treaty of, 320
- Audenham, Marshal of King John II, 429
- Audoen St. (St. Omer), 93
- Augustine, S. of Hippo, fosters monasticism 65; his works read by Charlemagne the Great, 117.

- Augustine, St., of Canterbury helped by Brumhild, 89.
- Augustodunum, (Autun), 38; school of Latin learning 39.
- Augustonemetum, 38.
- Augustoritum, (Limoges), a centre of Christianity 46.
- Augustus, organises Gaul, 38 his cities, 38; founds Lyons, 38. his four provinces, 38; his roads, 39.
- Auray battle of, 457; Du Guesclin, a prisoner at, 458.
- Avellan reunites Gaul to Rome, 46.
- Ausculta fill the Bull, 367-368.
- Austrasia, 72 its prince, 76 struggles with Neustria, 79 wild and pagan, 80 its triumph, 81 separated from Gaul, 81 its conquests, 82 a distinct kingdom, 84; has a Mayor 85; prepares to conquer Neustria, 95 its princes become more German, 97 never French, 38 its clergy become lay-lords, 98 remains of it in Hugh Capet's days, 186.
- Autricum, (Chartres), later centre of Druid worship, 13.
- Autun, 38.
- Auvergne, Theodorik has possessions in, 81.
- Auxerre peace of, 496.
- Avancum, (Bourges), taken by Caesar 32; changes its name, 38.
- Avignon, the new seat of the Papacy 379; visited by Du Guesclin, 459 home of all crimes and immoralities, 475.
- Ayoubates, the, in Egypt, 534.
- Azincourt, battle of, 503-508.
- B.
- Bacon Roger at Paris, 341.
- Bagaudes, or peasant insurgents, 58.
- Bahucet, the Treasurer hung after Sluys, 405.
- Bajaret, Ottoman Sultan, defeats the Burgundians at Nicopolis, 490.
- Baldwin, Count of Edessa, 224.
- Baldwin I of Jerusalem, altered the Codes, 240.
- Barbarian incursions, the 48-509.
- Barbarossa, Genoese, sea-captain in French service, 403; slain at Sluys 405.
- Bards, the second order of Druids, 15 are parasites to Chiefs, 38. their degradation, 19, 20.
- Basilians are turned into Churches, 52.
- Basle, the Council of, 543 disperses at the approach of Louis the Dauphin, 547; finally dissolved, 550.
- Batavian island, the, 30 population, 42; rises against Roman legions, 38.
- Bandricourt, Robert of, captain of Vaucouleurs, 523; treats Jeanne Darc with scorn, 38 afterwards helps her 38.
- Baguc, battle of, 512.
- Bavarians, attacked by Austrasians, 82 a separate kingdom under Hilmiwig, son of Hilodwig the Pious, 153.
- Beauvais, Bp. of, with his mace, 309.
- Becket, his fortunes and fate, 270, 272 Henry II at his shrine, 273.
- Bedford, the Duke of, Regent of France 512; attends funeral of Charles VI, 514 prudent in dealing with the Burgundians, 517 orders the Earl of Salisbury to besiege Orleans, 518 refuses to raise the siege for Phillip of Burgundy 522; his account of Jeanne Darc, 527; his steps to counteract her influence, 534, forced to leave Paris, 535; pulled the strings of the trial of Jeanne, 538 got what advantage he could from her death, 541; his death, 542 character 543.
- Belen, spoils of Delphi in his temple, 24.
- Bayonne, last English city in Guienne, 551.
- Belfort, the key to Burgundy 226.
- Belg the name, 9.
- Belgae, the, 9, 10; resist Caesar 29.
- Belgica, Augustus Province 28.
- Benedetto Gaetani, or Boniface VIII 360.
- Benedict of Nursia, 86 his order 38; its beneficent action, 38.

- Benedict XIII elected Avignon Pope, 488, clings to his seat, ib, deposed by Council of Constance, 499
- Beneficiary, 46, 77, 134, Allodial lands converted into, 144, hereditary possession of, 165
- Bernard, King of Italy, 150, 153
- Bernard, Duke of Gothia, 154, 156, and Septimania, 163
- Bernard, St. last of the Fathers, 260, preaches the Second Crusade, 263, refuses to lead it, 264
- Berra, ceded to Philip Augustus, 281
- Berra, Duke of, brother to Charles V, 469, at his death-bed, 477, takes South France, ib, is deposed by Charles VI, 485, seizes the government with Burgundy, 486, is appointed Captain of Paris, 493, tries to mediate between the parties, ib, joins league against Burgundy 495, attacked by Charles VI, 496, gives in, ib, again Captain of Paris, 497, anxious about the battle of Azincourt, 504, brings the King into Paris, 508, dies ib
- Bertha, mother of Charles the Great, 115
- Bertha, Queen of Robert of France, 197, divorced, ib
- Berthar, Neustrian Mayor, 95
- Betrade, wife of Fulk of Anjou, 212, a troubled spirit, 252, her plans fail, she takes the veil, and dies, ib
- Bertram de Born, his Sirventes, 274
- Bertulf of Bruges, 257
- Bertrand de Goth, nominee of Philip IV for the Papacy, 375, becomes Clement V, ib, his consecration, ib, a 'prisoner at large' in France, 376, does Philip le Bel's bidding, ib, flees from Poitiers, to avoid condemning the Templars, 378, declares Philip to have had excellent motives, 379
- Beziers, city of, sacked, and inhabitants all massacred in the name of God, 302
- Beziers, the Viscount of, resists the Crusaders 302, dies, 303.
- Bicêtre, treaty of, 495
- Birse, battle of the, 547.
- 'Bishoprics the three,' 517
- Bishops in Gaul become chief magistrates, 51, 52, in room of Detensores, 53, mediate with the Franks, 64, 65, sole rulers in towns, 75, counsellors of kings, ib, subservient to kings, 86, great allodial lords ib, 92, despoiled by Charles Martel, 101, befriended by Pippin the Short, 112, needed to organize his kingdom, ib, under Charles the Great, 138, in a low moral state, 145, the Age of the, ib
- Bitunt the Armenian 23
- Biturigan cities burnt by the Gauls 32
- Black Death, the, 421
- Black Prince, the see Edward
- Blanche-Triquet, Edward III fords the Somme at, 411, Henry V tries in vain to cross at, 503
- Blanche of Navarre, second wife of Philip VI, 422
- Blanche of Castille, wife of Louis VIII, 312, has vigour, 313, rules for her husband, 316, defends her son Louis IX, 319, moulds his character, ib, detaches Theobald of Champagne for the league 320, calls on Paris for help, ib, is victorious, ib, teaches her son, 323, finds him a wife, ib, her rule in France, 335, her death, 336
- Blandina, a martyr, 45
- Blankenberg, battle near, 404
- Boccaccio celebrates the Black Death in the Decamerone, 421
- Bohemia, John the blind King of, at Crécy, 417
- Bohemond the Norman, on Crusade, 222, becomes Prince of Antioch, 224, returns to Europe for help, 227
- Bon settle in Gaul, 28
- Boileau, Stephen, compiles a Book of Trades, 344
- Bomfacc, St. 'Apostle of Germany,' 100, helps Carloman to reform abuses, 104, is Abp of Mainz, ib, crowns Pippin, 109, dies, AD 755, 112.

- Boniface VIII, how elected Pope, 360; his character ib., 361 unfortunately pitted against Philip le Bel, 361 tries to mediate between him and Edward I, 362 his struggle with Philip, ib., 363, 367-372 issues the Decretal Unam Sanctam, 371 Nogaret's charges against him, 372 seized at Anagni, 373; rescued, ib., dies, ib. his character 374 Phillip tries to make Clement V condemn his memory 376 Phillip abandons the attempt, 379.
- Book of Trades, of Stephen Bollean, 344
- Bordeaux, sacked by the Arabs, 103; by the Norsemen, 172 capitulates to the French, 552.
- Border line of France, 1
- Boson, founds the kingdom of Arles, 166
- Boucavault, Marshal of France, 503 taken at Arincourt, 508
- Boulogne, seat of one of the Malls of Charles the Great, 218; a French army under Phillip Augustus gathered there, 307
- Bourbon, Duke of, brother-in-law of Charles V 469; at his death bed, 477; his character ib. at Arlecourt, 504 a prisoner 508.
- Bourbon, Duke of, helps Richemont to carry off La Tremouille, 841; at the Congress of Arras, 842 supports the Praguerie, 845.
- Bourges, 38, the archbishopric of, a source of quarrel between Louis VII and Innocent II, 262 Council of, 544.
- Bouvines, battle of 309; its influence on French national feeling, 311 and on royalty 312
- Brabantons, the. 273.
- Brenneville, battle of, 255.
- Brenos, (Brennus), sacks Rome, 22
- Brethny treaty of, 448-481
- Breton war of Charles the Great, 137
- Brignais, battle of, 453.
- Brittany under Nomenoc 163; ceases to be isolated, 269; succession to its Duchy 407 pedigree of Ducal family ib. war in, ib., 408 lords of, beheaded by Phillip VI, 409 flies to arms, ib.; John of Montfort enters, ib. war continues in 428 Charles V proposes to confiscate it, 467; revolt in, ib. one of the three great fields left, 472 attacked by the English, 550 who are driven out, ib.
- Brittany Duke of holding the reign of Clement V is killed by the falling of a wall at Lyons, 376.
- Brittany John of, dies childless, 407
- Brittany Duke of, lands at Calais, and passes through France, 465.
- Brittany Duke of, refuses to give up Peter Craon, 485.
- Bruges, Louis VI at, 257 the French massacred at 370 battle of, 480.
- Brunhild, daughter of Athamagild, wife of Sigebert, 85; her feud with Fredegonde, 87; a prisoner at Rouen, ib.; escapes, ib. her greatness, 88, 89; her miserable end, 91; her aims, and failure in them, ib.
- Bruno, as Pope Leo IX, 202.
- Bucban, Constable of France, 516 perishes at Verneuil, 517
- Buchard, at Bruges, 287
- Bull, the, Clericis laicos, 362 363 Ineffabilis amoris, 362 another 364; Ausculta, fili, 367 the Little Bull and its Answer 368; of Excommunication of Phillip le Bel, 372
- Burgher Court of Jerusalem, the, 229, 241
- Burgher life, in middle ages not strong enough to govern, 447
- Burgundians, 49 in Saône valley 58, 59; Arlans, ib.; a friendly race, ib. their peaceable settlement in Gaul, 60; their law system, 66 defeated by Hlodowig 71
- Burgundians and Armagnacs, first symptoms of, 486; Burgundians have North French sympathies 489; are for the way of cession, ib. contrasted with Armagnacs, 489; suffer a terrible blow at Nicopolis, 490 not allowed to be present at Azincourt, 502, in the ascendent after that battle, 508, 509, their breach with the national party healed, 542

Burgundy, attacked by the sons of Hlodowig, 82, a separate kingdom, 84, has a Mayor, 85, attacked by Philip Augustus, 279, Duchy and Kingdom of, ib note, falls to Philip, brother of Charles the Wise, 453, 473, foundations of the great Dukedom laid, 482

Burgundy, Duchy of, makes separate terms with Edward III, 449, given to King John's fourth son, Philip 'le Hardi,' 453, 473

Burgundy, House of, overcomes the Flemish cities, 555.

Burgundy, John of, 'the Fearless,' routed and taken at Nicopolis, 490, succeeds his father, 492, rescues his children from the Orleanists, ib, issues a manifesto to the Parisians, ib, in high favour with the Burghers, 493, calls up his German allies, ib, makes peace with the Orleanists, ib, takes on himself the murder of the Duke of Orleans, 494, returns in triumph to Paris, ib, called to quell revolt at Liège, ib, is met by a league of Princes, 495, bows before them, treaty of Bicêtre, ib; is much helped by Paris, ib; the King and Dauphin side with him, ib, a patched up peace at Auxerre, 496; seems to lose all nerve, 497; loses ground, and agrees to the treaty of Arras, 498; his ambassadors at Paris, 501; threatens Paris, 508; declares himself head of the popular party, ib; allies himself with Queen Isabelle, ib., proclaims her Regent, 509; tries to moderate the fury of his men, ib; his 'fearlessness' gone, ib; assassinated, 510

Burgundy, Philip of, wages fierce war on the Armagnacs, 510; joined by the Queen of France, 511; makes the Treaty of Troyes, 511: the English really depend on him, 515; crowned by Gloucester, 517, draws towards the French, ib, receives embassy from Orleans, 522; withdraws from the siege, ib; is in connexion with the King's favourites, 524; receives letters from Jeanne Darc, 534; negotiates with Charles VII, 535, has Jeanne Darc in his hands, 536, sells her to the English, 537, makes party-war with the Duke of Bourbon, 542; declared head of feudalism, 543, 544, has Guines in his hands, 553; beats down the Flemish cities, 555.

Burkhard of Wurzburg, Pippin's envoy to Rome, 109.

Byzantium, Emperors of, friendly with Charles the Great, 130.

C

Caballari, or cavaliers, 244

Cabochians, the, 495, their Ordinance, 496, 497, their overthrow, 497, reappear in Paris, 509

Caccina wore the Gallic dress, 42

Caen, Edward III takes, 409, 410

Caepio takes Toulouse, 24

Caesar born, 25, Proconsul of Gaul, 26; succeeds Marius, 27, his provinces, ib, at Geneva, 28, his measures, ib, defeats Helvetians, ib, defeats Ariovistus, 29, marches north, ib, takes Novodunum, 30, hard pressed by Nervii, ib, attacks Aduatici, ib, destroys fleet of Veneti, ib, in England, ib, ravages Nervian country, 31; his assembly at Samarobria, ib, at Lutetia, ib; quiets Gaul, 32, is revolted by Arvernians and Vercingetorix, ib; beats them at Duro, 33; besieges them in Alesia, ib; defeats retreating army, ib; resolves to give up Gaul, ib; treats it kindly, ib; founds Fréjus, 37; treats Massiliens, ib; is murdered, 38.

Caesariacum, (Torn, a centre of Christianity, 45).

Caesars, best, 419; 121

- Eustache de S. Pierre, ib.; a great English mart, ib. Its fall closes the first period of the war ib. English land at, in 1360, 449 Henry V makes for it, 503 reaches it after Arincourt, 508 left to the English, 553, why not attacked by Charles VIII, ib.
- Calendar the, reformed by Charles the Great, 119.
- Caligula, governs Gaul wildly 40 his half-crazy actions, ib. his competitive examinations, ib.
- Callixtus II, Pope at Rheims, 255.
- Callet, W., leader of the Jacquerie, 445
- Calverley Sir Hugh, a good soldier 482
- Cannibalism in France 201
- Cannon on the walls of Le Quesnoy 403 not used at Crécy 417
- Canon Law conquered by Civil Law 361.
- Capetian line, its early Kings feeble, 184 the end of it, 388
- Capitularies of Charles the Great, 119, 137 143, 144 show the degradation of the Clergy 145; on slavery 147
- Capit de Buch, the, commands free lances, 457; is defeated at Cocherel, ib.
- Cards, game of, brought into vogue, 400.
- Carloman, elder son of Charles Martel, has the German part, 104 resigns it to Pippin, ib. becomes a monk, at Soracte, and at Monte Casino, ib.
- Carloman, younger son of Pippin the Short, 115 dies, ib.
- Carloman, son of Iludwig the German, defeats Charles the Bald, 165.
- Carloman, son of Iludwig II, King in South France, 166.
- Carrutes, territory of, centre of Druid worship, 13, 31
- Caroling Princes, rise of, 96, 97 beaten by the feudal lords, 168 end of their line, 178
- Carroccio, the, of Otho at Bonvines, 309.
- Cassel, battle of, 392.
- Casvelanus submits, 30.
- Castellum Francicum, 124
- Castillon, battle of, 552.
- Catalamici Campi, battle of, 61
- Catherine, daughter of Charles VI, 501
- Catherine, St., of Siena, 475.
- Catherine of France is to marry Henry V 510, 511
- Catti, German tribe, 42; formed Imperial body-guard, ib. decided the battle of Pharusilla, ib.
- Cauchon, Peter of Beauvais, ejected, 535 chief instrument in the trial of Jeanne Darc, 517; his conduct, 538 his wages and end, 540, 541
- Cavares, a Rhone tribe, 23.
- Celestin III, Pope, refuses to abet Phillip Augustus, 282
- Celestin V Pope, 360
- Celts, the, 8.
- Centeniers, under Charles the Great, 138.
- Cerealis defeats Civilla, 43
- Châlons, battle of, 61
- Chalons, siege of, causes Richard's death, 283.
- Chandos, Sir John, knighted, 402 at Poltara, 420; defeats Du Guesclin at Aray 457
- Charles the Bald, born, 153 is lord of North Gaul, 155 has all France after Verdun, 187 188; enters on his share, 163; his difficulties, ib. scholasticism rises under him, 164; desires to restore the Empire, 163; holds a diet at Chieral, ib.; defeated in Italy ib.; dies on Mount Cenla, ib.
- Charles (eldest son of Charles the Great), destined for the Imperial crown, 132 dies, ib.
- Charles, youngest son of Iludwig II, 166.
- Charles the Fat, Emperor 166; fails to relieve Paris, 167; buys off the Northmen, ib.; returns to Germany and dies, ib.
- Charles the Great, not a French King 97; sole King of Franks, 118 his reign an epoch in European history ib. a thorough German, 116; his personal appearance habits, dress, 116-118 is careless

- of the marriage-tie, 117, his mental gifts, acquirements, love of building, 118-122, his many wars, 123, Saxons, ib, Aquitanians, 124, Lombards, 125, confirms the Donation of Pippin, ib, at war with Spanish Saracens, 126, Leo III flies to him, 128, at Rome, 129, anointed Emperor and proclaimed, ib, greatness of his Empire, 130, his later wars, ib, 131, is a great sovereign, 131, exacts a new oath from his leudes, ib, fights against the territorial tendencies, 132, settles the succession ib, causes the Franks to salute Hlodowig as Emperor, ib, dies AD 814, ib, Hrollam and Guizot on him, 133, his administration of Gaul, 134, tenure of land, 134, 143, his authority personal, 135, his war-power, ib, his assemblies, 136, his officers, 138, his authority over his nobles, ib, his Missi Dominici, 140, the Church under him, 141, compared with other great princes, 142, state of society under him, 143, his chieftains, 144, free Franks, ib, Gallo-Romans, 145, clergy, ib, slaves, 146, tries to do justice, 148, superstitions flourish in his day, ib, his Empire breaks asunder, 155, France a dying branch of his Empire, 162, resisted the Northmen, 171, said to have originated chivalry, 243
- Charles IV, 'the Fair,' 387, his death, ib
- Charles V, the Dauphin, won away from his father, 423, at Poitiers, 429, flees headlong, 430, returns to Paris, 434, convokes the States-General, ib, his character, health, 435, goes to Metz after dismissing the States-General, 436, Paris rises against him, ib, ratifies the decrees of the Estates, 437, is wanted on by Marcel, 441, who tries to reconcile him with Charles of Navarre, ib, the murder of his Marshals, 442, 443, wears the civic cap, 443, is reconciled with Navarre, ib, is named Regent, ib, convokes the States-General at Compiègne, 444; cuts off the supplies from Paris, ib, besieges that city, 445, negotiates with Charles of Navarre, 446, enters Paris after death of Marcel, 447, learns more cunning, ib, his Days of Terror, ib, at peace with Charles of Navarre, 448, calls in the States-General, ib, refuses terms with England, ib, at war with Edward III, 449, his policy of waiting, ib, the treaty of Bretigny, 450, Regent again on King John's return to England, 453, his quiet character, its effects, 454, 455, his favourite is Du Guesclin, ib; thought to be a magician, 456, severity at Paris, 457, pays Du Guesclin's ransom, 458, sees where he may weaken the English, ib, works steadily to overthrow the Treaty of Bretigny, 459, prepares for war, 461, declares war with England, 462, makes war, ib, makes Du Guesclin Constable of France, 463, sends him to Brittany and Poitou, ib, 464, Edward III's opinion of him, ib, punishes Montfort in Brittany, ib, refuses to fight, and wears out his foes, 465, his success, ib, his reforms, ib, ravages English coasts, 466, overbears the English, ib, too eager to concentrate power, ib, causes revolt of Brittany, 467, suspects Du Guesclin, ib, buries him worthily in his own tomb, 468, refuses to help Louis, Count of Flanders, ib, appeases the discontent in Languedoc, 469, his heavy taxes, ib, his last illness, ib, death, 470, character and habits, 470-473, creates the Great Schism just before his death, 474, loses his hold over Urban V, 475, supports the Urbanist party, 476, his last injunction to the royal uncles, 477, his secreted wealth, 479
- Charles VI, comes to the throne, 470, 477, his character, ib, 478, at Roosebek, 480, 481, enters

- 45 its spirit modified, 65; bridges gulf between Roman and German, 45
- Christine of Pisan, wrote on Charles V 455.
- Christopher the, a great ship, 404 405
- Church of Rome, its growth, 106; its dream of a spiritual empire, 107
- Church of the Holy Sepulchre destroyed, 217
- Church, the, in Gaul, 45, 46 or garrisoned under Constantine, 53 growth in influence in Gaul, 64; turns to the Franks, 69; its war tendencies, 70 recovers territory under Hlodowig, 74 loses spirit usually ib.; gains by transfer to Frank King 75 advises royalty ib. administers Roman Law ib.; subservient 85 its lands confiscated by Charles Martel, 101 restored in great part by Pippin the Short, 113 the Precaria, ib. under Charles the Great, 141 her law ib. her influences for good, ib. mediates between French and Northmen, 173; revives and rises, 259 under St. Louis, 343.
- Cicero, attacked by Gauls, 31
- Cimbri, from Jutland, 24.
- Citeaux, Innocent IV and St. Louis at, 319.
- Cities, names of, changed by Augustus, 38 the Gallic, under Charles the Great, 139; gained by the Crusades, 233
- Civil Law triumphs over Canon Law 261
- Civills leads the Batavians, 43
- Civilisation, advanced by the Crusades, 231
- Claire-sur Epte, St., Hroif swears allegiance to Charles at, 174.
- Clarence, Duke of, defeated and killed at Baugé, 12.
- Claudius, born at Lyons, 40; speech on Gallic claims, 41 governs Gaul well, ib.
- Claus Dennequin leads the Flemish at Cassel 392.
- Clemangis, Nicolas de, Orator of the University of Paris, 458.
- Clement V nominee of Philip le Bel 375; see Bertrand de Goth.
- Clement VI, Avignon Pope, his degradation, 421 422
- Clement VII, Avignon Pope, 469 first Pope of the Great Schism, 474; gives his name to one party ib. elected Pope, 476 his character ib. takes refuge at Avignon, ib.
- Clementines, the, 474.
- Clergy in Gaul, 53 honoured by Franks, 75; weregild for ib. Guizot on, ib. protected Gallo-Romans, 78; subservient to Franks, 85 wink at royal vices, 93 become less Gallo-Roman, 98; become territorial chiefs, ib., wear armour ib.; at a low level under Charles the Great, 134 he raises them much, 141 their influence for good, ib. not in a satisfactory state, 145; influence of great, 168 wealth of, increased by the Crusades, 231; resisted by league of Barons under Louis IX, 330; low condition under Philip VI, 422.
- Clerics laicos, the Bull, 362 363.
- Clermont, defended by Salomon, 62 Council of, 214.
- Clermont, Marshal of John II, 429.
- Climate of France, 3.
- Clisson, Oliver murdered by Phillip VI, 409.
- Clisson, Oliver a true freebooting captain, 467 made Constable of France, 469; in high honour with Charles VI, 484 Craon tries to murder him, 485; Charles VI determines to avenge him, ib.
- Clotilde, see Hlodowig.
- Clovis, see Hlodowig
- Cocberel, battle of, 457
- Codes of Law in use in the Empire of Charles the Great, 119.
- Corur Jacques, the wealthy merchant, 544 his trial and fall, 454; his character ib.
- Coin of the realm, reformed by St. Louis, 344 debased by Phillip VI 394; reformed by Charles V 455.

Columbanus, St., rebukes Brunhild, 89
 Commendation, the custom of, 168
 Commerce, stimulated by the Crusades, 231
 Committee of Thirty-six at Paris, 157
 Communes the, help to win battle of Bouvines, 311
 Compiègne, Jeanne Darc captured at, 536
 Congress of Arras the, 542
 Conrad III, the Emperor, goes on Crusade, 264, worsted by the Turks, ib
 Conrad the Peaceful, 195
 Constance of Aquitaine, Queen of Robert, 197, 198, dies, 200
 Constance, Queen of Louis VII, dies, 271
 Constance Council of, 198; shews growth of national feeling, ib
 Constantine, in Gaul, 51, his conversion rallies Gaul to him, ib
 Constantinople, imperial emblems sent to, 63, the Crusaders at, 220, 222; attacked by Bohemond, 227, taken by the Turks, 555
 Constitutions of Clarendon, 270
 'Cottareux,' the, 273
 Council of Biele, 543, breaks up at approach of Louis the Dauphin, 547, its close, 550
 Council of Bourges, 544, draws up the Pragmatic Sanction, ib
 Council of Lateran, 304
 Council of Pisa, to heal the Great Schism, 494
 Council of Tours, enjoins the 'Romana Rustica' on the Clergy, 161
 Council of Vienne, condemns the Templars, 379, 380
 Counts, or Reeves, 83, under Charles the Great, 138
 Courtrai, battle of, 370, 371, sacked after battle of Roosebeck, 481
 Craon, Peter, tries to murder Chis son, 485
 Crassus conquers Aquitaine, 30
 Crau, district of the, 25
 Crécy, battle of, 412-418
 Crevant, battle of, 516

Crown of Thorns sent to St Louis, 324
 Crusade, type of the first, 210, how the idea began, 212, led by the Papacy, 213, the First organized by Adhemar of Puy, 215, joined by Raymond of Toulouse at the cross under Peter, 219, the second army, of French and Normans, 221, the Third, of Southerners, 222, Antioch taken, 223, battle of Antioch, ib, Jerusalem taken, 224, four Latin Principalities, 225, the conquest organized at, many Crusaders return home, 226; a new wave headed by William of Aquitaine, 227, general effect of the movement, 228, the name used for this period, 229, the soul of Chivalry, 234, the Second at origin, 261, 263; marked by a religious revival, ib its miserable result, 264, still it shews the French that they are a nation, 265, ruined utterly in 1187, 280, a new Crusade under Frederick Barbarossa, 281, Richard and Philip join, 282, first of St Louis, 328, of the Pyrenees, 335, second, of St Louis, 338, end of them, 347, again attempted in vain, 357

Curia in Gallic cities, 47
 Curials, their office and decay, 52, 53
 Custom Law of France, 75, much curtailed by St Louis, 743
 Cyprus, seized by Richard Lionheart, 282, rendezvous of St Louis Crusade, 330

D

Dagobert, King of Neustria, 92, and of Austrasia, 93, a great King, ib, dies, A. D. 638, 94, with him the Meroving monarchy sinks to dust, ib
 Damietta, battle of, 331, is taken by St Louis, ib
 Damme, taken by French fleet, 307
 Danawerk, or Dannewerk, the, 171

- Danes, their early incursions, 131; reach Tours, take Rouen, 171
- Danse Macabre, at Paris, 518.
- Darc, see Jeanne.
- Dauphin, the title sold with the district, to Philip VI, who grants it to his grandson Charles, 432.
- Dauphin, eldest son of Charles VI, insults Henry V 500; dies of debauchery 508.
- David, King of Scots, taken prisoner at Neville's Cross, 419 a prisoner in England, 432
- Day of the Spurs, the, 370, 371
- Day of the Herrings, the, 521
- Debonair (Louis the) signification of title, 151 note title also of King Robert, 195
- Decates, Ligurian tribe, 23.
- De Civitate Dei, the, a favourite work with Charles the Great, 117 118.
- Defensores, the Gallic, in cities, 53 supplanted by the Bishops, 138
- Denis, St., 46; Sacer Abbot of 261 his care of it, 266 Charles VI, buried at, 514.
- Denis of Mortbeque, captures John II at Poitiers, 431
- Derby the Earl of, drives the Flemish knights out of Cadrand, 400 holds John of Normandy in check, 409 rides north to Poitiers, 419; joins Edward III at Calais, 420.
- Desiderata, daughter of Desiderius, married to Charles the Great, 115
- Desiderius, Lombard King, 115 resists Charles the Great, 124 125.
- Des Marets, the great lawyer 479; his fall, and execution, 481
- Dieppe, siege of, raised by the Dauphin, 546.
- Diet at Coblenz, names Edward III Imperial Vicar 401
- Dioceses in Gaul, civil and religious, 81
- Diocletian, Gaul under 50.
- Dionysius, settles at Lutetia, founder of the Church in North France, D 46.
- rio, (Dijon), Caesar defeats Vercingetorix at, 23.
- Divitiacus the Druid, calls in Romans, 25.
- Domains of the Crown, under Louis VI, 249.
- Domenico, Canon of Osma, founder of the Dominican order 301
- Domfront, William the Bastard at, 203.
- Domitius defeats Bituit, 23; makes the Vin Domitius, 24.
- Domremy birth-place of Jeanne Darc, 522.
- Donation of Pippin, the, 114.
- D'Orgeumont, Chancellor of France, 479.
- Dorylaeum, battle of, 222
- Douglas, the, captures Edinburgh Castle, 406
- Douglas, the, in France, 516; killed at Verneuil, 5
- Druid, the, 13 his faith and philosophy 14; highest class in the hierarchy 15; his teaching 16; his sacrifices, 17
- Druidism, 11 an element in Gallic unity 12; last rituals of, 40, 41 42
- De Guocella, Charles V's instrument, 455; war in his hands, 5., 456 his unchivalrous character, 5; appearance, and ways, 5; a freebooter 457; a prisoner in English hands, 457 458 freed by Charles the Wise, who pays his ransom, 458; marches to Avignon, 459; compels Urban V to give him indulgence and money 5; passes into Aragon, 5.; overthrows Peter the Cruel 5.; is Constable of Spain, 5.; assists at the murder of Peter 461; is Constable of France, 463; recovers Poitou, 464; preases Bordeaux hard, 466 suspected as a Breton by Charles, 467 resigns his sword as Constable, 468 perishes at Châtean Randon, 5.; buried in Charles own tomb at St. Denis, 5. the King's love for him, 470.
- Dukes, under Charles the Great, 138
- Dunols, Bastard of Orleans, wounded, 521; describes the influence of Jeanne Darc, 527 note 2; takes counsel with her 529; she tells him she would gladly go home after the coronation, 533 sup-

- Anjou, & and carries to him
Poitou and Aquitaine, &. goes over from Henry II, 372, 373;
her inheritance to descend intact to her descendants, 450.
- Elgius, Bp., builds St. Denis, 93.
Elm of Conferences, the, 2, 9.
- Emmaus, the Crusaders see Jerusalem from, 324.
- Emperors of Byzantium, on friendly terms with Charles the Great,
130; call for help from the West,
218
- Emperors of Germany the supreme heads of the Caroling nobles, 177
- Empire, from Roman to German, 89; the woes of the Roman culminate in assassination, 61; dying 62 dead, 63; lay-empire, whose seat is on the Rhine, &. the western, revived in Charles the Great, 189 the extent of his,
120 its landed possessions, 144; strives against decentralising and territorial influences, 163; partition of, after Charles the Fat, 167
the Holy Roman, then the German, 348.
- Engelheim, Charles the Great at, 118.
- England, under Interdict, 306;
threatened by Phillip Augustus, 307; crown of, offered to Louis of France, 313 invaded by Louis, 313; contrasted with France in 14th century 395 her nobles, burghers, and yeomen, 398 accepts the shame of Jeanne Darc's death, 540 weakness of, under Henry VI, 553.
- English, fight well at Bouvines, 309;
their doorways into France 406; yeomen, at Crécy 418; their national life, &.; lose almost all France, 463 comes tardily to help Ghent, 480 limits of their hold on France, 515
- Enguerrand, lord of Coucy 318 head of the league against Louis
IX, 320; his dealings with the King at law 341
- Episcopacy high water mark of, 164.
- Establishments, the royal, of St.
Louis, 342.
- Estates of France, summoned by Phillip le Bel, 368 after Poitiers, 434.
- Estates of the Languedoc, resist
King John II, 425.
- Estates, Provincial, meet to hear the report of the States-General, 443.
- Estourville, the Baron of, holds Harfleur against Henry V 501
- Etrel, (Attila), enters Gaul, 60; spreads ruin, & his host, &;
raises siege of Orleans, &. falls back to Châlons, 61 defeated, &., takes Bp. Lupus with him to the Rhine, 63; greater than Hlodowig, 73.
- Endes, see Odo.
- Evgenius, Arbogast's Emperor 56.
- Europe, general ferment in, in 14th century 474; dark state of, 477
- Euakariana, the, 6.
- Eustache de St. Pierre, and the burghers of Calais, 420.
- Ewarik, Visigothic King, attacks
Arvernans, 62 has a grant of South Gaul, 63; seat of government at Toulouse, &.; his Code of laws, 66.
- Exarchate of Ravenna, taken by Pippin, 113 granted to the Papacy 114.
- Exchequer Court of Rouen, 357 made sovereign, 553.

F

- Fabian, Bp. of Rome, sends seven
Bishops to Gaul, 45.
- Famine destroys many slaves, 147;
rise in France, 187; described, 201
- Faro, St., life of, 161
- Fastrada, one of the wives of Charles the Great, 118.
- Fatimites, the Egyptian, 223 defeated at Ascalon 224
- Felix, last Antipope, withdraws, 820.
- Ferrand of Flanders, summoned to Soissons, 307 stirs up war 309; prisoner at Bouvines, 310; sent to Paris, 311

- smallest branch of Teutons, 67; last to settle in Gaul, ib.; their confederations, ib. Sallan, ib. Ripuarian, 68 settle on left Rhine-bank ib.; under Hlodowig, 68 sqq. attack the Burgundians, 70; refuse to take Orders, 74 use Ordination as a penal settlement, ib. dislike town-life, 75; honour the Church, ib. territorial settlement in Gaul, ib.; long retain German character 76; specially so the Austrasians, ib. their old life perishes, ib. 77 78 become Clergy for the sake of rich bishoprics, &c., 85 impose on Hlotair II the Perpetual Constitution, 92; their harsh voices, 119 under Charles the Great, 134; the free, driven downwards, 144 have disappeared, 148 their chiefs fortified strong places throughout France, 187; their castles, ib.; are the sword arm of the Church, 129.
- Fredegood, Queen of Neustria, 85 assassinates Sigebert, 87 imprisons Brunhild, ib.; her life a catalogue of crimes, 88 dies in peace (A.D. 597) ib.
- Frederick Barbarossa perishes, 381
- Frederick II employs the Inquisition for his own purposes, 322; his struggle with the Papacy 324; treated by the Pope as deposed 329 330.
- Free-lancers, the ravage France, 444; companies, the curse of France, 453 their day coming to an end, 458 460 still scourge France, 544 successful measures against them, 548; are crushed, 546; directed against Metz and Basle, 547; absorbed into the army 548.
- Free population of France in days of Hugh Capet, 186.
- French character the, 41; history when it really begins, 70 language, its pedigree, 169; kingship begins with Hugh Capet, 184 architecture, 259; language and literature advance under St. Louis, 241
- Froissart, his writings, 397 on the English forces at Crécy 412 violently prejudiced, 433 on the causes of discontent, 475 sneers at Philip van Artevelde, 480.
- Fulcher of Chartres quoted, 213.
- Fulk, Abp. of Rheims, 169.
- Fulk Nerra of Anjou, 199, 200.
- Fulrad of St. Denis, Pippin's envoy to the Pope, 109.

G

- Gaelic Kerts, from Ireland and Wales, at Crécy 417
- Galcazzo Visconti pays King John's ransom, 452; gets Isabelle of France for his son John, ib.
- Galla Braccata, 24; Togata, ib.
- Gallo character the, 11 12; forms of government changes, 20; state of society 21; society under Constantine, 53.
- Gallo-Roman Church, its orthodoxy 45.
- Gallo-Roman Empire, 46 state of, 64; Bishops flatter the vices of Hlodowig, 74; fill all clerical posts under the Germans, ib. their condition, 78 courtiers at the Neustrian Court, 84 their sorry plight, 145; a few rich ones at Court ib.; in cities, ib.; their homes originally undefended, 186.
- Galswith, Queen of Hiltperik, 87
- Gascony Charles VII in, 546
- Gaul, the, 8, 10 his home 17; family usages, 18; learns trade, 20 deals with Rome, ib.; his inventions, 21; sacks Rome, 22; threatens the Republic, ib. helps Hannibal, ib.; takes Roman dress, 24; revolts against Caesar 31; reduced by him, 32, 34; treated kindly 34; under Roman influences, 15, 209; one-third of the race perishes fighting against Caesar 36; prolific, ib.; under Augustus, 38 39; rhetoricians, ib. receive citizenship, 40; wear Roman dress, ib. Claudius on their citizenship, 40, 41; the last Gallic war ib.; last uprising under Civilis, 42; under the Empire, 44; their misery ib.; Emperors friendly to, ib.; Christianity in, 45 under

Diocletian, 50, in two vicariates, 51, early Jacquerie in, ib., under Constantine, ib., field in which Christianity vanquished Paganism, ib., Southern, happy under Visigoths, 60, desolated, 62, state on fall of Empire, 64 Frankish settlement in, 75, 76, inhabitants and divisions of, under Charles the Great, 134, elements of population in, 146

Geneva, Caesar at, 28.

Genoise sailors in French service, 401; overborne at battle of Sluis, 404; archers at Blanche-Taque, 412; at Crecy, 412.

Geoffrey Plantagenet, marries the Empress Maud, 258.

Geoffrey, son of Henry II, made Duke of Brittany, 272; dies, leaving a posthumous son, Arthur, 273.

Geoffrey Martel of Anjou, 200.

Geography of France, the, 1, 200.

German Pope Sylvester II, gives Hugh Capet made King, 190; visit made in Constantinople, 194; his history, character, accomplishments, 199, 194; is King of Rome, 190; of Rome, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

41, cities garrisoned by frontier-legions, ib., recolonised with Franks, 46.

Gerona taken by Philip III, 252.

Gerson at Paris, 497; leads at Constance, 499, his controversy with the Burgundians, 501; always Armagnac, 537.

Gervais, Archbishop, concedes Philip I at Rheims, 203, 204.

Gezellen, the, 49.

Ghent, men of, murder Jacquemart van Arteveld, 408; revolt under Philip van Arteveld against feudalism, 479, beaten down by Philip the Good, 1 v. 1452, 555.

Giula, daughter of Charles II, King, marries Hroll, 174.

Giula, daughter of Philip the Short, 115.

Giuliano de' Medici, commander of the Tour de St. Pierre, 149, 150; Governor of Rome, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

Giuliano de' Medici, commander of the Tour de St. Pierre, 149, 150; Governor of Rome, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714,

- by Crusades, 230 makes an interested and hollow peace with the Latins, 348.
- Gregorian chant introduced by Charles the Great, 119.
- Gregory of Tours quoted, 83, 84<sup>v</sup> boldly resists Fredegood, 87
- Gregory the Great sends a letter to Brunhild, 89.
- Gregory III negotiates with the Carolings, 103 108
- Gregory IV blesses the sons of Hlodwig the Pious, 154.
- Gregory V puts France under ban, 197
- Gregory VII, see Hildebrand.
- Gregory IX threatens St. Louis with excommunication 121 his struggle with Frederick II of Germany 224, 225; dies, ib
- Gregory X resists Charles of Anjou, 241, 248 his great schemes and death, 248 249.
- Gregory XI, Pope, 475
- Gregory XII, Anti Pope, resigns, 499.
- Griffith, a Welsh free-lance, 445
- Grimoald, son of Pippin, Austrasian Mayor 94.
- Guerin, Bp. of Senlis, at Beauvais, 309.
- Gulenne, English doorway into France, 406 submit to the French, 465; one of the three great fiefs left, 473; English driven out of it, 551 its ties to England noblesse and commerce, ib Talbot raises it against Charles VII, 552 is quickly reduced ib assimilated to France, 553.
- Guibot on Charles the Great, 133, 140.
- Gunpowder overthrows baronial castles and chivalry 248 used by Edward III 598 early instance of ib note 1
- Guy of Burgundy attacks William the Bastard, 103.
- Guy of Dam pierre abandoned by Edward I to Philip le Bel 365
- Guy of Namur at Courtrai, 370

H.

- Habsburg origin of House of, 248
- Haganon rules Charles the Simple, 175
- Hainault, Edward III in 401; takes Edward's side, 403 ravaged by French, ib
- Hallam on Charles the Great, 119, 133, 141 on feudalism and chivalry 243.
- Hannibal helped by the Gauls, 22.
- Harfleur siege of, 501 is taken by Henry V 502 recovered by Charles VII, 511
- Haribert, King of Paris, 84 dies in A.D. 86, ib
- Haribert II, King of Aquitania, 92
- Harold the Dane, 171 177
- Harold Harfagr 131
- Harold, son of Earl Godwin, 207 his coth, ib
- Haroun-al-Raschid, 130.
- Hasting the Dane takes Rouen 171
- Helgald, biographer of Robert le Debonair 196.
- Helvetiana, migration of, 26 cross Sequania, 28; defeated by Caesar ib
- Henry I youngest son of King Robert and Constance, crowned, 199 sole King 200; attacked by his brother and mother ib; defended by Robert the Devil, ib loses his wife 203; marries Anne, a Russian, ib; crowns her son Phillip joint-king ib, 204.
- Henry Beauchere seizes the English throne, 226 also Normandy ib.
- Henry V of Germany threatens France, 255; but withdraws, 256; dies soon after ib
- Henry of Anjou (II of England) marries Eleanor 266; his rights and claims ib; his strength, 267; ascends the English throne ib; does homage to Louis VII, ib; contrasted with Louis, 268 attacks France 269; strengthens himself in Normandy ib; conquers Hainault ib his wife's territories, 270; his strife with Becket, ib; Becket's death, 272; the King's humiliation ib; calls up the Cotteraux, 2721

- gets over his difficulties, 274, turbulence of his sons, 278, his sad death, 281
- Henry Courtmantel, son of Henry II, marries Margaret, daughter of Louis VII, 269, submits to his father, 274, opposes Philip Augustus, 278, dies, ib
- Henry III of England, feeble, 320, comes to Poitou to help Hugh of Lusignan, 326, defeated at Taillebourg, ib, returns home, ib, receives back Périgord, &c., from St Louis, 337, his relationship to St Louis, ib note, his death, 347
- Henry V of England, succeeds in AD 1413, 500, the Red Rose triumphs, ib, his overtures to France, ib, war, 501, besieges Harfleur, ib, takes it, 502, marches northwards, ib, difficulties with the Somme, ib, 503, his route, 503, at Azincourt, 503-508, returns to London, 508, returns into Normandy, 509, takes Rouen, ib, takes Pontoise and threatens Paris, 510, signs the Treaty of Troyes, 511, is to be Regent of France, is to marry Catherine of France, ib, takes sundry towns which held for the Dauphin, ib, at Paris, 512, is 'King of Paris' against the 'King of Bourges,' ib, returns to England, ib, back in France, 513, falls ill and dies, ib, his character and burial, ib
- Henry VI of England, brought over to Paris, 534, crowned at Notre Dame, 541, his incapacity, 543; allies himself with the Count of Armagnac, 547, loses all France, 550, 551
- Henry of Lancaster, helped by Philip of Burgundy 490, marries the Duchess of Brittany, 491
- Henry of Navarre dies, 349, his daughter marries Philip le Bel, ib
- Henry of Trastamare, bastard brother of Pedro the Cruel, 458, crowned King at Burgos, 459, loses his crown, 460, Charles V offers him open help, 461, murders Pedro the Cruel, ib
- Herbert of Vermandois, 176, flies to Germany, ib, 177
- Hereditary succession, why firm in France, 275
- Heristal, seat of Austrasian Court, 97
- Hermingard, first wife of Hlodwig the Pious, 153
- Herpin of Bourges, sells his lordships to King Philip, 227
- Herulians, the, 49
- Hesús, Druid divinity, 13
- High Court of Jerusalem, the, 239, 240
- Hilbert, son of Hlodowig, King of Paris, 81, seizes Hlodowig's lands, 82
- Hildebrand of Cluny, Pope Gregory VII, 205, goes with the Normans, 206, his letter to Henry IV of Germany, 219
- Hilderik III, last Merwing King, 105, deposed by Pippin, 109
- Hilperik, King of Soissons, then of Neustria, 84
- Hincmar of Rheims, his high pretensions, 163, 164, resists Engena, 105
- History of France, true starting point of, 184
- Hlodoald, (St Cloud), 83
- Hlodowig, King of Orleans, 81; killed in Burgundy, 82
- Hlodowig, head of a petty Frankish tribe, 64, orthography of name, ib note, influenced by S Remigius, 65, his career, 68, defeats Syagrius, ib, occupies North Gaul, 69, marries Hlotehild, ib, wins battle of Zulpich, ib, is converted, ib, baptized at Rheims, 70, defeats Burgundians, 71, Visigoths, ib, is Consul Romanus, 72, gets his rivals assassinated, ib, dies, 73, his character, ib, he modified Christianity, 73, 74, had seen his task achieved, 80
- Hlodowig II, King of Neustria, 94, a roi fainéant, ib
- Hlotair, see Hlodowig
- Hlotair King of Soissons, 81; joins Hilbert in seizing Hlodowig's lands, 83, is first King of Neustria, ib, has trouble with his

- leaders, 84 is sole King ib.
dies, ib.
- Hlotair II, sole King 90, 92; murders Brunhild, 91
- Hlotair III, King of Neustria, 94
- Hlotchild, wife of Hlodowig 69 her reply as to her grandchildren's fate, 82
- Hlothar King of Italy 163 is Emperor 185 is defeated at Fontanet, 186 has Italy and Lotharingia, 187; dies, 185.
- Hlothar Caroling King, 177
- Hlodwig the Pious, learned like his father 120 is King of Aquitaine, 125, 122 saluted Emperor ib. his reign, 150; his earlier life, 151 character ib. appearance, 152 wives, 153; troubles with his sons, 154 is deposed, 155 restored, ib.; dies, ib.
- Hlodwig the German, 155 is lord of Germany after Verdun, 157
- Hlodwig II, the Stammerer King 165
- Hlodwig III King in North France, 166 defeats Hasting 172
- Hlodwig IV Outremer, King 176 bravely resists Otto the Great, 1, 7; has a hard struggle for existence, ib.
- Hlodwig V last Caroling King 178
- Holy Roman Empire, its germs in Church and State, 63, 95; is merged into a German Empire, 348.
- Honorius, Emperor, gives his daughter to Ataulf, 59 cedes South France to Visigoths, 60.
- Hôtel de Ville of Paris, founded by Marcel 443.
- Hrolf the Northman besieges Paris, 166 settles on the Seine 172 173 becomes a Christian and marries the daughter of Charles the Simple 174
- Hubert de Burgh, 320.
- Hugh of Lorraine, joins Hrolf the Northman, 166.
- Hugh, first of Abbots, 166
- Hugh le Blanc, son of Robert the barons' King, 176; the Great, becomes man to Otto, 177; dies, 178.
- Hugh of Beauvais, friend of Robert, King of France, 196.
- Hugh, son of Robert, crowned, 199 dies, ib.
- Hugh, Duke of Burgundy submits to Philip Augustus, 279.
- Hugh Capet, son of Hugh the Great, is Duke of France, 178 is elected and crowned King of France, ib. limits of his Kingdom, 188 is Abbot of St. Denis, ib., his pedigree 189; elected by influence of Gerbert, 190; had been strongest of the barons, ib.; lay head of the Church, 191; opposed by Karl of Lorraine, ib. origin of his name Capet, ib. note; attacks William of Aquitaine, 192 has his son Robert crowned, ib.; is called the King of St. Denis, ib.; takes Karl by treachery 193 makes Gerbert Abp. of Rheims, ib.; dies, 194.
- Hugh the Great, of Vermandois, heads the second Crusading army 221
- Hugh of Lusignan, becomes one of Louis IX's vassals, 320 opposes Alphonse at Poitiers, 326; is defeated by St. Louis, and yields, ib.
- Hundred Years War periods of the, 399; end of the, 512 583.
- Hunold of Aquitaine, resists Carl the Great, 124.
- Huns, enter Gaul, 58 cross Loire, ib.; in army of Aetius, 60 make incursions under Etzel, ib. defeated at Châlons, 61
- Huss, John, burnt at Constance, 499.

L

- Iconoclastic controversy the, 10
- Idactus, Spanish Bishop, 85
- Île de France, dialect of the 161
- Imperial dignity the idea of, grows, 111 112
- Indutomar Trevisan chief, 31
- Ineffabilis amoris, the Doll, 262
- Ingeborg, Danish Princess, wife of Philip Augustus 295 ill-used by him, ib.; restored, 296; brought into notice again, 307
- Innocent II, quarrels with Louis

- VII over the Archbishopric of Bourges, 262
- Innocent III, compels Philip and Richard to peace, 283, tries to stop siege of Château Gaillard, 295, preaches Albigensian Crusade, 300, excommunicates Raymond of Toulouse, 301, accepts his submission, 302, regrets the evils done, 304, holds the Lateran Council, ib, declares the Great Charter null, 312, resisted by English barons, ib
- Innocent IV, resists the Hohenstaufen, 325, his interview with St Louis, 329, opposes the French barons, 330
- Innocent VI, is invited to ratify Treaty of Bretigny, 451
- Inquisition, established in south of France, 322, used even by Frederick II, ib, 323, claims Jeanne Darc as its victim, 537
- Irenaeus, second Bishop of Lyons, 45
- Isabelle of France, returns to England in A.D. 1326, 395
- Isabelle, daughter of John II, marries John Galeazzo of Milan, 452
- Isabelle of Bavaria, married to Charles VI, 483, the scourge of France, ib, goes with the Duke of Orleans, 489, 491, tries to carry off the Burgundian children, 492, comes to Paris, 493, is Regent, 494, is at Troyes, 508, comes to terms with John of Burgundy, ib, is Regent, 508, establishes a Parliament at Poitiers, ib, joins the new Duke of Burgundy, 511
- Italian troubadours, 358
- Italy under Charles the Great, 126
- Ithacius, Spanish Bishop, 55
- J
- Jacquemart van Arteveld, see Arteveld
- Jacquerie, an early, under Diocletian, 51, the Great, under Charles the Dauphin, 444, suppressed, 445
- Jacques Coeur, 544, 550, his fall, 554
- James, King of Aragon, 337, last King of Majorca, sells Montpellier to Philip VI, 422
- Jargeau besieged and taken by Jeanne Darc, 532
- Jean de Meung, the satirist, 356
- Jeanne of Burgundy, wife of Philip of Poitiers, proves faithless, 380
- Jeanne Darc, 515, her origin, 522, spelling of name, ib note 1, her mission 523, is forwarded to the Dauphin, ib, opposition to her, 524, has a friend in Yolande of Aragon, ib, admitted to the King's presence, ib, her appearance, 525, rides forward towards Orleans, 526, enters it, ib, the fear of her, 527, opposition in the city, 528, attacks the English lines, takes St Loup Bastille, 529, the Augustinians, ib, the Tournelles, 530, the English withdraw, 531, she sets out to find the King, ib, takes Jargeau, 532, wins battle of Patay, ib, finds the King at Sully, ib, besieges Troyes and takes it, ib, escorts the King to Rheims, 533, at the coronation, ib, her mission fulfilled, ib, her height of power, 534, the Court thwarts her, ib, goes to St Denis, 535, fails in the assault of Paris, 536, taken at Compiègne, ib, sold to the English by the Burgundians 537, her trial, 538, her death, ib, who is most to blame? ib, England accepts the shame, 540, the reaction in her favour, ib, the rehabilitation-trial, 555
- Jeanne, Queen of Naples, put to death, 476
- Jerusalem, Crusaders reach, 224, is stormed, ib, Godfrey of Bouillon 'King of Jerusalem,' ib, Kingdom of, feudal, 238
- Jews in France, persecuted, 218, attacked in the religious revival of the second Crusade, 264, protected by St. Bernard, ib, and by Louis VII, 275, persecuted by Philip Augustus, 277, used and squeezed by Philip the Fair, 358, persecuted under Philip V, 366

Joanner Scotus Erigena, 164
 John of Brienne, titular King of Jerusalem, 318
 John, the blind King of Bohemia, at Crécy 417
 John of Hainault, forces Philip VI to retire at Crécy 417
 John, second son of Charles VI, his end, 508.
 John Lackland joins Philip Augustus, 283; deserts him when Richard is free, &. feehlest of Henry's sons, 284; seizes Arthur 285 indolent and cowardly at Rouen, & does not relieve Chateau Gaillard, 292 flies to England, 296 summoned by Phillip to answer for Arthur's death, 297 cedes his crown to the Pope, 307; receives it from him again &; humiliated in his French campaign of A.D. 1214, 308, 311; signs the Great Charter 312 breaks faith, &; is supported by Innocent III, &. attacked by Louis of France, 313; dies, &.
 John of Procida, opposes Charles of Anjou, 351
 John II, Duke of Normandy carries on war in North France, 403; supports claims of Charles of Blois to the Duchy of Brittany, 407; hesitates to attack Edward III, 408 held in check by the Earl of Derby 409 called in by Philip VI, 419; succeeds to the throne, 422 named le Bon, & his character 423; compared with Charles the Bad, & ill-uses Charles of Navarre, &; opposed by the Estates of the Langue d'Oïl, 425 starts from Paris for the south, 426; passes the Black Prince, and awaits him at Poitiers, &. loses the battle of Poitiers, 42, -432; is taken prisoner 431; carried to Bordeaux, to London, 432; tries to make terms of peace, 448; which are refused by Charles the Dauphin, &; accedes to the treaty of Bretigny 450; his ransom, &, his description of the woes of France, 451 & sent over to Calais, and released, 452; tries to get rid of the free companies, but is defeated at Brignais, 453; returns a voluntary captive to England, &; there dies, 454.

 John XXIII, Pope, 498 at Constance, &; deposed, 499.
 Joinville, at Mansourah, 332 has to carry St. Louis in his arms, 338; refuses to go on the King's second Crusade, 339 his book, 341
 Jubilee of A.D. 1300, 366.
 Judith, daughter of Welf, second wife of Hludwig the Pious, 183.
 Julian, Emperor 54 resists Franks, &; makes Paris his capital in Gaul, &.
 Jullus Nepos, Emperor 62.
 Jumilgeux, Abbey of, 198.
 Justice done by Charles the Great, 117; how administered, 139.
 Juvenal des Ursins, Provost of Paris, 484, 497

K

Kerboga, Sultan of Mosul, defeated at Antioch, 223.
 Killidj Arslan Sultan of Nicaea, 220 resists Crusaders, 221
 King of Bourges, the, 517
 King of Franks, the title not territorial, 111
 Kings, Frankish, their way of life, 76; grant allodial possession to nobles, &; are personal not territorial sovereigns, 7; simple leaders in war 81; the Carolings rise, 96.
 Knight, the Gallic, 12, he and the Druid the only free Gauls left, 21
 Knighthood, its qualities, institution &c see Chivalry
 Knolles, a free-lance in Normandy 445; pushes up to Paris, 463.

L

Labarum, the, 51
 Labienus in Gaul, 33.
 Lacti or Lendes, 46
 La Hire, Jeanne Darc's roughest captain, 529, 530
 La Hogue, Edward III lands at, 499.

- Lancaster, the Duke of, in France, 449, opposed to Philip of Burgundy in Normandy, 462, lands at Calais, and marches to Bordeaux, 465
- Land in Gaul, how divided, 134
- Landen, Pippin of, and his family, 79, 89, 90
- Langobards, the, 49
- Langue d'Oc, 162
- Langue d'Oil, 162
- Laon, a Frankish centre, 162, the last stronghold of the Caroling Kings, 175, Charles the Simple there, ib, it falls to Charles of Lorraine, 191, ceases to be great, 193, its dealings for a Commune with Louis VI, 254.
- Laon, Cardinal of, advises Charles VI to dismiss his uncles, 484, is poisoned accordingly, ib
- 'Lark,' Legion of the, 34, receives Roman citizenship, 37
- Lateran Council, the great, 304
- Latin influences begin in Gaul, 20, 21, language in Gaul, 54, how it passed into French, 159, of the Church, 161, classical, ib
- Latin Church and Greek Church, much sundered by the Crusades, 230
- La Tremouille, King Charles' favourite, 524, hostile to Jeanne D'arc, ib, his castle at Sully, 532, his conspiracy against his country, 534, his fall, 541
- Law, age of development of, 66, Burgundian, ib, Visigothic, ib, Roman, and Custom, 75, Salic, 88, 119, Ripuarian, 119, Roman, ib, is attached to the land, 175, Custom-, in Northern France, ib, French, as administered by St. Louis, 338, 341, 342, Roman, extended in France, 342, its influence under Philip III, 346, 349, ennobled, ib, Roman, adopted by Philip IV, 355 its spirit destroys medievalism, ib, its great power under him, 357, Civil, triumphs over Canon 361
- Lawyers, the great under Philip le Bel 366, under Louis X, 383
- Learning, fostered by Charles the Great, 119, tale of the Scots' teachers, 120
- Lecocq, Bp of Laon, 436, supports Marcel, ib 437, 438
- Leger, St, opposed to Ebroin, 94, sainted, 95
- Legions on the Rhine-frontier, 41
- Leitrad, one of the Missi of Charles the Great, 141
- Leo III, Pope, 128, visits Charles the Great, ib, his ill-treatment, ib note, undertakes to crown Charles, ib, declared innocent, 129
- Leopold of Austria, holds Richard prisoner, 282.
- Lérins, Isle of, 65
- Leudes of the Germanic tribes, 49, their independence, 81, lay the bases of feudalism, 82, are the King's 'fideles,' 83, under Charles the Great, 134, the King's, rank before all others, 135
- Lewis, see Louis
- Library, the, at Paris, founded by Charles V, 455
- Lamoges, the Black Prince at, 463
- Lingua Romana Rustica, 161.
- Literature in the 5th century, 66, frozen by German invasion, ib.
- Liutprand, the Lombard, takes Ravenna, 108
- Lombards, in Italy, 107, 108, support the Papacy, ib, not trusted by it, ib, kingdom of, held by Pippin, 126
- Long-bow, the, in English hands, 400,
- Long-haired Kings, 83, 96
- Loss of life in the Crusades, 228
- Lotharingia or Lorraine, 158, Charles the Simple flees thither, 176
- Louis I, see Hludwig the Pious
- Louis VI, le Gros, joint-King with his father, 249, the crown-domain under him, ib, his rights of suzeranty, 250, his vigour and character, ib, royalty gains under him, 251, his wars with his neighbours, ib, gets Montlehery, 252, his father dies, ib, crowned at Orleans, why? ib, peasants in his armies, 253, is fountain of justice, ib, encourages the poor, the Church, 254, does very little for the Communes, ib;

- at war with the Normans, 225; beaten by Brenneville, ib. prepares to resist Henry of England, ib. takes the Oriflamme, ib. Henry V of Germany threatens him, 226 but dies, ib. interferes in the South, 257 and in Flanders, ib.; crowns Phillip his son, ib. who dies, ib. then crowns Louis the Young, ib. marries Louis to Eleanor of Aquitaine, 258 dies, ib. his character and work, ib.
- Louis VII, the Young, is crowned as joint King by Louis VI, 257 marries Eleanor of Aquitaine, 258 retards the growth of French monarchy 259 slave of the Church, 261; brought up by Suger at St. Denis, ib. favourite with the chroniclers. ib. crowned, 262; repulsed in the South, ib. falls in Normandy ib. quarrels with Pope Innocent II, ib. burns Vitry parish church, ib., 263 takes the cross at Vézelay 263 goes on crusade, 264 leaves his army and pushes on by sea, 265; does penance for Vitry at Jerusalem, ib. is captured at sea, and rescued, returns home, ib. Eleanor abandons him, ib.; consents to a divorce, 266; tries to check growth of Henry II of England, 267 receives his homage, ib. contrasted with him, 268 supports Becket against him 270 his influence south of the Loire, 271 his second Queen Constance dies. ib. marries Alice of Hols, ib. meanly tempts Henry's sons from him, 273 defeated by Henry ib.; has his son Phillip crowned, 274 dies, 275 his acts, ib.
- Louis VIII sent by his father into the South, 206 has English crown offered him, 312; accepts, and goes across, ib. his failure, 313; his short reign, 316; besieges Aignon, catches camp fever dies, 317
- Louis IX (Saint), comes to the throne in A.D. 1226, aged 12 317; critical time for monarchy 318; is crowned, ib. defended by Queen Blanche, 319 his nobleness much due to her ib.; resists the league of barons, 320 wears them out, ib. time works for him, 321 makes peace with Raymond VII, ib. gets Narbonne, and prospect of the rest of the South, 322 marries Margaret, daughter of Raymond Berenger 323 behaves well to Frederick II, 324 tries to make his brother Alphonse Lord of Poitou and Auvergne, 325 defeats Henry III of England at Taillebourg 326, reduces Raymond VII of Toulouse, 327; bids the nobles choose between him and Henry III, ib.; his first Crusade, 328 interview with Pope Innocent IV at Cîteaux, 329 sanctions the league of the Barons against the Papal ban, 330 sails from Aigues Mortes, ib.; at Cyprus, 331; Damietta, ib. delays too long 332; battle of Mansourah, ib. second battle, 333; retires towards Damietta, is taken prisoner ib.; purchases his freedom, 334; lands at Ptolemais, ib. sends his brothers home, 335 the ferment in France at news of his mishaps, ib.; is four years in Palestine, 336; Queen Blanche dies, ib. he returns to France ib.; his good rule, 337 cedes much land to England, ib.; his ways and acts, 338; again takes the cross, ib.; lands near Tunis, 339; falls ill and dies, 340 his character person, love of learning ib., 341; his great work as a lawyer ib., 342; enlarged the royal domain, ib.; ruled over the Church, 343 reformed the coin 344; his additions to the monarchy ib.; how regarded in his own day and afterwards, 345; long the patron Saint of France ib. canonised by Boniface VIII 364
- Louis X, le Hutin, succeeds, 352; condemns Languerrand de Marigny, ib., 353; his Ordinance that every man ought to be born free,' ib, his foolish regulations, 384, campaign in Flanders, ib, dies,

ib
 Louis XI as Dauphin, 545, shows signs of capacity, ib, head of the discontented nobles, ib, submits to the King, 546, does good service for France, ib, 547, draws the free-lances to Switzerland, 547, wins the battle of the Birsch, ib, makes terms with Basle and ravages Alsace 548, intrigues against the King, 549, hates
 Agnes Sorel, ib; withdraws to Dauphine, 550, offers to reconquer Guienne for the King, 552,
 France prepares herself for him,
 557
 Louis of Anjou, see Anjou Louis, Duke of Bavaria, tries to carry off the Burgundian children 492.
 Louis de Male, Count of Bruges,
 490; his death 482.
 Louis I of Flanders, cousin of Philip 471-472.
 Louis II of Flanders, Cousin of
 Philip 472-473.

M.

Magic, fear of, in the 14th and 15th centuries, 394.
 Magna Charta, signed, 311.
 Magnentius, the Emperor, a Frank,
 54
 Mahaut, said to have been poisoned
 by Robert of Artois, 391.
 Mahometanism spreads over South
 France, 102, arrested by Charles Martel, ib, 103, effects on the Papacy, 107, its division and movement, 218, checked awhile by the Crusades, 230; but not permanently, ib
 Maillaht by Etienne Martel, 446, 447
 Mainz, Huns cross the Rhine at,
 58; bridge over the Rhine at,
 122; Charles the Great holds a diet at 200, 211, 219
 Maître Jean le, Marshal of France,
 472-473, 474, 475.
 Mainz, France, 475; see also the Rhine, 116.
 Mainz, the seat of the archbishop,
 472; see also 473, 474,
 475, 476.

- Margaret of Anjou wife of Henry VI, 547; unpopular in England, 561
- Margaret marries Henry Count mantel and carries Gisore and Vexin to him, 280.
- Margaret, daughter of Raymond Berenger marries St. Louis, 323; at Damietta, 334; gives birth to a son, 35
- Margaret, heiress of Flanders, married to Philip of Burgundy 462 478 dies, 493 is founder of a kingdom all but in name, 35.
- Margraves, under Charles the Great, 138.
- Maric, Druid leader 41
- Marignol, Enguerrand de, minister of Philip le Bel, 379; perishes, 382
- Marius resists barbarians, 24 defeats them near Aix, 25; defeats Cimber in North Italy 26.
- Marmosets, the, 481 484.
- Marriage-tie, weak among Franks, 117
- Martin, Bishop of Tours, 54 opposes persecution, 56 fosters monasticism, 65 church of St., 72
- Martin, Austrasian Mayor 95; murdered, 26.
- Martin IV Pope, supports Charles of Anjou, 351
- Martin V Pope, elected at the Council of Constance, 499.
- Mary of Anjou, married to Charles VII, 517
- Matilda, the Empress, marries Godfrey Plantagenet, 252.
- Masilina, entrepôt between Gaul and Rome, 20; when founded, 22 its importance, 23 falls before Caesar 37 school of Greek learning 39 a zealous worshipping of Roman devils, 45.
- Matthew Paris on St. Louis, 345.
- Manpertuis, near Poitiers, 426.
- Maximus recolonises Armorica with Britons, 55; condemns Priscillian for heresy 26
- Mayors of the Palace, 81; in all Frankish kingdoms, 85; over shadow the royal power 90; nature and origin of, 26 derivation of name, 26 note the office fixed in family of Pippin, 26; lords over the Merwing Kings, 96.
- Meaux, treaty of, 321
- Medard, St., of Soissons, vassals of, at Bouvines, 310.
- Medicine comes to Europe through Provence, 300.
- Medio-bann, 14.
- Mediterranean, highway of civilization, 37
- Menapii, 30.
- Merwings or Merwings, 68 their faintest Kings, 96, 97; they disappear from history 109
- Merow marries Brunhild, 87
- Merowig, Frankish chief, at Châlons, 61
- Metz, fruitlessly besieged by Charles VII, 548.
- Michael Palaeologus, alarmed by Charles of Anjou, 348.
- Military orders, the, 247
- Millennial year the, 193 its influence, 26 shifted to the 1000th year from the crucifixion, 200, 201
- Milo, Legate of Innocent III 302
- Miss Dominici, the, of Charles the Great, 139, 140 re-established by St. Louis, 342
- Molai, Jacques de, Grandmaster of the Templars, 370.
- Monarchy its phases in France 184, 185; strengthened by the Crusades, 233.
- Monasticism, developed in 5th century 65; its western characteristics, 26 a new religious element, 26 allied to Austrasians, 26 restored honour to toll, 26; friendly to the earlier Austrasians, 99; is sunk in apathy 146.
- Monk of St. Gall, the quoted, 120.
- Monks, the 99; help Pippin of Heristal, 26, 100; from England and Scotland, 26 go between the Pope and Pippin, 109.
- Montanist opinions at Lyons, 42.
- Montfort, John of claims Duchy of Brittany 407; crosses to England for help, 26; is taken and cast into prison by Philip VI, 403;

- enters Brittany, 409; overthrows the French party and Charles of Blois, 458, expelled by weakness of the English party, 467, heads Breton revolt, ib
- Montforts, the, at feud with Charles of Blois, 457, punished by Charles V, 464.
- Montleheri bars King Louis from the South, 250, falls to Louis VI, 251
- Montmorenci resists King Louis VI to the North, 250
- Moors, the, attack Aragon, 303, defeated by King Peter, 304
- Morality suffers from the Crusades, 228
- Morini, overcome by Caesar, 30
- Mountains of France, 5
- Municipal institutions in Gaul, 47
- Mysteries, the, first acted in Paris, 421
- N
- Najara, battle of, 459.
- Nantes, pillaged by Norsemen, 172
- Naples, the aim of the Duke of Anjou, 479
- Napoleon's criticism on St Louis in Egypt, 331
- Narbo Martius, founded, 24, Latin missionaries land at, 46
- Narbonensis, Augustus' Province, 38, the Second, ceded to Visigoths, 60
- Narbonne, Arab capital, recovered by Pippin, 114
- National life, growth of, 358
- Neim-heidh, 8
- Nero, fond of Provence, 41, rebuilt Lyons, ib
- Nerobaldus, a Frankish 'King,' is Consul, 55
- Nervians affected a Germanic origin, 26, a warlike tribe, attack Caesar, 30
- Neustria, 72, opposed to Austrasia, 79, chief Frankish power first therein, 80, settles down into a kingdom, 83, 84, has a Mayor, 85, in Hugh Capet's days, 186
- Neustrian Kings, the, 79 sqq
- Nicaea, taken by Crusaders, 222
- Nicknames, rise in France, 491
- Nicolas III, Pope, 351
- Nicolas V, Pope, closes Council of Basle, 550
- Nicolas de Clemangis, 487
- Nicopolis, battle of, 490
- Nimwegen, Charles the Great at, 118
- Ninth century, the age of the Bishops, 145
- Nobility, Patents of, granted by Philip III, 349
- Noblesse of France, dissolute, 433, Patents of, to civic persons, 472
- Nogaret, William, a great lawyer, 366, appears in the Parliament of Paris, and attacks Boniface VIII, 372, in Italy, ib, captures Boniface, 373, conducts the posthumous trial of the Pope, 379
- Nomenoe, lord of Brittany, 163
- Norman Conquest, the, 208, its effects, ib, 209
- Normandy, peasant-rising in, 199, troubles in, 200, Robert 'the Devil' becomes Duke of, ib, pledged to William II of England, 225, restless against Louis VI, 255, in troubles, 257, 258, strengthened by Henry II, 269, attacked by Philip Augustus, 284, finally conquered by him, 296, cleared of the English, 550, 551
- Northmen, attacked by Charles the Great, 130, their early landings on other shores, 131; attack even Paris, 163, settle on the Seine, ib, ravage the Atlantic coasts, 166, again besiege Paris, ib, their influence on feudalism, 168, their age, 170, manner of settling, ib, on every shore, ib, 171, many converted, ib, under Hasting they take Rouen, ib, first settlement in France, 172, pillage and spoil, ib, settle permanently on the Seine and Loire, 173, become Christians, 174, make a compact state out of Normandy, ib, learn the French tongue, ib, their literature in it, ib, influenced Custom-law, 175, their influence in Italy, 205, 206, their conquest of England, 208, and South Italy, 209, vigour, 211, under "

Crusade, 221 their architecture, 259 great castle builders, 291
 Novempopulania, the Huns in, 58 ceded partly to Visigoths, 60.
 Noviodunum (Nevers), taken by
 Caesar 32.
 Noviodunum (Soissons), taken by
 Caesar 30.
 Nuncios, the, of Boniface VIII, 363, 364.

O

Oath, exacted by Charles the Great,
 131; the Strasburg, 157 159 161
 Odo, the vigorous King of Aquitaine, 100.
 Odo (Eudes), Count of Paris, defends the ses against Northmen, 166 elected King, 167; opposed by Carolings, 169 comes to terms with them, ib dies, ib.
 Odo of Chartres resists King Robert, 109.
 Odowacer the Herulean deposes Romulus, 63 is Patrician, King
ib gives Empire beyond the Alps to Ewarik, ib is defeated by Theodoric, 64.
 Olaf the Swede converted by An-gar 171
 Oléron, Isle of, ceded to Louis IX, 321
 Opmintus subdues the Ligurians, 23.
 Oratory natural to the Gaul, 12
 Ordinances, royal, of Phillip le Bel, 362 of John le Bon after Bre-tigny 451; of Charles V 466, 472 fixing royal majority 478 the Cabochian 496, 497 for a standing army 545, 548
 Orpetorix, Helvetian leader 26.
 Oriflamme the, 51 described, 255;
 at Bouvines, 309 in hands of Philip III 352; at Poitiers, 429 taken by Charles VI against Henry
 V 501
 Orleans, persecution of Manicheans at, 199; Louis VI crowned at, 252 besieged, 518 its position.
 b plan of, 519 deserted by her chief men 222; offers to yield to the Duke of Burgundy
ib relieved by Jeanne Darc,

526; her entry ib; siege of, raised, 531 the States General of the Langue d'Oïl meet there,
 544 great Ordinance of, 543.
 Orleans, Duke of, excluded from the regency 486 first symptom of the Armagnac Burgundian troubles, ib; his interests Southern and Clementine, 488; heads the aristocratic party 489; acts very foolishly 491 tries to carry off the children of John the Fearless, 492 murdered by Raoul d'Octonville, 494.
 Orleans, Duke of, a prisoner at Azincourt, 508 returns to France 546 yields to the King ib. a poet, 526.
 Orosius, quoted, 59.
 Ossian's poems, Gallic in spirit, 11
 Ostrogoths, the, 49 in Etrel's army
 61
 Otho, King of Germany in England, 306; is Emperor ib. excommunicated by the Pope 307 joins the attack on Phillip Augustus, 308; his boat, ib; loses the battle of Bouvines, 310; ruined thereby 311
 Otto the Great, 176.
 Ouid, the, lowest order of Druids,
 13 their degradation, 19
 Oudenarde, besieged by the men of Ghent, 480; siege raised after Roosebeck, 431
 Oxybil, a Ligurian tribe, 23

P

Paganism falls before Christianity
 51 52
 Painting not of much account in France, 516.
 Pandulf the Legate 307 sets Philip Augustus on Flanders, ib
 Papacy friendly to the Austrasians,
 99 discerns the value of the Franks, 103 strives against decentralisation, 163; redacts simony 211; its risks after Hildebrand's death, 212 reaps the fruits of the Crusades, 226 its power largely increased by them, 230 receives allegiance of the Crusad-

- ing Principalities, 238, no longer the central figure of Christendom, 357, its struggle with Philip le Bel, 359-374
- Paris, school of the Schoolmen, 4, Caesar holds a conference at Lutetia, 31, becomes capital under German influences, 37, Julian's capital in Gaul, 54, its dialect the standard of speech, 161, is much befriended by Philip Augustus, 315, rises to defend Louis IX, 320, Parliament of, 342, 372, 472, threatened by Edward III, 410, States-General at, 434, 436, 437, fortified, 435, under Étienne Marcel, ib, Charles of Navarre preaches at, 438, plan of, 439, Charles the Dauphin preaches at the Halles, 442, supported by a few towns only, ib, 443, strengthened by Marcel, 444, threatened by the Dauphin, ib, besieged by him, 445, the Royal Terror at, 447, the great library founded by Charles V, 455, 472, receives patent of nobility for Provost and Sheriffs, 472, punished by Charles VI, 481, the Mysteries acted at, 491, sides with John the Fearless, 492, his manifesto, ib, defences restored, 493, the Cabochians in, 495, 496, besieged by Armagnacs, 496, threatened by John of Burgundy, 508, opens its gates to the Burgundians, 509 begins to wish for the English, 510, Henry V enters it, 512, its bad position as heart of France, 515, wolves in the cemeteries, 517, 'Danse Macabre' in the cemetery of the Innocents, 518, assaulted by Jeanne Darc, 535, goes over to the royal side, 543, the English evacuate it, ib
- Parliament of Bordeaux established, 553
- Parliament of Paris becomes a law-court under St Louis, 342, a legal body, 357, called together by Philip le Bel, 372, made permanent, 472, has a rival at Poitiers, 509
- Parliament at Poitiers, 509
- Parliament, the English, consulted as to the homage due from Edward III to Philip of Valois, 393, held at Leicester, 500
- Parthenius, a Gallo-Roman, stoned in Trèves Cathedral, 83
- Parties in France and their nicknames, 491
- Partition of Frankish kingdom, 81, second, 84, five in thirty years, 162
- Paschal, Pope, comes to France, 252
- Pastoureaux, Crusade of the, 335
- Patay, battle of, 532
- Paterins, a harmless sect, persecuted by Philip Augustus, 277
- Patrician, a Burgundian officer, 85
- 'Patrician of Rome,' a title offered to Philip the Short, 105, 111
- 'Peace of God,' the, 201
- Peasant-rising in Normandy, 199
- Pedro the Ceremonious of Aragon, 459
- Pedro the Cruel of Castille, 458, his wretched end, 461
- Peers, the Twelve, of France, 274
- Pembroke, the Earl of, cannot land in Aquitaine, 463, made prisoner in sea fight off La Rochelle, ib
- Pentapolis, the, granted by Pippin to the Papacy, 114
- Périgueux, ceded to the Visigoths, 60
- 'Perpetual Constitution,' the (A D 614, 615), 92
- Persecution, begins within the Church, 55, 56, of the Manicheans of Orleans, 199
- Peter II, King of Aragon, 302, resists the Moors, 303, defeats them, 304, perishes fighting against Simon of Montfort, ib
- Peter III of Aragon opposes Charles of Anjou, 351, defeats Philip III's expedition, 352, dies, ib
- Peter de la Brosse, his history and fate, 349, 350
- Peter du Bois, a royalist pamphleteer, 355
- Peter, Czar, compared with Karl the Great, 142
- Peter of Dreux, Regent of Brittany, 318, named Mauclerc, 319;

- afterwards devoted to Louis IX, 321.
- Peter Flotte, a great lawyer 366 conducts trial of Salaiset, 367 attacked by Boniface VII 369.
- Peter the Hermit, 213 described,
218 revered, 219 at Antioch,
223 his quiet end, 226
- Peter Morroce elected Pope, 360;
abdicates, ib
- Peter of Pisa, instructed Karl the Great, 119
- Peter of Vaux Cernay on the Provencal heretics, 298.
- Petit, John, defends the Duke of Burgundy's murder of Orleans, 501
- Phillip, the Emperor 48
- Phillip I of France, born, and crowned, 203 his reign long and inglorious, 209; falls in Flanders, 211 shows some vigour in Normandy ib; submits to the Papacy
ib marries Bertrade, 212 gains by the Crusades, 217 crowns his son Louis as joint King 249
dies, ib.
- Phillip, son of Louis VI joint King, 257; killed by an accident, ib
- Phillip (Augustus) born 271; his destiny ib crowned by his father 274 his pride and ambition, 276 succeeds to all his father's territories, 27, his authority ib persecutes Jews,
ib had married Isabelle of Hal-lant, 278 gets Amiens, ib;
accepts homage of Henry II, ib his earlier wars, in Flanders and Burgundy 279 his conferences with the English in Normandy
ib; encourages Henry's undutiful sons, 280; grounds of dispute with Henry ib takes the cross, 281 wins Berry from Henry ib; goes on Crusade with Richard of England, 282 winters in Sicily
ib reaches Ptolemais, ib; soon back in France, ib; his faithless-ness and meanness, ib attacks
Normandy 283; is overmatched by Richard, ib; makes peace with him, ib; attacks Normandy again, 285; and Brittany
ib; his ill-treatment of his Danish wife, ib; takes Agnes of Meran, ib; France therefore under Interdict, 286; is reconciled with the Pope, ib; establishes the University of Paris, ib; allies himself with the Law 287 takes up the cause of murdered Arthur 288 attacks and takes Château Galliard, 291-296 overruns Normandy and takes Rouen, 296;
augments royal power 297; calls out the Twelve Peers, ib receives homage of Simon of Montfort for the South, 305; is in Flanders, 307 loses his fleet at Damme,
ib; his campaign of A.D. 1214 in Flanders, 309; battle of Bouvines, ib, 310; its results, 311 allows his son Louis to go to England, 313;
resists dictation of Innocent III, ib, his sagacious rule, ib; death, 314;
his qualities and acts, 314 316.
- Phillip III at his father's deathbed, 340 le Hardi, succeeds to the throne, 346; returns to France, ib; character ib gets, through his wife, a large part of Southern France, 347; marries the heiress of Navarre and Champagne to Phillip his son, 349 why called the Rash, ib encroaches on the barons, ib his favourite De la
Brosse, ib; his great tournament,
350 is lieutenant of his uncle
Charles, 351; his attack on Peter of Aragon, 352; dies at Perpignan, ib his sons, 353.
- Phillip IV le Bel, marries the heiress of Navarre, 349; succeeds his father 353 his person looks, character 354, 355; pupil of the lawyers, 355; bargains with Edward I, 356; not fond of war
357 a monster of greediness,
358 quarrels with Pope Boniface
VIII over clerical taxation, 359,
361; Boniface tries to mediate between him and Edward I 362; issues an Ordinance in reply to the Bull Clerics laicos, ib; their contentions, 363; partial reconciliation, 364; makes a marriage treaty with Edward I, 365;

- crushes Guy of Dampierre, ib ; has lawyers round his throne, 366, arrests Saisset, 367, second struggle with Boniface, ib, the answer to the 'Little Bull,' 368, Flanders revolts from him, 370, gains by the defeat of Courtrai, ib, is threatened with excommunication, 372, appeals to a general Council, ib, wins battle of Mons-en-Puelle, 374, chooses a Pope, 375, attends his consecration at Lyons, ib, holds him captive in France, 376, wishes him to reverse the acts of Boniface, ib, attacks the Templars, 377, persecutes and burns them, 379, gets the Order finally abolished, 380, gets most of their property, ib, the protest of nobles and burghers against him, 381, dies, ib, added somewhat to the French territory, specially Lyons, ib, strong reaction against absolutism at his death, 382
- Philip V, of Poitiers, the Tall, 384, comes to the throne, 385, establishes the 'Salic Law,' ib, his wretched reign and death, 386
- Philip VI, of Valois, guardian to the Queen of Charles IV, 387, his claim to the throne, ib, is elected King, 388, his lineage, 389, position and character, 391, crowned at Rheims, 392, his Flemish campaign, ib, battle of Cassel, ib, receives homage of Edward III, 393, fair beginnings of his reign, ib, smites down the old noblesse, 394, his foolish financial measures, ib, compared with Edward III, 395, bent on war with England, 397, drives Edward to it, 400, his fleet takes Southampton, 401, marches to Peronne in Vermandois, ib, dismisses his army, 403, receives the defiance of the Hainaulters, ib, makes his Avignon Pope lay Flanders under Interdict, ib, loses battle of Sluys, 404, how informed of it, 405, how he received the news, 406, supports claim of Charles of Blois to Brit-
- tany, 407, his folly in alienating the Bretons, 409, war breaks out again with Edward III, ib, is menaced at Paris by Edward, 410, pursues him northward, 411, nearly catches him at Blanche-Taque, 412, loses the battle of Crécy, 413-418, retreats by Amiens to Paris, 419, tries to relieve Calais, ib, retreats to Amiens, 420, adds Dauphiné to the crown, 422, marries again, and dies, ib
- Philip of Alsace, Count of Flanders, 278
- Philip, afterwards Duke of Burgundy, 'le Hardi,' at Poitiers, 431, becomes Duke, 453, commands in Normandy against Edward III, 462, at deathbed of Charles V, 469, busy in North France, 477, married to Margaret of Flanders, 478, gets Flanders, 482, receives the wooden town built for England, 484, seizes the government of France, 486, supports Henry of England in A.D. 1399, 490, his death 492
- Philip Hurepel, uncle of Louis IX, 318
- Philip of Navarre, brother of Charles, 441
- Philip de Rouvre, Duke of Burgundy, 449, dies, 452
- Philip of Swabia, rival of Otto, 306
- Philippa of Hainault, her character, 396, bears the King a son, John of Ghent, 436, defeats the Scots, 419, the tale of her intercession for the burghers of Calais, 420
- Picquigni, the Baron of, friend to Marcel, 437, rescues Charles of Navarre, 438
- Pilgrimages to the Holy Land, a cause of the Crusades, 217
- Pippin, son of Charles the Great, to have Italy, 232, but dies, ib
- Pippin of Landen, House of, 79, 89, 91, heads the aristocracy against Brunhild, 90, why did it become so famous? 98
- Pippin of Heristal, Mayor, 95,

- wins battle of Testry ib.; uses the monks, 99.
- Pippin the Short, friend of the Bishops, 99, 112 son of Charles Martel, 104; has the Gallic part, ib. has all, on Carloman's abdication, 105 deposes the last Merwing King 109; described, ib. King of Franks, ib. is not easy as to his title, 111; attacks Lombards, 112 a second time, 114 his donations to the Papacy ib. his remaining deeds, ib.
- Pisa, Council of, tries to heal the Great Schism, 494.
- Placita majora, 72
- Plaidan lord of Vezenoble, attacks Boniface, 372
- Plectrude, widow of Pippin of Herstal, 100
- Plutarch quoted, 36
- Poisy Edw. and III crosses the Seine at, 410.
- Poitiers, ceded to Visigoths, 60; battle of 103 battle of (or Blau pertuis), 426 432; taken by Du Guesclin, 464; patent of nobility for 472; Parliament of 509.
- Poitou declares for France and Du Guesclin, 464.
- Pontoise, taken by Charles VII 646
- Popes take titles of Empire, 52
- Pothinus, an Asiatic Priest, at Lyons, 45.
- Prætextatus Abp. of Rouen, murdered by Fredegond, 85
- Pragmatic Sanction of St. Louis, the, 343 of Charles VII 544
- Praguerie, the, 545; at an end, 546.
- Pré-aux-Clercs, at Paris 438.
- Preaching of Charles of Navarre at Paris, 438; of Charles the Dauphin at the Halles, 442
- Præcaria, title of some Church lands, 113, note.
- Priesthood, the, attacked by Provençal heretics, 298.
- Printing first hist. of, 491
- Priscillian, a Spanish heretic, 85; martyred, 86
- Princes of the Lilies, they quarrel, 499.
- Principality of Jerusalem, the, 238
- Probus, drives barbarians over the Rhine, 46
- Proprietors in Gaul, the small, 83.
- Provençals in the first Crusade, suffered less than others, 223.
- Provence, Crusade in, 298; its high civilisation, 200.
- Province, the, 28; its early civilisation, 36 37 more Italian than Italy 39, its learning ib.
- Provost of the Traders, the, at Paris, 412.
- Pulzet, Le, besieged by Louis VI, 253.
- Pullani, the, 229
- Q
- Queen-Regents, the, of France, 286.
- Quercy, revolts from Edward III, 462
- Queenooy Le cannon on the walls of, 403.
- Quèrcs, Sir Hugh French sea captain, 402; beheaded at Sluys, 405.
- R
- Ragnachar King at Cambrai, 72
- Raoul, goldsmith to Philip III ennobled, 349.
- Raoul d'Orléans, marries the Duke of Orleans, 494
- Ravenna falls into Pippin's hands, 113.
- Raymond IV Count of Toulouse takes up the Crusading cause, 215 sets out, 222 wins battle of Antioch, 223 establishes himself at Tripoli, 225 swears never to return to Europe, 226
- Raymond V of Toulouse calls on Philip Augustus for help, 280.
- Raymond VI of Toulouse excommunicated by Innocent III, 301 submits, 302; rises again 303; flees to Aragon, ib.; at Lateran Council, 303 returns successful, 305
- Raymond VII, of Toulouse, makes peace with St. Louis, 321; the hard terms of it, 322; makes a last attempt at independence 326; fails, 37
- Raymond Berenger of Provence marries his daughter to St. Louis, 323.

- Regency of France under Charles VI, 478
- Religious Orders spring from the Crusades, 231
- Remi, friends of Rome, 29
- Remigius, Bp, influences Hlodowig, 65 69, baptizes him, 70
- Renaissance, the, forwarded by fall of Constantinople, 555
- René of Anjou, 547, a poet, 556
- Renard of Boulogne attacks French fleet, 307, stirs up war, 308, a prisoner, 311
- Rheims Cathedral, place of coronation of Pippin the Short, 112, is the coronation place, 274, stands out against Edward III, 449, Charles VI takes the government in his own hands at, 484, Charles VII crowned at, 533
- Rhetoric, the Celtic gift, 39
- Rhine, why the chief cities are on its left bank, 41, Roman settlements on, ib, long regarded as home of the Franks, 75, seat of the Austrasian power, 97, bridged at Mainz by Charles the Great, 122
- Richard, Duke of Normandy 177
- Richard Lionheart, 274, made Duke of Aquitaine, ib, marries Alix, daughter of Louis VII, 280, sleeps in Philip's bed, ib, goes on Crusade, 281, in Sicily, 282, in Palestine, ib, wrecked, prisoner of Leopold of Austria, ib, freed, 283, builds Château Gaillard, ib, dies, 284
- Richard of Cornwall leads opposition to Louis IX, 318
- Richard II of England eager to end the Schism, 488, meets Charles VI on the subject near Calais, ib, makes a 28 years' truce with France, 489, is affianced to Isabelle, daughter of Charles VI, ib
- Richemont, Arthur of, made Constable, 517, Charles VII refuses to be reconciled with him, 532, retires to Brittany, and there resists the English, ib, loyally seconds the national movement, 535, captures La Tremouille, 541, head of the war-party, ib, 542, received by the King, 544, stands by him in the Praguerie, 545, one of the few great men of his age, 556
- Ripuarian Franks, 46, note, 68, Law, 119
- Rivers of France, 5
- Roads, the Domitian, 24, the Augustan, 39
- Robert of Artois, brother of St Louis, 325, is offered the Imperial Crown, ib, takes the cross, 328, killed at battle of Mansourah, 332
- Robert of Artois, cousin of Philippe Bel, 365, perishes at Courtrai, 370
- Robert of Artois, brother-in-law to Philip VI, 393 claims Artois, &c, ib, is banished, and flees to Edward's Court, 394, perishes in a skirmish near Vannes 408
- Robert of Clermont, brother of Philip III, his idiocy, 350
- Robert 'the Devil,' Duke of Normandy, 200, defends and overshadows King Henry, ib, goes on pilgrimage and dies, 202
- Robert Guiscard, Duke of Apulia, 206
- Robert, King of France, crowned, 192, pupil of Gerbert, 194, sole King, 195, his character, 'Debonair,' ib, anecdotes of, 196, in trouble with the Pope, 197, gives up his wife Bertha, ib, marries Constance, ib, her Aquitanians at Paris, 198, his struggles with the Barons, 199, his son Hugh crowned, but dies, ib; Henry, his youngest son by Constance, is crowned, ib, he dies, 200
- Robert, son of King Robert, made Duke of Burgundy, 199
- Robert the Strong, his origin, 169, ancestor of the Capets, ib
- Robert, brother of Odo, Duke of France, 169
- Robert, son of Robert the Strong, defeats Karl the Simple, 175, is made King, 176, killed, ib
- Robert, son of William the Conqueror, Duke of Normandy, 211,

- goes on Crusade, 221; careless of the Crown of England, 225, 226; is defeated by Henry Beauchere, 226
- Rochelle, La, English Kings door way into France, 316; sea fight off, 463 patent of nobility for its officers, 472
- Rodolf of Burgundy the Barons King 176
- Roger de Lacy defends Château Gaillard, 292
- Roger Viscount of Berker 302 cheated and murdered by the Churchmen, 3
- Roger of Loria, a Ghibeline refugee, destroys fleet of Charles of Anjou, 351
- Rohan, a true freebooting captain, 467
- Roland, perishes at Roncesvalles, 227
- Rollo, see Hrolf.
- Roman army full of Gauls, 41 51 Law the, 44, 75 119 tongue, the, 53 157 change in Empire under Diocletian, 50; Law adopted by Phillip le Bel, 354
- Rome deals with Gaul, 20; sacked, 22; confiscates Allobroctan lands, 23; offended with Caesar 34; gives citizenship to the Alauda, 37 10 Gallic chiefs, 40; her altar at Lyons, 28. her Christian missionaries in Gaul, 44, 46 Charles the Great anointed Emperor 129.
- Romulus, last Emperor 62.
- Roncesvalles, disaster of, 127
- Roosebek, battle of, 480.
- Rothfeld, the field of lies, 155.
- Rouen taken by the Danes, 171 seems to be the capital of Henry II 269; improved by him, 2; ceases to be centre of English King's domains, 284. taken by Phillip Augustus, 296. threatened by Edward III 410 Jeanne Darc imprisoned at, 537 tried and burnt there, 538 revolts from the English, 550 its Exchequer Court made sovereign, 553.
- Round Table the Celtic, 11
- royal power the much weakened, 92 strengthened by the Crusades, 223 its growth under Phillip Augustus, 277
- Rudolf III of Arles, 195.
- Rudolf of Hababurg, 348.

S.

- Sabinus defeats Veneti, 30.
- Sacrovir leads Aduans against Rome, 40.
- St. Malo attacked in vain by the English, 466.
- St. Pol, Comt of, at Douvines, 210
- Sainte Chapelle, the built, 324.
- Saintes ceded to Visigoths, 60
- Saintonge, Helvetians propose to settle at, 26
- Saisset, Bp. of Pamiers, describes Phillip le Bel, 354 legate at Phillip's Court, 367 his character 3
- Saladin defeats the Christians, 280; makes treaty with Richard, 292
- Salian Franks, the, 67; the dominant tribe, 72 called Neustrians, 2; occupy North France, 80.
- Salle Law supposed to date from Treaty of Andelot, 88 origin of, 285.
- Salisbury Earl of, attacks the French fleet, 307; at Douvines, 208, 211 a prisoner 2.
- Salisbury Earl of, in Brittany 464; ordered to besiege Orleans, 518; takes the southern suburb, 2; and the Tournelles, 521; is killed by a shot there, 2
- Salyes, a Ligurian tribe 23.
- Samirobriva, Caesar at, 21
- Saracen wars of Charles the Great, 226.
- Satire appears in France 356
- Saxons enter France, 54; attacked by Austrasians, 82; their wars with Charles the Great, 123.
- Scabini under Charles the Great, 239
- Schism of the West, the Great, 474; its origin, and parties, 474. 4 6; Charles VI strives to heal it, 457; suggestions for its abolition, 2; Council of Pisa on it, 494 makes it worse there being now three Popes, 495 partly closed by Council of Constance 492;

- its final hearing after the Council of Basle, 550
- Scholasticism, its use, 164
- Schools in Monasteries, 146
- Scarra Colonna captures Boniface VIII, 373
- Scipio lands at Massilia, 22
- Scotland is to England what Britany is to France, 397, French renounce her alliance, 451, she helps Charles VII, 516
- Scots in France, 516, many perish at Verneuil, ib, cause loss of the 'Day of Herrings,' 521
- Scroop, conspiracy of Lord, 501
- Seljukian Turks, their origin, 218, their power broken at Antioch, 223
- Senatorial families in Gaul, 53
- Senones, the, threaten Rome, 22
- Septimania, 71, why so called, 100, note, under Duke Bernard, 163
- Sequanians, their hams, 20, they call in the Germans, 25
- Serfs in France, 186, their condition lightened by the Crusades, 233, help Louis VI at siege of Le Puset, 253
- Sieilian Vespers, the, 351
- Sidonius, Bp of Clermont, 62
- Sigebert, Ripuarian King, assassinated, 72
- Sigebert, son of Hlotar, King of Austrasia, 84, defeats Neustrians, and is assassinated, 87
- Sigebert, son of Dagobert, is King of Austrasia, 94, a 'roi faineant,' ib
- Sigismund, Emperor elect, 498
- Simon of Montfort, 302, attacks Toulouse, 303, defeats Peter of Aragon, 304, lord of almost all the South, ib, does homage to Philip, 305, killed at siege of Toulouse, 306
- Slavery, Frankish influence on, 57, 78, under Charles the Great, 134
- Slaves in Gaul, 53, 146, their condition, 147
- Sluys, battle of, 404, rendezvous for army and navy against England, 483,
- Somerset, Duke of, defeated at Formigny, 551
- Somme, the river, difficult to cross, 111, Edward III gets over at Blanchic-Laque, ib, stops Henry V, 502, 503, he crosses it near Nesle, 503
- Soriete, place of Carloman's retirement, 105
- Sorbonne, the, created by St Louis, 341
- Sorel, Agnes, 549
- South of France, its intellectual precocity, 300, has inflicted on it a feudal form, 301, falls at last to the French Crown, 322, was and is a land apart, ib, suffers from the Inquisition, ib, at the mercy of the English, 420, 421
- Southampton, sacked by the French, 401
- Southern Gauls hate the Franks, 71
- Spain begins persecution within the Church, 55, Charles the Great in, 126, Louis VI in, 257
- 'Spurs, Day of the,' 370, hung up in Comtrai Cathedral, 371, avenged after Roosebek, ib, 481
- Standing Army in France, its origin, 545, construction, 548, 549, success, 551, 557
- States-General, the, meet in AD 1302, 368, 369, address letters to Boniface VIII, 369, are summoned after Poitiers, 434, their regulations, 436, appoint a Committee of thirty-six, 437, Third Estate all powerful, ib, convoked by Charles the Regent at Compiègne, 444, again, to sanction war with Edward III, 462, are refractory, 480, convoked by the Cabochians, 496, issue the Cabochian Ordinance, 496, 497, accept the Treaty of Troyes, 512
- States of the Langue d'Oil meet at Orleans, 544
- Stephen of Blois goes on Crusade, 221, is chosen King of England, 258, attacks Anjou, 262, recognises Henry of Anjou as his heir, 267, dies, ib
- Stephen III, Pope, flees into Gaul for help, 112, recrowns Pippin the Short, ib

Stewart d'Aubigné serves Charles VII, 549.
 Stilleho, 61
 Succession to the French throne on death of Louis X, 384, 385 on the extinction of the House of Valois, 387-389.
 Suffolk, Duke of, fell at Azincourt, 507
 Suger quoted, 25 his estimate of Louis le Gros, 258 his own character and career 260 supports Louis VII against Innocent II, 262 dislikes Crusades, 263 is Regent of France, 264 his wisdom and success, 266 he retires to the quiet of St. Denis, 26
 Sumptuary Laws of Phillip IV 359.
 Superstitions in Gaul, 248.
 Supreme Pontiff, title of Emperor transferred to Pope, 52
 Swabians, 50.
 Sword, the arbiter of religious disputes, 229
 Syagrius, King of the Romans, 62 68; defeated by Hlodowig, 26 flees to Alaric at Toulouse 26
 Syrians, the, in Jerusalem, 241 242.

T

Tacitus quoted 41
 Taillebourg, battle of 326
 Talbot marches to meet Jeanne Darc, 532 defeated at Patay 26. in Normandy in evil plight, 550; has to evacuate Rouen, 26 perishes at Castillon, 552
 Tancred the Norman goes on Crusade, 222
 Tanneguy Duchâtel murders John the Fearless, 510.
 Tartars (or Turks) attack Eastern Europe, 524.
 Taxation under Phillip le Bel, 358 under Charles V 469
 Templars, at feud with Frederick II 231 at the battle of Mansourah, 332 their origin, 37 their home at Paris, 26; wealth, and character 26; arrested by Phillip le Bel, 378; tortured &c., 26 their dignified defence 379 the execution of them, 26 Clement V promises their dissolution, decreed at the Council of Vienne, 379, 380; the heads of the Order condemned, 26; their curse believed to rest on the lineage of Phillip the Fair, 387

 Tenures of feudalism, 237
 Tertullus the Rustic, ancestor of the Plantagenets, 169
 Testry battle of 92.
 Teutonic France, or Austrasia, 92 97
 Teutonic knights, crushed at Tannenberg, 557
 Teutons, driven South by an earthquake, 24.
 Thegan describes Hlodowig the Pious, 132
 Theobald of Champagne attacks Louis VII 262.
 Theobald VI of Champagne stands aloof from Louis IX 319 joins the Barons League 26; is detached by Blanche 320 becomes King of Navarre, 321
 Theoderic, King of Austrasia, 83; has good ideas, 26
 Theoderic II slain by Brunhild, 80
 Theoderic the Goth resists Etzel 60; defeats him, but perishes at Châlons, 61
 Theoderic the Ostrogoth, in Italy 64 in South Gaul, 71
 Theodinus, Innocent's legate 303.
 Theodorik, son of Hlodowig, 71 King of Metz, 81; dies A.D. 534 83.
 Theodorik II dies, 89.
 Theodorik III, Neustrian King 92
 Theodosian Code, the 66
 Theodosius, Emperor 55; defeats Arbogast, 56.
 Theodulf one of the Missal Dominici, 241
 Thierry of Alsace Count of Flanders, 25
 Thionville assembly at, for settlement of succession to Lorraine 132
 Thorimond, son of Theoderic, made King in the battle of Châlons 61; assassinated, 26.
 Thowars, siege and capitulation of, 464

Thun l'Évêque, French before, hear of the disaster at Sluys, 406
 Tolbiac (Zulpich), battle of, 69
 Tolosa, seized by Volcae Tectosages, 24, retaken by Caepio, ib, seat of Ewank's power, 63, headquarters of the Albigenses, 298, besieged by Simon of Montfort, 303, falls to him by conquest, 305, it revolts, ib, besieged again, 306, the death of Simon relieves it for a time, ib, makes peace with France, 321
 Tournaments, why discouraged at first, and then favoured by Kings, 350.
 Tournay, besieged in vain by Edward III, 406
 Tournelles, the, at Orleans, 521, taken by the English, ib, retaken by Jeanne Darc, 531
 Toxandria, Germans settle in, 46
 Trajan, 44
 Trèves Cathedral, 83
 Treviri, affected a German origin, 26, friendly to Rome, 29, revolt against Rome, 31, seat of Roman government, 54
 Tributary lands in Gaul, 77, 134
 Troussel, Guy, Lord of Montleheri, 251
 Troyes, Treaty of, its terms, 511, besieged by Charles VII, 532, taken by Jeanne Darc, 533
 'Truce of God,' the, 202
 Tunis, St. Louis at, 339, why he steered thither, ib
 Turks (or Tartars), attack Eastern Europe, 324, at the second Council of Lyons, 348
 Tutelage of Charles VI, 478
 Twelve Peers, the, of France, 274, under Philip Augustus, 297
 Tyrants, the, in Gaul, 46

U

Ulfilas, 74
 'Unam Sanctam,' the Decretal, 371
 University of Paris created, 286, its studies, ib, encouraged by Philip Augustus, 315, flourishes under St. Louis, 341, gives its opinion on the Great Schism, 487, clamours for the condemnation of Jeanne Darc, 537

 Urban, Pope, decides on head of the Crusade movement, 213, enters France, ib, holds Council of Clermont, 214, believes in Peter the Hermit, 215, his sermon, 217
 Urban III dies of grief, 281
 Urban V grants indulgence to Du Guesclin, 458, escapes from Avignon, 460, at Rome, 475
 Urban VI gives name to one party in Great Schism, 474, elected Pope, 475, his severity, 476
 Urbanist cause supported by England, 482

V

Valentinian, Emperor, tries to depose Arbogast, 55, assassinates Actus, 62
 Val-es-Dunes, battle of, 203
 Valois, House of, begins to reign, 388, 389, 391
 Vandals, the, 49
 Vauconleurs, Jeanne Darc at, 523
 Veneti, their fleet destroyed by Caesar, 30
 Vercingetorix, his name, 32, note, revolts against Caesar, ib, his end, 34.
 Verdun, treaty of, 157
 Vergy, relieved by Philip Augustus, 279
 Vermandois, the, ceded to France, 279
 Verneuil, taken and burnt by Louis VII, 273, battle of, 516
 Vesontio, (Besançon), seized by Caesar, 29, receives Christianity, 45
 Vexin, the French, given to Robert le Diable, 200, the Norman, ib note
 Vézelay, Louis VII takes the cross at, 263
 Vicariates, the two in Gaul under Diocletian, 51
 Vicars (Viguers), under Charles the Great, 138
 Vierzon, taken by the Black Prince, 426
 Vikings, Norman, term, ib note
 Villains in F

Villeneuves, the, of France, 275.
 Viscount of Jerusalem, the, presided over the Barber Court, 341
 Visigoths, 49 reach the Rhone, 59 make themselves a kingdom in South Gaul, & nominally under the Empire 60 have all Gaul west of Rhone granted them by Julius Nepos, 62 Code of Laws, 66 defeated by Hlodowig 71
 Vitellius wore Gallic dress, 41
 Vitry church, burnt, with hundreds of persons in it, 262
 Voladensian Plain (Vouglé), battle of, 71
 Vocontii, a Rhone tribe, 22.
 Volcae Arecomici, 9 Tectosages, &

W

Wasser Duke of Aquitaine, resists
 Pippin, 114 slain, 124
 Waldenses, the, 299.
 Walla, King of Visigoths, 60.
 Walter the Penniless, 219.
 Walter Tyrrell, did he shoot William Rufus? 225.
 Wandomme, the Bastard of, captures Jeanne Darc, 536.
 Wars of Charles the Great, 123-127
 War of Investitures, crossed by the Crusades, 221 the art of, modified by gunpowder, 248; reformed
 by Charles V 456.
 Weltrea, the Slavonian, attacked by Charles the Great, 130
 Wenilmon, Abp. of Sens, 164.
 Weregild for Bishops and Clergy
 76.
 Wilhelm Courtner, 125; his wise rule in Aquitaine, 151
 William Fier-a-Bru, Duke of Aquitaine, 191 194 dies, 200.
 William the Bastard, 202; his early vigour 203; makes Harold swear to him, 20 proposes to attack England, 26. Henry I refuses to help him, 208 effects of his conquest, &, 209; attacks Mabe, and makes peace with Phillip I, 211 dies, &.

William the Breton, Chaplain of Phillip Augustus, at Bouvines, 310.
 William Clito, the Norman, 258 made Count of Flanders, 257;
 ejected, killed, &.
 William Rufus, King of England
 211 attacks Normandy 225 claims the French Vexin, &;
 killed, &.
 William of Tyre reckons the numbers of Crusaders, 222
 William the Carpenter 223.
 William IX of Aquitaine goes on Crusade, 227; stirs up strife in Auvergne, 256 offers his daughter
 Eleanor for Louis the Young 258 dies on pilgrimage &.

William, Abp. of Tyre, 281

William of Julliers leads the Flemish against the French at Courtrai, 370

Winchester the Cardinal of, comes over to Paris with help and Henry VI 524; arranges the trial of Jeanne Darc, 537 pulls the strings, 538 at the Congress of Arras, 542.

Winfrith (or St. Boniface) 100.

Wool, medieval importance of its trade, 296.

Worms, one seat of the Austrasian
 Monarchy 97

Y

Yeomen, the English, 398; at Crécy
 418

Yolande of Aragon, supports Jeanne Darc, 524

York, Duke of, fell at Aincourt, 507

Z

Zachary Pope his reply to Pippin, 109.

Zulpich (Tolbiac) battle of, 69.

CLARENDON PRESS, OXFORD.

Books lately Published.

A Primer of French Literature. By George
Saintsbury Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 2s

---

Brachet's Historical Grammar of the French Language Translated into English by G W Kitchin, M.A. Fourth
Edition Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 3s 6d

---

An Etymological Dictionary of the French Language, with a Preface on the Principles of French Etymology By A Brachet Translated by G W Kitchin, M.A. Second Edition.
Crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s 6d

---

French Classics, edited by GUSTAVE MASSON, B.A., Univ Gallie.,
Assistant Master in Harrow School.

Corneille's Cinna, and Molière's Les Femmes
Savantes Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 2s 6d

---

Racine's Andromaque, and Corneille's Le Menteur With Louis Racine's Life of his Father Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 2s 6d.

---

Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin, and Racine's Athalie. With Voltaire's Life of Molière Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 2s 6d.

---

Selections from the Correspondence of Madame de Sevigné and her chief Contemporaries Intended more especially for Girls' Schools Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 3s

---

Voyage autour de ma Chambre, by Xavier de Maistre; Ourika, by Madame de Duras, La Dot de Suzanne, by Les Jumeaux de l'Hôtel Corneille, by Edmond de La Roche-Beaucourt d'un Ecolier, by Rodolphe Topffer Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 2s 6d.

---

Regnard's Le Joueur, and Brueys and Palaprat's
Le Grandeur Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 2s 6d.

---

Louis XIV and his Contemporaries. Selections from the Memoirs of the Cardinal of Montpensier, Madame de Motteville, and others. With geographical Notices, Notes, Historical Ext fcap 8vo, cloth, price 2s 6d.

CLARENDON PRESS, OXFORD

Books lately Published.

The Constitutional History of England in its Origin and Development. By WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D. Regius Professor of Modern History Oxford. Library Edition. Three vols. demy 8vo., cloth, 2l. 8s

Also in 3 vols. crown 8vo., price 12s. each.

Select Charters and other Illustrations of English Constitutional History from the Earliest Times to the Reign of Edward I. Arranged and Edited by W. Stubbs, D.D. Fourth Edition 1831 Crown 8vo., cloth, 8s 6d.

A Short History of the Norman Conquest of England. By E. A. Freeman, M.A. Ext. fcap 8vo., cloth, 2s 6d.

A History of England principally in the Seventeenth Century. By Leopold Von Ranke. Translated by Resident Members of the University of Oxford under the superintendence of G. W. Kitchin, M.A., and C. W. Doase, M.A. 1875 6 vols. 8vo., cloth, 3l. 3s

Genealogical Tables, illustrative of Modern History. By H. B. George, M.A. Second Edition Small 4to., cloth 12s

A History of the United States of America. By E. J. Payne, M.A., Barrister-at Law and Fellow of University College Oxford. In the Press.

A History of Greece from its Conquest by the Romans to the present time, B.C. 146 to A.D. 1864. By George Finlay LL.D. A new Edition. Edited by H. F. Tozer M.A. 7 vols. 8vo. cloth, 3l. 13s

A Manual of Ancient History. By George Rawlinson, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History formerly Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. Second Edition Demy 8vo., cloth, 14s

Italy and her Invaders, A.D. 376-476. By T. Hodgkin, B.A., Fellow of University College London. Illustrated with Plates and Maps. 2 vols. 8vo., cloth, 1l. 12s

LONDON HENRY FROWDE,

Oxford Bible Warehouse 7 Paternoster Row

Clarendon Press, Oxford

A SELECTION OF

BOOKS

PUBLISHED FOR THE UNIVERSITY BY

HENRY FROWDE,

AT THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE,
AMEN CORNER, LONDON

ALSO TO BE HAD AT THE CLARENDON PRESS DEPOSITORY, OXFORD

[Every book is bound in cloth, unless otherwise described.]

---

LEXICONS, GRAMMARS, ORIENTAL WORKS, &c

ANGLO-SAXON — An Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, based on the MS Collections of the late Joseph Bosworth, D D, Professor of Anglo-Saxon, Oxford Edited and enlarged by Prof T N Toller, M A (To be completed in four parts) Parts I and II A—HWISTLIAN 4to 15s each

CHINESE — A Handbook of the Chinese Language By James Summers 1863 8vo half bound, 1l 8s

— A Record of Buddhist Kingdoms, by the Chinese Monk FÂ-HIEN Translated and annotated by James Legge, M A, LL D. Crown 4to cloth back, 10s 6d

ENGLISH — A New English Dictionary, on Historical Principles founded mainly on the materials collected by the Philological Society Edited by James A H Murray, LL D, with the assistance of many Scholars and men of Science Part I A—ANT Part II ANT—BATTEN Imperial 4to 12s 6d each

— An Etymological Dictionary of the English Language. By W W Skeat, M A Second Edition 1884. 4to 2l 4s

— Supplement to the First Edition of the above 4to 2s 6d

— A Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language By W W Skeat, M A Second Edition 1885 Crown 8vo 5s 6d

- GREEK.—A Greek English Lexicon, by Henry George Liddell, D.D., and Robert Scott, D.D. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout. 1893. 4to 11 16s
- A Greek English Lexicon abridged from Liddell and Scott's 4to edition, chiefly for the use of Schools. Twenty first Edition. 1884. Square 12mo 7s 6d
- A copious Greek-English Vocabulary compiled from the best authorities. 1800 24mo 3s
- A Practical Introduction to Greek Accentuation by H W Chandler M.A. Second Edition 1881 8vo. 10s 6d
- HEBREW.—The Book of Hebrew Roots by Abu I Walid Marwān Ibn Janāh, otherwise called Rabbi Yōsēf. Now first edited with an Appendix by Ad. Neubauer 1876 4to. 2l 7s 6d
- A Treatise on the use of the Tenses in Hebrew By S. R. Driver D.D. Second Edition. 1881 Extra fcap 8vo 1s 6d
- Hebrew Accentuation of Psalms, Proverbs and Job By William Wickes, D.D. 1881 Demy 8vo. stiff covers, 6s
- ICELANDIC.—An Icelandic English Dictionary based on the MS. collections of the late Richard Cleasby. Enlarged and completed by G Vigfósson, M.A. With an Introduction, and Life of Richard Cleasby by G Webbe Dasent, D.C.L. 1874 4to. 2l 7s
- A List of English Words the Etymology of which is illustrated by comparison with Icelandic. Prepared in the form of an APPENDIX to the above. By W W Sleat M.A. 1876 stitched, 2s
- An Icelandic Primer with Grammar Notes, and Glossary. By Henry Sweet, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s 6d
- An Icelandic Prose Reader, with Notes Grammar and Glossary by Dr Gudbrand Vigfósson and F York Powell, M.A. 1890 Extra fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d
- LATIN.—A Latin Dictionary founded on Andrews edition of Freund's Latin Dictionary revised enlarged and in great part rewritten by Charlton T Lewis, Ph.D. and Charles Short LL.D. 1879 4to 11 2s
- MELANESIAN.—The Melanesian Languages By R H Codrington, D.D., of the Melanesian Mission. 8vo. 19s
- SANSKRIT.—A Practical Grammar of the Sanskrit Language, arranged with reference to the Classical Languages of Europe for the use of English Students, by Sir M Monier Williams M.A. Fourth Edition. 8v 12
- A Sanskrit English Dictionary Etymologically and Philologically arranged with special reference to Greek Latin German Anglo-Saxon, English and other cognate Indo-European Languages. By M Monier Williams M.A. 1873 4to 4l 14s 6d

- SANSKRIT.—Nalopákhyaṇam. Story of Nala and an Episode of the Mahá-Bhárata the Sanskrit text, with a copious Vocabulary, and an improved version of Dean Milman's Translation, by Sir M Monier-Williams, M A Second Edition, Revised and Improved 1879 8vo 15s
- Sakuntalā A Sanskrit Drama, in Seven Acts. Edited by Sir M Monier-Williams, M A Second Edition, 1876 8vo 21s
- SYRIAC — Thesaurus Syriacus collegerunt Quatremère, Bernstein, Lorsbach Arnoldi Agrell, Field, Roediger edidit R Payne Smith. STP Fasc I-VI 1868-83 sm fol each, 1l 1s Fasc VII 1l 11s 6d.
Vol I, containing Fasc I-V, sm fol 5l 5s
- The Book of Kalīlah and Dimnah Translated from Arabic into Syriac Edited by W Wright, LL D 1884 8vo 21s

GREEK CLASSICS, &amp;c

- Aristophanes* A Complete Concordance to the Comedies and Fragments By Henry Dunbar, M D 4to 1l 1s
- Aristotle* The Politics, with Introduction, Notes, etc., by W L Newman M A, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford Vols I and II Nearly ready
- Aristotle* The Politics, translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indices, by B Jowett, M A Medium 8vo 2 vols 21s
- Catalogus Codicum Graecorum Sinaiticorum* Scripsit V Gardthausen Lipsiensis With six pages of Facsimiles 8vo linen, 25s
- Heraciti Ephesi Reliquiae* Recensuit I Bywater, M A Appendicis loco additae sunt Diogenis Laerti Vita Heracliti, Particulae Hippocrati De Diaeta Libri Primi, Epistolae Heracliteae 1877 8vo 6s
- Herculanensium Voluminum Partes II* 1824. 8vo 10s
- Fragmenta Herculanensia* A Descriptive Catalogue of the Oxford copies of the Herculanean Rolls, together with the texts of several papyri, accompanied by facsimiles Edited by Walter Scott, M A, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford Royal 8vo cloth, 21s
- Homer* A Complete Concordance to the Odyssey and Hymns of Homer, to which is added a Concordance to the Parallel Passages in the Iliad, Odyssey, and Hymns By Henry Dunbar, M D 1880 4to 1l 1s
- Scholia Graeca in Iliadem Edited by Professor W. Dindorf, after a new collation of the Venetian MSS by D B Monro, M A, Provost of Oriel College 4 vols 8vo 2l 10s Vols V and VI In the Press
- Scholia Graeca in Odysseam Edidit Guil Dindorfius. Tomi II 1855. 8vo 15s 6d

- Plato Apology* with a revised Text and English Notes and a Digest of Platonic Idioms, by James Riddell, M.A. 1878 8vo 8s 6d
- Philebus, with a revised Text and English Notes, by Edward Poste, M.A. 1860 8vo. 7s 6d
- Sophistes and Politicus, with a revised Text and English Notes, by L. Campbell, M.A. 1867 8vo. 18s
- Theaetetus with a revised Text and English Notes by L. Campbell, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo 10s 6d
- The Dialogues, translated into English, with Analyses and Introductions, by B. Jowett, M.A. A new Edition in 5 volumes, medium 8vo 1875 3l 10s
- The Republic translated into English with an Analysis and Introduction, by B. Jowett, M.A. Medium 8vo 12s 6d
- Thucydides* Translated into English with Introduction Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indexes. By B. Jowett M.A. 2 vols. 1881 Medium 8vo. 1l. 12s

THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, &c.

STUDIA BIBLICA —Essays in Biblical Archaeology and Criticism and kindred subjects. By Members of the University of Oxford. 8vo 10s 6d

ENGLISH —The Holy Bible in the earliest English Versions made from the Latin Vulgate by John Wycliffe and his followers edited by the Rev J Forshall and Sir F Madden 4 vols 1850. Royal 4to 1l 3s

[Also reprinted from the above with Introduction and Glossary by W W Skeat M.A.

— The Books of Job Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon according to the Wycliffite Version made by Nicholas de Hereford, about A.D. 1381 and Revised by John Purvey about A.D. 1399 Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d

— The New Testament in English according to the Version by John Wycliffe about A.D. 1380, and Revised by John Purvey about A.D. 1398 Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s]

ENGLISH — The Holy Bible: an exact reprint, page for page, of the Authorised Version published in the year 1611. Demy 4to. half bound, 1l 1s

— The Psalter, or Psalms of David, and certain Canticles, with a Translation and Exposition in English, by Richard Rolle of Hampole Edited by H R Bramley, M A, Fellow of S M Magdalen College, Oxford With an Introduction and Glossary Demy 8vo 1l 1s

— Lectures on Ecclesiastes Delivered in Westminster Abbey by the Very Rev George Granville Bradley, D D, Dean of Westminster Crown 8vo 4s 6d

GOTHIC — The Gospel of St. Mark in Gothic, according to the translation made by Wulfila in the Fourth Century Edited with a Grammatical Introduction and Glossarial Index by W W. Skeat, M A Extra fcap 8vo 4s

GREEK.— Vetus Testamentum ex Versione Septuaginta Interpretum secundum exemplar Vaticanum Romae editum Accedit potior varietas Codicis Alexandrini Tomi III Editio Altera 18mo 18s

— Origenis Hexaplorum quae supersunt, sive, Veterum Interpretum Graecorum in totum Vetus Testamentum Fragmenta Edidit Fridericus Field, A.M 2 vols 1875 4to 5l 5s

— The Book of Wisdom the Greek Text, the Latin Vulgate, and the Authorised English Version, with an Introduction, Critical Apparatus, and a Commentary By William J Deane. M A Small 4to 12s 6d

— Novum Testamentum Graece. Antiquissimorum Codicum Textus in ordine parallelo dispositi Accedit collatio Codicis Sinaitici Edidit E H Hansell, S T B Tomi III 1864 8vo half morocco Price reduced to 24s

— Novum Testamentum Graece Accedunt parallela S Scripturae loca, etc Edidit Carolus Lloyd, S T P R 18mo 3s

On writing paper, with wide margin, 10s

— Novum Testamentum Graece juxta Exemplar Millianum 18mo 2s 6d On writing paper, with wide margin, 9s

— Evangelia Sacra Graece. Fcap 8vo. limp, 1s. 6d

— The Greek Testament, with the Readings adopted by the Revisers of the Authorised Version —

(1) Pica type, with Marginal References Demy 8vo. 10s 6d

(2) Long Primer type Fcap 8vo 4s 6d

(3) The same, on writing paper, with wide margin, 15s

— The Parallel New Testament, Greek and English, being the Authorised Version, 1611, the Revised Version, 1881, and the Greek Text followed in the Revised Version 8vo 12s 5d

The Revised Version is the joint property of the Unio

bridge

GREEK — Canon Muratorianus the earliest Catalogue of the Books of the New Testament. Edited with Notes and a Facsimile of the MS. in the Ambrosian Library at Milan by S P Tregelles LL.D. 1864 to 1867

— Outlines of Textual Criticism applied to the New Testament By C. E. Hammond M.A. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo 3s 6d

HEBREW etc. — The Psalms in Hebrew without points 1879 Crown 8vo 3s 6d.

— A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs Attributed to Abraham Ibn Ezra. Edited from a MS. in the Bodleian Library by S. R. Driver M.A. Crown 8vo paper covers, 3s 6d

— The Book of Tobit A Chaldee Text from a unique MS. in the Bodleian Library with other Rabbinical Texts. English Translations, and the Itala. Edited by Ad. Neubauer M.A. 1858. Crown 8vo 6s

— Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae a J Lightfoot A new Edition, by R. Candell M.A. 4 vol 1839 8vo. 11 1s

LATIN — Libri Psalmorum Versio antiqua Latina cum Para- phrasi Anglo-Saxonica Edidit B. Thorpe F.R.S. 1835 8vo 10s 6d

— Old Latin Biblical Texts No I The Gospel according to St Matthew from the St Germain MS (g). Edited with Introduction and Appendices by John Wordsworth, D.D. Small 4to., stiff covers, 6s

— Old Latin Biblical Texts No II Portions of the Gospels according to St. Mark and St. Matthew from the Bobbio MS. (k). &c. Edited by John Wordsworth D.D., W. Sanday M.A., D.D., and H. J. White M.A. Small 4to. stiff covers, 2s

OLD-FRENCH — Libri Psalmorum Versio antiqua Gallica e Cod MS in Bibl. Bodleiana adseruata, una cum Versione Metrica aliisque Monumentis peruetusti Nunc primum excipit et edidit Franciscus Michel Phil. Doc. 1860 8vo. 10s 6d

FATHERS OF THE CHURCH, &c

St Athanasius Historical Writings according to the Benedictine Text. With an Introduction by William Bright D.D. 1881 Crown 8vo. 10s 6d

— Orations against the Arians With an Account of his Life by William Bright D.D. 1853 Crown 8vo 9s

St Augustine Select Anti-Pelagian Treatises and the Acts of the Second Council of Orange With an Introduction by William Bright D.D. Crown 8vo. 9s

Canons of the First Four General Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon 1877 Crown 8vo 2s 6d

— Notes on the Canons of the First Four General Councils
By William Bright, D D 1882 Crown 8vo 5s 6d

Cyilli Archiepiscopi Alexandrini in XII Prophetas Edidit
P E Pusey, A M Tomi II 1868 8vo cloth, 2l 2s

— in D Joannis Evangelium Accedunt Fragmenta varia necnon Tractatus ad Tiberium Diaconum duo Edidit post Aubertum
P E Pusey, A M Tomi III 1872 8vo 2l 5s

— Commentarii in Lucae Evangelium quae supersunt Syriace E MSS apud Mus Britan edidit R Payne Smith, A M 1858 4to 1l 2s

— Translated by R Payne Smith, M A 2 vols 1859.
8vo 14s

Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae Episcopi Edesseni, Balaei, aliorumque Opera Selecta E Codd Syriacis MSS in Museo-Britanico et Bibliotheca Bodleiana asservatis primus edidit J J Overbeck 1865 8vo 1l 1s

Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, according to the text of Burton, with an Introduction by William Bright, D D. 1881 Crown 8vo 8s 6d

Irenaeus' The Third Book of St Irenaeus Bishop of Lyons, against Heresies With short Notes and a Glossary by H Deane, B D 1874 Crown 8vo 5s 6d

Patrum Apostolicorum, S Clementis Romani, S Ignatii, S Polycarpi, quae supersunt Edidit Guil. Jacobson, S T P R Tomi II Fourth Edition, 1863 8vo 1l 1s

Socrates' Ecclesiastical History according to the Text of Hussey, with an Introduction by William Bright, D D. 1878 Crown 8vo 7s 6d

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY. &c.

Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, according to the uses of Sarum, York, Hereford, and Exeter, and the Roman Liturgy, in parallel columns, with preface and notes By William Bright Third Edition 1882 8vo 12s.

Baedae Historia Ecclesiastica. Edited, with English Notes by G H Moberly, M.A. 1871. Crown 8vo 10s 6d

- Bright (W)* Chapters of Early English Church History
1878 8vo 12s
- Burnet's History of the Reformation of the Church of England*
A new Edition Carefully revised, and the Records collated with the originals, by N Pocock, M.A. 7 vols 1865 8vo Price reduced to 1l. 10s
- Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain* and Ireland. Edited after Spelman and Wilkins, by A. W. Haddan, B.D. and W. Stubbs, M.A. Vols. I. and III. 1869-71 Medium 8vo. each 1l 1s
Vol. II. Part I. 1873 Medium 8vo 10s 6d
Vol. II. Part II. 1878 Church of Ireland Memorials of St Patrick.
Stiff covers, 3s 6d
- Hamilton (John, Archbishop of St Andrews)* The Catechism of Edited, with Introduction and Glossary by Thomas Graves Law With a Preface by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. 8vo. 12s 6d.
- Hammond (C E)* Liturgies Eastern and Western Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Liturgical Glossary 1878. Crown 8vo 10s 6d
An Appendix to the above 1879 Crown 8vo. paper covers. 1s 6d.
- John Bishop of Ephesus* The Third Part of his Eccle- siastical History [In Syriac.] Now first edited by William Cureton, M.A.
1853 4to. 1l 12s
- Translated by R. Payne Smith M.A. 1860 8vo 10s
- Leofric Missal* The, as used in the Cathedral of Exeter during the Episcopate of its first Bishop, A.D. 1050-1072 together with some Account of the Red Book of Derby the Missal of Robert of Jumèges, and a few other early MS. Service Books of the English Church. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by F. E. Warren B.D. 4to. half morocco 3s
- Monumenta Rituali Ecclesiae Anglicanae* The occasional Offices of the Church of England according to the old use of Salisbury the Prymer in English, and other prayers and forms, with dissertations and notes.
By William Maskell M.A. Second Edition. 1853 3 vols. 8vo 2l. 10s
- Records of the Reformation* The Divorce 1527-1533 Mostly now for the first time printed from MSS. in the British Museum and other libraries. Collected and arranged by N Pocock M.A. 1870. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l 16s
- Shirley (W W)*. Some Account of the Church in the Apostolic Age Second Edition, 1874 Fcap. 8vo 3s 6d
- Stubbs (W)*. Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum An attempt to exhibit the course of Episcopal Succession in England 1829 Small 4to 8s 6d
- Warren (F E)* Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church
1891 8vo 14s

ENGLISH THEOLOGY.

Bampton Lectures, 1886. The Christian Platonists of Alexandria By Charles Bigg, D D 8vo 10s 6d

Butler's Works, with an Index to the Analogy. 2 vols 1874.
8vo 11s

Also separately,

Sermons, 5s. 6d. Analogy of Religion, 5s. 6d.

Griswells Harmonia Evangelica Fifth Edition. 8vo. 1855
9s 6d

Heurley's Harmonia Symbolica. Creeds of the Western Church 1858 8vo 6s 6d

Honouries appointed to be read in Churches. Edited by J Griffiths, M A 1859 8vo 7s 6d

Hooker's Works, with his life by Walton, arranged by John Keble, M.A. Sixth Edition, 1874 3 vols 8vo 1l. 11s 6d

— the text as arranged by John Keble, M.A 2 vols
1875 8vo 11s

Fewell's Works Edited by R W Jelf, D D 8 vols. 1848.
8vo 1l 10s

Pearson's Exposition of the Creed. Revised and corrected by E Burton, D D Sixth Edition, 1877 8vo 10s 6d

Waterland's Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist, with a Preface by the late Bishop of London Crown 8vo 6s 6d — Works, with Life, by Bp Van Mildert. A new Edition, with copious Indexes 6 vols 1856 8vo 2l 11s

Wheatly's Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer A new Edition, 1846 8vo 5s

Wyclif A Catalogue of the Original Works of John Wyclif, by W W Shirley, D D 1865 8vo 3s 6d

— Select English Works By T. Arnold, M A. 3 vols. 1869-1871 8vo 1l 1s

— Dialogus. With the Supplement now first edited. By Gotthard Lechler. 1869. 8vo 7s

HISTORICAL AND DOCUMENTARY WORKS

- British Barrows* a Record of the Examination of Sepulchral Mounds in various parts of England. By William Greenwell, M.A., F.S.A. Together with Description of Figures of Skulls, General Remarks on Pre-historic Crania, and an Appendix by George Rolleston M.D., F.R.S. 187-
Medium 8vo 25s
- Britton A Treatise upon the Common Law of England* composed by order of King Edward I. The French Text carefully revised with an English Translation Introduction, and Notes by F. M. Nichols, M.A.
2 vols. 1865 Royal 8vo 11 16s
- Clarendon's History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England* 7 vols. 1833 18mo 11 1s
- Clarendon's History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England* Also his Life, written by himself in which is included a Continuation of his History of the Grand Rebellion With copious indexes. In one volume royal 8vo 1843 12 2s
- Clinton's Epitome of the Fasti Hellenici* 1853 8vo 6s 6d
- Epitome of the Fasti Romani 1854. 8vo 7s
- Corpus Poeticum Boreale* The Poetry of the Old Northern Tongue, from the Earliest Times to the Thirteenth Century Edited classified and translated with Introduction Excursus, and Notes, by Gudbrand Vigfusson M.A., and F. York Powell M.A. 3 vols. 1893 8vo 42s
- Freeman (E. A.) History of the Norman Conquest of England* its Causes and Results. In Six Volumes 8vo 8l 9s 6d
- The Reign of William Rufus and the Accession of Henry the First 2 vols. 8vo 11 16s
- Gascoigne's Theological Dictionary* ("Liber Veritatum") Selected Passages, illustrating the condition of Church and State 14 3 14<sup>ss</sup> With an Introduction by James E. Thorold Rogers, M.A. Small 4<sup>o</sup> 10s 6d
- Magna Carta* a careful Reprint Edited by W. Stubbs, D.D. 18,9 4to stitched 1s
- Passio et Miracula Beati Olani* Edited from a Twelfth Century MS in the Library of Corpus Christi College Oxford, with an Introduction and Notes, by Frederick Metcalfe M.A. Small 4<sup>to</sup> 1s covers. 6s

MATHEMATICS, PHYSICAL SCIENCE, &c

- Acland (H W, M.D., F.R.S)* Synopsis of the Pathological Series in the Oxford Museum. 1867 8vo 2s 6d
- De Bary (Dr A)* Comparative Anatomy of the Vegetative Organs of the Phanerogams and Ferns Translated and Annotated by F O Bower M.A., F.L.S., and D H. Scott, M.A., Ph.D. F.L.S. With 241 woodcuts and an Index Royal 8vo., half morocco 1l 2s 6d
- Outlines of Classification and Special Morphology of Plants* A New Edition of Sachs Text Book of Botany Book II. English Translation by H E. F. Garnsey M.A. Revised by L. Bayley Balfour M.A., M.D., F.R.S. With 407 Woodcuts. Royal 8vo. half Morocco, 21s
- Müller (F)* On certain Variations in the Vocal Organs of the Passeres that have hitherto escaped notice Translated by F J Bell, B.A., and edited, with an Appendix, by A. H. Garrod M.A., F.R.S. With Plates. 1878 4to paper covers 7s 6d
- Price (Bartholomew, M.A. F.R.S)* Treatise on Infinitesimal Calculus
 Vol. I. Differential Calculus. Second Edition. 8vo. 14s 6d.
 Vol. II. Integral Calculus, Calculus of Variations, and Differential Equations. Second Edition 1865 8vo 18s
 Vol. III. Statics, including Attractions Dynamics of a Material Particle Second Edition, 1863 8vo 16s
 Vol. IV Dynamics of Material Systems together with a chapter on Theoretical Dynamics by W F Donkin. M.A., F.R.S 1862 8vo 16s
- Pritchard (C., D.D. F.R.S)* Uranometria Nova Oxoniensis
 A Photometric determination of the magnitudes of all Stars visible to the naked eye from the Pole to ten degrees south of the Equator 1884. Royal 8vo. 8s. 6d.
 — Astronomical Observations made at the University Observatory Oxford, under the direction of C. Pritchard, D.D. No. 1 1878 Royal 8vo paper covers. 3s 6d
- Rigaud's Correspondence of Scientific Men of the 17th Century* with Table of Contents by A. de Morgan, and Index by the Rev J Rigaud M.A. 2 vols. 1841-1862 8vo 18s 6d
- Rolleston (George, M.D. F.R.S)* Scientific Papers and Addresses. Arranged and Edited by William Turner M.B., F.R.S. With a Biographical Sketch by Edward Tylor F.R.S. With Portrait, Plates, and Woodcuts. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l 4s
- Westwood (J O., M.A., F.R.S)* Thesaurus Entomologicus Hybricus or a Description of the rarest Insecta in the Collection given to the University by the Rev William Hope With 40 Plates. 1<sup>o</sup> 4 Small folio half morocco 1 10s

The Sacred Books of the East.

TRANSLATED BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS, AND EDITED BY F MAX MULLER

[Demy 8vo cloth ]

- Vol I The Upanishads Translated by F Max Muller.
Part I The Khândogya-upanishad, The Talavakâra-upanishad, The Aitareya-âraṇyaka, The Kaushîtaki-brâhmana-upanishad, and The Vâgasaneyi-saṃhitâ-upanishad 10s 6d
- Vol II The Sacred Laws of the Âryas, as taught in the Schools of Âpastamba, Gautama, Vâsishtha, and Baudhânyana Translated by Prof Georg Buhler Part I Âpastamba and Gautama 10s 6d
- Vol. III The Sacred Books of China The Texts of Confucianism Translated by James Legge Part I The Shû King, The Religious portions of the Shû King, and The Hsiâo King 12s 6d
- Vol. IV. The Zend-Avesta Translated by James Darmesteter Part I The Vendîdâd 10s 6d
- Vol V. The Pahlavi Texts Translated by E W. West. Part I The Bundahis, Bahman Yast, and Shâyast lâ shâyast 12s 6d
- Vols VI and IX The Qur'ân Parts I and II. Translated by E H Palmer 21s
- Vol VII. The Institutes of Vishnu Translated by Julius Jolly 10s 6d
- Vol VIII The Bhagavadgîtâ, with The Sanatsugâtîya, and The Anugîtâ Translated by Kâshnâth Trimbak Telang 10s 6d
- Vol. X The Dhammapada, translated from Pâli by F. Max Muller, and The Sutta-Nipâta, translated from Pâli by V Fausboll, being Canonical Books of the Buddhists 10s 6d
- Vol XI. Buddhist Suttas. Translated from Pâli by T. W Rhys Davids 1 The Mahâparinibbâṇa Suttanta, 2 The Dhamma-kakkappavattana Sutta, 3 The Tevigga Suttanta, 4 The Akankheyya Sutta, 5 The Ketokhila Sutta, 6 The Mahâ sudassana Suttanta, 7 The Sabbâsava Sutta 10s 6d

- Vol XII The Satapatha Brāhmana according to the Text of the Mādhyandina School. Translated by Julius Eggeling Part I Books I and II 12s 6d.
- Vol XIII Vinaya Texts Translated from the Pāli by T W Rhys Davids and Hermann Oldenberg Part I. The Pātimokkha. The Mahāvagga, I-IV 10s 6d
- Vol XIV The Sacred Laws of the Āryas as taught in the Schools of Apastamba, Gautama Vāśiṣṭha and Bandhāyana Translated by Georg Bühler Part II Vāśiṣṭha and Bandhāyana. 10s 6d.
- Vol XV The Upanishads Translated by F Max Müller Part II. The Kaṭaka-upanishad, The Muṣṣaka upanishad, The Taittirīyaka upanishad, The Iśāhadāraṇyaka upanishad The Svetasvatara-upanishad The Prāśna-upanishad and The Maitrayana Brāhmana-upanishad. 10s 6d
- Vol XVI The Sacred Books of China. The Texts of Confucianism. Translated by James Legge Part II The Yi king 10s 6d
- Vol XVII Vinaya Texts Translated from the Pāli by T W Rhys Davids and Hermann Oldenberg Part II The Mahāvagga V-X The Aṅgavagga, I III. 10s 6d
- Vol XVIII Pahlavi Texts. Translated by E W West Part II The Dāstūrīn i Dīnāk and The Epistles of Mānūšihār 12s 6d
- Vol XIX The Fo-sho-hing tsan king A Life of Buddha by Asvaghosha Bodhisattva, translated from Sanskrit into Chinese by Dharmakīrti, A.D. 420, and from Chinese into English by Samuel Beal 10s 6d
- Vol XX Vinaya Texts Translated from the Pāli by T W Rhys Davids and Hermann Oldenberg Part III. The Aṅgavagga, IV XII 10s 6d
- Vol XXI The Saddharma puṇḍarīka or the Lotus of the True Law Translated by H Kern. 12s 6d
- Vol XXII Gāyā Sūtras. Translated from Prākṛit by Hermann Jacobi. Part I. The Āśīrāḍya-Sūtra. The Kalpa-Sūtra. 10s 6d
- Vol XXIII The Zend Avesta. Translated by James Darmesteter Part II. The Sraoshs Yasts, and Nyāy 10s 6d
- Vol XXIV Pahlavi Texts Translated by F W West Part III. Dīn i Mānōg-i Kīrad Sīkand gūmānk and Sat Dīn 10s 6d

Second Series.

Vol XXV. Manu. Translated by Georg Buhler 21s.

Vol XXVI. The Satapatha-Brahmana. Translated by Julius Eggeling Part II 12s 6d

Vols XXVII and XXVIII The Sacred Books of China
The Texts of Confucianism Translated by James Legge Parts III and IV
The Li Ki, or Collection of Treatises on the Rules of Propriety, or Ceremonial
Usages 25s

Vols. XXIX and XXX The Gṛhya-Sūtras, Rules of Vedic
Domestic Ceremonies Translated by Hermann Oldenberg

Part I (Vol XXIX), 12s 6d Just Published

Part II (Vol XXX) In the Press

The following Volumes are in the Press —

Vol XXXI The Zend-Avesta Part III The Yasna, Visparid, Âfrinagân, and Gâhs Translated by the Rev L H Mills

Vol XXXII Vedic Hymns Translated by F Max Muller Part I

Vol XXXIII Nârada, and some Minor Law-books.
Translated by Julius Jolly [Preparing]

Vol XXXIV The Vedânta-Sūtras, with Sankara's Commentary Translated by G Thibaut [Preparing]

* * * The Second Series will consist of Twenty-Four Volumes.

Clarendon Press Series

I ENGLISH, &c.

- A First Reading Book* By Marie Eichens of Berlin, and edited by Anne J Clough. Extra fcap. 8vo. stiff covers, 4d
- Oxford Reading Book, Part I* For Little Children Extra fcap. 8vo stiff covers, 6d.
- Oxford Reading Book Part II* For Junior Classes. Extra fcap. 8vo. stiff covers, 6d
- An Elementary English Grammar and Exercise Book* By O W Tancock, M.A. Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 1s 6d
- An English Grammar and Reading Book, for Lower Forms in Classical Schools.* By O W Tancock, M.A. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s 6d
- Typical Selections from the best English Writers* with Introductory Notices. Second Edition. In 2 vols. Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d each.
Vol. I Latimer to Berkeley Vol. II Pope to Macaulay
- Sharp (F C., LL D) Aspects of Poetry* being Lectures delivered at Oxford. Crown 8vo 10s 6d

- A Book for the Beginner in Anglo-Saxon* By John Earle M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap 8vo. 2s 6d
- An Anglo-Saxon Reader* In Prose and Verse With Grammatical Introduction, Notes, and Glossary By Henry Sweet. M.A Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged Extra fcap. 8vo. 8s 6d
- A Second Anglo Saxon Reader* By the same Author Extra fcap. 8vo. Nearly ready
- An Anglo-Saxon Primer with Grammar, Notes and Glossary* By the same Author Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d
- Old English Reading Primers* edited by Henry Sweet M.A
I Selected Homilies of Ælfric Extra fcap 8vo., stiff covers, 1s 6d
II Extracts from Alfred's Orosius. Extra fcap 8vo., stiff covers 1s 6d
- First Middle English Primer with Grammar and Glossary* By the same Author Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s
- Second Middle English Primer* Extracts from Chaucer with Grammar and Glossary By the same Author Extra fcap 8vo. 2s
Just Published
- Principles of English Etymology* First Series. By W W Skeat, Litt.D Crown 8vo. Nearly ready

- The Philology of the English Tongue.* By J Earle, M A Third Edition Extra fcap 8vo 7s 6d
- An Icelandic Primer, with Grammar, Notes, and Glossary*
By the same Author Extra fcap 8vo 7s 6d
- An Icelandic Prose Reader, with Notes Grammar, and Glossary.*
By G Vigfusson M A, and I York Powell, M A Extra fcap 8vo 10s 6d
- A Handbook of Phonetics, including a Popular Exposition of the Principles of Spelling Reform* By H Sweet M A Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d
- Elementarbuch des Gesprochenen Englisch Grammatik,
Texte und Glossar* Von Henry Sweet Extra fcap 8vo, stiff covers 2s 6d
- The Orimulum; with the Notes and Glossary of Dr. R M.
White* Edited by R Holt, M A 1875 2 vols Extra fcap 8vo 21s
- Specimens of Early English. A New and Revised Edition.*
With Introduction Notes and Glossarial Index By R Morris F.L.D. and W W Skeat, M A
Part I From Old English Homilies to King Horn (A D 1150 to A D 1300).
Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 9d
Part II From Robert of Gloucester to Gower (A D 1298 to A D 1393)
Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 7s 6d
- Specimens of English Literature, from the 'Ploughmans Crede to the 'Shepherdes Calender' (A D. 1394 to A D 1579) With Introduction, Notes, and Glossarial Index* By W W Skeat, M A Extra fcap 8vo 7s 6d
-
- The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman, in three Parallel Texts, together with Richard the Redeless* By William Langland (about 1362-1399 A D) Edited from numerous Manuscripts, with Preface, Notes, and a Glossary, by W W Skeat, Litt D 2 vols 8vo 31s 6d Just Published
- The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman* by William Langland Edited with Notes, by W W Skeat, M A Third
Edition Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d
- Chancer. I. The Prologue to the Canterbury Tales; the Knights Tale, The Nonne Prestes Tale* Edited by R Morris, Editor of Specimens of Early English, &c. &c. Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d
- II. *The Prioresse's Tale; Sir Thopas; The Monkes
Tale, The Clerkes Tale, The Squieres Tale, &c* Edited by W. W. Skeat,
M A Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d
- III. The Tale of the Man of Lawe; The Pardoner's Tale, The Second Nonnes Tale, The Chanouns Yemannes Tale By the same Editor Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d
- Gamelyn, The Tale of.* Edited with Notes, Glossary, &c., by W W Skeat, M A Extra fcap 8vo Stiff covers, 1s 6d
- Minot (Laurence) Poems* Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Joseph Hall, M A. Extra fcap 8vo Nearly ready

Spenser's Faery Queene Books I and II Designed chiefly for the use of Schools. With Introduction, Notes, and Glossary By G W Kitchin, D.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d. each.

Hooker Ecclesiastical Polity, Book I Edited by R. W Church, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo 2s

OLD ENGLISH DRAMA

The Pilgrimage to Parnassus with The Two Parts of the Return from Parnassus Three Comedies performed in St. John's College Cambridge, A.D. MDXCVII-MDCI Edited from MSS. by the Rev W D Macray M.A., F.S.A. Medium 8vo. Bevelled Boards, Gilt top, 8s 6d.

Marlowe and Greene Marlowe's Tragical History of Dr Faustus and Greene's Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay Edited by A. W Ward, M.A. 1878 Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s 6d. In white Parchment, 6s

Marlowe Edward II With Introduction Notes, &c. By O W Tancock, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo 3s

SHAKESPEARE

Shakespeare Select Plays Edited by W G Clark, M.A., and W Aldis Wright, M.A. Extra fcap 8vo. stiff covers.

The Merchant of Venice. 1s Macbeth. 1s 6d.

Richard the Second. 1s 6d Hamlet 2s

Edited by W Aldis Wright, M.A.

The Tempest. 1s 6d Midsummer Night's Dream. 1s 6d

As You Like It. 1s 6d Coriolanus. 2s 6d

Julius Caesar 2s Henry the Fifth. 2s

Richard the Third. 2s 6d Twelfth Night 1s 6d.

King Lear 1s 6d. King John. 1s 6d

Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist a popular Illustration of the Principles of Scientific Criticism By R. G Moulton, M.A. Crown 8vo. 2s

Bacon I Advancement of Learning Edited by W Aldis Wright, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo 4s 6d

— II The Essays With Introduction and Notes. By S. H Reynolds, M.A. late Fellow of Brasenose College In Preparation

Milton I Arcopagistica With Introduction and Notes. By John W Hales, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo 3s

— II Poems Edited by R. C Browne M.A. 2 vols Fifth Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 6s 6d Sold separately Vol. I 4s 1 Vol. II 3s

In paper covers:—

Lycidas, 3d L Allegro 3d II Pensive, 4d Comus 6d

Samson Agonistes, 6d.

— III Samson Agonistes Edited with Introduction and Notes by John Churton Collins. Extra fcap. 8vo stiff covers, 1s

- Bunyan* I. The Pilgrim's Progress, Grace Abounding, Relation of the Imprisonment of Mr John Bunyan Edited, with Biographical Introduction and Notes, by E Venables, M A 1879 Extra fcap 8vo 5s
In ornamental Parchment, 6s
- II. Holy War, &c. Edited by E Venables, M A
In the Press
- Clarendon History of the Rebellion Book VI.* Edited by T Arnold, M A Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d
- Dryden Select Poems.* Stanzas on the Death of Oliver Cromwell, Astræa Redux, Annus Mirabilis, Absalom and Achitophel, Religio Laici, The Hind and the Panther Edited by W D Christie, M A Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d
- Locke's Conduct of the Understanding* Edited, with Introduction, Notes, &c, by T Fowler, M A Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 2s
- Addison Selections from Papers in the Spectator* With Notes. By T Arnold, M A Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d In ornamental Parchment, 6s
- Steele. Selections from the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian.* Edited by Austin Dobson Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d In white Parchment, 7s 6d
- Pope* With Introduction and Notes By Mark Pattison, B.D
- I. Essay on Man Extra fcap 8vo. 1s. 6d
- II Satires and Epistles. Extra fcap. 8vo 2s.
- Parnell The Hermit.* Paper covers, 2d.
- Gray Selected Poems.* Edited by Edmund Gosse Extra fcap 8vo Stiff covers, 1s 6d In white Parchment, 3s
- Elegy and Ode on Eton College. Paper covers, 2d.
- Goldsmith The Deserted Village* Paper covers, 2d
- Johnson.* I Rasselas, Lives of Dryden and Pope. Edited by Alfred Milnes, M A (London) Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d, or Lives of Dryden and Pope only, stiff covers, 2s 6d
- II Vanity of Human Wishes. With Notes, by E J. Payne, M A Paper covers, 4d
- Boswell's Life of Johnson With the Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides* Edited, with copious Notes, Appendices, and Index, by G Birbeck Hill, D C L, Pembroke College With Portraits and Facsimiles
6 vols Medium 8vo Nearly ready
- Cowper* Edited, with Life, Introductions, and Notes, by H. T Griffith, B.A
- I The Didactic Poems of 1782, with Selections from the Minor Pieces, A D 1779-1783 Extra fcap 8vo 3s
- II The Task, with Tirocinium, and Selections from the Minor Poems, A.D 1784-1799 Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 3s.

- Burke Select Works* Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by E. J. Payne, M.A.
- I Thoughts on the Present Discontents the two Speeches on America Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s 6d
- II Reflections on the French Revolution Second Edition Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s
- III Four Letters on the Proposals for Peace with the Regicide Directory of France. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s
- Keats Hyperion, Book I* With Notes by W. T. Arnold, B.A. Paper covers, 4d
- Byron Childe Harold* Edited, with Introduction and Notes by H. F. Tozer M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s 6d. In white Parchment, 5s
- Scott Lay of the Last Minstrel* Edited with Preface and Notes by W. Minto, M.A. With Map. Extra fcap. 8vo. Stiff covers, 2s Ornamental Parchment, 3s 6d
- Lay of the Last Minstrel Introduction and Canto I., with Preface and Notes, by the same Editor. 6d

II LATIN

- Rudimenta Latina* Comprising Accidence, and Exercises of a very Elementary Character for the use of Beginners. By John Barrow Allen, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s
- An Elementary Latin Grammar* By the same Author Forty-second Thousand. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d
- A First Latin Exercise Book* By the same Author Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d
- A Second Latin Exercise Book* By the same Author Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s 6d
- Reddenda Minora, or Easy Passages, Latin and Greek for Unseen Translation.* For the use of Lower Forms. Composed and selected by C. S. Jerram M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d
- Anglice Reddenda or Easy Extracts Latin and Greek for Unseen Translation.* By C. S. Jerram M.A. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d
- Anglice Reddenda, Second Series.* By the same Author Extra fcap. 8vo. Nearly ready
- Passages for Translation into Latin* For the use of Passmen and others. Selected by J. Y. Sargent M.A. Fifth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d

- Exercises in Latin Prose Composition:* with Introduction, Notes and Passages of Graduated Difficulty for Translation into Latin. By G. G. Roman, M.A., II.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Hints and Helps for Latin Elegiacs.* By H. Lee-Warner, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- First Latin Reader.* By T. J. Nunns, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Caesar. The Commentaries (for Schools)* With Notes and Maps. By Charles F. Mohr, M.A.
 Part I The Gallic War Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
 Part II The Civil War Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
The Civil War, Book I. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Cicero. Catilinarian Oration.* By E. A. Upcott, M.A., Assistant Master in Mathematics, in College. In two Parts.
- Cicero. Selection of interesting and descriptive passages.* With Notes. By Henry Wolford, M.A. In three Parts. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
 Each Part separately, lump, 1s. 6d.
 Part I. Anecdotes from Cicero and Roman History. Third Edition.
 Part II. Omens and Dreams. Beauties of Nature. Third Edition.
 Part III. Rome's Rule of her Provinces. Third Edition.
- Cicero. De Senectute.* Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by L. Huxley, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
 Or separately, Text and Introduction, 1s. Note, 1s.
- Cicero. Selected Letters (for Schools).* With Notes. By the late C. E. Pritchard, M.A., and E. R. Bernard, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Cicero. Select Orations (for Schools)* In Verrem I. De Imperio Gn. Pompeii. Pro Archia. Philippica IX. With Introduction and Notes by J. R. King, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Cornelius Nepos.* With Notes. By Oscar Browning, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Horace. Selected Odes.* With Notes for the use of a Fifth Form. By E. C. Wickham, M.A. In two Parts. Extra fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s.
 Or separately, Part I Text, 1s. Part II Notes, 1s.
- Livy. Selections (for Schools)* With Notes and Maps. By H. Lee-Warner, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. In Parts, lump, each 1s. 6d.
 Part I. The Caudine Disaster. Part II. Hannibal's Campaign in Italy. Part III. The Macedonian War.
- Livy. Books V-VII.* With Introduction and Notes. By A. R. Cluer, B.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Livy. Books XXI, XXII, and XXIII.* With Introduction and Notes. By M. T. Tatham, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

- Ovid* Selections for the use of Schools. With Introductions and Notes, and an Appendix on the Roman Calendar By W Ramsay M.A. Edited by G G Ramsay M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d
- Ovid. Tristia.* Book I The Text revised, with an Introduction and Notes. By S. G. Owen, B.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s 6d
- Plautus Captivi.* Edited by W M Lindsay, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. In the Press.
- Plautus The Trinummus* With Notes and Introductions Intended for the Higher Forms of Public Schools. By C. E. Freeman, M.A., and A. Sloman, M.A. Extra fcap, 8vo 3s
- Pliny Selected Letters* (for Schools) With Notes. By the late C. E. Prichard, M.A., and E. R. Bernard M.A. Extra fcap 8vo 3s
- Sallust* With Introduction and Notes. By W W Capes, M.A. Extra fcap, 8vo 4s 6d
- Tacitus The Annals* Books I-IV Edited, with Introduction and Notes for the use of Schools and Junior Students, by H Furzeux M.A. Extra fcap, 8vo. 5s
- Terence Andria.* With Notes and Introductions. By C E. Freeman, M.A., and A. Sloman, M.A. Extra fcap 8vo. 3s
- Adelphi With Notes and Introductions. Intended for the Higher Forms of Public Schools. By A. Sloman, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s
- Tibullus and Propertius Selections* Edited by G G Ramsay, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. (In one or two vols.) 6s Just Published.
- Virgil* With Introduction and Notes By T L Papillon M.A. Two vols. Crown 8vo 10s 6d The Text separately 4s 6d
- Virgil. The Eclogues* Edited by C. S Jerram M.A. In two Parts. Crown 8vo. Nearly ready
-
- Catullus Veronensis Liber* Iterum recognovit, apparatus criticum prolegomena appendices addidit Robinson Ellis. A.M. 1888 Demy 8vo. 16s
- A Commentary on Catullus By Robinson Ellis M.A. 1876. Demy 8vo 16s
- Catullus Veronensis Carmina Selecta*, secundum recognitionem Robinson Ellis, A.M. Extra fcap 8vo. 3s 6d.
- Cicero de Oratore* With Introduction and Notes. By A S Wilkins, M.A.
Book I 1879. 8vo 6s Book II 1881 8vo 5s
- Philippic Orations With Notes By J R King, M.A. Second Edition. 1879. 8vo 10s 6d

- Cicero Select Letters* With English Introductions, Notes, and Appendices By Albert Watson, M A Third Edition Demy 8vo 18s
- Select Letters. Text. By the same Editor. Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 4s
- pro Cluentio. With Introduction and Notes. By W. Ramsay, M A Edited by G G Ramsay, M A 2nd Ed Ext fcap 8vo 3s 6d
- Horace* With a Commentary. Volume I The Odes, Carmen Seculare, and Epodes By Edward C Wickham, M A Second Edition 1877 Demy 8vo 12s
- A reprint of the above, in a size suitable for the use of Schools Extra fcap 8vo 5s 6d
- Lucy*, Book I With Introduction, Historical Examination, and Notes By J R Seeley, M A Second Edition 1881 8vo 6s
- Ovid. P. Ovidii Nasonis Ibis*. Ex Novis Codicibus edidit, Scholia Vetera Commentarium cum Prolegomenis Appendice Indice addidit, R Ellis, A M 8vo 10s 6d
- Persius The Satires*. With a Translation and Commentary. By John Conington, M A Edited by Henry Nettleship, M A Second Edition 1874 8vo 7s 6d
- Juvenal. XIII Satires* Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by C H Pearson, M A, and Herbert A Strong, M A, LL D, Professor of Latin in Liverpool University College, Victoria University In two Parts Crown 8vo Complete, 6s Just Published
- Also separately*, Part I Introduction, Text, etc., 3s Part II Notes, 3s 6d
- Tacitus The Annals* Books I-VI Edited, with Introduction and Notes by H Furneaux, M A 8vo 18s
-
- Nettleship (H., M A) Lectures and Essays* on Subjects connected with Latin Scholarship and Literature Crown 8vo 7s 6d
- The Roman Saturna. its original form in connection with its literary development 8vo sewed, 1s
- Ancient Lives of Vergil. With an Essay on the Poems of Vergil, in connection with his Life and Times 8vo sewed 2s
- Papillon (T L., M A) A Manual of Comparative Philology*. Third Edition, Revised and Corrected 1882 Crown 8vo 6s
- Pinder (North, M A.) Selections from the less known Latin Poets* 1869. 8vo 15s
- Sellar (W. Y., M A.) Roman Poets of the Augustan Age*. VIRGIL New Edition 1883 Crown 8vo 9s
- Roman Poets of the Republic. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged 1881 8vo 14s
- Wordsworth (F., M A) Fragments and Specimens of Early Latin* With Introductions and Notes 1874 8vo 18s

III. GREEK.

- A Greek Primer*, for the use of beginners in that Language.
By the Right Rev Charles Wordsworth D.C.L. Seventh Edition Extra fcap
8vo 1s 6d
- Easy Greek Reader* By Evelyn Abbott, M.A. In two Parts. Extra fcap 8vo. 3s Just Published
The Text and Notes may be had separately 1s 6d each.
- Græcæ Grammaticæ Rudimenta* in usum Scholarum Auctore Carolo Wordsworth D.C.L. Nineteenth Edition, 1882 12mo 4s
- A Greek-English Lexicon*, abridged from Liddell and Scott's 4th edition chiefly for the use of Schools. Twenty first Edition 1884.
Square 12mo 7s 6d.
- Greek Verbs, Irregular and Defective* their forms meaning, and quantity; embracing all the Tenses used by Greek writers, with references to the passages in which they are found. By W Veitch. Fourth Edition Crown 8vo 10s 6d.
- The Elements of Greek Accentuation* (for Schools) abridged from his larger work by H W Chandler M.A. Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d
- A SERIES OF GRADUATED GREEK READERS —
- First Greek Reader* By W G Rushbrooke, M.L. Second Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d.
- Second Greek Reader* By A. M Bell, M.A. Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d.
- Fourth Greek Reader, being Specimens of Greek Dialects*
With Introductions, etc. By W W Merry M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s 6d
- Fifth Greek Reader* Selections from Greek Epic and Dramatic Poetry with Introductions and Notes. By Evelyn Abbott, M.A.
Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s 6d
- The Golden Treasury of Ancient Greek Poetry* being a Collection of the finest passages in the Greek Classic Poets, with Introductory Notices and Notes. By R. S. Wright, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo 8s 6d
- A Golden Treasury of Greek Prose, being a Collection of the* finest passages in the principal Greek Prose Writers with Introductory Notices and Notes. By R. S. Wright, M.A., and J. E. L. Shadwell, M.A. Extra fcap.
8vo. 4s 6d
- Aeschylus Prometheus Bound* (for Schools). With Introduction and Notes, by A. O Prickard, M.A. Second Edition Extra fcap. 8vo 1s
- Agamemnon With Introduction and Notes by Arthur
Sidgwick, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 3s
- Choephoroi With Introduction and Notes by the same
Editor Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s

- Aristophanes.* In Single Plays. Edited, with English Notes, Introductions, &c, by W. W. Merry, M A. Extra fcap 8vo
- I. The Clouds, Second Edition, 2s.
 II. The Acharnians, 2s.      III. The Frogs, 2s.
- Cebes. Tabula* With Introduction and Notes. By C. S. Jerram, M A Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d.
- Demosthenes Olynthiacs and Philippics* Edited by Evelyn Abbott, M A Extra fcap. 8vo In two Parts In the Press
- Euripides Alcestis* (for Schools). By C. S. Jerram, M A. Extra fcap. 8vo 2s 6d
- Helena. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, etc, for Upper and Middle Forms By C. S. Jerram, M A Extra fcap 8vo. 3s
- Iphigenia in Tauris. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, etc, for Upper and Middle Forms By C. S. Jerram, M A Extra fcap 8vo. cloth, 3s
- Medea By C. B. Heberden, M A. In two Parts. Extra fcap 8vo 2s
- Or separately, Part I Introduction and Text, 1s Part II Notes and Appendices, 1s
- Herodotus, Selections from* Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and a Map, by W. W. Merry, M A Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d.
- Homer. Odyssey,* Books I–XII (for Schools) By W. W. Merry, M A Twenty-seventh Thousand Extra fcap 8vo. 4s 6d
- Book II, separately, 1s 6d
- Odyssey, Books XIII–XXIV (for Schools). By the same Editor Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 5s
- Iliad, Book I (for Schools). By D. B. Monro, M. A. Second Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 2s
- Iliad, Books I–XII (for Schools) With an Introduction, a brief Homeric Grammar, and Notes By D. B. Monro, M A Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 6s
- Iliad, Books VI and XXI. With Introduction and Notes By Herbert Hailstone, M A Extra fcap 8vo 1s 6d each
- Lucian. Vera Historia* (for Schools) By C. S. Jerram, M. A. Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 1s 6d
- Plato. Selections from the Dialogues* [including the whole of the Apology and Crito] With Introduction and Notes by John Purves, M A, and a Preface by the Rev. B. Jowett, M A. Extra fcap 8vo 6s 6d.

Sophocles For the use of Schools. Edited with Introductions and English Notes. By Lewis Campbell M.A., and Evelyn Abbott, M.A. New and Revised Edition. 2 Vols. Extra fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d
Sold separately Vol. I, Text, 4s 6d.; Vol. II, Explanatory Notes, 6s

Sophocles In Single Plays, with English Notes, &c By Lewis Campbell, M.A., and Evelyn Abbott, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo limp.
Oedipus Tyrannus, Philoctetes New and Revised Edition, 2s each.
Oedipus Coloneus, Antigone, 1s 9d each.
Ajax, Electra, Trachinians, 2s each.

— Oedipus Rex Dindorf's Text, with Notes by the present Bishop of St. David's. Extra fcap. 8vo limp. 1s 6d

Theocritus (for Schools). With Notes. By H Kynaston D.D (late Snow). Third Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d

Xenophon Easy Selections (for Junior Classes) With a Vocabulary Notes, and Map By J S Phillpotts, B.C.L. and C S Jerram M.A. Third Edition Extra fcap 8vo. 3s 6d

— Selections (for Schools) With Notes and Maps. By J S. Phillpotts, B.C.L. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap 8vo. 3s 6d

— Anabasis, Book I Edited for the use of Junior Classes and Private Students. With Introduction Notes, etc. By J Marshall M.A. Rector of the Royal High School Edinburgh. Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d

— Anabasis Book II With Notes and Map By C S Jerram, M.A. Extra fcap 8vo. 2s

— Cyropaedia Books IV and V With Introduction and Notes by C. Bigg, D.D Extra fcap. 8vo 2s 6d

Aristotle's Politics By W L Newman, M.A [In the Press]

Aristotelian Studies I On the Structure of the Seventh Book of the Nicomachean Ethics. By J C. Wilson M.A 8vo. stiff, 2s

Aristotelis Ethica Nicomachea ex recensione Immanuelis Bekkeri. Crown 8vo. 5s

Demosthenes and Aeschines The Orations of Demosthenes and Aeschines on the Crown With Introductory Essays and Notes. By G A. Simcox M.A., and W H Simcox, M.A. 18, 2 8vo 12s

Head (Barclay V). Historia Numorum A Manual of Greek Numismatics. Royal 8vo. half bound. 2s. 2s Just Pub. 1887

Hicks (E L M.A.) A Manual of Greek Historical Inscriptions Demy 8vo 10s 6d

Homer. Odyssey, Books I–XII Edited with English Notes, Appendices, etc., By W W Merry, M A, and the late James Riddell, M A 1886 Second Edition Demy 8vo 16s

Homer A Grammar of the Homeric Dialect. By D. B. Monro, M A Demy 8vo 10s 6d

Sophocles The Plays and Fragments. With English Notes and Introductions, by Lewis Campbell, M A 2 vols

Vol I Oedipus Tyrannus Oedipus Coloneus Antigone 8vo 16s

Vol II Ajax Electra Trachiniae Philoctetes Fragments 8vo 16s

IV. FRENCH AND ITALIAN.

Brachet's Etymological Dictionary of the French Language, with a Preface on the Principles of French Etymology Translated into English by G W Kitchin, D D Third Edition Crown 8vo 7s 6d

— Historical Grammar of the French Language Translated into English by G W Kitchin, D D Fourth Edition Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d

Works by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M A

Primer of French Literature. Extra fcap 8vo. 2s

Short History of French Literature Crown 8vo 10s. 6d.

Specimens of French Literature, from Villon to Hugo Crown 8vo. 9s

MASTERPIECES OF THE FRENCH DRAMA

Cornelle's Horace. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by George Saintsbury, M A Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d

Molière's Les Précieuses Ridicules Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Andrew Lang, M A Extra fcap 8vo 1s 6d

Racine's Esther. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by George Saintsbury, M A Extra fcap 8vo 2s Just Published

Beaumarchais' Le Barbier de Séville. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Austin Dobson Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d

Voltaire's Mérope. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by George Saintsbury Extra fcap 8vo cloth, 2s

Musset's On ne badine pas avec l'Amour, and Fantasio Edited, with Prolegomena, Notes, etc., by Walter Hernes Pollock Extra fcap. 8vo 2s

The above six Plays may be had in ornamental case, and bound in Imitation Parchment, price 12s 6d.

- Sainte-Beuve Selections from the Causeries du Lundi* Edited by George Saintsbury Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s
- Quinet's Lettres à sa Mère* Selected and edited by George Saintsbury Extra fcap. 8vo 2s
- Gautier Théophile Scenes of Travel* Selected and Edited by George Saintsbury Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s
- L'Éloquence de la Chaire et de la Tribune Françaises* Edited by Paul Blouët, B.A. (Univ. Gallie) Vol. I. French Sacred Oratory Extra fcap. 8vo 2s 6d.

Edited by GUSTAVE MASSON B.A.

- Cornelle's Cinna* With Notes, Glossary, etc. Extra fcap. 8vo cloth 2s Stiff covers, 1s 6d
- Louis XIV and his Contemporaries* as described in Extracts from the best Memoirs of the Seventeenth Century With English Notes, Genealogical Tables, &c. Extra fcap 8vo. 2s 6d.
- Maistre Avvier de Voyage autour de ma Chambre* Ourika, by Madame de Duras Le Vieux Talleur by M<sup>lle</sup> Erikmann-Chastan; La Veillée de Vincennes, by Alfred de Vigny, Les Jumeaux de l'Hotel Cornelle, by Edmond About; Mémoires d'un Écolier by Rodolphe Teyssier Third Edition, Revised and Corrected. Extra fcap. 8vo 2s 6d
- Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin*, and Racine's Athalie With Voltaire's Life of Molière Extra fcap. 8vo 2s 6d
- Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin* With Voltaire's Life of Molière. Extra fcap. 8vo. stiff covers, 1s. 6d
- Molière's Les Femmes Savantes* With Notes, Glossary, etc Extra fcap 8vo. cloth 2s Stiff covers, 1s 6d
- Racine's Andromaque* and Cornelle's Le Menteur With Louis Racine's Life of his Father Extra fcap 8vo. 2s 6d
- Regnard's Le Foueur*, and Brueys and Palaprat's Le Grandeur Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d
- Steuert Madame de and her chief Contemporaries Selections from the Correspondence of* Intended more especially for Girls &c. Look Extra fcap. 8vo 3s

- Dante* Selections from the Inferno With Introduction and Notes. By H. B. Cotterill B.A. Extra fcap. 8vo 4s 6d
- Tasso La Gerusalemme Liberata* Cantos i. ii. With Introduction and Notes. By the same Editor Extra fcap. 8vo 2s 6d

V GERMAN.

Scherer (W). A History of German Literature. Translated from the Third German Edition by Mrs F Conybeare Edited by F Max Muller 2 vols 8vo 21s

Max Muller. The German Classics, from the Fourth to the Nineteenth Century With Biographical Notices, Translations into Modern German, and Notes By F Max Muller, M A A New Edition, Revised, Enlarged, and Adapted to Wilhelm Scherer's 'History of German Literature,' by F Lichtenstein 2 vols crown 8vo 21s

GERMAN COURSE By HERMANN LANGE

The Germans at Home, a Practical Introduction to German Conversation, with an Appendix containing the Essentials of German Grammar. Second Edition 8vo 2s 6d

The German Manual, a German Grammar, Reading Book, and a Handbook of German Conversation 8vo 7s 6d

Grammar of the German Language. 8vo 3s. 6d

German Composition, A Theoretical and Practical Guide to the Art of Translating English Prose into German 8vo 4s 6d

Lessing's Laokoon. With Introduction, English Notes, etc. By A Hamann, Phil Doc, M A Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d

Schaller's Wilhelm Tell Translated into English Verse by E Massie, M A Extra fcap 8vo 5s

Also, Edited by C A BUCHHEIM, Phil Doc

Becker's Friedrich der Grosse Extra fcap 8vo. In the Press

Goethe's Egmont. With a Life of Goethe, &c. Third Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 3s

— Iphigenie auf Tauris. A Drama. With a Critical Introduction and Notes Second Edition Extra fcap. 8vo 3s.

Heine's Prosa, being Selections from his Prose Works. With English Notes, etc Extra fcap 8vo. 4s 6d.

Heine's Harzreise With Life of Heine Descriptive Sketch of the Harz, and Index Extra fcap 8vo paper covers, 1s 6d, cloth, 2s 6d.

Lessing's Minna von Barnhelm. A Comedy. With a Life of Lessing, Critical Analysis, etc Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d

— Nathan der Weise. With Introduction, Notes. Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d

- Schiller's Historische Skizzen Egmont's Leben und Tod and Belagerung von Antwerpen* With a Map. Extra fcap. 8vo 2s 6d
- Wilhelm Tell With a Life of Schiller, an historical and critical Introduction, Arguments, and a complete Commentary and Map. Sixth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo 3s 6d
- Wilhelm Tell School Edition. With Map 2s

- Modern German Reader* A Graduated Collection of Extracts in Prose and Poetry from Modern German writers —
- Part I. With English Notes, a Grammatical Appendix, and a complete Vocabulary. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Part II. With English Notes and an Index. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d

- Niebuhr's Griechische Heroen Geschichten* Tales of Greek Heroes. Edited with English Notes and a Vocabulary by Emma S. Bachheim. School Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo., cloth 2s. Stiff covers 1s 6d

VI MATHEMATICS, PHYSICAL SCIENCE, &c

By LEWIS HENSLEY M.A.

- Figures made Easy* a first Arithmetic Book. Crown 8vo 6d
- Answers to the Examples in Figures made Easy* together with two thousand additional Examples with Answers. Crown 8vo 1s
- The Scholar's Arithmetic* with Answers. Crown 8vo 4s 6d
- The Scholar's Algebra* Crown 8vo. 4s 6d

- Aldis (W. S., M.A.)* A Text Book of Algebra Crown 8vo
Nearly ready
- Baynes (R. E., M.A.)* Lessons on Thermodynamics 1878
Crown 8vo 7s 6d
- Chambers (G. F. F.R.A.S.)* A Handbook of Descriptive Astronomy Third Edition. 1877. Demy 8vo. 28s
- Clarke (Col. A. R. C.B., R.E.)* Geodesy 1880. 8vo. 12s 6d
- Cremona (Luigi)* Elements of Projective Geometry Translated by C. Leudeford M.A. 8vo. 12s 6d
- Donkin* Acoustics Second Edition. Crown 8vo 7s 6d
- Euclid Revised* Containing the Essentials of the Elements of Plane Geometry as given by Euclid in his first six Books. Edited by R. C. J. Nixon, M.A. Crown 8vo. 1s 6d

Sold separately as follows

- Books I-IV 3s 6d      Books I II 1s 6d
Book I 1s

- Galton (Douglas, C B, F.R.S.). The Construction of Healthy Dwellings* Demy 8vo. 10s 6d.
- Hamilton (Sir R. G. C.), and J. Ball. Book-keeping.* New and enlarged Edition Extra fcap 8vo limp cloth, 2s Ruled Exercise books adapted to the above may be had, price 2s
- Harcourt (A. G. Vernon, M.A.), and H. G. Madan, M.A. Exercises in Practical Chemistry* Vol I Elementary Exercises Third Edition Crown 8vo 9s
- Maclaren (Archibald) A System of Physical Education* Theoretical and Practical Extra fcap 8vo 7s 6d
- Madan (H. G., M.A.) Tables of Qualitative Analysis.* Large 4to paper, 4s 6d
- Maxwell (J. Clerk, M.A., F.R.S.) A Treatise on Electricity and Magnetism* Second Edition 2 vols Demy 8vo 1l 11s 6d
- An Elementary Treatise on Electricity. Edited by William Garnett, M.A. Demy 8vo 7s 6d
- Minchin (G. M., M.A.) A Treatise on Statics with Applications to Physics* Third Edition, Corrected and Enlarged Vol I Equilibrium of Coplanar Forces 8vo 9s Vol II Statics 8vo 16s
- Uniplanar Kinematics of Solids and Fluids. Crown 8vo 7s 6d
- Phillips (John, M.A., F.R.S.). Geology of Oxford and the Valley of the Thames* 1871 8vo 21s
- Vesuvius. 1869 Crown 8vo. 10s 6d
- Prestwich (Joseph, M.A., F.R.S.) Geology, Chemical, Physical, and Stratigraphical* Vol I Chemical and Physical Royal 8vo 25s
- Roach (T., M.A.) Elementary Trigonometry* Crown 8vo
Nearly ready
- Rolleston's Forms of Animal Life* Illustrated by Descriptions and Drawings of Dissections New Edition (Nearly ready)
- Smyth. A Cycle of Celestial Objects* Observed, Reduced, and Discussed by Admiral W. H. Smyth, R.N. Revised, condensed, and greatly enlarged by G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S. 1881 8vo Price reduced to 12s
- Stewart (Balfour, LL.D., F.R.S.) A Treatise on Heat*, with numerous Woodcuts and Diagrams Fourth Edition Extra fcap 8vo 7s 6d

- Vernon Harcourt (L.F., M.A.) A Treatise on Rivers and Canals* relating to the Control and Improvement of Rivers, and the Design, Construction, and Development of Canals. 2 vols. (Vol. I Text. Vol. II Plates.) 8vo. 21s
- Harbours and Docks their Physical Features, History, Construction, Equipment, and Maintenance; with Statistics as to their Commercial Development. 2 vols. 8vo 25s
- Watson (H.W., M.A.) A Treatise on the Kinetic Theory of Gases* 1876 8vo. 3s 6d
- Watson (H.W.D.Sc., F.R.S.), and S.H. Burbury M.A.*
 I. A Treatise on the Application of Generalised Coordinates to the Kinetics of a Material System 1879 8vo 6s
 II. The Mathematical Theory of Electricity and Magnetism Vol I Electrodynamics. 8vo. 10s 6d.
- Williamson (A.W., Phil. Doc., F.R.S.) Chemistry for Students* A new Edition with Solutions. 1873. Extra fcap. 8vo 5s 6d

VII HISTORY

- Bluntschli (F.K.) The Theory of the State* By J.K. Bluntschli, late Professor of Political Sciences in the University of Heidelberg. Authorised English Translation from the Sixth German Edition. Demy 8vo. half bound 12s 6d.
- Finlay (George LL.D.) A History of Greece from its Conquest by the Romans to the present time B.C. 146 to A.D. 1864* A new Edition, revised throughout and in part re-written, with considerable additions, by the Author and edited by H.F. Tozer M.A., vols. 8vo. 3s 10s
- Fortescue (Sir John, Kt.) The Governance of England:* otherwise called The Difference between an Absolute and a Limited Monarchy A Revised Text. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by Charles Plummer M.A. 8vo half bound, 12s 6d.
- Freeman (E.A., D.C.L.) A Short History of the Norman Conquest of England* Second Edition. Extra fcap 8vo. 2s 6d.
- George (H.B. M.A.) Genealogical Tables illustrative of Modern History* Third Edition, revised and Enlarged. Small 4to 12s
- Hodgkin (T.) Italy and her Invaders* Illustrated with Plates and Maps. Vols. I—IV, A.D. 36—153. 8vo 3s 8s
- Kitchin (G.W., D.D.) A History of France* With numerous Maps, Plans, and Tables. In Three Volumes. Second Edition Crown 8o each 10s 6d
- Vol. 1 Down to the Year 1453.
 Vol. 2 From 1453—1624
 Vol. 3 From 1624—1913

Payne (E. F., M.A.) A History of the United States of America In the Press

Ranke (L. von) A History of England, principally in the Seventeenth Century Translated by Resident Members of the University of Oxford, under the superintendence of G W Kitchin, D D, and C W Boase, M A 1875 6 vols 8vo 3l 3s

Rawlinson (George, M.A.) A Manual of Ancient History. Second Edition Demy 8vo 14s.

Select Charters and other Illustrations of English Constitutional History, from the Earliest Times to the Reign of Edward I Arranged and edited by W Stubbs, D D Fifth Edition 1883 Crown 8vo 8s 6d

Stubbs (W., D D) The Constitutional History of England, in its Origin and Development Library Edition 3 vols demy 8vo 2l 8s
Also in 3 vols crown 8vo price 12s each

— Seventeen Lectures on the Study of Medieval and Modern History, &c, delivered at Oxford 1867-1884 Demy 8vo half-bound, 10s 6d

Wellesley. A Selection from the Despatches, Treaties, and other Papers of the Marquess Wellesley, K G, during his Government of India Edited by S J Owen, M A 1877 8vo 1l 4s

Wellington A Selection from the Despatches, Treaties, and other Papers relating to India of Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington, K G. Edited by S J Owen, M A 1880. 8vo 24s

A History of British India By S. J. Owen, M.A., Reader in Indian History in the University of Oxford In preparation

VIII LAW.

Alberici Gentilis, I C D, I C, De Iure Belli Libri Tres. Edidit T. E Holland, I C D 1877 Small 4to half morocco, 21s

Anson (Sir William R, Bart., D C L) Principles of the English Law of Contract, and of Agency in its Relation to Contract Fourth Edition Demy 8vo 10s 6d

— Law and Custom of the Constitution. Part I. Parliament Demy 8vo 10s 6d

Bentham (Jeremy) An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation Crown 8vo 6s 6d

Digby (Kenelm E., M.A.) An Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property Third Edition Demy 8vo 10s 6d

Gau Institutionum Juris Civilis Commentarii Quattuor, or, Elements of Roman Law by Gaus With a Translation and Commentary by Edward Poste, M A. Second Edition 1875. 8vo 18s

Hall (W E, M.A.) International Law Second Ed 8vo 21s

Holland (T E., D.C.L.) The Elements of Jurisprudence
Third Edition. Demy 8vo 10s 6d

— The European Concert in the Eastern Question a Collection of Treaties and other Public Acts Edited, with Introductions and Notes, by Thomas Erskine Holland D.C.L. 8vo. 12s 6d

Imperatoris Iustiniani Institutionum Libri Quattuor with Introductions Commentary Excursus and Translation. By J R. Moyle B.C.L.
M.A. 2 vols Demy 8vo. 21s

Iustinian The Institutes of, edited as a recension of the Institutes of Gaius by Thomas Erskine Holland D.C.L. Second Edition
1881 Extra fcap 8vo 5s

Iustinian Select Titles from the Digest of By T E Holland, D.C.L., and C. L. Shadwell, B.C.L. 8vo 14s

Also sold in Parts, in paper covers, as follows —

Part I Introductory Titles. 2s 6d Part II Family Law 1s.
Part III Property Law 2s 6d. Part IV Law of Obligations (No. 1) 3s 6d
Part V Law of Obligations (No. 2). 4s 6d

Lex Aquilia. The Roman Law of Damage to Property being a Commentary on the Title of the Digest Ad Legem Aquilianam (ix. 2)
With an Introduction to the Study of the Corpus Iuris Civilis. By Lewis Gruber Dr Jur., M.A. Demy 8vo. 10s 6d

Markby (W D.C.L.) Elements of Law considered with reference to Principles of General Jurisprudence Third Edition Demy 8vo 12s 6d

Travis (Sir Travers D.C.L.) The Law of Nations considered as Independent Political Communities.

Part I On the Rights and Duties of Nations in time of Peace A new Edition
Revised and Enlarged 1884. Demy 8vo 14s

Part II On the Rights and Duties of Nations in Time of War Second Edition
Revised 1875 Demy 8vo 21s

IX. MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY, &c

Bacon's Novum Organum Edited, with English Notes, by G W Kitchin, D.D. 1855 8vo. 9s 6d

— Translated by G W Kitchin, D.D. 1855. 8vo. 9s 6d

Berkeley The Works of George Berkeley D.D., formerly Bishop of Cloyne including many of his writings hitherto unpublished
With Prefaces, Annotations and an Account of his Life and Writings by Alexander Campbell Fraser M.A. 4 vols. 1811 8vo 21 18s

The Life Letters &c. 1 vol. 16s

— Selections from With an Introduction and Notes for the use of Students in the Universities By Alexander Campbell Fraser LL.D. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 1 6d.

Fowler (T, D D). The Elements of Deductive Logic, designed mainly for the use of Junior Students in the Universities Eighth Edition, with a Collection of Examples Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d

— The Elements of Inductive Logic, designed mainly for the use of Students in the Universities Fourth Edition Extra fcap 8vo 6s

Edited by T FOWLER, D D

Bacon Novum Organum With Introduction, Notes, &c 1878 8vo 14s

Locke's Conduct of the Understanding Second Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 2s

Danson (J T). The Wealth of Households Crown 8vo 5s

Green (T H, M A) Prolegomena to Ethics. Edited by A C Bradley, M A Demy 8vo 12s 6d

Hegel. The Logic of Hegel, translated from the Encyclopaedia of the Philosophical Sciences With Prolegomena by William Wallace, M A 1874 8vo 14s

Lotze's Logic, in Three Books, of Thought, of Investigation, and of Knowledge English Translation, Edited by B Bosanquet, M A Fellow of University College, Oxford 8vo cloth, 12s 6d

— Metaphysic, in Three Books; Ontology, Cosmology, and Psychology English Translation, Edited by B Bosanquet, M A 8vo cloth, 12s 6d

Martineau (James, D D) Types of Ethical Theory Second Edition 2 vols Crown 8vo 15s

Rogers (J. E Thorold, M A) A Manual of Political Economy, for the use of Schools Third Edition Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d

Smith's Wealth of Nations A new Edition, with Notes, by J E Thorold Rogers M A 2 vols 8vo 1880 21s

Wilson (J M., B D), and T. Fowler, D D The Principles of Morals (Introductory Chapters) 8vo boards, 3s 6d

X. ART, &c.

Hullah (John). The Cultivation of the Speaking Voice. Second Edition Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d

Ouseley (Sir F. A. Gore, Bart). A Treatise on Harmony. Third Edition 4to 10s

— A Treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue, based upon that of Cherubini. Second Edition 4to 16s

— A Treatise on Musical Form and General Composition Second Edition 4to 10s

- Hall (W E., M.A.) International Law* Second Ed 8vo 21s
- Holland (T E., D.C.L.) The Elements of Jurisprudence*
Third Edition Demy 8vo 10s 6d
- The European Concert in the Eastern Question a Collection of Treaties and other Public Acts. Edited with Introductions and Notes, by Thomas Erskine Holland, D.C.L. 8vo. 12s 6d.
- Imperatoris Iustiniani Institutionum Libri Quattuor*, with Introductions, Commentary Excursus and Translation. By J. B. Moyle B.C.L. M.A. 2 vols. Demy 8vo 31s
- Iustinian The Institutes of*, edited as a recension of the Institutes of Gaius, by Thomas Erskine Holland, D.C.L. Second Edition 1881 Extra fcap 8vo 5s
- Iustinian, Select Titles from the Digest of* By T. E. Holland, D.C.L., and C. L. Shadwell, B.C.L. 8vo 14s
- Also sold in Paris, in paper covers, as follows —
- Part I Introductory Titles. 2s. 6d. Part II Family Law 1s.
- Part III Property Law 2s. 6d. Part IV Law of Obligations (No 1) 3s. 6d
- Part IV Law of Obligations (No 2) 4s 6d
- Lex Aquilia* The Roman Law of Damage to Property, being a Commentary on the Title of the Digest Ad Legem Aquilliam (ix. 2) With an Introduction to the Study of the Corpus Iuris Civilis. By Erwin Grueber Dr Jur M.A. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Markby (W., D.C.L.) Elements of Law* considered with reference to Principles of General Jurisprudence Third Edition. Demy 8vo 12s. 6d.
- Tauss (Sir Travers D.C.L.) The Law of Nations considered as Independent Political Communities*
- Part I. On the Rights and Duties of Nations in time of Peace A new Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 1854. Demy 8vo. 12s
- Part II. On the Rights and Duties of Nations in Time of War Second Edition Revised. 1875 Demy 8vo 21s

IX. MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY, &c.

- Bacon's Novum Organum* Edited, with English Notes, by G. W. Kitchin, D.D. 1855. 8vo. 9s 6d
- Translated by G. W. Kitchin, D.D. 1855. 8vo. 9s 6d.
- Berkeley The Works of George Berkeley D.D.* formerly Bishop of Cloyne; including many of his writings hitherto unpublished. With Prefaces, Annotations, and an Account of his Life and Philosophy by Alexander Campbell Fraser M.A. 4 vols. 1871 8vo. 27 18s.
- The Life Letters &c.* 2 vol. 16s.
- Selections from With an Introduction and Notes. For the use of Students in the Universities. By Alexander Campbell Fraser LL.D. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s 6d.

- Fowler (T. D. D.). The Elements of Deductive Logic* designed mainly for the use of Junior Students in the Universities. Eighth Edition, with a Collection of Examples. Extra fcap 8vo 3s 6d
- The Elements of Inductive Logic, designed mainly for the use of Students in the Universities. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 6s
- Edited by T FOWLER, D D
- Bacon. Novum Organum*. With Introduction, Notes &c. 1878. 8vo 1s
- Locke's Conduct of the Understanding*. Second Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 2s
- Danson (J. T.) The Wealth of Households*. Crown 8vo 5s
- Green (T. H. M. A.). Prolegomena to Ethics*. Edited by A. C. Bradley, M. A. Demy 8vo 12s 6d
- Hegel The Logic of Hegel*; translated from the Encyclopaedia of the Philosophical Sciences. With Prolegomena by William Wallace, M. A. 1874. 8vo 1s
- Lotze's Logic*, in Three Books, of Thought, of Investigation, and of Knowledge. English Translation, Edited by B. Bosanquet, M. A. Fellow of University College, Oxford. 8vo cloth, 12s 6d
- Metaphysic, in Three Books; Ontology, Cosmology, and Psychology. English Translation, Edited by B. Bosanquet, M. A. 8vo cloth, 12s 6d
- Martineau (James, D. D.) Types of Ethical Theory*. Second Edition. 2 vols. Crown 8vo 15s
- Rogers (J. E. Thorold, M. A.). A Manual of Political Economy*, for the use of Schools. Third Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 4s 6d
- Smith's Wealth of Nations*. A new Edition, with Notes, by J. E. Thorold Rogers, M. A. 2 vols. 8vo 1880 21s
- Wilson (J. M., B. D.), and T. Fowler, D. D. The Principles of Morals* (Introductory Chapters). 8vo boards, 3s 6d

X. ART, &amp;c.

- Hullah (John) The Cultivation of the Speaking Voice*. Second Edition. Extra fcap 8vo 2s 6d
- Ouseley (Sir F. A. Gore, Bart.) A Treatise on Harmony*. Third Edition. 4to 10s
- A Treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue, based upon that of Cherubini. Second Edition. 4to 16s
- A Treatise on Musical Form and General Composition. Second Edition. 4to 10s

- Robinson (J. C., F.S.A.) A Critical Account of the Drawings by Michelangelo and Raffaello in the University Galleries, Oxford 16 s. Crown 8vo. 4s.*
- Ruskin (John U.A.). A Course of Lectures on Art, delivered before the University of Oxford in Hilary Term 1850 8vo. 6s*
- Treutbeck (J., M.A.) and R. F. Dale M.A. A Music Primer (for Schools). Second Edition. Crown 8vo 1s 6d*
- Tyrwhitt (R. St. J., M.A.). A Handbook of Pictorial Art With coloured Illustrations, Photographs, and a chapter on Perspective by A. Macdonald. Second Edition. 18 s. 8vo. half morocco, 18s*
- Uppcott (L. E., M.A.). An Introduction to the History of Architecture Crown 8vo. 4s 6d*
- Taux (W. S. W., U.A.) The History of Architecture in the Later Middle Ages Crown 8vo. 4s 6d*